6 At the same time the South sea at the Indies was discovered: For Vasco Nuygues of Balboa, jealous that any other should obtain commission from the king to that effect, and depriue him of the honour of this discouerie, which he had now attempted, without attending any answer from Spaine, nor the 1000 Spaniards which he had demanded from the king, parting from the Antique of Darien, in September this yeare 1513, with 190 Spaniards, in a galleon and ten barks, he came to Careta, where he landed his troupe, and marcht into the country of the Cachico Pansa, whom he forced to giue him gold, and guides to conduct him to the mountaines, whereof notice had bene giuen him by the Cachico D. Charles Panquiao. With these guides they came into a country called Quareca, and the Cachico Torecha, where they were forced to fight: They slue the lord and dispersed his people, not accustomed to see such great wounds as swords of yron make, nor to heare the noyse of harquebuses, nor the biting of furious dogs, which the Spaniards led to the warre with them, whom they caused to teare in peeces certaine Indian Sodomites, whom they found in that country. Pasing on, Vasco Nuygues went vpon certaine high mountaine, with 67 of his souldiers, leauing the rest to gard them that were hurt and sicke, in a burrough at the foot of the mountaine. Being nere vnto the top, he caused his troupe to stay, and would himselfe goe vp alone, where he discouered the waters of the South Ocean, for the which he was exceeding glad, and gaue God thanks, and then he called all the souldiers to haue them see it. There they made mounds of stones, in signe of possession taken. Being come from the mountaine, they went to assaile a Cachico, called Chiape, who being obdurate, they put to fight: yet being friendly invited he returned, and made himselfe vassall to the king of Castille, accompanying him vnto the South sea shore, whereof they tooke possession, and drew a writing on the 29 of September, being S. Michaels day 1513. By this seruice which Vasco Nuygues of Balboa did then vnto the king, he well deserved his pardon, if he had offended in any thing. The company which he had left at Quareca being ioyned with him, he past a great riuer with 80 Spaniards leauing the rest vpon the banks, and went and forced another Cachico, called Cogue, who put himselfe in defence, as Chiape had done, and brought him vnder his obedience. Then thrust on with a great courage, he would enter into that sea, notwithstanding that Chiape did dissuade him, saying, That the current was strong & troublesome: so as he was in danger of drowning, seeking to recover a nere island, where he arrived, with much paine and perill. There reigned there a Cachico called Tumaco, who made offer to fight, but being aduertised by the Indians, guides to Chiape, that the Spaniards were good men, this Tumaco sent them a sonne of his, to know what they demanded: Vasco Nuygues spake courteously vnto him, appaialed him, and gaue him looking glases,

South sea discovered by Vasco Nuygues of Balboa.

L

M

1513

A fes, with such other toies, the which he carrying to his company, it moued them so, as Tumaco came himselfe in person to the Spanish troupe with shewes of loue and friendship, of whom the Spaniards demanded perles, for they saw the Indians of his company weare some, whereof they did furnish them with a good quantity, and aduertised them that there was a plash nere hand, where they did fish some as big as a mans eye, the which did please the courteous Spaniards and their Captaines: but for that they were few, and there were great difficulties and dangers, they deferred this prey vnto another voyage, wherefore they returned to their companions, & past into the country of the Cachico Chiape, where they refreshed themselves, and rested some daies. Chiape the Cachico did also fish vpon his shoare, and gaue them about foure charges of perles. Vasco Nuygues of Balboa tooke his leaue of him, leauing some Spaniards with him, for he wept being much grieued at their departure, for the opinion he had of their wisdom: then they past a riuer to come into the countrie of a Cachico called Tecoa, where the Spaniards were receiued with great ioy, and Tecoa gaue them presents of gold and perles. From thence they went through desert and barren places, full of Tygres, and Lyons with hunger, thirst, and extreame danger, into the lands of Parra, a cruell tyrant, and a Sodomite, who pursued by the conscience of his owne wickednes, thought to escape by flight, but he was brought backe, and after information made of his tyrannies, & dishonesty, Vasco Nuygues caused him to be torne in peeces by his Malties, with foure other lords, his confederates and ministers of such filthines, and then the peeces to bee burnt: Hee called the countie of Parra, All Saints. Vasco Nuygues going from thence, he came to Buquebuca, the lord of which region, thinking that the Spaniards were diuine people, he was ashamed to appeare before them, holding himselfe vnworthy, but he sent them some vessels of gold well wrought, & craved pardon of them. Going on with more desire to find victuals than gold, they saw certain Indians which crost their way, who being brought back vnto them and demanded of what region they were, and where there was any victuals, they said, that they were subiect vnto a king called Coriza, who desired to know them, and to be their friend, of whom afterwards they receiued thirty plates of golde, offering them all that was in his power, and intreating them to aide him against another Cachico his enemy, in D whole countie hee assured them they should find great wealth: Balboa promised him friendship, aide and fauour, presenting him with their hatchets and other iron works, and then he past into the land of Peccorofa, where he found victuals, & receiued gold & slauess, & hauing left his sick men there, he went on with sixtie souldiers onely, vntill he came vnto the Cachico Tumanama, of whom D. Charles Panquiao had spoken vnto him; whom he surprised in his lodging at night: And for that he was giuen to the brutish sin against nature, Balboa was ready to haue him burnt, but thinking to draw from him some secret of his hidden treasure, & of the qualitie of the countie, he was content to reprehend him sharply, and to keep him prisoner, giuing some satisfaction to his accusers: and there Balboa remained the rest of that yeare 1513.

Hope of gaine made vice-reine unpunished.

E 7 The Spaniards affaires prospering after this manner at the Indies, the Armie which was in Italie against the Venetians, was no lesse succesfull. After the retreat of Aluano the Venetian generall, the emperours lieutenant beleaged Padoua in vaine. The viceroy of Naples being resolved to put part of his armie into Bresse, and part into Bergamo, & there to winter, he was importuned by his souldiers, to keep the field with the Germans, hauing the Catalanie of Naples, and the Popes, with 4500 Spaniards, hauing sent one thousand Spaniards to assist the duke of Milan: The viceroy hauing with these forces sackt Bouoelta, past the Brent, and marcht vnto the sea, burning townes and villages, and all the houses of the gentlemen of Venice, which were in that countie: and the more to assist & braue them, he caused ten peeces of his greatest ordnance to be mounted at a place called Marguera, and shot against the city of Venice, whereof the bullets fel at S. Seconds church, with trouble and amazement to all the inhabitants, and the more, for that night comming, it did represent vnto them more plainly, the great fiers and ruines of their houses of pleasure in the country, the which they held to be the greatest indignitie that euer the common wealth of Venice receiued: which thinking to reuenge they encreased their disgrace: for Aluano hauing assured the Senat, that the enemies

Cruell warre of the Spaniards against the Venetians.

armie

1513

Venicians defeated by the Spaniards

armie laden with spoiles in those moorish places, and trenches of riuers, would find G such difficulties in their retreat, as it would be easie to put them to rout, and there- fore had gotten leaue to draw their forces to field after that hee had coasted the enemies, seeking to stoppe their passage at the riuer of Brenta, being himselfe de- ceived and surpris'd, as hee thought to stop their passage going to Verona, whe- ther they marcht onely with an intent to retire, hee was fought with all, and van- quished about Vincence, having lost aboute fure thousand Venetians, and many Cap- taines slaine: vpon the place, with their Pouiditor Andrew Lauradan, who was slaine by the contention of two souldiers, whose prisoner hee should be, besides many captaines and gentlemen of Venice, that were prisoners: which rout did much trouble the af- faires of that state. What succeeded afterwards in that warre, I leaue to other Histori- es whome it concerns more particularly.

King Ferdinand being much impayred by his languishing infirmitie, growen by reason of the potion which had beene giuen him, attended as well as hee could the gouernment of his realmes: but hee had a good Councell, and faithfull ministers, for as his affaires both of state and iustice, were nothing impayred, neither were they in any sort peruerced. This yere there was a fort built at Oran, and another at a place called Pegnon, or the rocke of Alger in Afrike, whereas the crowne of Ca- stille held Melille, Casafa, Oran, Masalquier, Tripoli, and Bugie, and the tworockes or Pegnons of Alger, and of Velez, besides the Princes and townes, that were Tributarie vnto it. And so ended that yere 1513.

Fort built in Afrike.

1514.
Behauiour of Vasco Nuyges of Balboa at the Indies.

8 In the yere one thousand fure hundred and foureteeen Vasco Nuyges of Balboa, ha- uing staied a good space in the countrie of the Cachico Tumanama discovering the mines and treasures of that region, he parted from thence, leading one of that princes sons with him, to be instructed in the Romish religion, and came into the countrie of D. Charles Pan- guico, who receiued Balboa being fickle verie courteously, with all his companions, giuing them the ease & commodities he could, and when they would depart, he presented them with 20 pounds of gold. Being thus satisfied of him, they retred to their fort of the An- tique of Darien, the which they found much better peopled than they had left it: for vpon the brute of the great riches that were on the firme land, many were come from Hi- paniola, & the citie of S. Domingo to inhabit there. It is thought that Balboa brought be- side the contentment he had to haue discovered the south sea, the value of aboute 100000 Castillians in gold, besides perles and other precious Jewels in great abundance, having made a long and dangerous voyage, gone through many barbarous nations & enemies, by desert and vnknown places, hauing not onely to encounter men, but Tygres and Lyons, hunger and thirst, thick woods & craggy mountaines, and yet neuer was put to rout, neuer lost a man, nor himselfe wounded in any fort. Of al their spoiles they laied to the value of 20000 ducats for the kings right; and then they diuided the rest among them, euerie one receiuing according to his place, yea their mastiues had pay as well as the men, for it is re- ported that a dog belonging vnto Vasco Nuyges, called Lemelle, had for his part 500 Ca- stillians, receiuing a greater pay than a harquebusier. After that Vasco Nuyges had ordered some things in the fort of Darien, he sent a friend of his called Arbolancha, born at Bilbo, into Spain, to carry news vnto king Ferdinand of his voyages and discoveries, and the fit penny of what they had gotten.

Butty taken at the Indies.

Travels endured with great patience and happines by the Spaniards.

Desires recei-ued pay and a part of the spoile among the Spaniards.

Designes of Pope Leo to put strangers out of Italy.

Pope seeks to get the realme
of Naples.

At that time the French king did sollicit both k. Ferdinand and the emperor Maximilian to conclude the marriage betwixt D. Ferdinand brother to prince Charles of Austria, and the lady Renée, the French kings second daughter, for whose dowrie hee would quit his pretensions to the duchie of Milan: but hauing made a peace with the king of Eng- land, by a marriage contracted betwixt him & Marie that kings sister, he changed his o- pinion, and gaue ouer that treatie for Renée and Ferdinand. The Pope hauing diuers de- signs to free Italie of strangers, hauing no desire to see the French king lord of Milan, yet he entertained him with this hope, to make vse of him and his meanes, to get the realme of Naples from k. Ferdinand, to settle his brother Julian of Medicis king there, & therof he had already had some practise with the Venetians. To fauor the Popes designs, being pro- fitable for the common-weale of Venice, Andrew Gritti was appointed by the Senat to be generall

1514

A generall of an armie to inuade the banks of Apulia, thinking by that meanes to diuene the Spanish army out of Lombardie, & that they should haue none but the Germanes to ti- counter. Hereupon Bartholomew of Aliano hauing surpris'd certain Spaniards, hee caused them to be hanged at Padoua, saying that they had beene suborned by their commanders to kill him in treason: the which put the viceroy of Naples into such a rage, as he made a mi- serable spoile of the countie about Padoua, & hauing chased Bernardinus Antinola, nephew to Aliano, he shut him into Citadelle, which place being battered, was taken partly by a breach, and partly by escalado. Bernardin of Antinola & his men were carried away priso- ners, and the place sackt. To recompence this losse, Aliano defeated some troups of light horse nere to Este: the army which besieged Creme, being hardly retained for want of pay was forced to retire. The armie of Spain after the taking of Citadelle, diuided it selfe into diuers lodgings, the viceroy to Verona, the Marques of Pescara to Lendenara, with 3000 Spaniards: there came about 800 men at armes to Rouigo; of which D. Garcia Matrigue was captain, who suffered themselves to be surpris'd by Aliano, who led both him and all his company away prisoners: some write they were 300 horse, & 1000 Spanish foot: On the other side Renzo de Cors, being freed from the siege of Creme which hee had defended valiantly, being fortified with men, hee surpris'd Bergamo by intelligence of the inhabi- tants, but soon after the viceroy recovered it againe, hauing joined his Spaniards with the forces of Milan, led by Siluis Suedo, Renzo, who was within it, yielding it vpon honorable

Spaniards
surpris'd in their lodging

conditions. The Bergamasques were punished for their rebellion by the purse, redee- ming the sack of the town, & other punishments prepared for them, for great sums of mo- ney: the which did much displease the Spaniards, who were in hope that the spoile of this town should haue been giuen to them. Winter approaching, the armies were lodged and for that it was bruited that the French king prepared a great power to passe into Italy in the spring, D. Raymond of Cardone the viceroy, who had his Spanish army much diminished, went to the emperor to Insuprach, to take counsell touching the affaire of the future warre. At Rome the embassadors for the emperor, King Ferdinand, and French king vied their art and skill to win the Popes fauor for their masters: but he being cunning, politique, and enemy to them all, discovered not his conceits, but entertained them with vaine hopes.

D 10 About the end of this yere, before that k. Ferdinand had any intelligence of the suc- cesse of Vasco Nuyges of Balboa, it was resolved in counsell, to send to the Antique of Da- rien, & into the region of Castille del or a knight for gouernor, whose name was Pedro Arias of Auila, born at Segobia: which charge was demanded by many, Arbolancha whome Vasco Nuyges had sent into Spain, being not yet arriued, for otherwise without doubt that charge had bin giuen him in recompence of his labors & great seruice which he had done vnto the king in the discovery of so rich countries: yet he was made gouernor of the coast towards the South sea: but D. John Rodrigo of Fonseca, bishop of Burgos, who had the superintendency of the affaires of the Indies, & did much fauor Pedro Arias, protracted the time to make the dispatch of his prouision, yet the sentence giuen against him at the suit of

Pedro Arias
of Auila made viceroy of the firme land at the Indies

E the bachelor Emiso was cancelled and made void. Pedro Arias then hauing in- formed by Saint Lucar of Barrameda, with one thousand fure hundred men in 17 ves- sels, the 14 of May, hauing in his company, kiet John Cabedo first bishop of the Antique of Darien, & first Prelat of the firme land at the Indies, and for pilot John Vesputio, Florentine, heailed in 38 daies to the Antique, where he was receiued with great ioy, & Vasco Nuyges of Balboa lodged him in his own lodging, with al the honor he could deuise, & was in- formed by him of the whole estate of that country, & of the discovery which he had made of Castille delor, for so he had named it, by reason of the great riches thereof; and of the South Sea, and of pearles: wherewith Pedro Arias de Auila was verie much plea- sed, finding that there was worke done, and that there remained nothing but to people and husband it. He made the Licenciat Gaspas of Espinose, borne at Medina del Cam- po, Alcayde maior, or president of his Iustice, and according to his charge, he beganne to diuide the prouinces to his people, sending Francis Becerra with 550 Spaniards towards the Riuer of Dabayba, who indured great miseries there, and returned with no- table losse. John of Ayora with foure hundred men was directed into the countrie of the Cachico. D. Charles Panquico, a most faithfull friend to the Spaniards, who

John Cabedo first Bishop of the Antique of Darien

1514

who notwithstanding was so ingratiously intreated by them, and the Indians his subjects so cruelly and couetously vexed, as they were forced to take armes, and to chafe away Apur, who returned flying from whence he parted. Captain Pedro being sent towards Caribana, and Berthelmeo Hurtado to Acla, they had no better successe ino other in other places: so as Vasco Nunez, was not so fortunate, but Pedro Arias and his company were as unfortunate in all their enterprises. King Ferdinand toward the end of this yeare 1514 did so decay in his health, as there were apparent signes of a dropsie in him: One of the captaines which Pedro Arias de Auila, called Gonsalo of Badajos, had sent to people in the maine land, tooke his course towards Nombr de Dios, in the beginning of the yeare

1515

1515, where hee found Indians that were strange and vntoerable, so as hauing increased his troupe, being about 80 Spaniards, by the arrivall of Lewis of Mercado, who brought 50 more, they went in company towards the fourth Sea, and being come to a place called Coyba, they lackt it, for that the lord of the country called Tuana flying the acquaintance of these bearded men, had retired himselfe into the woods: then they made prey of many things, and especially of slaves. Passing on by a rivers side, on the 5 day they met with two Indians laden with bread, which a blind Cachico sent vnto them, who brought them to the place where this Cachico dwelt, with whom they made good cheare, & received presents of gold, with information of those countries, which they sought, and guides to conduct them. Continuing on their course they came where there reigned a lord called Taracura, who also gaue them a good quantity of gold: but yet they did not forbear to fier a borough belonging to a brother of his, for that he was not to be found at their arrivall: then passing by the countries of the Cachicos Cherra and Nathan they received so much gold & other things, as the treasure which they got in that voyage, amounted to about 8000 ducats, & at the least 400 slaves. But as prosperity makes people careless & overweening, being come into the country of a mighty lord called Parica, holding no order nor discipline, thinking they should find friendly reception in all places, they were suddenly charged by a great number of Indians, who slue 80 of his Spaniards, put the rest to flight, and got their gold and slaves, with all the booty which they had made in this voyage. The same yeare Gasper of Morales being sent by the same gouernour with 150 Spaniards towards S. Michaels gulph, he pass with the help of the Cachicos Chispe & Tumaco, into the illad of Tarareque, leading 70 men only with him, being drawne on by the fame of perles and other riches which were there, and vpon that shore: there he had three encounters, whereas the Indians shewed themselves braue, seeking to repulse the Spaniards, but at the fourth charge they were vanquished, and the Cachico brought to obedience, by the means of some Indians that were friends, and did accompany the Spaniards, who did highly praise

Spaniards defeated and slain by the Indians.

Perles in abundance.

Statuities at the Indies through euill.

by this lord, & received of him about 110 markes of perle, in recompence whereof they gaue him hatchets and other smal mercery wares, of the which he and his Indians made great esteeme: and this Cachico grew so familiar, as he discovered vnto Gasper of Morales all the riches of those illands, & moreover made himselfe vassall & tributarie to the king of Castille, promising to giue him yerely 100 markes of perle: he suffered himselfe to be baptized, and was called Pedro Arias, by the gouernours name, and with this good successe Gasper of Morales returned hauing sped better than the rest. The gouernor Pedro Arias in the mean time being entred into a great quarrel against Vasco Nunez of Balboa, (whether it were through enuy, for that the one had been more happy in discouering, then hee in gouerning of those new found countries, or through the infolenie of Balboa, who soot at his enterprises, & the aduersities of his captains: ) it did much trouble his government: to pacifie the which, & to reconcile them, frist John Canedo, the new bishop, tried all the meanes he could, causing Vasco Nunez to marrie Pedro Arias daughter: but notwithstanding this alliance, they fel againe to great discord, which proceeded so far, as Vasco Nunez being in his gouernment towards the fourth Sea, where he had caused foure Carauels to be built to continue his conquests, the gouernour Arias caused him to be adourned, and forced him to appeare in iustice at the Antique of Darien, where being arriued, he was laied hold on, and the procurator fittall pleading against him, he accused him of mutinies and other infolenies committed, for the which he had beene absolved; yet they condemned him to lose

A lose his head, with five of his companions: the which did wonderfully increase all the Spaniards that were in that countrie, who lamented with reares the pittifull end of so braue a Captaine, vnder whose conduct and good fortune they did hope in short time to be the richest men in Europe.

11 Whilest these things past at the Indies, the counsell of Spaine was in great difficulties for the affaires of Italie, by the death of Lewis 12: the French king, who dyed the first of Ianuarie, this yeare 1515, to whom Francis duke of Angoulisme had succeeded, a young, braue, and valiant Prince, who at the first intituled himselfe duke of Milan, with an intent to pursue the right of his predecessor and father in law, wherefore hauing confirmed the peace made with the English, and vpon a hope of marriage betwixt the ladie Reney, younger daughter to the deceased king, being then but nine yeres old, and Prince Charles, who began to gouern his estates of the Netherlands, being assured of his friendship, he prepared himselfe for the warre of Italie. It was contracted with the earle of Nassau Prince Charles his embassador, that to the Princess his future spouse should be giuen 600 thousand crownes, and the duchie of Berry in dowrie, in regard whereof hee should renounce al rights & pretensions which she might haue to her mothers or fathers goods, that is, to the duchies of Britaine and Milan, and moreover, that Prince Charles should be a mediator to the king D. Ferdinand his grandfather, for the restoring of Iohn of Albret and Catherine his wife, to their realm of Navarre: & on the other side, that King Francis should

C aid Prince Charles with men & shipping, when as (after the death of King Ferdinand, which approached) it should be fit for him to passe into Spaine, where hee feared some opposition, by his brother D. Ferdinand, who was bred up and much beloued in Spain, King Francis sought to prolong the truce made by King Lewis his predecessor with King Ferdinand, to win the Popes fauour, and to pacifie the Suisses: but hee found opposition in all these three: for these Potentates were directly contrarie to the design which he made vpon the duchie of Milan, and it was bruted that the Suisses prepared to iuniade Burgongne, or Dauphine. Besides, there was a streit league made betwixt the emperour King Ferdinand, and the duke of Milan, to force the French king to quit the title of duke Milan, and to renounce his pretended right to the duchie. And there was another league made be-

D twice the French king and the Venerians in that respect. At that time Pedro Nauarro, earle of Albeto, remained prisoner among the French, since the battell of Raunna: for whose redemption King Ferdinand did not care, for that some noblemen Castilians, of lesse merit than himselfe, through emulation of his vertue, had impured the losse of that battell vnto him: which this wife and iudicious captaine apprehended, and thinking his seruices were ill rewarded, hee agreed to serue the French king, quitting the countie of Albeto, and all that hee held in the king of Castilles dominions, making all acts and protestations in that case required: After which he began to leuie troups of foot in Gascoine, seeming that they with other forces should serue for the recouerie of the realme of Navarre: but the princes whome it concerned, knewe well that this great preparation was for the duchie of Milan, so as euerie one stood vpon his gard.

E King Ferdinand being bound by the league to inuade France by Cattelonia, and Guipuscoa, he approached nere to Burgos, where hauing bene verie sicke some daies in the monastier of Mejorada, hee past at Aranda of Duero, from whence he sent Queene Germane his wife into Arragon, to assit at the Estates at Monson, and to provide for that which should be necessarie, if the warre grew hot in France, to the end hee should receiue no harm on that side, himselfe taking the charge of Castille, and of the frontier of Guipuscoa. Being come to Burgos, he called the estates, with whose aduice and aid hee provided for the sea coast & the realme of Navarre, the which at that time, as a conquest made with the forces of Castille, hee did solemnly incorporate for euer to that crown: And for that his charges would be verie great for the execution of those enterprises which hee had in hand, namely for the conquest and defence of those places which hee held in Afrike and the Indies, and to stee the seas from pyrats, the Pope gaue him leaue to raise certaine summes of money vpon the Clergie for two yeares. His infirmity increasing, hee had such continuall faintings, as on the seuen and twenetieth of Iune, they thought hee would haue died:

1515
After Nugnes of Balboa capt at the Antique of Darien.

Francis the first
the French king

Contract of marriage betwixt
Prince Charles of Austria and Queen of France

League against King Francis.

Pedro Nauarro serues the French king.

Enterprises of King Ferdinand
against the French king.

Navarre incorporated to the crown of Ca-stille.

1515 Treatise of king Ferdinand

Chancellor of Aragon accused to have sought to dis-serve queen Germaine.

Entervue betwixt Pope Leo and king Francis.

Pragmaticke sanction abolished.

Death of D.
Gonsalo Fernandes of Cor-doua, called the great Capitaine.

died : wherefore finding himselfe neere his end, he desired to make his will, and caused it to be written, leauing his daughter Queene Joane for his generall heire, and the infant D. Ferdinand his grand-child, gouernour of Castille; to whom he gaue for gouernour D. Gonsalo of Guzman treasurer of Calatrava, and for his Schoolemaster D. Aluaro Osorio bishop of Astorga, hauing a great desire to cause the three masterships of Castille to fall into his hands after his death, whereupon he made orders which hee thought might take place, but afterwards he reuoked them. He had some amendment, and came to Aranda of Duero, whither Anthony Augustine, his Chancelor of Arragon came, whom he caused to be apprehended, and committed, being informed that he had presumed to attempt against the honor of the queene, his wife: for seeing her too desirous to haue children, and the king her husband by reason of his age and infirmities, too weake, he had offered her his seruice too familiarly. This Chancellor remained in prison, till after the kings death, and then was set at liberty by the Cardinal Ximenes, who was gouernour of Spaine. The same yeare there hauing been an entervue at Vienn in Austria, betwixt the emperor Maximilian and Ladillaus king of Hongarie, and Bohemia, the marriages were accorded of the infant Ferdinand, with Anne Daughter to the said king of Hongarie, and of Marie sister to prince Charles of Austria, Infanta of Castille, with Lewis sonne and heir to the said king Ladillaus.

13 King Francis past into Lombardy, with a great army: what succeeded in those wars you may read at large in the French Historie. The Pope seeing all things prosper for the French, made an accord with the king: they had an entervue at Bologna, with great shewes of friendship; there they confirmed their league, and conferred long of the conquest of Naples, for the French king; but they resolved to deferre it till after the death of king Ferdinand, which they knew to be neere: the Pope hauing no desire of it for the quiet of Italie, alleging for excuse, that the time of the league which hee had with the Catholike king, did not yet expire of fixteene months, yet in shew he seemed verie willing to countenance that conquest, so as the French king (who was well content to haue it deferred vntill another time, for that his treasure was exhausted) was verie well satisfied. There the Pragmaticke sanction was abolished, the Pope granting liberty to the king, to the preiudice of the clergy of France, to name & present men at his pleasure, to ecclesiastical dignities and benefices being void within his realme; a priuiledge which belonged to Chapters and Colledge: they made many other agreements to the contentment one of another.

In this estate stood the affaires of Italie, towards the end of king Ferdinands daies, whose disease did vndermine him by little & little yet he would needs part from Segobia, to goe into Arragon to the estates, whether he had sent Queene Germaine his wife, transporting himselfe to Calatrava: but he was forced to returne into Castille, as well for the affaires of the realme, as to giue order to provide men for Italie in fauour of the emperor Maximilian, who made preparation to enter in the Spring, and also to care for the defence of that which he held in Africke. At that time was the marriage betwixt D. Alonso Peres of Guzman, or Aluaro duke of Medina Sydonia, and D. Anna of Arragon, daughter to D. Alonso of Arragon, the kings Nece: to whom one of his Council comming from visiting a certaine woman, whom they held for a Saint in Spaine, called the holie woman of Barca, reported from her, that hee should bee of a good courage, for hee should not die before he had conquered Ierusalem: but this good woman was deceived.

This yeare dyed of a double quarter Age, the great Capitaine Gonsalo Fernandes of Cordoua duke of Sessa, Terranova, of Saint Ange, marquisse of Bitonto, Prince of Squilaci, and Constable of the realme of Naples. Among the other vertues of this famous man, hee is much commended for his great chastity, a rare thing in a Spaniard: his end was in the seventy third yeare of his age, leauing by his wife D. Maria Henrique, one only daughter and heire, named D. Eluira of Cordoua: his bodie lies in the monastery of Saint Ierome, in that citie. The king hearing of the death of this worthy man, sent to comfort his widow and daughter.

14 In the yeare one thousand five hundred and fixteene, which was the last of king Ferdinands life, there arrived in Castille, at a place called the Screine, doctor

A Adrian Florent deane of Louvain, embassador for Prince Charles of Austria; and his Schoolemaster, who in time was made bishop of Tortosa, then Cardinal, and successively Pope. His charge in shew, was for matters of gouernement; against the Lord of Cheures, who was the princes gouernour: but in effect he came into Spaine, to pry and looke into the state of things, and to aduertise the prince: And the King dying, which was held to bee verie neere, hee had authoritie and commaundement to take possession in his name of the gouernement of the realmes of Castille, Arragon, and the rest. The king parted from Plaisance, with an intent to goe to Guadalupe, there to performe a vow: passing from one place to another, his infirmities still increasing, hee stayed at Madrigalejo, a borough neere vnto Trugillo, where he had a kind of fluxe:

B by reason whereof doctor Adrian (who was verie vnpleasing vnto him) transported himselfe thither; yet shewing him a good countenance, hee willed him to goe and attend him at Guadalupe: his sicknesse encreasing, they that were about him were contrayned to aduertise him that his end drew neere, the which did much discontent him: for hee thought hee had a longer time to liue; neyther did hee giue credit to all that his Confessor Frier Thomas of Matienso said vnto him: but when they had often reiterated this aduertisement, that hee might dispose himselfe to die like a Christian, he caused the Licenciat Zapate and doctor Caruial, who were of his chamber, and of his Councill, to bee called vnto him, and with them the Licenciat Pergas his Treasurer, who was also of his Councill, a man in whom hee had great confidence: whom he employed and coniured to giue him good and faithfull counsell, in that which hee should demand of them: hee told them that for the opiopie hee had that prince Charles would not come in person to gouerne the realmes of Spaine, hee had appointed the Infant D. Ferdinand gouernour of them for the Queene D. Joane her daughter: whereupon hee desired to know their opinions, if hee had not done well. These three men zealous of the good of those realmes told him freely, that in so doing hee had not provided for the peace and quiet of the realmes, wherefore he should call backe that article, and name prince Charles gouernour of them, as Lawe and Justice required, shewing him the great inconueniencies which might happen, if haply the Infant D. Ferdinand, finding himselfe seised of so great Estates, should seeke to hold them; such thoughts being easie to breed in the hearts of princes. The king yeelded to this Councill, and reformed his Will in that point, in regard of Castille, and that which is incorporated vnto it: As for Arragon and Sicile hee left the gouernement to his base sonne D. Alonso archbishop of Saragosse, and vntill that prince Charles came, he appointed gouernor in his absence, by the aduice of this Councill, Cardinal Francis Ximenes of Cisneros, saying, that he knew him to be an honest man, and wel affected, fashioned and aduanced by him and by the Q. D. Isabella; one who had no great alliances, & had alwayes shewed himselfe a faithfull seruant. As for the realm of Naples, he confirmed the gouernment with the same condition to the viceroy D. Raymond of Cardone, & in Nauar there had bin viceroy D. Frederic d'Acuna, commander of Montemolin, of the order of S. James, brother to the erle of Buendia:

E Some few daies before he had obtayned from Pope Leo, a new prouision in his owne person, of the three masterships of Castille, Saint James, Calatrava and Alcantara, the which he desired to resigne to the Infant D. Ferdinand whom hee loued deerey: but hee was in like manner perswaded not to doe it, for hee should remember of what importance in former times one of those masterships had bin, in the person of a priuar man; to trouble the realme: and therefore hee must thinke that if all these were ioyned in one, and he of the blood royall, hee equalling (without doubt) the kings power might cause greater alterations: whereupon the king demanding, What then shall the Infant do remayning so poore? It is, answered his Councillours, the best and goodliest inheritance that you can leaue him: for finding himselfe poore, it will giue him occasion to seek the helpe of prince Charles his brother, who will aduance him. These things pleased the king, who gaue vnto the Infant D. Ferdinand 50000 ducats of yerely rent vpon Brindes, Tarentum, and other places in Apulia in the realme of Naples, by the aduice of the same Councillours. Out of the reuenues of the realm of Sicile, he left vnto his wife Q. Germaine, thirtie

5555

thirtie

Reformation of king Ferdi-nands vsuities by the aduice of some of his councill.

Infant D. Ferdinand ill appointed.

thirtie thousand florins of gold of yearly rent, the which was afterwards assigned in G Castille, vpon the townes of Arenale, Madrigal and Olmedo: hee left moreover vnto her tenn thousand ducats in the realme of Naples. These Ordinaunces in forme of a testamēt were written by the hand of one of the aboue named Councillours, reuoking that which hee had made at Burgos; all being done in great secret, to the end that nothing might come to the knowledge of the Infant D. Ferdinand, who was then at Guadalupe; not of his Gouernours and Ministers, who did hope to manage the realme after the Kings decease. The will being written out faire, it was receiued by the Prothonotarie Clement of Velasco. The Queene D. Germaine hauing notice of the extremitie of the Kings infirmities at Calataub, whereas the estates of Arragon were held; shee came with all speed to Madrigalejo; and was at his death, which was the three and twentieth of January one thousand five hundred and sixteene, being three score and three years old, and hauing reigned one and forty yeeves, one moneth, and nine dayes, comprehending the time that king D. Philip of Austria reigned. The Kings Councill and the Noblemen being assembled; they resolved to send to the embassadour Adrian, who attended the king at Guadalupe: wherefore Doctor Canual and the Licenciat Vargas were sent vnto him, who brought him to Madrigalejo, where in his presence the kings will was opened and read, whereof they gaue a copie to the embassadour, at his request. Afterwards by the aduice of them all, D. Bernard of Rojas, marquess of Denia, and the licenciate Remiquillo Alcaitor prouost of the Court, did accompanie the Kings bodie to Granado, and the other Noblemen went to Infant D. Ferdinand at Guadalupe; where the funerall was made with royall pompe and ceremonies. The body passing by the cite of Cordoua, there ioynd with it D. Martin of Angolobisshoppe of that cite, the marquess of Priego, the earle of Cabra, with other Lords and Knights which did accompany it vnto Granado, where with the state woorthy of such a prince, hee was interred in the chappell of Kings, by Queene Isabella his wife, whose bodie had bene left in the Alhambra of that cite.

A little before the kings death, John Diaz de Solis of Lebrica, chiefe Pilot to the king; parted from the port of Lepe, with three shippes armed, to goe and discover countries in the new world, vnder the equinoctial, where hee had already bene, and found out the great riuer of Panaraguala; which hee had named the riuer of Plata, or of Siluer; where being arrived and entered, hee landed with fiftie Spaniards, thinking to finde all things quiet; as hee had at the other time: but hee found himselfe surprized; and charged by a multitude of Indians, who slew him and all them that had landed with him, and ate them: the rest which kept the shippes being terrified, weighed anchor, and returned into Spaine laden with breffill, and white anise, which they vse for dying.

15. D. Manuel king of Portugall had alwayes continued his navigations, and discoveries at the East with good successe and profit, and imitating the example of the king of Castille, hee prest the African Moores his neighbors vpon the westerne shore, from whom hee tooke the towne of Zafin, by the meanes of Xpouo Fernandes of Araide, who was the first Gouernour, and afterwards hauing sent James Duke of Braganca his nephew, with two thousand horse, and fiftie thousand foote, who landing at Maragan, did assaile and take the towne of Azamon, being abandoned by the Moores: and soone after Almedina yielded; with other places of that terricorie: in which expeditions the Duke of Braganca purchased so great fame, as at this time the name of Braganca is a terror to the Moores. To supply the charges of this waye & conquests, the King D. Manuel hauing emptied his coffers, he obtained from Pope Leo, by his embassadours Triflan of Acauna, and doctor Diego Pacheco, aid and subuentiō out of the reuenues of the Clergie of his country: wherunto the Pope did the more willingly yeeld; hauing heard the great exploits which hee had done, and the discoveries which hee had made; to whom the embassadours presented in the name of the King their master a great elephant, a lionesse, and a bishops mitre or tyare garnished with petyles and precious stones, the richest that euer had bene seene at Rome. The Pope therefore to incorage and giue

Death of King Ferdinand King of Arragon.

Indies.

Spaniards slain in the riuer of Plata by the Indians.

Portugall.

Exploits of King Manuel in Africa.

Braganca a terror to the Moores.

means

A means vnto King Manuel to proceede in so commendable an action; hee graunted him the third part of the reuenues and fringes of Spiritual Liuinges, and moreover to haue a Croisade preached, wherein the Kings deputies behaued themselves so industriously and courageously, as all men had occasion to complaine: whereupon the conuers and new Christians tooke occasion to fall into many errors and peruerse opinions, touching our Religion. These things past about the yeeves one thousand five hundred and twelue, one thousand five hundred and thirteene, and one thousand five hundred and fouretee. The yeeve one thousand five hundred and fiftieene being come, the king vnderooke to build the fort of Mandora in Africk; but his prouisions and men were all disperst and lost there, by the incurfions of the Moores, so as few, and those verie poore, returned into Portugall. This vnfortunate successe was imputed to the exactions which the kings Officers vied vpon the clergie; being an opinion already seled in the hearts of men: that those princes which touch the treasures of the Church, prosper not.

This yeeve Queene Mary was deliuered in the city of Elisbeto, of the Infant D. Edward futur husband to D. Isabella daughter to D. John duke of Braganca, from whom issued D. Edward, and D. Catherine duchesse of Braganca, wife our dayes to the duke D. John second sonne to duke Theodosius; and grandchild to the first D. John. Of D. Edward of Portugall, and D. Isabella, was also borne D. Maria, who was married to the prince of Parma; Isidore to Octauio Farnese, and to Mary Magdalene of Austria, base daughter to the emperor Charles: Soone after the death of D. Ferdinand king of Arragon, the king D.

Manuel was full of care, for the insolent behaviour of his vassals; who sought to disquiet him in his navigations and voyages to the Indies. These were Ferdinand of Magellanes and Roy Falero; who for some discontentment retired themselves into Castille, whereas the cardinal D. Francis Ximenes archbishoppe of Toledo gouerned, offering to discover a short course or way, to go to the rich lands of the Molouques, whence the spices came, more profitable and commodious then that of Calicut and China. Magellanes gaue D. Manuel Rodrigues of Fonseca president of the royall court of the Indies, and other counsellours to vnderstand, that they might find better and more short cut to goe to the Molouques by the coast of Breffill and the riuer of Plata; then by the Cape of Bonne Esperance: and moreover they told them that the great land of Zafintra, and Malacca; were comprehended in the first and fine of the navigation of Castille: they did maintain that the lands of the Molouques were not farre from Panama; and the gulph of saint Michael, and that in all those countries and regions they found abundance of gold, pearles; precious stones, spices and drugges: and to make these counsellours more desirous, they told them many other wonders of unknowne lands, which they offered to discover. Magellanes saying that hee had a relation of a man of Verchano in Bolonia, who had beene at Bagan, Borneo, Bathan, Tidore; and other countries of spices, which are vnder the Equinoctiall; shewing many letters written from his friends to the Indians: And moreover, hee had a slave of the land of Zamate, who vnderstood many languages of that Country; and an other slave recouered at Malacca. By these reasons and persuasions, hee inducethem of the council and the Regent D. Francis Ximenes gave gooth hope to Magellanes, to obtaine ships and men to make this voyage, at the commanding of the prince D. Charles, who would not stay long before hee parted from Placentia, to come and take possession of his realmes of Castille and Arragon. The king D. Manuel made many consultations against the suspected subjects; by his Ambassadors to the council of Castille, and they against him; and the voyage was performed as wee will shew. About the yeeve one thousand five hundred and fiftieene, Cristobal Colon second wife to the king D. Manuel, was deliuered in child betwixt the Infant D. Anthony, who lived not long after his mother; which caused great heaviness in the king. Shee lies in the monastere of the order of Gold: Shee was then fise and thirtie yeeves old, and the king died and buried, which occasioned with the prelates and clergie more of his realme had often yeeves died vnto them: that his cruelties and aduersities came for that hee tooke the reuenues of the church, and employed them for the affairs of his realme; hee caused the collections & contributions to the clergie, promising to pay into the clergie 10000 ducats in yeeves, at 7 yeeves.

The king went to his third wife D. Zuzanna who reigned the first of Austria

3516
Third part of spiritual livinges graunted to the king of Portugall in the same yeeve.

Opinion fauourable for the Clergie.

Genealogie of Portugall.

Magellanes and Falero Portugallians in Castille.

Death of Marie Queene of Portugall.

King consents.

Infanta of Castille, niece to the two former queenes, being then 19. yeeres old, and the King 50. She was conducted into Portugal by Castille, in the yeere 1518. alittle before the arrival of King Charles in Spaine: the marriage was celebrated in Crato, with great pompe and shew: of which marriage were borne the infants D. Charles, and D. Marie.

D. Ioane Queene of Castille, Arragon, Nauarre,

Naples, Sicile, Sardania &c. for whose incapacie, the reignes of D. Charles her sonne, began, being the first of that name, and the two and twentieth king of Castille.

Castile.

Cardinal Ximenes governor of Castile.

Accord for the government of Spaine.

Contention for the masteryship of S. Iohn.

Previdence of Cardinal Ximenes for the peace of Spaine.

16 After the decease of King Ferdinand, Queene Ioane his daughter succeeded in all his realmes, lands, and feignories. Charles archduke of Austria, and erle of Flanders her eldest sonne, who should inherite all those great estates after her, was then in her absence, and for the Queenes incapacie, Cardinal Francis Ximenes of Cisneros, according to the testament of the deceased King, tooke upon him the gouernement of Castille, with the consents of all the Councell and Nobilitie of the realme: notwithstanding that the gouernours and ministers of the infant D. Ferdinand, would, by vertue of the last testament made at Burgos, haue him intrude himselfe into the gouernment of affaires as regent. He having written to them of the counsell to come vnto him to Guadalupe, and vnto too high times in his letters, one of the counsell, said freely vnto him that presented the Infantes letters, Tell him that wee will be shortly at Guadalupe, where knowing well our duties, we will doe him the honour and reuerence that belongs vnto him, & that we haue no other king but Cesar. The prince Charles was that chosen emperor: but that word was taken as a preface of his future election. The first care of Cardinal Ximenes, was to make an agreement with doctor Adrian, who had brought letters and authoritie from prince Charles by the which he declared him his lieutenant, in case that the king D. Ferdinand should die, during his legation in Spaine. The accord was thus made, that vntill they had other news from prince Charles, they should iournly signall dispatches. After which they went to pacifie a trouble that was of small consequence; for D. Pedro Portocarrero called the Deafe brother to the duke of Escalona, the sennet of the Marquesse of Villeneuve at this day, had obtained after the decease of the great capitaine, who alwaies to the masteryship of S. Iohn, bulls and prouision from the pope, of that masteryship, & did sollicite the commanders of the Order assemblable together to receiue him, but prince Charles during his grandethere life had also obtained a later prouision, by the means of D. Bernard de Caxules, of all the saiden masteryships, in his person, and it is most certaine that King Ferdinand was not perishing in seeing that he would haue giuen them to the infant D. Ferdinand: The cardinal being perswaded of these things, he sent with the assents of doctor Adrian and the Councell Alonso, one of the Alcaldes of the court with letters & force, to suppose Portocarrero, and to stay this assembly of the commanders: whereunto they obeyed, Portocarrero took his flight, who defiled from his enterprise. This Cardinal had a warre still late upon the actions of the infant D. Ferdinand, and of that which did concerne him, being alwaies euer vnto his person, for he feared that the noblemen of Castille, who desired some alteration in the State, would corrupt him, and might do otherwise. He prouided in such sort for queene Germane in this beginning, so that in all things were disposed that there might not want money for the entertainment of her person, and royal dignitie: A bishop of residence for the counsell was chosen at Madrid, for that it was common opinion for a great while, being not farre from his archbishopricke of Toledo, from whence either King Perez of Combray, & Reynold of Auila, to carrie away the prince Charles of the duke of the king his grandfather, and of all that part of France, the prince was then at Orleans where he had bene bred up, and his brother D. Ferdinand in Spaine the one instructed in the manners & customs of the Flemings, the other in those of Spaine: which made the Spaniards to chide at the younger more, and did much trouble the Cardinal Ximenes: These were men which at that time did gouern the person of prince Charles, & his affairs, young Alonso was governor of

A of Bourgondie, and afterwards Chancelour, the Lord of Cheures, and Lanau, Chamberlaines, Lawrence Gorrebot great master, and Charles of Lannoy Master of the Horse. Hee had a Pupilion of Milan, called etier Marlian, a learned man and of great experience, who was theinuentor of that Most Plow vna, the which prince Charles vied betwixt Hercules pillars, hee was afterwards bishop of Tui, but against the will of cardinal Ximenes. The lord of Cheures was of greatest authority about the prince, hauing bred him vp: hee was so hated of King Ferdinand as a little before his death, in a certaine treaty made with doctor Adrian, hee would haue it expredly referred that Cheures should be chased away, the which did much discontent him, who for that cause conceived a great hatred against doctor Adrian, but hee was forced to yeeld that to the King, that hee might winne his loue to prince Charles, for hee sawe his intent was to debase him, to aduance the Infant D. Ferdinand, if hee could. Of Spaniards D. Iohn Manuel was in some credite in the court of Flaunders, a flatterer and breeder of debate betwixt King Ferdinand and Philip of Austria his sonne in lawe, for the which hee was put in prison by the lady Marguerite gouernesse of Flaunders: but after the kings death hee was presently set at libertie by prince Charles. D. Antonio of Eshuniga brother to the duke of Bejar was also hopoured in that Court, D. Pedro Portocarrero loanne to him that was deafe, of whom wee haue spoken, D. Lewis of Cordoua, D. Alphonso Alantiques, the bishop of Badajoz, and Pedro Mata archbishoppe of Seule, a famous preacher, and Secretary to the prince. Such was the estate of his Court, when hee receiued newes of the death of the king his grandfather, for the which hee shewed a grieued befitting nature, and the neerenesse of blood that was betwixt them: hee commended him for the election which hee had made of the cardinal Francis Ximenes, and did write vnto the Infant his brother, to the widow Queene, and to the counsell, giuing them hope that hee would bee soone in Spaine. In his first letters to the Gouernours and the Councell hee did intitle himselfe Prince: but some of the Councell of Flanders, seeing Queene Ioane weake of her fences, and to bee but a vaine maske of royall dignitie, they were of opinion that hee should take the title of King, the which hee did, for that said hee, it was conformable to the custome of the princes of Flaunders and Germanie, and that it was the aduice of the Emperour Maximilian, and of Pope Leo, the which was not well liked of in Spaine: notwithstanding seeing hee had once taken it, it would haue bene dishonourable to haue left it, and therefore hee continued this title, the cardinal Ximenes causing the rest to allow of it: and thereupon they did aduance the Standard and Armes of the new King Charles, in the towne of Madrid. The Arragonois (strict defenders of their Lawes) would neuer allow of this title of King, during the life of Queene Ioane: of whom D. Alphonso of Arragon, archbishoppe of Saragoffe was gouernor.

18 Whilest these things were done at Madrid by cardinal Ximenes, there grew new tumults, the which did first disquiet Andalusia, and afterwards all the Prouinces of Spaine. The chiefe of this tumult was D. Pedro Giron, eldest sonne to the earle of Vregna, who entred the countrey of the duke of Medina Sidonia with forces, and besieged Luzzero a towne, with an intent to seaze vpon the whole Duchie, if hee could. And this was the cause of his enterprise: D. Iohn of Guzman duke of Medina Sidonia married two sisters successuely, one after an other, daughters to the Duke of Bejar; by the first hee had two children, D. Henrie, and D. Mentia; and by the second one sonne called D. Aluaro: D. Mentia was married to D. Pedro Giron: D. Henrie was vnapt for generation, and dyed without children: D. Aluaro borne of the second ventur, married, as we haue said, with D. Anne of Arragon, daughter to D. Alphonso of Arragon: which marriage was made by the King D. Ferdinand, in hope that D. Aluaro should succede in all the feignories of Duke Iohn his father: who being dead, hee was put in possession of the Duchie of Medina Sidonia; notwithstanding the opposition of D. Pedro Giron, who said, that D. Aluaro was a bastard, borne in incest, not being tollerable neither by Diuine nor Humane Lawes to marrie two sisters: and if Popes had at any time suffered it, it was for some great good and benefite to the Common weale, which had no such consideration in the fact of

Cheures gouernour to prince Charles.

Title of King allowed in Castille to prince Charles during his mothers life, but not in Arragon.

Correll brother to Pedro Giron, and the duke of Medina Sidonia.

Acts of Cardinall Ximenes approved by the King.

Rebellions pacified in Castile.

Defeat of Turkes at sea by the Spanish Gallies.

Orders for the Indies.

Cardinall Ximenes causeth information to be taken at the Indies of the Spaniards.

like remedy, to force many great men to the observation of the Lawes, hee had required this most necessary remedie, with the which hee meant to preferre him the realme of his predecessors, without any charge vnto his coffers. For this cause hee besought the king not to give eare vnto the flanderous reports of his ill willers, who desired nothing but troubles, seeing hee had had so great proofes of his loyalty and affection: and that it would please him to write sharpe letters to the townes that would not obey him, that they might bee drawne to their duties, a contempt or rebellion being of great importance, the which can not be light, no nor in light matters: And for that since the warre of Granada Spaine was much vnfurnished of armes, that it was necessarie to send out of Flaunders; and the neighbour countries; great store of corslets, harquebuzes, pikes and other armes: the which was faithfully solicited by Diego Laper, and fauorably granted by the King; so as at the comming of those Letters into Spaine, the inhabitants of Vaileadolit and others, seeing that the Cardinall's counsell was allowed by the prince, submitted themselves, and gaue over their factions. There were foure Sindies of the people appointed at Vaileadolit; who should assist at the Council, and might oppose against all decrees and resolutions which should bee made to the prejudice of the King, or commonweale, and if they would proceede, then to aduertise the King. This was thought verie fit and necessarie by the Vaileadolitians, the chiefe whereof were too much obliged to the Admirall and Earle of Benarent. Thus ended the rebellion of those townes against the Cardinall; who by means of these provisions maintained himselfe in his charge and authoritie. These militarie Orders haue been in our time practised by King Philip the second, having appoynted bands and captaines, and granted immunities to the souldiers throughout all his townes. And for that the Cardinall had provided in vaine for all inconueniences which might happen at land, if he should not in like manner assure the realme towards the Sea, hee added to the old galleies which hee found in Spaine; twentie new, which were built and rigged at the charge of the people, dwelling vpon the Sea coast, ynder colour to defend them from the incursions and surprizes of the Moores, Turkes and pyrates; the which procured honourable for him: for soon after that they were readie, the Spanish armie tooke six Turkish galleies with the slaughter of aboute six hundred Turkes, and brought them to Alicant. This Cardinall forgetting nothing that might serue for the publique good, hee repaired the forts and publique monuments which went to ruine; amongst which was the Alcazana, or Alcazar of Seville. His care and diligence extended to the Islands and West Indies, where, by his peticie and wisdom, the Ilanders beganne to take some libertie. At that time there was resident in Madrid, Don Diego Colon, Admirall of the Indies, who had bene called home into Spaine by the deceased King D. Ferdinand; by reason of some quarrelles betwixt him and some that had charge at the Indies; and for many complaints and accusations framed against him by his enemies. After the kings decease hee did sollicite Cardinall Ximenes the Regent to take knowledge of his iustices; and to suffer him to execute his charge: whereas hee thought it fittest to send some good and learned men to be informed of these matters at the Indies, and to attend hee made chiefe of two souldiers, of the Order of Saint Ierome, the one was Luis de Figueroa prior of the monastarie of Mejorada of Olivado; and the other Alphonso of Saint Iohn prior of Ortega of Burgos, to whom hee ioyntly Alphonso and James, and gaue them charge to passe into the Island of Saint Domingo or Hispaniola, and thence to take an exact information of the insolencies and abuses of euery man, and especially of the quarrells betwixt the Admirall and the Spaniards, and to requite of all things that were profitable or necessary for the publique gouernement, and especially for the quiet and good vlsage of the naturall Indians, who at that time were oppressed with cruel seruitude. Recommending especially vnto them that information of those people in religion: Afterwards hee appoynted Don Alphonso to follow them for President of the Iustice, a man learned in the Lawes, and verie stout. The souldiers being come into the land, beganne to execute their charge very diligently, and with discretion, and did order many things, whereof this is memorable: King Ferdinand deceased, had distributed the Ilanders and Indians to certaine captaines, and other Spaniards,

A ards, who had employed themselves in these discoueries and conquests, to haue the care and defence of them, as Lordes of their vassalls and subiects; and for this reason were called Commanditaires, for that these people Indians were committed vnto them: many of these haue left the Indies, were returned into Spaine; and there remayned: from whence the Fathers (disannulling the king's Foramans Edict)ooke their vassalls and subiects, saying, that it was not reasonable the absent living in idleness and delights, should enioy the fruites due to their vertue, who staying ouer the spacious Ocean with so great danger, did sweate continually vnder their armes to extend the Empire of the Crowne of Spaine, and religion: wherefore the Ilanders were diuided by them to the olde inhabitants residing at the Indies; according to euery mans merite and dignitie. Then they thought that these miserable Indians were slaues by the Lawes of armes; by reason whereof their masters did increase them cruelly, causing them to draw and to carrie burthens like horses or asses, the which seemed verie inhumane to these fathers, and strange from all Christian pietie: wherefore somewhat to moderate that which they could not altogether helpe: they ordained that this people liuing then in the fieldes and desert places, of whom they made no more accompt then of beasts, should bee drawne into townes and villages, and liue vnder some forme of policie and municipall Lawe, taking from their masters this great authoritie and power which they pretended of life and death, letting them know, that they should vse them as vassalls, and not abuse them as slaues.

C Thus the Fathers thought to provide for the libertie of this people, against the tyranny of the souldiers: where they found great difficulties and debates, the which is visually seene when they seeke to abolish any peruerse custome; so as their holy diligence did afterwards cause a very bad effect, through the wickednesse of the Spaniards, who seeing the same order obserued by the fathers in other Ilands, and places of those regions, whereas the like diuisions and distributions had bene assigned, as well by the Admirall Columbus and others, thinking that hereafter there would come others, so as in the end the Indians should be set at full libertie, wherat the Spaniards were so mad, as surcharging their subiects and vassalls with insupportable traile they made them shrinke vnder their burthens, and die. They saie, that by the industrie of these friers, the art of drawing and refining of sugar was much bettered and augmented, and therefore they were much honoured in Spaine, as the authors and inuentsors of many profitable things.

It happened at that time, that some without the priuie of Cardinall Ximenes, had gotten leaue of King Charles in Flaunders, to carrie foure hundred Ethiopian Moores to the Ilands, such as the Portugalles were accustomed to bring into Spaine, vnder colour that the art of drawing and trimming their sugars required great and strong labour, which the weak bodied Indians could not vndergoe: which the Cardinall vnderstanding hee presently aduertised the King of the danger hee foresawe therein; for these Moores are more strong and giuen to armes: wherefore hee besought him to consider what a subiect of sedition those men which had obtained this leaue of him, caried with the Indians, a simple and rude people, who without doubt would learne of them to bee hardie and warrelke, and to rebell afterwards against the Spaniards. This counsell was contemned by the king, or rather by Monseign de Chenes who gouerned him, thinking that the Cardinall did not so much blame their traffike of slaues for the good of the Common weale, as for that hee being Gouernour of Spaine, thought it should not be allowed without his priuie; but hee found afterwards by the event, how wise the Cardinall's aduice was. For in the year one thousand five hundred and two, and twentie, by the conspiracie of foure of these Moores, they did cause a seruile warre in the Island of Hispaniola, the which was hardly quenched by the vertue and diligence of Melchior de Castro, and Francis d'Avila Inhabitants there.

20 The gouernement of Castile was not yet assured from troubles, when as they had newes, that Iohn of Albret king of Nauarre came with a great armie of French, for the recouerie of his realme, wherewith the Cardinall was troubled; having not suffici-

Cruelty of the Spaniards to the Indians.

Others brought and sold for the warre.

Nauarre

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 26.

Tumult at Malaga.Malaquins supplie.Gouernors should be maintained in their reputation.Contention for the towne of Aurealo.

sons which were vpon the Sea-coasts did abuse these things, appealing sometime from the kings justice, sometimes to the admiraltie. Being not able to obtain any prouision therein from king Ferdinand, at such time as the Cardinal gouerned, they sent into Flander from king Charles of Austria. But, as a multitude dets, to get an abolition of this justice from king Charles of Austria. But, as a multitude hauling once a desire, hath no patience, order nor mean, those of Malaga, without expecting of any answer, did tumultuously chase away the judges and beat down the gib-bets, and all other marks of the Admiralty in their towne and iurisdiction: whereof cell, who thinking by admonitions and threats to suppress the heat of this people, they received answer, that they would not submit themselves to any judgement touching the differences betwixt them and the admiral, vntill that king Charles their soveraigne lord were arrived in Spaine: and meaning to maintaine themselves in this opinion against any force that should be offered them, they took armes, and planted all the artillerie they had vpon their towers & wals, making one peece of admirable greatnes, by a general contribution of the people, wheron they did graue these words in latin, Malacitana libertatis assertores, &c. that is to say, the defenders of the Malaquins libertie haue caused it to be made. The multitude was entertained in this rebellion for a time, by some of their citizens, to whome the Flemish lords that were neere vnto the kings person, did write letters, and promise fauor: but the Cardinal after that he had vsed all mild remedies, sent an army of the legionaries, according to his institution, in the which were 6000 foot and 400 horse, led by D. Antonio de la Cueva: whereupon the Malaquins fainting, when as their my came but to Antequera, they sent word, that they were ready to obey the Cardinals commandements, sending two deputies vnto him, whos in the cities name besought him to take them to mercy, and to abstaine from blood. D. Anthony hauing aduertise the Cardinal of the Malaquins submission, hee had commandement to end matters with mildnes and clemency, and to yeeld all the might vnto them, preserving the kings honour and dignitie. There were five of the chief authors of the sedition hanged, & the rest were pardoned. Of which things the Cardinal did aduertise the king, letting him vnderstand how preiudiciall it would be to the common weale, if his counsell of Flanders did so easily vndo that which had bin concluded with mature deliberation in the counsell of Spaine; beseeching him therein to haue a care of his authority, the which was ioyned to the royal authoritie, holding, that the chiefest foundation of the publike peace, did consist in the reputation of the gouernour.

22 In Castille Iohn Velasques of Cuellar, superintendent of the treasure, son to doctor
Gustiere Velasques, fought to keepe the castle of Aurealo by force, which place the queene
D. Isabella, wife to king Iohn the second, had had for her dwelling, and had bene committed, as also the affaires of the widow queene, to the custodie of doctor Gustiere, & then to his sonne after his death: but the Cardinal had newly, by the aduice of king Charles, giuen that place, with Olmedo, Madrigal, and Santa Maria de Nieua, with their reuenues, vnto the queene Germaine, widow to king Ferdinand, in exchange of 30000 ducats of rent which the king her husband had left her by his will, to be taken out of the reuenues of Naples: wherupon Velasques seeing himself put from the possession of the Castle of Aurealo, which he did think should haue bin perpetual, he durst presume to hold it by force, being prest ther-unto by D. Maria of Velasco his wife, who was at that time as much hated of Q. Germaine, as shee had bene formerly beloued: and fauoured by her; besides that many noblemen desiring to see Velasques advanced, either for loue, or for alliance that was betwixt them, & not greatly affecting queen Germaine; they encouraged him to commit this inso-lency, promising him aide at all euents: but such promises are most commonly vaine & deceitful, when as the soveraigne magistrat pursues his right, euery man fearing when it comes to a matter of fact, to incur the punishment of a rebell. Against this purpose of Velasques, the Cardinal, after his accustomed maner, vsed all mild courses, causing the king to write kind letters vnto him, and this prevailing little, he afterwards added threats: but he gaue more credit to his wife, & to the persuasions of the admiral, the constable, the earle of Benauent, the duke of the Infantazgo & others, who enuied the cardinal, of which the admirall shewed letters signed by them all, promising that if the Cardinal attempted any thing

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A thing against the towne of Aurealo, they would send him succours, & therefore the Inhabitants should take courage to maintein themselves vnder the iurisdiction of the crown, rather than to receiue a woman for their lady & mistress, being assured that k. Charles, being in the country, he would like of their constancy, and dispose otherwise of their affaires.
The inhabitants of Aurealo being animated hereby, they reiect all good Councell:
wherefore the Cardinal sent an alcaide of the court thither, with some souldiers, to reduce them to their duties, who summoned them by a trumpet to obey the kings commandement, else he would proceed against them with all rigour, as rebels, & would make Velasques proceesse condemning him as a traitor, which note should passe to all his posterity, & would confiscate his goods. These formations being reiterated according to the forme of Iustice, & with solemnities and ceremonies, Velasques seeing that neither the admiral nor the other noblemen, which had promised him so much assistance, did not make any offer to defend him, he thought it better for him to yeeld vnto the Alcaide, the to attend the rigor of armes, or the proceeding of justice, wherefore hee dismissed the souldiers which were in garrison in the Castle; the which with the towne were deliuered vp vnto Alcaide.
Some daies after Velasques went to court, & submitted himselfe & his affaires to the Cardinals pleasure, who receiued him courteously, promising him all assistance & fauor to the king, & did comfort him for the great afflictions which he had suffered, especially for the late death of his eldest son, which grief did soon bring him to his end at Madrid, although some did say that he was poisoned.

C These things done in fauour of the royall authority, by Cardinal Ximenes, he found meanes to maintaine them of Aurealo & Olmedo in their priuiledges and liberties, & to keep them from coming into the power of Q. Germaine, whom he did not loue, for that he saw himself contemned by her, & that she did incline to the party of the Infant D. Ferdinand, & of his gouernors, who were opposite vnto him: wherupon he did write vnto king Charles in Flanders, shewing him by old & new examples how much it did import for the safety of Castille, that Aurealo & Olmedo places of strength and fit to trouble the realm should remain vnto the crown, & not be in the possession of any priuat lord, obiecting that which D. Iohn king of Nauarre & Arrago, had attempted, by the opportunity of those two places, against D. Iohn 2 king of Castille: saying moreover, that Q. Germaine had cause D content her self with the large reuenues of Madrigal alone, wherewith she had bin satisfied before the troubles of Aurealo: That if he had suppressed the inhabitants & Velasques, it was more to teach them to obey the kings commandement, than for that he thought it expedient that place should bee giuen to the queene, to whom he had granted it, before hee was truly aduertised of the estate of her affaires; adding to his letters a copy of the priuiledges granted by auncient kings to the townes of Aurealo and Olmedo: wherefore hee did easily obtaine from the kings, that which hee pretended, at the least hee kept the townes in their liberty, and caused the matter to be deferred vntill his coming.

E 23 The pitifull estate of D. Iane queen of Castille, did much trouble the Cardinal Ximenes, being afflicted with a miserable infirmity for this princeesse was posselt with a cruell melancholike humor, so as she led a most lamentable life in the castle of Tordesillas, wheras k. Ferdinand her father had lodged her, a pleasant & commodious place. Lewis Ferrier of Valencia had charge of her, being also captain of the castle of Tordesillas, but he was vnfit for such a busines; for whether by his slownes, growing by reason of his age, or through ignorance, he could neuer get her to lodge in any pleasant and well syred chamber of the castle, but would alwaies lurke in darke and obscure places neere the ground, fit to enertain and augment her melancholike humor: she did abhorre soft and delicate beds, and F would lie vpon the ground, and if she did lay herself vpon a board couered with a Carpet, it was by great importunity: it was not possible to make her weare a furred gowne in winter, nor any thing that was rich: She was often three daies together without eating; neither could the prayers nor persuasions of her seruants preuaile any thing with her: she often complained that she was kept like a prisoner, and that they withheld her from the gouernment of affaires, like a priuat person.

The Cardinal was much grieved for these things; & somewhat to remedie it, holding T t t t j for Estate of queen

Iane of Castille, mother to king Charles.Ambition raising in Queen
Iane.

for certain that the negligence of Lewis Ferrier did feed the malice of her infirmity, hee G dismiss him by reason of his great age, putting in his place Ferdinand Duca called Straz, of Talavera, a man of a Noble family, wife and well aduised, who carried himselfe so discreetly in his charge, as in a short time hee did moderate this violent humour in the Queene, and got her to bee content to haue her chamber made cleane, and many earthen dishes wherein they did commonly serue her to bee carried away: for shee had an humor to make them leaue the dishes full of meat in her chamber, not suffering them to carrie any away, so as the meat corrupting, made a stinking fauour:
then by little and little hee procured her to lie in a bed; hee perswaded her to goe abroad to church, and made her to haue some feeling and apprehension that shee was a H Queene, and so acknowledged: and so by little and little made her familiar, & brought her to a more milde and humane kinde of life: the which did much please king Charles her sonne, who thanked Cardinall Ximenes by his letters.

The displeasure which Lewis Ferrier had conceived for his displacing, was augmented by the dismissal of his sonne, from the gouernement of Toledo, for his misdemeanors and negligence, which caused infinite confusions; in whose place the earle of Palma, of the family of Portocarrero was made gouernour, a man worthy of great honour, who was receiued notwithstanding the oppositions of the faction of Ayala:
for the citie of Toledo, hath beene long diuided into two factions of Sylva and of Ayala. This was pacified by the diligence of the earle of Fuensalida, who was one of the I heads of it, a deare friend to Cardinall Ximenes. Doctor Gallego being sent to Toledo to informe of the life and behauiour of the gouernour of Ferrier, displaced by the Cardinall and the kings councill, by a memorable example, and shewing his auarice feueritic, hee caused some officers and ministers of iustice to be publicly whipt, being convicted of corruption and other crimes, and would haue punished Araoz treasurer of the Calatrava more grieuously, if hee had not fled away, being accused of infinite villanies, rapes, & violences committed about his commandery of Loria, whereof being deprived by sentence, the Cardinall gaue it vnto Sancho Cabrera. By these offices of piety and iustice, the Cardinall made himselfe to be obeyed, feared, beloued and reueren- K ced in Castille, keeping the realme in peace, and prouiding in the meane time for those things which might serue for future and vnexpected accidents. Hee appointed arce-nals or storehouses for artillerie, engines, and all munition of warre, in three places of Spain: At Medina del Campo, beyond the mountaines, in Castille the old: in the realm of Toledo, at Alcalá de Henares; and at Malaga in Granada, that when any tumultor sedition should arise, they might haue speedy meanes to suppress it: As for that of Medina del Campo, it is most certaine that it was then made. He had an humour to haue coyned a peece of money, on the which should be grauen the Image of Saint Francis, but the kings councill holding it to be somewhat ambitious in the Cardinall, who was a firmer, opposed themselves. He began a commendable and most profitable thing in all great estates, that is, hee obtained a decree from king Charles, by the which there was com- L mendement giuen to bring in all sort of registres, accompts, memorials, instructions, & such like writings, concerning the publike affaires, of the realm, or the state of the kings house, which might be in the hands of the counsellors and soveraign Iudges, or of those which had been employed in embassages to foreine Princes and common-weales, and other persons whatsoeuer, to be kept in certaine places, to be vsed when time and necessity should require: the which if it had been executed, posteritie had bene better satisfied of that which had past in precedent times, and better informed of that which was to be done. By some little which was done according to this decree, the Cardinall came to the knowledge of many things, especially of that which concerned the militarie orders of Spaine, as the reuenues & ancient rights of the masters, & of their tables, of the common money of com- M manderies, & the duties of commanders & their iustice and Chapters; which things were vnknowne to the kings officers, the masterships hauing bene retained and held by kings, and then annexed to the crowne: so as there were infinite fraudes and abules committed, which gaue occasion to the great commanders of those orders, to make oppositions, and to seeke to exempt themselves out of the Cardinalls power, yea

Ministers of iustice punished exemplary.

Storehouses for munition in Spaine.

Search of aucient writings
by Cardinall Ximenes.

A yea of the king himselfe: the prouision of Commanderies, was one of the quarrels which they debated; saying, that it should bee Canonically done; according vnto the orders which they held, and not giuen to any, but to them of their orders, respectively: but it is hard to kicke against the power of kings; wherefore altho that the commanders could alleage was easily refuted by the Cardinall, who could giue good interpretations to their Papall Bulles, and other instructions which they produced. Through the Cardinalls diligence, by the reuision of the ancient accompts, hee found that there had been imbezeled from the king about forty Millions of Marauidis euerie yea, the fraud consisting chiefly in that the commanders were in old time to assist their masters in the warres against the moores, with a certaine number of B Soldiers entertained at their charges; the which they concealed, and freed themselves, leaving the care and charge to the king. Finding that some townes belonging to those masterships had bene vsurped, hee restored them to the kings reuenues, wherein he did chiefly make vse of the labour and diligence of Tobilla and Cabrera, commanders of the orders of Calatrava. He made inquirie of the manners and carriage of the Iudges of those orders, and censured them, displacing some, and instituting others: Hee had resol-ued to doe the like to them of the Chanceries and great counsell, as well following the court, as of Valladolid, Granado, Galicia, and others, with speciall commandement from the king, which hee had procured to that end: hee did with great diligence and se-ueritie cut off many gifts, fetes and entertainments, which were not greatly necessarie;
C the which did much ease the kings coffers, not fearing to offend his greatest and dearest friends, for the profit of his Prince, wherby he purchased many enemies: finally imitating the emperor Seuerus, a most worthy Prince, hee would not haue any one receiue wages from the king, nor to haue an office in the state, that were not profitable and necessarie for the common-weale; and hee disappointed all those raze, which did but deuour, retaining onely in court, the Iudges or Councillors of the great Chancery, the officers and ordinarie ministers of the roiall Pallace, the garrisons of the frontiers, the four prouosts of iustice; whome they call Alcaydes, and their archers, the marshalls of the lodgings; and harbin-gers, gards of the body, and such like. But it is doubtfull touching the taking away of of-D ficers fees, whether hee did it of his owne motion, or by the kings commandement: for hee complained by some letters to the king, for that they gaue him alwaies an odious charge to take away, and neuer to giue any thing. But howsoeuer, he was of opinion that sparing was most necessarie and commendable in a prince; who must consider that all that hee spends comes out of the bowels of his people, complaining greatly that in lesse than fourte months that he had begunne to gouerne the realm, king Charles had giuen away a Col about eighteen millions of Marauidis. About all things, he held that a multitude of Collectors and receiuers; and a great number of treasurers were verie pernicious and hurtfull to a state: wherefore he desired that some man of a noble house, diligent and expert, were made superintendent of all the kings money, whose charge should be to distribute the or-E dinarie expenses, as need should require, and to reuene the remainder, to be employed in vnexpected affaires, and in liberalities well employed by king; and vnder him such a number of deputies as should be necessarie: He held, that it was a great confusion in the managing of the treasure, to inuert and employ one kind of money to another vse than it had bene assigned: of which rules hee did continually aduertise the king his master by his letters, and gaue an accompt of his gouernment, shewing with how little charge in a small time that he had been his lieutenant in Castille, hee had effected great matters: Hee had pacified the tumults in Andalusia, repulst the French in Nauarre, suppressed the tempt and rebellion of the Malaquins, held the frontiers wel manned, denied the sea from pirats, and assured the coast, made an enterprize against Alger, freed Bugia, Pegnon and F Melille from feare and the assaults of Harufa Barberousse, succoured Argille for the king of Portugal, and with all discharged great debts, which D. Ferdinand his grandfather did owe. That if he with a limited authority, and for another, amidst the enuy and crosses of his ill willers, could effect such great matters, by the means of sparing & good husbandrie, much more might hee doe it, who was a king; and whose greatness was without the touch of enuie.

Husbandrie of Cardinall Xi-
menes.

Abundance of officers in the treasury hurt-full to the realm.

1517

Cardinal Ximenes an enemy to the Genoises.

Edict against the Genoises revoked.

Proceeding unjust against the accused by the Inquisition.

Contention for the bishopric of Sigüenza.

Nobilitie instituted to command.

Cardinal Ximenes impatient of injuries by reason of his position.

the cardinals will, who was verie obstinate in that which he had once conceived, and did still sollicite the king to breed jealousies in his head against that commonweale, and to bring them into disgrace with him; saying, that they had intelligence with the French: giving infinit crosses to these poore Genovois. Yet in the end, by their diligence and perseverance, they justified themselves, and obtained restitution, and an abolition of the Edict, the cardinals their adversaries (being somewhat pacified) consenting thereunto. He opposed himselfe with great vehemence, against the pursuits of the new Christians (as they call them) in Court, that the judgements of the Inquisition might bee executed against them, touching that which concerns witnesses, according to the forme of other criminall causes; for the accused were not allowed to except against the witnesses, which were not confronted against them, nor yet named: which gave occasion and boldnesse vnto judges, which were greedy of the bloud and wealth of these poore men, to commit many cruelties and abuses in their charges. Finally, this cardinal did so labour with the king and Pope, whereas they of Arragon were also furors, as the lawes of the tribunall of the Inquisition, practised in the time of king Ferdinand, remained firme.

29 About that time there fell out a great debate in the citie of Sigüenza, for the restitution of the cardinall D. Bernardin of Carajal, sometimes bishop of that sea, whereof he had beene deputed by Pope Inno, by reason of the Councell of Pisa. Cardinall Ximenes favouring his reintegration to his dignitie, goods, and honours, made by Pope Leo, he had for opposite D. Frederic of Portugall, subrogated into that bishopricke, after the deposition of D. Bernardin, who would not leave it. So as some holding with cardinall Carajal, and others with D. Frederic, the diocesse was divided, & their contentions came to armes. The place where the greatest excessse was committed, was Almazan, a towne of the earle of Montagus jurisdiction, whither they were resolved to send an Alcaide of the Court, to suppress this tumult. This Alcaide called Ferdinand Calderon, shewed himselfe cruell in his proceedings against this poore people, as the earle their lord telling him, that his too great severity should rather be called outrage then justice: and having by sundrie messengers advertised the kings Councell, and besought them, to commaund Calderon to retire: his being that they made no account of it, he came himselfe well accompanied to Almazan, and forced him to leave the towne. Wherewith the Councell, especially doctor Adrian, who was now a cardinall, and companion to cardinall Ximenes in the government of Castille, being incensed, sent a personall adjournement for the earle of Montagu, and meant to make his processe, as having offended the kings Majestie. But cardinall Ximenes opposed himselfe, shewing that he might lawfully doe that which he had done, seeing that vpon his many complaints made vnto the Councell, against the excessse of Ferdinand Calderon there was no order taken: and so he caused this pursuit to cease. The difference for the bishopricke of Sigüenza, ended in like maner, by the death of D. Gutierre of Toledo, bishop of Plaisance: which place was given to the cardinall of Carajal, and D. Frederic left in the possession of Sigüenza. And for that the governments of cities and provinces of Spaine, had beene for a long time distributed confusedly, & without distinction of persons, whether noble or ynnoble, it was concluded to restore the ancient custome, and conformable to nature, that nobilitie instituted to command, and to exercise honourable charges, should be employed: wherefore there were many changes of old governours throughout all Spaine. True it is, that the Biscanes and they of Palence had no gentlemen at that time, but two famous Lawyers for their governours, that is, León and Gallego. In some places cardinall Ximenes was prevented by such as obtained them by the kings favour, and of the Flemish courtiers; wherewith he was much discontented, especially for the government of Burgos, the which was given without his priuite to D. Pedro of Castille, who deliuered the fort of Lara into the hands of the Sherifes and Communiakie of the towne, and they gave the gard thereof to Jeffrey of Conde, a Fleming, who had beene marshall of the lodging to the deceased king Philip, an inconstant man, and a prater, and therefore much hated by cardinall Ximenes. Of this and of many other things done by D. Pedro, he made sundrie complaints vnto the king. So impatient he was of any injurie, as he thought that whatsoever king Charles ordained, touching the affaires of Spaine, if it came not from him, and his advertisements and counsels, it was done.

A done in contempt of him, condemning it as pernicious, and as subjects of seditions; accusing the noblemen and counsellors of Flanders of rashnesse, who being ignorant of the lawes and manners of the Spaniards, medled with the disposition of the governments of Spaine, the which did wholly depend of the Viceroyes authoritie and reputation, and of the kings councell which was in the country. He did honour and cherish doctor Adrian Florent verie much, for that he yielded vnto him: He procured him the bishopricke of Tortosa, the which made his way to a cardinals hat, and afterwards to the Papacie. He sought also by all meanes to procure him the dignitie of Inquisitor generall of Arragon, as he himselfe had that of Castille; but he could not. The secretarie Mote of Burgos, a diuine, was verie deere vnto him, whom he made bishop of Badajos, and would have made him cardinall, and Archbishop of Toledo, had not the cardinall died so soone, which hindered him from enjoying of those dignities whereof he held himselfe sure, but he was deceived. Mote had beene preacher to king Philip, after whose decesse he would have retired into Flanders, for that in hatred of the king D. Ferdinand, he and all the servants of the deceased, sought to draw the Emperour Maximilian into Spaine, to contend for the government of those realmes, for prince Charles his grand child. To haue the better accessse vnto the young princes court, he begged letters of fauour almost from all the chiefe noblemen of Spaine. King Ferdinand knowing that this preacher was full of spleene against him, yet would he not hinder his voyage for Flanders, shewing therein C a generous mind: but he gave order, that when he should be readie to depart, all his letters of recommendation should be stolne from him; the which was cunningly performed by the care of D. Bernardin of Velasco, the kings sonne in law, who had great meanes in that citie to doe it. Mote not discouering what was done, goes on his way, and being arrived in Flanders, where they were already advertised that he should come, accompanied with many letters of fauour, when he opened his male he found not any, whereat he was much abashed, and therefore for a time was held of all those courtiers for a man of a shallow braine. Notwithstanding his vertue and eloquence made him a way to king Charles his favour, and advanced him to honour, by the meanes of cardinall Ximenes: who also procured honours and titles to many others, whose qualities and behaviour were D pleasing vnto him, as to D. John Pacheco, sonne to the earle of Escalona, the title of earle of Saint Stephen; to D. William Peres of Ajala, that of earle of Gomera, which is one of the islands of the Canaries, which he obtained of seeking for him. Such was the government and carriage of cardinall Ximenes, who was feared and respected both of great and small in Castille.

THE

THE 27 BOOKE OF THE Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 Disagreement betwixt cardinall Ximenes and the noblemen of Flanders. Three governors in Castille.
- 2 Seditions in Castille, under pretext of the Flemings greedinesse.
- 3 Exactions of the Pope hindered by cardinall Ximenes.
- 4 Proceffe ambitionly ended by cardinall Ximenes, among the great men. Contempts of iustice, rebellions, and other insolencies suppress by him.
- 5 Profanation of the order of cardinals by Pope Leo.
- 6 Cardinall Francis Ximenes poisoned by his enemies.
- 7 Reformation of the house of the Infants D. Ferdinand, brother to king Charles of Austria, by cardinall Ximenes.
- 8 Arrivall of king Charles of Austria in Spaine. Disgrace, discharge, and death of cardinall Ximenes.
- 9 Behaviour and qualities of cardinall Ximenes.
- 10 Bible printed in Spaine in many languages, by the diligence of cardinall Ximenes.
- 11 Buildings made by this cardinall.
- 12 Estates at Valladolid. Crowning of Charles of Austria king of Castille.
- 13 Election of Charles of Austria to be Emperour: his departure out of Spaine.
- 14 Sedition in Castille against cardinall Adrian and the governors.
- 15 Enterprize of king Henrie of Albret, for the recovery of his realme of Navarre. The taking of Pampelone.
- 16 The beginning and progresse of the Iesuites.
- 17 Sect of Theatines differing from the Iesuites.
- 18 Unfortunate exploits of the lord of Aspernaut in Navarre.
- 19 Another expedition of the French into Guipuscoa, under the lord of Bonivet: and the taking of Fontarrabie.
- 20 Adrian Pope. Continuance of the warre of Navarre. The Emperours returne into Spaine.
- 21 Fontarrabie recovered by the Spaniards. The governors of that fort successively unto our time.
- 22 Taking of king Francis at Paula.
- 23 Marriage of the Emperour Charles the first.
- 24 Rome sacked by the Spaniards.
- 25 Marriage of king Henrie of Albret with Marguerite of France.
- 26 Navigation of Ferdinand and Magellanes to the South.
- 27 Marriage of duke Charles of Savoy and D. Beatrice of Portugall.
- 28 D. Iohn the third of that name, and 15 king of Portugall.
- 29 Continuance of the navigation to the East, and the wonderfull voyage of Iohn Sebastian del Cano.
- 30 Marriage of D. Iohn king of Portugall, with D. Katherine, sister to the Emperour Charles.

- A 31 Unprofitable voyage of the Castilians to the Molacques.
- 32 Treatie of Cambrey.
- 33 Coronation of the Emperour at Bolonia.
- 34 Peru discovered.
- 35 Muley Hascen, king of Tunis, expelled by Barberousse, and restored by the Emperour.
- 36 Voyage of Pronomby the Emperour.
- 37 Portugals assailed by the Turkes in the East.
- 38 Enterprize of Pope, Emperour, and French king at Nice.
- 39 Troubles for the impost in diuers places.
- 40 Emperours voyage to Algier.
- 41 Warre betwixt the Emperour and French king, and then a peace concluded.
- 42 Muley Hascen, king of Tunis, againe dispossest.

For the continuance of the royall lines of Spaine in this seven and twentieth Booke, mention is made for

CASTILLE, of LEON, ARRAGON, NAVARRE:
23 D. Charles 1. — 44 the same 1. — 21 the same 1. — 37 the same 1.

The severitie and integritie of cardinall Ximenes, in the government of affaires, could not belong supportable to the Spaniards; who are haughty and proud, and accustomed to serve their kings being present; and much lesse to the Flemings, who were neere unto king Charles, who desirous to make vie of their credit and authoritie, did still busie themselves with the great affaires of Spaine, and made their profit, to the cardinals great griefe, he opposing himself against them in all he could: so as all things tended to confusion, as well among the Spaniards, who desired the coming of their prince into the countrey; the which might quench many quarrels, and content those that did envie the cardinals greatnesse, as with the many Flemings, who entertained the king in Flanders, upon diuers colours, thinking it a fit meane to compass their designs, if he did not undertake this voyage; and in truth these had the advantage, the king being in their power. And to take some countenance for the mischances which he feared might happen in Spaine, by reason of the kings absence, it was concluded to send the lord of Chaux thither, who had bene much favoured by king Philip, and was chamberlaine to Charles his sonne; a man fitter to entertaine a prince with pleasant discourse, and to keep him companie, than to manage the great affaires of a kingdome. To him was given the third place in the government of Castille, with cardinall Ximenes, and doctor Adrian, who had procured the coming of this third, writing into Flanders, That he was not sufficient to resist cardinall Ximenes, a haughty man, who (not able to endure a companion) did manage all things at his pleasure. The coming of Chaux was verie pleasing to the noblemen, and to the people of Spaine, who were discontented with the cardinall, and he was received with all royall honours, against the which the cardinall did not in any sort oppose himselfe, shewing therein, as in all other things, a great magnanimitie and constancie, although he knew that he was sent to check his authoritie and greatnesse. All the great noblemen of Spaine, without attending any commandement from cardinall Ximenes the Viceroy, went to meet him, being accompanied with great numbers of their friends and vassals: and coming neere to Madrid, they went forth to encounter him, doctor Adrian, his brother, and by the commanders of the militarie orders, having with them a great traine of commanders of euerie order, the Rector or gouernour of the towne, the Sherifes and most apparent burgeses, the embassadors or deputies of Arragon, the royall Councell, the Inquisition, the chamber of accounts, and other officers of the kings house, euerie one going in his ranke and order, with whom there joyned the bishop of Auilla, with the cardinals traine: And of noblemen, blemen, the marquisse of Villena, the earle of Vregna, the marquisse of Comares and Aguilár, D. Berrand de la Cueva, eldest sonne to the duke of Albuquerque, the earle of Oropesa, and others. Such as were not there were kept backe by a disease which did run generally ouer all Spaine. Cardinall Ximenes, in regard of his place of Viceroy, stayed in the palace, and receiued monsieur de Chambré, at the entrie of the great chamber of the lodging, which was prepared for him, and that night he feasted him with great state, and entertained him with much pleasant discourse; lodging him for that time in the chamber where the bishop of Auila was accustomed to lodge, for that the Infant D. Ferdinand, the widow queene Germaine, and the cardinall, were commonly lodged in the castle, and held a great part of it. Thus was this nobleman receiued and honoured, being the first that was sent into Spaine with authoritie, since that Charles of Austria tooke vpon him the title of king. The great lords of Spaine came to visit monsieur de Chambré, and courted him: but the cardinall had no great care to impart the affaires vnto him, nor to call him, vnlesse he came of himselfe, yet holding still the first place in all expeditions, the which he made knowne to him and doctor Arken, who hauing for a time signed some dispatches, leauing a place for the cardinall to signe vnder them, being presented vnto him thus signed, he care them in peeces, and caused others to be made, and signed them aboute, the which were of as great effect. And thus he continued vntill the kings coming, although before he would haue doctor Arken signe all things with him.

The lord of Chaux third gouernour in Spain by the procurement of doctor Adrian.

Cardinall Ximenes main-taines his au-thoritie resolutely.

The Flemish nobilitie being aduertised of this harsh proceeding, it made them abinke, that this cardinall would one day trouble both them and the king: wherefore to shate (as they thought) his greatness, they procured to haue a fourth sent into Spaine, vnder colour of some priuat businesse, with equall authoritie to the rest. This was Armasoff, a man that was some what grise: yet they might say, that of all that companie the cardinall was most iudicious, and continued his accustomed course, notwithstanding any thing that they could doe. But they stayed not here, for they often resolved in Flanders, to send some great prince to gouerne Spaine, to whom the cardinall should be forced to yeeld; or some other of judgement and vnderstanding, to oppose him against this great spirit. Some were of opinion, to intreat the Emperour Maximilian to take vpon him this charge; others, Lewis, count Palatin, allied to the king; and some, to giue the authoritie to the Infant D. Ferdinand: many gaue their voyces to the Chancellor Sauage. As for Maximilian, he was engaged in the warres of Italie to aduance Ferdinand, that was not safe nor conuenient, and it had beene alwayes their care, which loued the peace and vnion of these two brethren, that the Infant should be neereley lookt vnto, least that mines should make him their shield. The count Palatin was held fit, yea to take charge of the Infant, the which did not altogether displease the cardinall; for he had desired euer since the death of the Catholike king, to remoue such from about him, as, in his opinion, had bred him vp ill, yet he desired rather not to obey any one; to which end he writ to the king, beseeching him, not to send any into Spaine, with whom he must alwayes quarrell, but rather to giue him leaue to retire to his diocesse, where he would looke to his owne priuat affaires, and liue religiously in rest: for he did foresee, that the enuie of some, and the couetousnesse of many, would alwayes seeke to crosse his good designs and resolutions to serue the commonweale, they tending to no other end, but to cause some great tumult in Spaine, wherein he desired not to be engaged, but rather to looke on a fare off: aduertising him, that the onely remedie of these inconueniences was, to commit the affaires to his tried faith, and to relie onely vpon him, not suffering any Fleming, nor any of his Councell a fare off (no not himselfe vntill he were at age) to meddle in Spaine with the prouision of Estates, and order of iustice, with governments of prouinces, leauing of the kings money, nor with garisons of frontiers, and their commaunders: but onely retaine vnto himselfe the disposition of bishopricks being void, commaunders, and benefices of knights of militarie orders, and to vse his royall bountie with good measure: his cardinall diuiding betwixt the king and him the royall souerainetie, the which euery man of judgement thought expedient, considering his constant resolution to maintaine iustice and right in all things; adding still this concluding reason. For that, said he, the Flemings vnderstand nothing in our affaires in Spaine, and that the king by reason

Cardinall Ximenes cannot endure a comparison in the government of Castille.

Cardinall Ximenes will diuide the royall authoritie betwixt the king and himselfe.

A reason of his tender age, cannot vndergoe so great a burthen, full of care and trouble: By reason whereof he caused himselfe to be so hated, as many Councels were held against him, and without doubt his dayes were shortened. The courtiers dissembled, expecting but an opportunitie to rumble him from this high degree, in the which hee maintained himselfe invincible, against their wills, who writ vnto him, That hee should continue to doe well, assuring him that they would assist him with all their means, and sollicit the kings passage into Spaine; aduising him, for the effecting thereof, to send a good armie of ships well furnished into Flanders.

This voyage was much prest by the Emperour Maximilian, as most necessarie, and therefore he came to Brussels to see the king, and to conferre with him, fearing least his long stay there would cause some alteration in the State; comparing those people, being moued, to a colt, which being stung with a hornet, kickes at euery one, sparing not his owne damme. This conference put the cardinall into a ieaalousie, writing to monsieur de Chenres, That the entreatie of great men, did neuer bring profit neither to themselves, nor to their affaires, prouing it by many examples and great reasons. The Spaniards seeing that the time past away in vaine hopes of their princes comming, they began to make conuenticles, and to runne into the course (but by another way) of former seditions: For, sayed they, the Flemings not able to forbear to meddle with the affaires of Spaine; whereof they had made shew not to care, they leaue vs not any estate, charge, nor benefice; but it is sold to them that will giue most, and prophesied by vnworthie men: The great treasures of the realme gathered together, and religiously preferred by cardinall Ximenes; for the kings comming, are spoiled by strangers, and transported out of Spaine, the which is not tollerable to a free nation, well affected to the honour and greatesse of their prince, and to the publicke good. They of Burgos, Leon, Valledolit, and all that cuntry of Spaine, being incensed with these complaints and quarels, they appointed a day to resolve on some remedies for these great disorders, or how they might withstand the greedinesse of the Flemish courtiers. Many thought it fit to persuaide the king to chase all Flemings from about him, and to take Spaniards in their places, such as were vnderstanding men, to counsell him. Others sayed, That besides the difficultie to obtaine it, it was to be feared that Spaine would in short time be as corrupt as the rest, and more cunning in their villanies; holding, that the best course to restraine the couetousnesse of courtiers, by a publicke decree, by the which power should be taken from the king, to giue the estates, offices, or benefices of Spaine to strangers. That there should be no readie money caried out of the cuntry without great cause, and that no necessarie money for the kings house, should be sent by cardinall Ximenes, without consent of the townes. Many other things of this kind were then propounded, profitable, in truth, for the publicke, but derogating somewhat from the authoritie and Maiestie royall: for thereby they did open sigate vnto the people to commit great infolencies, the which they found by experience, after the death of cardinall Ximenes, who moderating what he could the peoples hear, could not prevent the decrees of these assemblies for the publicke good, some gouernors consenting therunto, and signing them, as D. Pedro of Castille, at Burgos, and others: yet the Leonois could neuer induce D. Frederic of Zamora, their gouernour, to consent vnto such decrees, whereof the towne and Comminalties did afterwards aduertise the cardinall and the kings Councell, sending deputies to treat with them of the affaires of the commonweale affected; and to intreat them to appoint a place and time for a generall assemble to that end: The cardinall and the Councell knew well, that the desire of the townes was iust, yet they sought to moderate them, fearing some popular tumults, persuaading them to forbear an assemble, vntill they had more certaine newes of the kings comming, who they vnderstood made preparation to imbarke speedily. In the meane time they did aduertise the king of all that had past, excusing the Spaniards, for that they did not in any sort doubt of the kings good will, and judgement to know, that all the admonitions & counsels which they gaue him, were holy and iust, but they complained of the Flemings that were about his person, who could make their diligences vaine, and get vnto themselves, both before the kings comming and after, the riches of Spaine without measure: so as it

2 Greedinesse of the Flemings gouerning king
Charles.

Demandes of the townes of Spaine.

Cardinall and Councell know
the Spaniards demande against the Flemings.

1517 Capacity of the Flemings.

Spaniards demand the Estates.

Libels cast abroad.

Exaltions of Pope Leo hindered by cardinall Ximenes.

Clergie of Spain
free from the exaction of the sensu penie of their benefices.

was thought the Chancellor Sauvage had gotten for his part in lesse than foure moneths, G about five hundred thousand crownes: and if we will conjecture how monieur de Cheu- res and the rest profited, we cannot imagine what great summes these thefts amounted vnto. The Spaniards seeing the kings comming to be daily delayed, the cardinal and the Councell were againe importuned for a generall assemblie of the Estates, where they promised not to treat of any thing, but to sollicite the king to come into Spaine, H to maintaine the lawes and rights of the countrey; to suppress the coueroulesse of courtiers, and the ambition of suitors for estates and offices: else, the people did protest, that they would send embassadours vnto the king, and prouide that the common-weale should take no harme, by such meanes as God should put into their hands. The cardinall not able with reason to denie their iust demand, he appointed an assemblie in the next month of September 1577, prorogating it of purpose to Autumne, beleuing that about that time the king might arrive in Spaine; and in the meane time he prepared a fleet of ships for his voyage, the which he sent him, posts running continually from Spaine to Flanders, and back againe, to aduance this comming, without the which they saw no meanes to maintaine the realme in peace: the cardinall holding (and rightly) it to be a pemitious thing; when as the people, hauing cause of grievance, prelimes to complaine publicly: for when as they haue once lost the reuerence which they owe vnto the superiour, there is no more any restraint; and popular complaints and quarrels are easily receiued and beleued, by such as haue a desire to trouble the State, whereof the number is alwayes great in great realmes. The place assigned for the assemblie, was at Madrid, the Viceroyes and the Councels place of residence. Many dan-derous libels were at that time cast abroad, euerie man censuring the cardinals adons according to his owne conceits: and seeing it was now a time of back-biting, and that some one had begun, doctor Adrian, monieur de Cheures, Francis Ruiz, monieur de Cheux, and others, were not spared. But cardinall Ximenes contemned these things, with a manly courage, saying, That they must leaue this solace to the multitude, to moderate their afflictions, which they could not otherwise reuenge; whereas the Flemings, who were not accustomed to this stinging, seemed to be much discontented:
so as it is no wonder if Adrian comming to bee Pope, caused the statues of Marforio and Paquin to be cast into the riuer of Tiber, whom they made to carrie the libels that were set vp in Rome: whereupon, they say, that the Spanish embassadour which was then in Rome, said vnto him, That it was to be feared, by this drowning the frogs would presently learne to sing bad songs.

3 The Cardinal being come to Toledo, to visit (attending the kings coming) his diocese, and the monasteries of Nunnes which he caused to be built, as well in that citie as at Illefa, being accompanied by doctor Adrian, he heard the complaint of the Clergie, for that Pope Leo, by vertue of the last decree of the Councell of Lateran, demanded the tenth of the revenues of all their benefices, vpon colour to defend the Christian religion against Infidels; for that Selim Emperour of the Turkes, having vanquished the Sultan of Egypt, did threaten Christendome, and namely Italie: Wherefore he not daely tent this year into Spaine, but into all others regions of Europe, whereas the Popes name and authoritie was reuerenced, to exact this money for three yeares, with many Indulgences and pardons to them that should contribute money willingly; and extraordinarily, whereof there followed great troubles in Christendome, yet with a lightning of the Gospell.

Cardinall Ximenes, whose authority was great with the Pope, was solicited not only by the Clergie of Castille, but also by that of Arragon (where they do all by an ancient right enjoy great priviledges and liberties) to take this cause in hand, and to be a mediator vnto the Pope; that the Clergie of Spaine might not be made tributary. The Cardinall did willingly offer to take vpon him the protection of this order; but hee did admonish them, not to make any assemblies to that end, but when hee should command them. In the meane time hee did manage this businesse so politickly at Rome, by the ministrie of Arreaga, his Agent, as hee kept Spaine free from this exaction; but in case of great necessitie; and having after

1517

A after the manner of auncient kings, called the deputies of the Clergie to the Court at Madrid, he gaue them this good newes, and attended willingly their refection, which was, not to contribute any thing. They say, that this tenth penie for three yerres, was duely leuied in Italie, in the territories of the Church, and no where else, but his Bulls of Indulgences, and the preaching of the Croisado, was generall.

4 There were many great fuits in Spain, which through the fraud and tergiversation of parties, and their counsels, were delayed and drawne into length, the which the cardinall desired to have determined before the kings comming, but he was suspected : Wherefore three of the greatest noblemen of Spain, in a manner at one instant, as it were conspiring together, did greatly crossie him, that is, the duke of the Infantado, chiefe of the house of Mendoza, D. Frederic of Toledo, duke of Alua, and the earle of Vregna, Giron. The duke of the Infantazgo remembered how that the cardinall had hindered the marriage betwixt D. Pedro Gonçales of Mendoza, his nephew, and D. Ioaue of Ciferinos, the cardinals neece : wherefore being incensed against him, he thought there was some indirect dealing with his aduersarie partie, the earle of Castilo, against whom hee had his suit, for the place of Belenna, neere vnto Guadalajara ; by reason whereof he desired to prolong the cause vntill the kings comming, of whom hauing obtained letters for his part, and the cardinall also for his part others of a contrarie tenour, to haue the cause judged by the kings counsell ; in the end the cardinall obtained that which he pretended,

C and a sentence was giuen in fauour of the earle: about which time there comming a promoter from Alcala of Henares, for the cardinal, touching some proceedings at Guadaluajara, the duke of the Infantazgo caused him to be chafed away with cudgels, threatening to hang this poore petie-fogger, if he returned any more; saying, That he did in-croach vpon the iurisdiction of his brother D. Bernardin, archdeacon of Guadaluajara. For which exccesse the cardinal gaue it out, that he would be reuenged of the duke, and that he would call him in question, for that religion was violared, in that they had wronged an officer which did belong vnto the Church, and also for that the fact was against the publike peace, and that he would abate his greatest. The duke being incensed, and desirous to braue the cardinal, he sent a chapaine of his vnto him, to deliuer him a D meffage full of disgrace and threatening. This poore priest being forced to goe to Alcala of Henares, whereas the cardinal was, hee fell on his knees before him, and craued leaue to doe his meffage. They were nothing but reproaches of his base condition, growne proud to see himselfe so highly aduanced, adding some vaine threats, the which did little moue the cardinal, who hauing heard all that hee would say with a constant countenance, he answered him quietly: Goe backe vnto thy master, whom thou shaldest find repenting the foolish words which thou hast deliuered me: and in truth before the priest returned, the dukes choler being past, he would haue giuen much that he had not sent him, blaming all his familiar friends and house hold seruants, that they had not pacified his rage, yea hee was displeased with the chapaine, for that hee was so readie to

E he hid his rage, yea hee was dupliciter so vexed, that hee could not shew how hee obeyed him. This question, and all the spleene which the cardinall had against the duke, was afterwards pacified by the countable D. Inigo Fernandes of Velaasco, who made them dwinge together at Fontcarillo, whereas the duke made for many excuses vnto the cardinall, as he remained satisfised. They say, that after the ceremonie of their reconciliation was ended, the lodging wherein they were was prefently enuioured by Iohn de Spinoza, captaine of the Viceroyes gard, with his archers and light horse, the which did amaze the noblemen that were there assembled, thinking that it was a plot layed by the cardinall, but hee assured them that it was the importune diligence of Spinoza, who was come thither without any commission, for the which, he said, hee was much offended with him.

The earle of Vregnaes quarell was more dangerous, and harder to be reconciled, the which did produce many violent effects. This earle soone after the decease of king Ferdinand, had also throwed himselfe opposite to cardinal Ximenes, and had afflicted D. Pedro his sonne, in the tumult of Medina Sionia, whom he should rather have admonished to proceed by way of justice. Certaine officers coming to execute a sentence of the Chancerie of Granada, & to recover certaine of the kings customs of Ofono, he had sent them

Yuuu ii

2W2V

Excesse committed by the duke of Infantazgo.

of cardinal
Ximenes

Reconciliation of cardinal Ximenes and the duke of Infantazgo.

Policy of cardinal Ximenes to keep the noblemen in fear.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

lona, with the other friends, kinfmen, and allies of the earle of Vregna; seeing they knew not what to reſolve, but to pacifie the cardinal, ſeeking by all means to have his authority by which means they obtained, that the earle reſeſſing himſelf in juſtice, & ſuſtain-ing himſelf thereunto, all offences were pardoned. D. Francis Roſa biſhop of Aulh, preſiding in counſell, and pronouncing the ſentence.

Causes of the duke of Albaes discontentment.

siding in counsell, and pronouncing the duke of Toledo, duke of Alba, had against the cardinal. The discontentment which D. Federicus of Toledo, the knights of Rhodes, the which D. nall, grew for the priorie of Jerusalem, and had enioyed it six yeeres. This dignitie is esteemed among Diego his third son held them, & had enioyed it six yeeres. This dignitie is esteemed among the greatest of Spaine, whereof the prior Vallenacha had beene deprived in the life of king Ferdinand, for his ill defendings, and D. Aluarno of Estuniga canonically aduanced; who had resigned it vnto his nephew D. Anthonie of Estuniga, with the content of king Philip, and confirmation of Pope Leo: but king Ferdinand after the death of Philip, returning to the government of Castille, & desirous to gratifie the duke of Alba, from whome he had drawne many good seruices, he tooke this priorie from D. Anthonie; and did inuest the duke named D. Diego of Toledo, against the ancient order, and against the lawes and customes of Spaine, begging therein the authoritie of the great master of Rhodes, who was discontented that the Pope should take vpon him to conferre that priorie to D. Anthonie of Estuniga, causing the grant of the order to be brought expressly from Rhodes to that end, D. Anthonie complaining in vaine to the Pope, both of the king and great to master, who for his last refuge retired into Flanders, taking Charles, beseeching him to confirme and maintaine that which his father Philip had done: to the which hee obtained, when as he was aduertised of the death of king Ferdinand; for king Charles did write in his fauour vnto the Pope. And so D. Diego of Toledo, and D. Anthonie of Estuniga, began to fall to fuit for this priorie at Rome, where D. Anthonie did win his cause; and got letters of execution from the Pope, with the which, and the Popes fauourable letters, he came vnto king Charles, who sent him into Spaine to cardinal Ximenes, whom he commaunded to take into his hands all the places of the priorie, admonishing the duke of Alba and his son, to retire their men, and to referre the controversie to him to compromise: and if the duke of Alba should refuse, he should then cause the kings letters and sentence to be executed, forcing them to obey that should oppose themselves notwithstanding a ny oppositions. The duke of Bejar, with his brother D. Anthonie of Estuniga, presented these letters and commauement from the king to the cardinal: the which the duke of Alba understanding, being out of hope to procure any delay from the cardinal (for hee was well acquainted with the nature of the man, and knew well what he desired to see this proceesse, in the which there had past many threats and injurious words, ended) hee resolved to oppose himselfe, and to crosse his proceedings by force. He had of his part the duke of Escalona, and many other noblemen, the which did trouble his aduerse partie. At that time the cardinal was troubled with a certian ague, the which did animate the duke of Alba and his partie, and gaue them hope to prolong the proceesse, and to keepe the possession vntill that the king (said they) were better informed. But being somewhat recouered of his sickness, he called both parties, and enioyned them to lay aside armes, vnill he were better informed of the right. The cardinal would haue the places sequestred, according to the kings letters, wherein seeing great difficultie by the practices and force vsied on the duke of Albas part, in the end he propounded to execute the kings letters, brought by D. Anthonie of Estuniga: wherein there was a diuision among the counsellors, some holding that the duke of Albaes cause was more iust; and for that, said they, there was some obscuritie in the letters, not being certaine, whether the duke of Alba referring the matter to the kings arbitrement, might still hold the possession, as depositarie, vntill the cause were ended, or else vntill the king should name another depositarie, into whose hands the places & the priorie should be deliuered, they thought it therefore necessarie to haue another warrant, of which aduice were doctor Adrian & the feignior of Chaux. The cardinal banding himself against all these difficulties, he brought all the council to that point, as they concluded the kings letters should be executed. The duke of Alba forgetting nothing that might helpe his cause, imploied in his fauor queene Germayne, the French king, and theking of England, by whose meanes king Charles was not so resolute to restore

D. An

Lib. 27.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A. Anthony of Espania to his Priory : whereof the Cardinal being aduerſed , hee wrote letters of complaint vnto the king, to the Lord of Chenres, and to the whole counsell of Flanders, ſhewing them how neceſſarie conſtancie and perſeuerance were in ſuch like ordinances and decrees : where heer thought it good to call the duke of Alba vnto him, to whom in the preſence of the counsell, and the earle of Oſimo, hee ſaid friendly, that he ſhould temper the heat which hee ſaw in him in the purſue of his rights, and that there would be means if he himſelf did not hinder it, to reconcile all things without tumult or armes : wherefore hee did ſuffer him to put the priory into the kings hands, to diſpoſe according vnto right and juſtice, ſuſſuring him that if hee did it willingly, hee would mitigate much of the rigour of the commandement which hee had received from the king, and that hee would deliuer the Priorie into the hands of D. Pedro Bazan, who hee knew was much affected to his houſe, and hee ſhould keepe it vntill the kings comming : promiſing moreover that hee would then cauſe the deliuerie of it to D. Anthony to be ſtaied for three moneths, that in the meane time hee might worke his beſt means. Theſe conditions were contemned by the Duke of Alba, who departed, ſaying : that the Cardinal might doe better if hee liſt, and not derogate any thing from the kings authority : and going from Madrid with this diſcontent, hee went to his kinsmen and friends, to conferre with them of the eſtimate which hee had in his braine, all diſſuading him, from oppoſing himſelfe againſt the Cardinal, wimeth the calamity of them of Villefrate and of the earle of Vregna, for the which they gaue him ſuch reaſons, as at that time hee yielded to their counſels. But falling afterwards into furie, the Cardinal was forced to ſeize the laſt remedy, calling together his Legionary companies, both horſe and foote, as well to gard and fortifie the counsell and juſtice, as to ſuppreſſe the mutines, and keepe them from ioyning together : which forces did encounter and put to rout about a thouſand foote and ſome horſe of the duke of Albas, and ſtrip them in the dioceſſe of Toledo. After which rout the duke comming to himſelfe, hee employed the fauour of Queene Germaine and the doctor Adrian, and came to Madrid, where hee was ſo tractable, as hee yielded the Priorie to the Cardinals diſcretion, for hee ſhewed him with what vprightneſſe he proceeded in this buſineſſe, and let him read the original letters hee had received of the kings commandement : to the end hee might know it was no cauſe that hee did affect and ſecke : adding that hee ſhould conſider with himſelfe wherein hee might aſſiſt him preſerving his honour, and the king his maſters ſeruiſe, ſuſſuring him that hee would not fail him : to whom the duke made anſwere, that hee would not inreat any other thing of him, but after that his ſonne ſhould be deprived of the priory, the king would remember, that their houſe had alwaies been affectionat to the crowne, and haue regard vnto it : and for that hee had vnderſtood that hee would leave the priory in depoſite in the hands of D. Ferdinand Andrada who had married D. Francis of Eſpania, kinswoman to his aduerſe party, hee deſired it might be giuen to ſome other, to the end that his enemies might haue no ſubiect to ſcorne at his calamity. The Cardinal who was alwaies vanquiſhed by them that yielded vnto him, ſaid, that it was reaſonable, ordaining that the Priory ſhould be deliuered into the hands of D. Ferdinand Andrada, & hee ſhould inſtantly redeliuer it to D. Anthony of Cordova, brother to the earle of Gabra. Theſe things concluded at Madrid, the duke ſent letters to D. Diego his ſon, to leave the priory, & by the Cardinal to D. Ferdinand of Andrada, to ceaſe from all acts of hoſtilitie. Thus the quarrel for the priory of S. John was ended, and enjoyed partly with the content, and partly againſt the wil of Charles himſelfe, who decreed that D. Diego of Toledo and D. Anthony of Eſpania, ſhould enioy it in common : but D. Anthony dying at Perpignan, he left the whole poſſeſſion to his competitor.

There remained another cause to determine, which the Cardinal did affect: it was the proceſſe of the earle of Ribadeo in Galicia, of a ſmall circuit, but good, fertile & pleaſant; The earle of which place hath this privilege, that on twelſe day the dayes of the king of Caſtilles table, & hath the robe that he wears that day. This earle dome had been held by D. Rodrigo of Villandradra, who having married two lawfull wives, and theſe pur- way

Speech of Car-
dinall Ximenes to the duke of alva.

Defeat of the duke of Albas men by the Cardinals companies.

Duke of Alba submits himself to Cardinall Ximenes.

Controversie for the earldome of Ribades.

Authority of Cardinall Xi-
menes vanquished by a woman

Profanation of the Cardinal's order by Pope Leo.

Navie sent into Flanders for Charles.

Cardinall Xi-
menes poisoned

away for barrenesse, had in the end taken to wife a state of his neice's sister, called Leonor, by whom he had D. Rodrigo his sonne and only presumptive heire, to whom the admiral had given a bafe daughter of his to wife. Against this D. Rodrigo, there contented for the succession, D. Maria of Villosa, married to the earle of Salinas, who was neece to the old earle of Villandrade, daughter to his sister, saying that D. Rodrigo was not lawfully, which sure had beene commenced long before the death of king Ferdinand. Cardinall Ximenes favoured D. Rodrigo's cause: but as many of the Councell inclined more to the reasons of D. Maria, the cause was sent to the Chancery of Vaileadolid: yea, D. Maria had such fauour in court, as the title and right was granted vnto her sonne by the kings letters, the which did much trouble the Cardinall, seeing himselfe vanquished by a woman; he that had gouerned the greatest Lords of Spaine at his pleasure.

This yeare one thousand five hundred and fenteene, Pope Leo created one and thirty Cardinals, among which Doctor Adrian Floris was one, for the which he was much blamed, against the which Cardinall de Monte, vnto to Pope Iulius the third, and others, opposed themselves, saying, that to make so many at one time, was to profane that sacred order. He had almost made Raphael of Urbino, an excellent painter, Cardinal, to free himselfe by a hax of a great sum of money which he ought him for pictures, with which hope being fed, he deferred to marrie with the Neece of the Cardinal of Bibiena, which was offered him, but his sodaine death deprived the painter both of the one and other.

Cardinall Ximenes being solicited by the king and the Flemish Lords, to send a fleet into Flanders, to conduct him, he rigged out a good number of ships, where Gomes of Bayron was admiral, causing the ports of Biscay, Asturia, and Galicia, to be visited, for that it was bruted the plague was in many places, appointing vidualls and other necessaries to be carried to refresh and ease the court, where soeuer the fleet should arrive: himselfe in the meane time leaving Madrid, went towards Aranda of Duero, where hee resolved to attend the kings coming, that abode seeming vnto him verie healthfull and pleasant, and by reason of the convent of Franciscan friers, situated in the next village of Aguilera: in passing hee made his last visit of Tordelaguna, the place of his birth.

There were in his company, the Infant D. Ferdinand, doctor Adrian now made Cardinall, and Arnauos: from Tordelaguna he came to Bozeguillas, a borough in the mountaine, where dying they did verily beleue that hee was poisoned, which made him fall into a lingring consumption, till hee dyed of it: for having dyed hee found himselfe verie ill, after which there came bloud out at his eares, and at the joyning of his nayles, the suspicion of poison was augmented by a certaine horseman vnknown, who that morning hauing met neere vnto Bozeguillas the Prouinciall Marquise, with other monkes that went vnto the Cardinall, hee willed them to make halt to be there before hee sat downe to dinner: and to aduise him not to cate of a great trout which should be set before him, for without doubt it was poisoned: If you arrive said hee, too late, care then for the health of his soule, for his body will bee past helpe. This speech was deliuered by Marquise, but late vnto the Cardinall, who gaue little credit, saying, that if his infirmite came of poison, hee thought it came from Flanders, and that hee had bene infected at Madrid; by the eyes, in reading of a letter which was brought out of that country, since which time hee had not bene well; whatsoeuer it were, hee was ready to goe when God should call him, who sends infirmities, and takes them away at his pleasure.

They obserue that hee said often to the Phisicians, that hee should die by the treachery and wickednes of traitors; and it was commonly reported that Francis Carillo, who was seuer to the Cardinall, hauing eaten of this trout, was verie sick; and they did vn doubtedly beleue that the Flemings sought his death: for they had discouered by his letters, that his intent was to procure the king to dismiss them all, and send them home to their houses, and to be serued by Spaniards in their places. The blame of this vild act was laid vpon Bernardo, one of his secretaries, who had done other treacheries to the Cardinall his master; yet the Cardinall did still vie his seruice vnto his dying day: which breeds some doubt whether it were he or some other that committed this crime, whereof there were many

A many contrarie arguments. Cardinall Ximenes caused himselfe to be carried to Aranda, whereas whilst hee strues against his infirmite, the towne of Vaileadolid fell into new tumults, vpon a conceit the people had, that the brute of the kings coming was but counterfeite, and that this great preparation was to send the infant D. Ferdinand into Flanders: So as Spaine remaining destitute of her princes, being in the hands of an old Monke, like rotten, and neere his end, must of necessity bee ruined by these seditions, or be a prey to foreign nations. To pacifie this mutiny, and to certifie them of the truth of the kings coming, the Cardinall sent vnto them, and caused them

7 Hee had yet one exploit to doe which hee thought expedient and necessarie, yet full of ennie, which was to reforme the Infant D. Ferdinand's house, and to take from him those that had bred him vnto and serued him, especially D. Pedro Nages, of Guzman treasurer of the Calatrava, his gouernour, and D. Aluaro Oforio, a Iacobin, bishop of Astorga his schoole-master: D. Pedro had neuer bene allowed by the Cardinall, in that charge, and hee had often sought to crosse him, whereupon there grew great hatred betwixt them, the which Oforio had entertained and increased as well for some ambition, whetein hee himselfe hindered by the Cardinall, as through emulation, which had bene long betwixt those two orders, the bishop being a Iacobin: and the Cardinall a Franciscane. It was commonly bruted; and every man did beleue it; that Oforio had bene the cause and breeder of seditions at Vaileadolid; and Cardinall Ximenes knewe that hee did continually maligne him to the Flemish Lords: that hee sought to disuade himselfe into the fauour of the emperor Maximilian, and that hee had treated of a marriage betwixt the emperor and Queene Germaine: And many held opinion that D. Pedro Nages of Guzman, had had a conceit to carrie the Infant D. Ferdinand into Arragon, with an intent and hope to make him king of that country, wherunto the people would easily haue consented for the memorie and name of their deceased king D. Ferdinand, who had loued the Infant dearly, and other things of some true, some false: which were spoken in Spaine: whatsoeuer was the cause D. Pedro Nages and the bishop of Astorga were in no grace with the Cardinall; wherefore hee did write often to the king, and caused the lords of the Councell to be deli with- al, to haue them discharged: so as a little before king Charles his coming into Spaine, there was a dispatch sent by the king, by the which the Cardinall was commanded to discharge D. Pedro Nages of Guzman gouernour; D. Aluaro Oforio Schoole-master; D. Gonfalo of Guzman, Chamberlaine, and Sancho de Paredes, steward to the Infant, and send them home to their houses, letting them know that the king was verie well satisfied with their good seruices, but their ages did now require rest; and that hee would haue regard vnto their merits, and remember them: as for the rest of the Infants house, hee left it to the Cardinall, to dispose as hee should think fit. This packet by the Post-masters fault came not to the Cardinals hands before all the contents were diuulged, which caused the more difficultie in the execution of the kings will, for the Post-master thinking it to be newes how that the king was imbarke to come into Spaine, he kept the packet five daies, before hee deliuered it to the Cardinall, to whome it was directed, and in the meane time sent this good newes to the noblemen, to draw presents from them: then Cardinall Ximenes being ill disposed of his person in the convent of Aguilera, this Post-master thought it indifferent to giue the packet to Cardinall Adrian or to him, the which hee did: Adrian whether through curiositie or otherwise, opened it, & finding letters directed to the Infant, hee gaue him them, without any further apprehension, who by this meanes vnderstood what was ordained of him, and of his seruants, & of the change of his house, whereof hee did presently aduertise them; before the Cardinall had seen the kings letters: wherwith they being wonderfully discontented, and seeing no other remedy they implored the Infants aide, which was of no great moment, beseeching him to remember their fidelity and good seruices, letting him vnderstand that all this was done to debase him, and keep him vnder, as the Cardinals pleasure, who had procured and practised this alteration.

C hee did continually maligne him to the Flemish Lords: that hee sought to disuade himselfe into the fauour of the emperor Maximilian, and that hee had treated of a marriage betwixt the emperor and Queene Germaine: And many held opinion that D. Pedro Nages of Guzman, had had a conceit to carrie the Infant D. Ferdinand into Arragon, with an intent and hope to make him king of that country, wherunto the people would easily haue consented for the memorie and name of their deceased king D. Ferdinand, who had loued the Infant dearly, and other things of some true, some false: which were spoken in Spaine: whatsoeuer was the cause D. Pedro Nages and the bishop of Astorga were in no grace with the Cardinall; wherefore hee did write often to the king, and caused the lords of the Councell to be deli with- al, to haue them discharged: so as a little before king Charles his coming into Spaine, there was a dispatch sent by the king, by the which the Cardinall was commanded to discharge D. Pedro Nages of Guzman gouernour; D. Aluaro Oforio Schoole-master; D. Gonfalo of Guzman, Chamberlaine, and Sancho de Paredes, steward to the Infant, and send them home to their houses, letting them know that the king was verie well satisfied with their good seruices, but their ages did now require rest; and that hee would haue regard vnto their merits, and remember them: as for the rest of the Infants house, hee left it to the Cardinall, to dispose as hee should think fit. This packet by the Post-masters fault came not to the Cardinals hands before all the contents were diuulged, which caused the more difficultie in the execution of the kings will, for the Post-master thinking it to be newes how that the king was imbarke to come into Spaine, he kept the packet five daies, before hee deliuered it to the Cardinall, to whome it was directed, and in the meane time sent this good newes to the noblemen, to draw presents from them: then Cardinall Ximenes being ill disposed of his person in the convent of Aguilera, this Post-master thought it indifferent to giue the packet to Cardinall Adrian or to him, the which hee did: Adrian whether through curiositie or otherwise, opened it, & finding letters directed to the Infant, hee gaue him them, without any further apprehension, who by this meanes vnderstood what was ordained of him, and of his seruants, & of the change of his house, whereof hee did presently aduertise them; before the Cardinall had seen the kings letters: wherwith they being wonderfully discontented, and seeing no other remedy they implored the Infants aide, which was of no great moment, beseeching him to remember their fidelity and good seruices, letting him vnderstand that all this was done to debase him, and keep him vnder, as the Cardinals pleasure, who had procured and practised this alteration.

D hee did continually maligne him to the Flemish Lords: that hee sought to disuade himselfe into the fauour of the emperor Maximilian, and that hee had treated of a marriage betwixt the emperor and Queene Germaine: And many held opinion that D. Pedro Nages of Guzman, had had a conceit to carrie the Infant D. Ferdinand into Arragon, with an intent and hope to make him king of that country, wherunto the people would easily haue consented for the memorie and name of their deceased king D. Ferdinand, who had loued the Infant dearly, and other things of some true, some false: which were spoken in Spaine: whatsoeuer was the cause D. Pedro Nages and the bishop of Astorga were in no grace with the Cardinall; wherefore hee did write often to the king, and caused the lords of the Councell to be deli with- al, to haue them discharged: so as a little before king Charles his coming into Spaine, there was a dispatch sent by the king, by the which the Cardinall was commanded to discharge D. Pedro Nages of Guzman gouernour; D. Aluaro Oforio Schoole-master; D. Gonfalo of Guzman, Chamberlaine, and Sancho de Paredes, steward to the Infant, and send them home to their houses, letting them know that the king was verie well satisfied with their good seruices, but their ages did now require rest; and that hee would haue regard vnto their merits, and remember them: as for the rest of the Infants house, hee left it to the Cardinall, to dispose as hee should think fit. This packet by the Post-masters fault came not to the Cardinals hands before all the contents were diuulged, which caused the more difficultie in the execution of the kings will, for the Post-master thinking it to be newes how that the king was imbarke to come into Spaine, he kept the packet five daies, before hee deliuered it to the Cardinall, to whome it was directed, and in the meane time sent this good newes to the noblemen, to draw presents from them: then Cardinall Ximenes being ill disposed of his person in the convent of Aguilera, this Post-master thought it indifferent to giue the packet to Cardinall Adrian or to him, the which hee did: Adrian whether through curiositie or otherwise, opened it, & finding letters directed to the Infant, hee gaue him them, without any further apprehension, who by this meanes vnderstood what was ordained of him, and of his seruants, & of the change of his house, whereof hee did presently aduertise them; before the Cardinall had seen the kings letters: wherwith they being wonderfully discontented, and seeing no other remedy they implored the Infants aide, which was of no great moment, beseeching him to remember their fidelity and good seruices, letting him vnderstand that all this was done to debase him, and keep him vnder, as the Cardinals pleasure, who had procured and practised this alteration.

E hee did continually maligne him to the Flemish Lords: that hee sought to disuade himselfe into the fauour of the emperor Maximilian, and that hee had treated of a marriage betwixt the emperor and Queene Germaine: And many held opinion that D. Pedro Nages of Guzman, had had a conceit to carrie the Infant D. Ferdinand into Arragon, with an intent and hope to make him king of that country, wherunto the people would easily haue consented for the memorie and name of their deceased king D. Ferdinand, who had loued the Infant dearly, and other things of some true, some false: which were spoken in Spaine: whatsoeuer was the cause D. Pedro Nages and the bishop of Astorga were in no grace with the Cardinall; wherefore hee did write often to the king, and caused the lords of the Councell to be deli with- al, to haue them discharged: so as a little before king Charles his coming into Spaine, there was a dispatch sent by the king, by the which the Cardinall was commanded to discharge D. Pedro Nages of Guzman gouernour; D. Aluaro Oforio Schoole-master; D. Gonfalo of Guzman, Chamberlaine, and Sancho de Paredes, steward to the Infant, and send them home to their houses, letting them know that the king was verie well satisfied with their good seruices, but their ages did now require rest; and that hee would haue regard vnto their merits, and remember them: as for the rest of the Infants house, hee left it to the Cardinall, to dispose as hee should think fit. This packet by the Post-masters fault came not to the Cardinals hands before all the contents were diuulged, which caused the more difficultie in the execution of the kings will, for the Post-master thinking it to be newes how that the king was imbarke to come into Spaine, he kept the packet five daies, before hee deliuered it to the Cardinall, to whome it was directed, and in the meane time sent this good newes to the noblemen, to draw presents from them: then Cardinall Ximenes being ill disposed of his person in the convent of Aguilera, this Post-master thought it indifferent to giue the packet to Cardinall Adrian or to him, the which hee did: Adrian whether through curiositie or otherwise, opened it, & finding letters directed to the Infant, hee gaue him them, without any further apprehension, who by this meanes vnderstood what was ordained of him, and of his seruants, & of the change of his house, whereof hee did presently aduertise them; before the Cardinall had seen the kings letters: wherwith they being wonderfully discontented, and seeing no other remedy they implored the Infants aide, which was of no great moment, beseeching him to remember their fidelity and good seruices, letting him vnderstand that all this was done to debase him, and keep him vnder, as the Cardinals pleasure, who had procured and practised this alteration.

F hee did continually maligne him to the Flemish Lords: that hee sought to disuade himselfe into the fauour of the emperor Maximilian, and that hee had treated of a marriage betwixt the emperor and Queene Germaine: And many held opinion that D. Pedro Nages of Guzman, had had a conceit to carrie the Infant D. Ferdinand into Arragon, with an intent and hope to make him king of that country, wherunto the people would easily haue consented for the memorie and name of their deceased king D. Ferdinand, who had loued the Infant dearly, and other things of some true, some false: which were spoken in Spaine: whatsoeuer was the cause D. Pedro Nages and the bishop of Astorga were in no grace with the Cardinall; wherefore hee did write often to the king, and caused the lords of the Councell to be deli with- al, to haue them discharged: so as a little before king Charles his coming into Spaine, there was a dispatch sent by the king, by the which the Cardinall was commanded to discharge D. Pedro Nages of Guzman gouernour; D. Aluaro Oforio Schoole-master; D. Gonfalo of Guzman, Chamberlaine, and Sancho de Paredes, steward to the Infant, and send them home to their houses, letting them know that the king was verie well satisfied with their good seruices, but their ages did now require rest; and that hee would haue regard vnto their merits, and remember them: as for the rest of the Infants house, hee left it to the Cardinall, to dispose as hee should think fit. This packet by the Post-masters fault came not to the Cardinals hands before all the contents were diuulged, which caused the more difficultie in the execution of the kings will, for the Post-master thinking it to be newes how that the king was imbarke to come into Spaine, he kept the packet five daies, before hee deliuered it to the Cardinall, to whome it was directed, and in the meane time sent this good newes to the noblemen, to draw presents from them: then Cardinall Ximenes being ill disposed of his person in the convent of Aguilera, this Post-master thought it indifferent to giue the packet to Cardinall Adrian or to him, the which hee did: Adrian whether through curiositie or otherwise, opened it, & finding letters directed to the Infant, hee gaue him them, without any further apprehension, who by this meanes vnderstood what was ordained of him, and of his seruants, & of the change of his house, whereof hee did presently aduertise them; before the Cardinall had seen the kings letters: wherwith they being wonderfully discontented, and seeing no other remedy they implored the Infants aide, which was of no great moment, beseeching him to remember their fidelity and good seruices, letting him vnderstand that all this was done to debase him, and keep him vnder, as the Cardinals pleasure, who had procured and practised this alteration.

The Infant being perswaded by his Masters, came the next day in great choler to the Conuent of Aguilera, hauing in his company the Bishoppe Oforio, Secrets of Cardinall Ximenes discouered.

1517

Oſorio (for D. Pedro Nugnes was sick) & doctor Adrian by reason of the error which he had committed in opening the packet, and giving the letters to the Infant, before he had imparted them to Cardinall Ximenes, durst not shew himselfe.

Intreaty of the Infant D. Ferdinand to the Cardinall.

Cardinall Xi-
menes inexcusable.

Being come vnto the Cardinall, he complained greatly (and with teares in his eyes) of the wrong he did him, in seeking to deprive him without any lawfull cause, of so good & faithfull seruants, the which he would neuer haue beleueed of him, whome hee held to be his deare friend: and thereupon he intreated him, and coniured him by the memorie of Queene Isabell, and the great advancement hee had receiued from her, not to suffer this indignity to be done vnto him, to take from him so worthy a person as his gouernour, so fit a Schoole-master as the bishop Oſorio, so many seruants which had attended him faithfully, and with whome hee had bene nourished, and bred vp with great content; and that hee would not suffer him to receiue that displeasure, to see them ignominiously and wrongfully disgraced. The Cardinall fought by mild words to pacifie the incensed courage of this Prince, laying before him the king his brothers pleasure, assuring him that all those things tended to his advancement, so as hee would shew himselfe obedient and tractable. As for the iniurie whereof hee complained, hee intreated him to thinke it was otherwise; and to beleuee that hee was a man of yeares and experience, and that hee loued him dearly; hee confessed that hee ought to haue a care of the honour and good of his seruants, but hee must withall thinke that the king his brother was dearer vnto him: And therefore hee exhorted him that leauing these passions which his seruants had bred in him, he should wholly adhere to him; who was the greatest king in Christendome against whose will it were neither safe nor conuenient for him to oppose himselfe; and if hee did persist to complaine, and to shew a discontentment for that which the king commanded to be done, hee should bee assured that hee would bring himselfe, his affaires, and his seruants into great danger. For all this the Infant D. Ferdinand, (being young and incensed) was not satisfied, but answering the Cardinall, I haue, said hee, tasted of your friendship in many occasions, but now it failes mee at my greatest need, neither doe I know which way it is best: but seeing that I find that you are resolu'd to ruine mee and mine, whome you may ease and comfort much with a small delay, I must of necessitie find meanes to defend and preferre our selues.

Speech of Cardinall Ximenes to the Infant D.
Ferdinand.

Diligence of Cardinall Xi-
menes to excocuate his desire.

At these words the Cardinall finding himselfe toucht, Do (said he) what you please, but I sweare vnto you by the life of king Charles your brother, that to morrow shall not passe before his commandements bee executed, the which it behooues you to obey before all others, yea though all Spaine had conspired to hinder it. This made the Infant take vnto him a manly courage, and to lay aside or dissemble his childish affections: wherefore hee departed from the Cardinall with a seled countenance, & without any shew of perturbation, and so returned to Aranda, where before his arriuall, hee found himselfe garded, with the towne and all the approaches, by the souldiers of Cabanille, and Espinola, capitaines of the guard, who were sent and instructed by the Cardinall, who knew how to execute their charge, and keepe the Infant or any of his house from attempting any thing. All that night was spent in complaints in the Infants lodging, who slept not; hee would say often that hee would bee reuenged of the Cardinall, and when they asked him what hee would doe against a man so well garded, and who had all the forces of Spaine at his command: well, I will make shew to goe and visit my mother, and then will I goe where I please, and the first that shall offer to hinder mee, let him assure himselfe I will kill him, with other such speeches of a yong man.

Day being come, the Infant by the aduice of his seruants, sent to intreat the kings counsell, and the Popes two Noncios to come vnto him, to whome hee said: That the king his brother had sent commandement to take his seruants from him, the which was grievous vnto him, but hee would obey, yet hee intreated them to doe one good Office for an Infant of the house of Castille, to complaine vnto the king by their letters, of the great wrong was done him, seeing they knew well that they had bred him vp, serued and accompanied him faithfully and honestly: the which they

1517

A they promised to doe. Cardinall Ximenes by the meanes of Cardinall Adrian, drew D. Pedro Nugnes of Guzman, D. Aluaro Oſorio, and Gonsill de Guzman, to come vnto him vnto the Conuent of Aguilera, to heare the reasons why they were discharged; and to answer the complaints they made of him, who hauing heard what hee would say vnto them, answered and replied, in the end they saide that they were ready to doe that which hee should command them; but they intreated him to persuaide the king, (with whome they knew hee had grace and credit) to haue regard vnto their honors and interests, and they did wisely to answer so, and shew themselves obedient: for if they had done otherwise, hee would not haue suffered them to returne to Aranda, but would haue stayed them prisoners vntill the kings comming; attending the which the charge of the Infant D. Ferdinand was giuen to the Marquesse of Aguilar, in the absence of D. Alfonso Teller, whom the king had appointed to that place. There were eight and twentie of the Infants seruants discharged, in whose places there were subrogated men of base condition, and obscure families, to cut off all occasions to vndertake great enterprises, and this Cardinall was so seuer as hee would not suffer the Infant to haue the young Vicont of Altamire, whome he loued dearly for his dexterity and good fashion, for that hee was nephew to D. Aluaro Oſorio: There remained onely of all the old seruants of that house Alfonso Castileja, for that being giuen to musike and poetrie, hee seemed to bee free from ambition; or any desire of alteration. These things thus done, being vnderstood at Court, the lords of the Councell sent letters from the king to the Cardinall for the Marquesse of Astorga, and the earle of Lemos, kinsman to D. Pedro Nugnes of Guzman, and to D. Aluaro Oſorio, admonishing them not to oppose themselves to any act done by him, but hee did not vouchsafe to giue them these letters; so confident hee was in the authority which hee held, representing the kings person, and so hee had often done, not caring much for that which the Spaniards suspected of eared.

Seuerity of Car-
dinall Ximenes.

Marquess of Aguilar gouernour to the Infant D.
Ferdinand.

D. Pedro Giran causeth new troubles.

The Marquesse of Aguilar gouerned himselfe so well with his master, as hee himselfe did write vnto the king his brother, and besought him not to giue that charge vnto any other: the which had bene appointed for D. Alfonso Teller.

There was a brute throughout Spaine, that the Cardinals infirmity had so weakened him, as leauing all affaires, hee liued retired in his Conuent of sisters, not seeing any man, and in effect the bloud came more abundantly out at his eares than before, and hee was much tormented in his body, and as in old men all remedies are difficult and of small effect, they knew not what to hope of him: wherefore D. Pedro Giran watching for all occasions to mutine, went to Armes, to invade the countrie of Medina Sidonia, and the Moores also hearing these newes; did molest the coast of Granado, making spoile of all they encountered, for the which the Cardinall provided notwithstanding his infirmity, for against D. Pedro hee opposed the earle of Luna, who kept him in awe, being assisted by D. Anna of Arragon, wife to the duke of Medina, who gaue him her jewels for the charges of the warre. The earle of Vregna his father, remembering the error committed at Villefrance, which was not yet forgotten; hee besought the Cardinall, not to impute these new broiles to him, promising that hee would cause his sonne D. Pedro to lay aside armes, and so hee did: yet the Cardinall did write letters vnto the king full of accusations against these Girons, persuaading him so to punish them once for all as they should haue no more desire to fall into such errors, and others might take example by them.

About that time the Turkes who had newly seized vpon Alger, vnder Horn so Barberousse, meant to make an enterprise vpon Oran, which was the Cardinalls conquest, and therefore hee did much affect it, and the king being then at Seay, had newes of it, the which did trouble them much, holding it a great losse if this landing place in Afrik were taken from the Christians. But God provided for it, for the Moores and Arabian Africans ieaalous that the Turkes should settle themselves in their countrie, assembled in great multitudes, and encountered them, which came against Oran, and defeated them, freeing the Spaniards, who attended a siege, from that paine and care.

King

1557
Arrival of King Charles at the Asturies.

8. King Charles having taken ship in Flanders about the beginning of September, hee came in the end of that month to the most vneasie coast of all the Asturies, about Tazane, a place full of rocks, and not frequented by seafaring men, not farre from Villeuicufe. The mountaine people of that countrie not knowing what they were which landed vpon their coast, hauing put their wiues and children into the most inaccessible places of the mountaines, they betooke them to armes, and ranne in troups to the Sea shoare, thinking they had bene French-men or some other enemies, which came to spoyle the countrie: the which they perceiving which were yet at sea, and the king himselfe, hee commanded to display the royall standard, that hee might be knowne. The Asturians discouering the Lions and Castles, knew that it was their king, and laying downe their armes, they came to salute him vpon their knees, accompanying him to Villeuicufe, the which by a good equiuocation they called Villadichola, which signifies a happy Towne, which sight was most pleasing vnto the king: there hee rested himselfe after his sea trauell, being accompanied by his sister D. Leonora then Queene of Portugal.

There were with him the lord of Cheures, the Chanceller Sauage, Charles of Lanoy, & other Flemish lords: and in a short time there came many noblemen of Spaine vnto him, among which were D. Inigo Fernandes of Velasco the Constable, a man of great possessions, in that barren country, being accompanied with 700 horse, all his kinsmen, friends, and vassals, who had giuen order that store of victuals should be brought vnto them as they past: there came other noblemen to kisse their princes hand, and then they returned presently, that they might not incumodate his household and train in the streits of the mountaines, vntill that he were come into a more open country, and better provided. The Cardinal who lay in his Conuent, scarce able to breathe, was so glad at the news of the kings arrival, as he left his bed, fng maffe, and eat in the Refectorie among the friers, the which did much discontent the Flemish Courtiers, who desired that hee had bene dead before that the king should conferre with him; for they were well aduertised that hee sought to chafe them from the counsell, and from all affaires, whereof hee had often treated by his letters and agents with the king whereof they informed themselves curiously of his phisitions, how long he would liue, thinking that his death was near, & therefore they staid the king as long as they could vpon the way, desiring much that he were dead before the king should see him. Some counselled the king to goe first and visit the realme of Arragon, before he staid in Castille, the which the Cardinall hindred all he could, informing him of many inconueniences which would happen by that counsell: and beseeching him most humbly not to determine any thing touching his publike or priuate affaires, before hee had giuen him a full information of the estate of his realme: hee did also counsel him to send the infant D. Ferdinand his brother, as soone as might bee into Germany, to the emperor his grandfather, thinking that hee could not take a better resolution, neither for his owne affaires, nor for the good of the Infant, then to send him thither, and to bee a meanes that all; or a good part of Maximilians succession might come vnto him, seeing that by the grace of God, he was king and lord of so many realmes and rich estates.

This counsell was followed after the Cardinals death, not at the Flemings sute, who it may bee had other desires, for the lord of Cheures desired to keep him vnder, & soon after would haue had him giue water vnto the king his brother: who, being discontented to see his brother so abasse himselfe, said, that Ximenes counsell was better. VVherupon he ordained that the Infant should be conducted into Germany. The king being come to Saint Vincent of Barquera, D. Anthony of Rojas, Bishop of Granada, President of the Council royall, who had bene alwaies opposit to the Cardinall, went from Aranda with all the Council, not making him acquainted therewith, to go and meet with the king; and the better to excuse their selfe, they would haue carried with them the Infant D. Ferdinand, if the Marquesse of Aguilar had not hindred it: The Cardinall finding himselfe wronged herewith, sent two of the kings letters to the President; by the which hee heard the whole counsell were commanded not to depart without him; but they staid not at that, thinking that the Cardinals authority was much decayed: but hee mooued with this contempt,

1557

A contempt, sent to the king, complaining of D. Antonio de Rojas, and of the counsell departure, in contempt of his letters, terming the forsakers of the commonweale, & of the affaires of estate, protesting, that if before his coming they had presumed to doe such a thing, he would haue punished them in such sort, as within 3 dayes both the president & the counsell had bin reuened, and had deprived the of their dignities with disgrace, wherefore he besought him to obseure the honor and dignity of this council of Spaine, & to caule them to returne, to the end they might all together go to meet him, as it was his: the which was done to the presidents great discontent and shame, who returned with at his train to Aranda. The masters of accounts did not abandon the cardinall: to whom the admirall Henriques an other nobleman, who were ready to go & meet the K. offered to go in his company: but he thinking that there were other considerations in these noblemen than in the Senat he gaue them thanks, intreating them to goe before and without him. Winter which comes looner, and is more sharp in the region beyond the mountains, than in other parts of Spaine, prest the cardinall to leaue the conuent of Aguilera, which place was too moist for his health: wherefore he removed to Roa a towne in the county of Sineselas, where he had learned his first letters in his infancy, causing himselfe to be carried thither in a close litter, and clad in furs: carrying with him the infant D. Ferdinand. Roa is 18 leagues nearer to Vaileddolit than Aranda, and it is a comodious place to take the way to Vaileddolit or to Segobia, as if it had bin don of purpose. For his part hee desired the court should rather go to Segobia than to Vaileddolit, whereas the King might consist of his affairs, & assemble the states, the which he dissuaded much at this his first arrival, saying, that their spirits were yet inflamed with the forpassed mutinies, doubting not but there would be many rash and impertinent articles preferred, wherefore it was expedient to deferre it for a time, & to suffer those humors to settle: being of great importance, that the people should meet and see their prince at the first with all humility, obedience and feare, which aduice was contemned, to the great prejudice and danger of the realme.

In the mean time there came deputies from Toledo to the king, beseeching him to giue this citie, which was great, spacious and healthfull, and situated in a fertile countrey, for his first abode, the which would haue bin very pleasing to the cardinall who was archbishop of Toledo: but the Flemish courtiers took no delight to be so far from the sea: wherefore the king hauing giuen good reception to the deputies, he sent them back making choice rather of the towne of Vaileddolit; but before his coming thither, he would go visite his mother D. Isabel at Tordeillas, writing the causes vnto the Cardinall, and to his brother D. Ferdinand, which had moued him thereunto: his resolution seemed full of pietie, but considering the indisposition of this princeesse, it was not needfull to conferre so long with her of affaires, as he did. During the Kings abode at Tordeillas, the lodgings were made at Vaileddolit, where the Cardinall beganne to find that the Flemings could doe more than he in Spaine, for his seruants demanding the lodging of doctor Bernardus for him, being in a wholesome place, and fit for his infirmity, the harbenger Terremonte refused it him, hauing marked it for Queene Germaine, wherein the Cardinall had infinite troublesome difficulties, being not accustomed to intreat, although he obtained it: (it was knowne after wards, that the duke of Alba had bene the motiue of this vnworthy vlage of a man of so great authority;) but as for his traine it was lodged in a village without the towne: and yet he must haue patience, it auailed him nothing to complayne of this contempt and disgrace, which he had neuer tried being in a meane estate, no nor when the kings D. Ferdinand, and D. Phillippe were together in that towne, with a great traine of noblemen and knights, and all their ordinary guards, saying, that it was a poore recompence, after so much toyle and sweat, to receive a wrong in the place of a reward, whereof hee blamed the K. officers who were strangers & ignorant of the custums of Spaine. But the worst was, when hee receiued letters from the K. by the which he was commanded to attend him at Mojados vpon the way to Tordeillas, where he desired to confer with him, and to haue his counsell in affaires both of his realme and house, to the end he might discharge him of so great a burthen, & suffer him to retire to his own house, to liue in rest, where God would comfort & recompence him, for so many good offices which he had done for the realme, seeing he thought it was not in the power of any man to do it, & that for his part hee would euer remember it, and honour and reueryence him as his father. These letters were written at the persuation of Mote Bish. of Badajoz, an affectionat servant

X x x

10

President of the Flemish courtiers to keepe the king from seeing of the Cardinall

Assembly of the states dissolved by the cardinall Ximenes at the kings arrival.

Entervew between K.
Charles and his mother vnnesseary.

Signe of the Cardinall
disgrace.

Letter of discharge from the Cardinall to the King.

1317

Death of the Cardinal
frier Francis Ximenes of Cisneros.

to the L. of Cheures, & yet much bound to the Cardinall, who having received them, conceived so great a griefe to see himselfe put backe, as within few hours after he died, his fever encreasing which he had gotten the day before these strange news: feeling his end to draw neerer, he had some little conference with some of his people of the mercy of God, & of the vanity of this world, & forgetting no ceremonies which his order & profession required, here commended his soul to God & to all the Saints, namely to the virgin Mary, to S. Peter, S. Paul, S. Iacques, and S. Michael, but especially to S. Francis, under whose rule he had lived, and to the protectors and patrons of his church of Toledo, S. Eugenius, and Idelfonso or Alphonso. Being thus provided, & with the prayers & suffrages of some priests which assisted him, he ended his daies, leaving a great griefe to many, but it may be the number of those that were glad of it exceeded. He was no sooner dead, but 2 Spanishe captaines Padillo & Collozo, going out of the Antichamber into the chamber where he died, began to lay hand upon some plate and other things, thinking that all was to be sackt, but they were baimed by the colonel Spinosa, D. Alphonso of Arreilan erle of Aguilar, & other noblemen, who were better taught. His body was embalmed, and being attired in his pontifical robes, he was laid for a time bare faced upon a rich bed, whereas every man came and kist his hands, being invited thereto by the found of a trumpet, with promise of pardon for their sins: Then according to his will, he was carried to Alcalá de Henares, where he was founder of that goodly Vniuersitie, and there with great honour and funerall pomp, he was interred in the Church of S. Idelfonso, as he had ordained, where his tombe is to be seene of white marble, with his Image in his archbishops weed, excellently well cut, enuironed with a grate of yron, whereas are 16 spaces, representing the deeds of this Prelate, artificially grauen. The people of Alcalá shewed him small reuerence, for presently after his funerall they went and beat downe and rased the houses and farmes, which he had caused to be built without the towne for Benedict his nephew: and they of the vniuersitie and college of S. Idelfonso disannulled many things which he had brought in, and chased away the chanon Cardena, who was treasurer and superintendent of that college. Such was the end of this cardinall, a famous man for his great wisdom & iudgement in the government of the affaires of state, constancie in his resolutions, and magnanimitie in the execution of his enterprises, severe, rigorous, and inexorable: a terror to great men, not yielding to force nor flattery, being exceeding ambitious & desirous of honor, the which he shewed in his softer disposition, fit for them that gouerne great Estates. His constitution of body did represent the qualities of his mind, for he was of a great stature, strong & lustie: his pace was graue, his voice strong & firm, his face long and drie, a large forehead without any wrinkles, reasonable big eyes, hollow, but quick sighted, and alwayes moist, long nosed & crooked like an Eagle, his great teeth stucke out, so as some called him Elephant, & thick lip. His skull being found in the yere 1565 in the vault where it had bin laied, seemed to be all of one peece without any scame: he delighted his conceptions in few words, & neuer straid fro the purpose, no not in his greatest choler: if he promised to do any man good, he alwayes performed more than he spake: he did seldom vye to leise, yet he took delight to heare them that were quick conceited, & would laugh at them that were pleasant in their speeches: he kept a mad man, who sometimes had bin learned & a diuine, & was delighted to heare him rehearse many passages which he had retained, the which he repeated without any reason, & yet sometimes not ill applied: he would be pleasant with a Spanishe captaine called Madero, who had made many promises, but done little good in all his life, counselling him to become a monk to do penance for his sins: & in these things he recreated his spirits, being charged with great affairs. Finally, he loued learning, & to heare the disputations of learned men, & oftentimes of yong scholars. This prelat being well informed of the great profit which the world might draw from the knowledge of tongues he did intertain men that were leamed in them: & to employ the in matters fit for his religious profession, & to the end the studious of the holy scripture might tast the word of God fro the original springs, he caused the bible to be printed in many tongues: that is, the book of the old testament distinguished into 3 parts, whereof the first contained the Hebrew text, the second the common translation into Latin which we vse: & the third the Greeke of the 70 Interpreters, with his translation in Latin, very well corrected: it contained the Greeke text, & the common translation in Latin, very well corrected: and in the end of the volume, a dictionary of Hebrew words interpreted, very ample & copious.

Cardinall
Ximenes his life reflected by the people and vniuersitie of Alcala.

9 Disposition of Cardinall Ximenes.

Bible printed in many tongues.

1317

A work of great labour, sumptuous and stately, witnessing the greatnes of this cardinalls courage, who was not daunted with any difficulty. Herein he vied the care, feeling, and iudgement of Demetrius Candiot, John of Vergara, Anthony Nebriense, Lope of Estuniga, Fernand of Vaileddoli, worthy professors in the Greeke and Latin tongue, Alphonso of Alcalá a philition, Paul Corriel, and Alphonso Zamora, learned men in the Hebrew tongue. These men were very careful to examine the old volumes that were most correct and approved of both testaments, wherein they had no small help and ease by the library of the Vatican at Rome, through the bounty of Pope Leo, who refused not any thing to cardinall Ximenes. The Latin explication of the translation of the 70 Interpreters, was the worke of Demetrius, of Fernand of Vaileddoli, and of Alphonso of Estuniga, assisted by some of their disciples learned men, John Vergara was also inquired and called by them to take part of this charge, who interpreted some of those bookes which he was wont to call Sapientiales: as Ecclesiasticus, the which he could not finish as he desired, by reason of his indisposition; for hee had an intent to make large Annotations. The Bible was begun by these men in the yere 1502, who spent 15 whole yeres, with great care and toyle to turne ouer infinite volumes and copies, gathered together from many parts of the world, with wonderful charge, for proofe whereof Comestius saies, that he had often heard Alphonso Zamora, professor in the Hebrew tongue, affirme, that for 7 Hebrew copies which are kept in the Vniuersitie of Alcalá de Henares, were payed 4000 crownes of gold. Being ended by John Brocario of Alcalá, it was dedicated to pope Leo, whereof the world hath receiued great profit. This Cardinall hauing his mind continually attentive to great matters, was sometimes oppress with melancholy, which made him to vndertake things rather through fume than counsell, but very seldom, as the consideration of the Moors of Granada, and the enterprises of Africa, attempted with too great affection & zeale without any ground. The quarrels which he had with great me with such obstinacie as we haue said proceeded fro the loue of Iustice, magnanimity & vertue; for he would reach them to liue according to equity. The chanoins of Toledo were his chiefe counsellors, without whose aduice he would neuer attempt any thing of importance, he would, as it was fit, that whatsoeuer had bin decreed after mature deliberation, should be instantly put in execution: he censured mens errors, not by the effect, but by the intent. Although in publicke affaires, he were impatient of alrepley, & bold speech, yet in that which concerned himselfe, he often indured the liberty of another mans tongue: the which he shewed to Contrera the preacher, who blaming him one day in his presence, for that he being a frier did often weare habiles & other rich furrres, he was inuited to dine with him, where he commended his preaching, but he excused that which he did reprehend in him, saying, that men aduanced to dignity and great charges, had need of precious ornaments, and rich attire, as well on their persons as in their houses, for that doth breed maiesty in him, and causeth reuerence in subjects. They write that these ornaments were vied superfluously by the Cardinall, for as for his vnder habit and his sleeping, he alwayes carried himselfe according to the Order of Saint Francis: he daily said his prayers, either alone, or accompanied, the doore being shut, that he might not be diuerted. He had great compassion of great persons unworthily afflicted, and did releue them with mony, as to D. Gulismir of Castro duhesse of Nagera, being chased from her house by her husband, whom he did nourish and comfort in the city of Toledo with as great honor, as the duke himselfe could haue done her, blaming his churlines the more, for that he had bin made duke by king Henry the fourth in fauor of this woman, with whom, as we haue said, he seemed to be in loue.

When there was any great benefice void in the church of Toledo, hee gaue it either to the sonne of some prince or great nobleman, or to some one of the leamedest men of Spaine; saying, That nobility becometh fauour, and learming authority to the clergie: finally, hee was liberal, and very charitable to the poore, and careful of his household seruants. He spent a good part of his revenues in religious buildings, which preferre his memorie, as at Tordelaguna, where hee was boine the conuent of Franciscan friers, intitled of the virginie Mary, a goodly and stately worke: at Toledo the conuent of Saint Iohn penitenc: and one of the like stile at Alcalá de Henares, whoo Conuent, one of Franciscans, and the other of Iacobins, in the city of Oran, but about all, the building

Men employed to persue the Bible.

Cardinall Ximenes spent with melancholy

A tower of indignity.

Execution must be speedie after mature deliberation.

Cardinall Ximenes, though a frier, yet he was richly apparellled.

Discretion in giving of benefices.

II Buildings made at the charge of Cardinall Xi-
menes.

1518

of the colledge of Saint Idelfonso or Alphonse, in the vniuersitie of Alcala of Henares is most famous, and the institution of the company, which should be all Diuines. This man was so seuerie, as he had attempted to reduce all the Orders of monkes to their ancient and first simplicitie and puritie. After this prelates death, D. Alphonse of Aragon archbishop of Saragossa, base sonne to the deceased king D. Ferdinandus, came to Tordesillas, to salute the king his nephew, and also to get the archbishopricks of Toledo, if he might; but the lord of Cheures, who would haue it for William of Crouy his nephew, stayed his comming, so as this prince was forced to go to Vaileddolit, there to attend the King, who hauing seen him, and conspying to all the noblemen of Spaine, of the wrong the lord of Cheures had done him, he returned into Aragon, frustrate of that which he pretended.

12 The king hauing caused the Estates of Castille to assemble at Vaileddolit, in September 1518, he was declared king of Castille, Toledo, Granada, and other dependancies in Spaine; hee received and tooke the othe after the accustomed manner: wherein there was some difficultie made by some great noblemen, for that Queene Isabel his mother dyed yet liue; notwithstanding it past: and hauing there ordeyned many things touching the gouernement of Castille, he past into Aragon, to haue alike assembly and solemnity, in regard of those realmes and the lands depending. Being in Aragon he was solicited to send embassadors to Mompellier, to conferre with the deputies of the French king, and of Henrie of Albrét, touching the rights of the realme of Nauarre, held and enjoyed by him, in the name of D. Ioane his mother, and his owne, by hereditary title, whereof there had bin another parliament held at Noion: whither were sent the lord of Cheures the chancellor John Sauage, who was of Bruges, D. Ant. of Estunga one of the priors of S. Iolin, the great commander of Castille, doctor Carnalis, with other knights and learned men: but all this conference was to no effect, for he that was in possession, would hold it: besides Arthur Gossier, L. of Bouilli dying, was a hinderance to it. At that time D. Ant. Miranques duke of Nagera was viceroi of Nauarre, hauing for assistant D. Rodrigo of Mercado bishop of Auila, at which time the new king Charles had caused the marriage of Pedro of Nauarre to be deliuered out of prison, being in the castle of Atienza, & prest him much to take the othe, & to do him homage, as to his king, but he who bare an affection to his master, refused it: by reason whereof he ended his daies in the prison of Simancas. The K. being at Barcelona he had news of his election to the empire of Germany: wherefore he went towards Vaileddolit, to make preparation for his iorney & order for the affaires of Castille, which were very confused. But hee was forced to make halt, and to leaue many things vndeclared, being advertised of the conspiracies & leagues betwixt the towns and great lords of the realme, for the defence of the priuiledges and liberties of the country, against the greedines & usurpations of the Flemish counsellors, who gouerned this yong prince: among the which the chiefe was, as we haue said, the L. of Cheurs. The K. for that he would not be engaged in these Spanish mutinies, with whose humours he was not acquainted, he parted as it were flying away, & embarked at the Groin, a famous port in Galicia, leauing for gouernors cardinal Adrian, & the constable. D. Inigo Fernandez of Velasco, to whom he afterwards ioyned D. Frederic Henriques, great admiral of Castille. Being landed in the low countries, he went presently to Aixla Chapelle, where he received the imperiall crowne, in the year 1520, being 20 yeres old. The first Acts of his gouernment, were to suppress by mild & quiet means the doctrine preached by Luther, which increased much in Germany. To this end, & for some other matters of importance concerning the empire, he caused the princes and estates to assemble at Worms, whereas Luther appeared hauing a passport, and was heard disputing against doctor Edmus & others, but there came no fruits of it. But in Spaine there grew great seditions and tumults in the towns and priuiledges of the realme, and of the bad gouernment of the Flemish lords, who by their great couetousnes, had drawne vnto them great summes of money, vnder the kings authority, vsurped the estates, offices, & benefices of the realme, & caused a profanation in a manner of all things, as if they had bin in a country of conquest: so as the people being moued vpon so apparent occasions, the exccesse and troubles which ciuile diffentions are accustomed to produce, followed soone after.

Cardinal

Coronation of King Charles the first of that name.

Conference of deputies touching the realme of Nauarre.

33 Charles chosen emperor of Germany.

Departure of the emperor Charles out of Castille forced.

14 Ciuile warre in Castille.

1519

A Cardinal Adrian & the constable thinking to suppress this mischief in the breeding, made the fire greater; for hauing sent against the of Segobia, Ranquillo Alcaide or prouost of the court, a man of a fower disposition, rigorous in his executions, & proud and insolent in his threats, hauing made the summations & solemnities required in Iustice, he began to burne, ruine, cut & pul vp, take & kil al that he found about Segobia: whereat the inhabitants of Toledo being incensed, they took armes and went to field chafing away this prouolt. They being once armed in one place, the sedition grew generall: Burgos, Vaileddolit, Salamaca, Auila, Zamora, Leon, Toro, and other chiefe places rebelled openly, & had many noblemen & knights of their faction, yet they were more led by their owne priuate interests then the publike good. The deputies of all these cities thus mutined came to Auila, where they made a league with the noblemen, the principall whereof were D. John de Padilla of Toledo, D. Anthony d. Acugna bishop of Zamora, D. Pedro Giron, of whom mention hath bin often made. Cardinal Adrian had bin already forced to flic from Vaileddolit, by the help of a priest, who conuied him away by night, breaking a piece of the towne wall, notwithstanding that D. Pedro Giron & D. John de Padilla had assured him that there was nothing intended against him, & that his innocencie was well known. The president and counsellors of the Audience and Chancery were in like manner fled, of the which doctor Vargas escaped by a snike. The people being masters in all the towns made choice of captains of their owne sort, smiths, belfounders, skimmers, tailors and such like, who forgat nothing to make them detestable, in all couetousnesse, cruelty, and other wicked actions.

C At Segobia they did hang the rector betwixt 2 sergeants, thinking to aduise them something for the good of the publike peace: they of Auila did rase the house of Pedro Ponce, for that he would not signe the league with the rell. The constable was chased from Burgos, who with the earle of Alua de Lissa and others were pursued by the conspirators with publike Edicts, who had summoned with solemnities and order of iustice, all the princes and great noblemen of the realme to ioine with them, for the defence, said they, of the lawes & liberties of Spaine: in default whereof to proceed against them as traitors to their country. The gouernors seeing this great reuolt, furnished themselves with armes & all other means to defend themselves & to suppress the rebels. Anthony Fonseca being sent Medina del Campo, with a good number of horse, to bring the artillery which was kept in the storehouse of that town, he found such resistance, as he was forced, partly through choler, & partly by a stratagem of war, to set fire in diuers parts of the town, to the end he might draw the people (who were earnest to defend the artillery) to go & saue their houses which were on fire: but their obstinacie was such as they had rather suffer their goods to be burnt, then abaddon the artillery to Fonseca, who was forced to returne without it: so vpon this occasion they of Medina ioyned with the league: In which towne there was great store of merchandise of all sorts, mouables & other riches of inestimable value burnt. The conspirators hauing put their army to field leised vpon Tor desillas, where Q. Ioane (being distressed) kept, here they saluted for their Q. & gaue her a gard of 300 priests, leised by the Bish. of Zamora in his dioces, whom he commanded to sweare and renounce God, & to looke like fouldiers: and if hee did see any one that did handle his portsaile, hee would beate him with a cudgel. The emperor being advertised of all these miseries, hee wrote vnto the Admirall D. Frederic Henriques, which was then in Catelogne, to take the charge of gouernor with the rell, & to seek by all means to pacifie those troubles. D. Frederic ioyned with the gouernors with equall authority & did what he could to pacifie al, notwithstanding that the Confederats had taken and spoiled Vneugna, Tordehumies, and Villabracca, lands belonging vnto him, & had sackt his vniuers palace, & committed other indignities in contempt of him, and to his preiudice, yet notwithstanding hee went and sent diuers times to the rebels: but the disease required a sharper remedy: for in truth there was no more any question to reforme abuses, and correct the faults of the common weale: all were now grown into a furie to ouerthrow the estate. As for the noblemen and knights their owne greedy desires had thrust them into armes: D. Pedro Giron would be duke of Medina Sidonia, and win his cause by the sword, D. John de Padilla promised to him the mastership of S. Iaques, others hauing priuar quarrelles, would bequeunged and spoyle their enemies: and as for the Townes, if their first motion had Exccesse of Ranquillo prouost of the court.

Townes confured.

Insolencie against the Cardinal and the Kings officers.

Tor desillas taken by the conspirators.

Xxxx iij

some

1520

Tordesillas recovered.Battle of Villa Lara, and defeat of the re-bells.Punishment of rebells.

Nauarre.

Pampelone abandoned by the castilians.Beginning of the Iesuits.Inigo of Loyola and his familie

some lawfull cause, their manner of proceeding, and their forme of demanding, had G spoyled all, and made them and their cause odious: wherefore the war beganne to grow hote: John de Padilla, and John Bravo being come to Villapanda, with part of the forces of the League, it seemed to the emperors captains that an opportunitie was offered, to re-couer Tordesillas, and to deliuer Queene Jane, who was held as a prisoner by the rebels:
the which succeeded well without anie great losse or difficultie, for the place was not strong: There were many of the seditious taken there: Tordesillas was lackt, yea the Queene and her seruants lodgings, yet all was restored vnto them againe. It is written, that when they battred the towne, a priest of the bishop of Zamoras being behind a loop hole slew 11 men with his peece; and to discharge himselfe somewhat of this guilt, or to giue some ease to his soule at whom he aimed, at euery shot he made a crosse with his harquebuz: In the end this priest was slaine with an arrow. After this prize the Constable and the Admirall who were commanders for the emperor, marched against the enemies, who went towards Toro, with an intent to ioyne with their other confederates, who had gathered together a rable of 8000 rascalls out of the townes and diocese of Zamora, but they were ouertaken neere vnto Villa Lara, and fought with: where notwithstanding that they had great numbers of men, and that Padilla and Bravo performed the parts of valiant and hardy captains, yet they were defeated and taken. This defeat pacified all tumults, and made them all more quiet. The confederate cities laboured euery one apart to returne into fauour, and did easily obtayne pardon, yea the city of Burgos before this rout had left the societie of the rest. The bishop of Zamora hearing of the defeat of his companions, thought to escape, but he was staied in Nauarre, and afterwards strangled. D. John of Padilla and John Bravo were condemned to lose their heads: D. Maria wife to John of Padilla, fell into the like miserie, a woman of a great courage, but decei-ued by the false predictions of diuines and forcerers, whom she beleued: their palace at Toledo, by the same sentence was ruined, and the soyle sowne with salt, and therein a pillar erected, for a perpetuall memorie of their rebellion: D. Pedro Giron who had left the other conspirators, by the persuation of his friends and kinsmen (whereof the Constable was the chiefe) was confined to Oran, with many other knights. Many men of lesse note felt the rigor of Iustice; and many also were pardoned. Thus ended the ciuile warre and sedition in Spaine, which grew by reason of the excesse and violent gouerne-ment of the Flemings, who suffered the Spaniards to end it, whilest that they were Iudges of their punishments and rewardes, for that the emperor was gouerned by their councell.

15 Whenas this rebellion in Castille happened, the gouernours finding themselves weake and ill provided of many things, they were forced to vse the souldiers which were in the garrisons of Nauarre, and to draw many peeces of ordonance, out of Pampelone, and places of that realme, which gaue occasion to some well affected to the house of Albret and Foix, and to Henry of Albret the true heire of that realme, to haue secret intelligences, in Beam and in France, in whose fauour king Francis sent Andrew of Foix, Lord of Alpertraut, or Elparre yonger brother to Oder of Foix Lord of Lautrech, who being receiued by them of the faction of Gramont tooke the castle of Saint John de Pied de Port: wherefore D. Antonie Maurique Duke of Nagera finding himselfe surprized, the city of Pampelone beginning also to mutine, he left it, and returned into Castille, abandoning his house to the sacke of the people.

16 At that time there was in Nauarre following armes, Inigo of Loyola, the first author of the Iesuits, an obdurate enemy to the house of Albret, who whenas the viceroi Maurique dislodged, remained in the castle of Pampelone in garrison, with the other souldiers of the emperor. It hapned that this castle being assailed by the people, there was a canon shot made by them of the towne, at a certaine place, where as this man had both his feet so bruised with stones which the bullet had scattered, as hee fell from the top of the castle to the bottome, but being ordained for an instrument to this new kinde of plant in the church, he was taken vp, and his life preferred. He was sonne to Bertrand of Loyola and Ognez in the prouince of Guipuscoa, in the iurisdiction of Alspeytia, which in old time was called Miranda of Yraurgui. After this mischance he was carried to his fathers

1521

Studies of Inigo of Loyola.

First Iesuits.

Self of Iesuits confirmed as Rome.Cardinal Guidicion first patron to the Ie-suits.

A thers house at Loyola, which is in the midst of the prouince of Guipuscoa, where seeing himselfe maimed and vnable euer after to beare armes, he changed his mind and profession, and quitting the world, he gaue himselfe to spiritual things, following the direction which he had, according to the religion which was then esteemed amongst men:
His first religious exploit was to goe and visit the place of Manresa, where he spent nine days; then he gaue all his goods vnto the poore, and retired himselfe into the moun-taines of Manresa, where hee began to lead a solitarie life, for the space of seuen months.
Afterwards he went to Barcelona, from whence he past by sea to Venice, and finding the pilgrims ship ready to depart, he put himselfe into it, & went to Palestina to seek the places of that land whereof mention is made in the holy Scripture: but the father gardian of the Franciscans of mount Sion forced him to returne: and for that hee was but ignorant, he began to study his Grammar at Barcelona, after which he frequented the vniuersitie of Alcalá de Henares, going alwayes bare footed, although hee were lame, which maner of liuing many did interpret to be very superstition: wherefore hee was apprehended, and let goe againe by the iudgement of doctor John of Figueroa, with charge that he should goe no more bare footed: this made him leaue Alcalá and goe to Salamanca, where hee was more derided: wherefore seeing himselfe crost in his studies by these persecutions, he left Spaine and came to Paris, where he heard master Peter Faber, and there he remained not long, being vexed by some and supported by others, in the end allowed by master Ori, they held an opinion that he was a holy man, and of a scholer he became a master, hauing for his followers his master Peter Faber, Diego Laynes, John Coduri, Claude Gay, Paſqual Bronet, Francis Xavierre, Alphonſo Sameron, Simon Rodrigues, and Nicholas of Bouadilla, students in diuinitie, all which submitted themselves to an Order set downe by Inigo, and did vow perpetuall pouertie & chastitie. Hauing wrought this in France, he returned into Spaine, honored with the degree of Master in the vniuersitie of Paris, and retired himselfe to the place of his birth, not to his fathers house of Loyola, but to the hospitall of Alspeytia, and would not be knowne: there he began to preach, as well in the church of Saint Sebastian of Soreasu, as in other places of that countrey, with so great a concourse and Re-pation, as it was (said they) wonderfull, so as in the end being discouered by a clerke of D. Nauarre, who had studied at Paris, he was made knowne vnto his parents, who sought by all means possible to retire him from that begging kind of life, but in vaine. Hee had concluded with his companions abouenamed, to make a voyage with them to the holie Land, wherefore he went to meet them at Venice where the Rendez-vous was: from whence they went to Rome, and stayed there all Lent in the yeare 1537, and obtayned leave of pope Paul the third to performe their pilgrimage: whereupon they returned to Venice, but finding that the passage was stoped by reason of the warre betwixt that commonweale and the Turke, they were forced to stay there, and by that means the Iesuits were first knowne in Italie, not without great crosses, from the which they were deliered by the iudgement of Caspar of Ortis, who disputed in their cause. Desirous to be of E greater fame, they got leave to heare in Confession, and some of them receiued Orders to say masse; then they dispersed themselves in the Venetians territorie, preaching and doing other workes of their profession, purchasing great fame, especially with the ignorant, so as in the yeare 1538 they came all to Rome, whereas they obtayned from pope
Paul confirmation & approbation of their manner of liuing, and of the statutes and orders of their sect, by the aid and fauor of cardinal Contareno, and they were receiued vnder the protection of the sea of Rome, but only visu vocis et oculis, referring them for the execution of the perpetuation of their sect, to cardinal Guidicion of Luca, the which was effected with the more ease, for as much as there were at that time in Rome, doctor John of Figueroa, master Ori, and Gasper of Ortis, who gaue ample information of the life, manners and intention of Inigo of Loyola, whom they had knowne at Alcalá, Paris and Venice. Cardinal Guidicion, notwithstanding that hee had a little before set forth a booke De non multiplicandis religionibus, not only embraced and allowed them, but became their solicitor: wherefore they were confirmed and allowed by letters and bulles, the first of October 1540, given at Tiuali, vnder the name and title of the company of Iesuits, with liberty to receiue into their company, being then but thre, to the number of thre score, by

1521

by prouision. The eleuenth which was retained into this Order was called Anthony of Araos, borne at Vergara in Guipuscoa. D. John the third king of Portugall, being advertised of this new brood, by his embassador D. Pedro Alcazar, desired to haue home into his country: wherefore he caused suit to bee made vnto the Pope, to send home vnto him: For this cause there were sent into Portugall, Francis Xavierre a Nauarrois, and Simon Rodrigues a Portugall, brothers of this Company of Iesus: Simon Rodrigues remained in Portugall, Xavierre past to the East Indies to preach, and there died. In the year 1543 they had leave from pope Paul to increase their number as much as they would, and to receive all that would enter into the Order: and then in the year 1545 hee graunted them all the priuiledges, faculties and graces which they now enioy. Afterwards Peter Fabri and Anthony of Araos came into Castille, and consequently the rest, so as Spaine hath neuer wanted of this brood. After the death of Paul the third, pope Iulio de Monte his successor, did in a manner beginne the first Acts of his papacie, by a confirmation of this Order in the year 1550. By the conseruation of doctor Anthony of Araos, D. Francisco Borgia and of Arragon, Duke of Gandie and Marquesse of Lombay, conceived a great loue to this sect, in the which he was the more confirmed by the persuation of his wife D. Leonora de Castro, a Portugall, much deuoted to the Iesuits: so as D. Francisco went out of Spaine with this doctor, who was the first Prouinciall of Castille, towards Rome, where he resolu'd to make himselfe a Iesuite, and to leaue his temporal estates, whereunto he was admitted by father Inigo of Loyola, author of that Order. The duke and doctor Anthony being returned into Spaine, the duke made renunciation of the duchie of Gandie, and of his other lands, vnto his sonne D. Charles Borgia and of Arragon, in the Iesuits Colledge of Ognate, where he tooke the habite, and received all the Orders: and soone after he would that his second sonne D. John Borgia and of Arragon, should marry D. Laurence of Loyola and Ognca, daughter to D. Bertrand of Loyola nephew to father Inigo, who with the aid and fauour of cardinall John Mouron, did build the Germane colledge at Rome, to instruct the youth of that nation against Luthers doctrine: Before his death he saw fixteene Prouincialls of his Institution and Order, and about a hundred and seuentie colleges, the which since haue multiplied strangely. He died at Rome in the year 1556 being threecore and one yeeres old, hee was buried in the chiefe house, and head of that Order, called Sancta Maria de la Strada. We haue seen the abouenamed D. Francisco Borgia and of Arragon generall of this Order in our time. There are three sorts of religious in it, one of protest who can hold no goods, the other probationers, and the third collegialls, and it is lawfull for these two to possesse what they will. The Iesuits are not Theatins: for they whom they called Theatins, had an other beginning, and another kind of life; they were certaine gentlemen and others moued with deuotion, who gaue themselves to prayers, singing, and other such works, and were first called of the company of the loue of God, to whom there being ioyned John Peter Carrafa, Neapolitane, bishop of Chieri, and being reputed as a worthy man, the head of those religious, they began to call them Chierins, and then corrupting the word Theatins, these Chierins were in credit in the time of pope Clement the tenth, who by reason of the sacke of Rome, being retired to Ostia, and there finding certaine Venetian galleys, they past to Venice, and there made their abode eleuen yeares, before that Inigo of Loyola and his companions came there. These Iesuits coming afterwards from Venice to Rome, for that they could not performe their voyage to the holy Land, the people thought that they were the Chierins or Theatins which were returned, and confounded these two Orders through ignorance, whereof there is great difference. This John Peter Carrafa came afterwards to be pope, and was called Paul the fourth. Of the Theatins there are not many other colleges or houses to be found, but at Venise, Rome, Naples, and Paulia. The Iesuits are also called in Arragon Inigists, of the name of their author, and in Portugall Apollies, but in all other places Iesuits, according to the Popes Bulles and Briefes. This we find in the Spanish Histories of the Institution of the Iesuits, inserted here of purpose, at the time of the rebelle of Pampelone; in the year 1521 where Inigo of Loyola their first Institutor was: There was at that time an ample subiect prepared for these Iesuits to practise their charities, and, withall, a fit and pleasing abode for them,

Duke of Gandie becomes a Iesuite.

17 Sect of Theatins differs from the Iesuits.

Lib. 27.

1521

A them, and other religious Spaniards, at the west Indies by Fernand Cortes, who hauing runne along the coasts of the firme land at this new world, going vp Northward, and there by sundry conquests hauing drawne vnto him in many of those Indian people he entered into the country and assailed the city of Mexico, took it, and conquered that realme with an incredible facilitie. It is at this present called Noua Hispania. This great citie which was one of the wonders of the world, by reason of the situation was taken in August this yeare 1521, where the king Moteczuma was slaine, and about a hundred thousand of this subiects.

Mexico at the Indies taken by the Castillians.

Returning now to the historie of Nauarre, we say, that as soone as the duke of Nagera was retired, they of Pampelone did choose the signior of Osioen for their captaine, who had serued the catholike king, Monsieur Asperaut pursuing his conquests was met in the Pyrene mountains by some deputies of the valley of Roncal, who yielded him obedience, and gaue him aduertisement of the estate of the countrie, with whom hee past to Pampelone, and made himselfe master thereof in the name of king Henrie. D. Lewis of Beaumont earle of Lerin desired to come to him, but they refused him a safeconduct for his returne. The lord of Asperaut finding no resistance in the whole realme, he reduced it in few days vnder the obedience of its naturall king: and making vse of the ciuile wars of Castille, hauing good intelligence with the compinnalities, hee past the riuier of Ebro, and laid siege to Logrogne, through a rain and ill digested counsell. D. Pedro Velez of Guere had put himselfe into the place, with some souldiers, who resisted the French armie virtuously, they being much fauored by the victorie of Villa Laria, which the viceroys of Castille had woon against the commons: by reason whereof the Victors aduanced with the Duke of Nagera, who had leuied men from Burgos vnto the sea, making his sonne D. John Marquisse de Lara colonell of the Guipuscoans, a yong Lord but fifteen yeeres old: and of the Biscains Gomes Gonsales de Butron, Lord of Muxica and of Butron: which forces being great, forced the French to raise their siege, and repassing the riuier, to returne into Nauarre, the Castilian army following them so neere, as whereas the French slept, the Castilians dined the next day. The armies being comeneere vnto Pampelone, the Lord of Asperaut being accompanied by many Nauarrois, was of opinion to turne head, and to hazard a bartell, but very inconsiderately: for at that time he was not strong enough to incounter the power which came against him; neither had he the patience to attend some of his forces which were at Tafalla, with the signior of Ollaogui, and at Pampelone, and a new leuie of sixe thousand Nauarrois, which might haue ioyned with him the next day, or the day after, wherefore being neere one vnto another, after that the artillery had played, when they came to ioine, the French horsemen behaued themselves woorthily: but the footemen, who were most part Gascoins, could not endure the force of the Castilians, but were presently put to rout, which made them to giue the field, and to leaue the victory vnto the viceroys. In this bartell which was giuen neere vnto the borough of Nozyn, and the port of Reniega, there died of French E. John of Saraza, captaine Martin, and Charles of Nauasques, or of Nouailles: the generall also of the French armie being hurt by a man at armes of the company of the Earle of Alba de Lista, yielded to D. Francis of Beaumont: the Lord of Tumon was also taken, D. Pedro of Nauarre sonne to the Marshall D. Pedro prisoner at Simanca, saved himselfe in France, with D. Arnold of Gramont, D. Frederic of Nauarre, and others in great numbers. Through the fauour of this victorie Pampelone was recovered without anie difficultie, by the Castilians: and after their example all the other places of the realme yielded, except some strong castles in the mountaines. The Lord of Asperaut was blamed to haue hazarded a bartell, being weake and within the realme, without anie command, but hee excused himselfe, for that hee had discovered a great disorder amongst the enemies, which promised him an assured victory, but he was deceived: it had bene more safe for him to haue stood vpon his guard, contenting himselfe with that which hee had wonne in so short a time, without striking stroke, and not to haue inuaded the lands of Castille: a while after hee was set at libertie, paying tenne thousand crownes ransom; by D. Francis of Beaumont, against the willes of the Viceroys of Castille, who

The lord of Asperaut makes himselfe master of Pampelone.

Logrogne besieged
by the French.

French retire from Logrogne.

1521
Route of the lord of Asperaut and the French army at Nozyn.

Pampelone recovered by the Castilians.

1522

D. Francis of Espania came of Miranda viceroi of Na-uarre.

Admiral of Navarre enters Guipuscoa.

Fontarraby besieged and take
by the French.

Demolitions in Nauarre.

Adrian chosen
Pope.

1522 Maine taken
by the French.

who made D. Francis of Espania and Auillanede earle of Miranda viceroi of Nauarre, in the place of the duke of Nagera. This year the bishopricke of Pampelone was voided, by the death of Cardinal Amado of Albrer, and Cardinal Alexander Cesarin Ramoin was aduanced to that place.

19 King Francis discontented with the bad success of the Lord of Asperants amie, hee resolved to invade Spaine with a greater power by Guipuscoa, whither hee sent the Lord of Boniuer, Admirall of Fraunce, who at his first entrance took the Caste of Beoyuia, into the which he put captayne Beaulis in garrison; then leading his army against Fontarraby, he besieged it, and planted his battery in the most convenient places. Diego de Vera was gouernour within it, who either through negligence, or want of means, had ill furnished it with victualles, so as the third day of the siege they beganne to want, yet notwithstanding he made some resistance, and endured an assault: but seeing there was no meanes to holde it, hee yeelded the place upon composition, the souldiers departing with their armes, and their colours flying. This yeelding fell out very happily for the French amie: for had it beene delayed but two dayes, they had bene forced to dislodge, for that there fell such abundance of raine, as the brookes being swelled in those vallies, would haue carried away both men and baggage. The Admirall Boniuer put a garrison of three thousand Galcoines into Fontarraby, vnder the commandment of the Lord of Lude, hauing rampared vp the breaches, and furnished it well with victualles. There was sent out of Spaine ynto that frontire, to make head against the French D. Bertrand de la Cueva, sonne to the duke of Albquerque, who provided for the towne of Saint Sebastian and other forts of that countrey. About that time the emperor sent a commaundement from Brussells, to the earle of Miranda viceroi of Nauarre, to raine all the walles and forts of Nauarre to prevent another rebellion; all which was executed, but at Pampelone, Lombier, Pont de la Roine and at the castle of Estella. It was resolved to fortifie Pampelone, and therefore the monasteries neere adioyning were ruined, and the monks drawne into the towne.

20 Pope Leodyng this year 1521, cardinal Adrian bishop of Tortola, who was then gouernour in Spaine, with the abouenamed viceroies, was chosen pope in the 62 year of his age: and retaining his name, he was called Adrian the first. The newes of his election was brought him to Victoria, where the viceroies were, full of care for the losse of Fontarraby, passing from thence towards Arragon & Castile, he embarked, and left Spaine to go to Rome to receiue the pontificall crowne, the which he enjoyed but few dayes.

The year following 1522 was taken the fort of Maja, not far from Bayona, by the diligence of the earle of Miranda, viceroi, and D. Lewis of Beaumont, earle of Leng, the which was defended by James Velez of Matran a Nauarrois, with others of the faction of Granoche, a place held impregnable for the situation, the which notwithstanding being extraordinarily prest, was yeelded by the said Madran, who was led with his some prisoners to Pampelone, where they died both within 14 dayes. By this prisiking Henry was quite spoiled of all that did belong to the realme of Nauarre towards Spaine.

The garrison of Galcoines which were within Fontarraby, was held very short, by them that were at Yruto, Vranu in the valley of Ojarum, in the Renterie, and other neighbour places. There was within the towne a captayne called John of Ase, who was newly fled out of Spaine vpon a quarrell which he had with Pedro of Vrdaniuia, feignior of the house of Aranzate: This captayne being desirous to be reuenged of his enemy, undertooke to surpris him in his house, which he knew verie well, being of the countrey, where hee had inioyed the seigniorie of Ibarolle: wherefore going one night out of Fontarraby with about six hundred men, he marched with great silence vnto a house called Weder, where the dogges hearing the noyse of them that past, beganne to bay, so as the master of the house who was a farmer, coming forth in his shirt to see what it was, was taken bound, and carried so farre as Ojarum, where before all things the souldiers tooke away the clappers of the belles, lest being discovered they should geue an alarme. Then going to the house of Pedro of Vrdaniuia, they did murther it and seke to force it: but hee who was valiant and resolute, and knowing the passages to saue himselfe, escaped. Captaine John of Ase and his souldiers seeing themselves frustrate of their pray, resolved before the alarme

1522

A larme were giuen in the Countrey, to returne as speedily as they might, and they had bene wile if they could haue effected it: but being desirous of spoyle, they lingered there about certayne packes of merchandize which were come thither from Lyon for Medina del Campo, with a passport, so as the people of those vallies being solicited by the Lord Aranzate, with cries, and other such signes and aduertisements as hee could giue them, assembled to the number of three hundred, whereof some following the French behind, and some getting before them by unknowne wayes, and cutting off their passage, they fought with them in such sort as they put them to rout and slew a booke halfe of them, and tooke many prisoners, they looting but one man, and some hurt. John of Ase escaped by the mountaine of Iazquitell, with few men, and got into Fontarraby: whose goods were confiscate by the Emperour, and giuen to captayne Ambuladi.

B The Caste of Beoyuia, was of verie great importance for the French, that would make warre in Spaine, for it is the onely passage by the which they may bring artillerie into Guipuscoa; notwithstanding being very ill aduised, they refused for the sparing of men and money, to ruine it, which captaine Beaulis hauing begunne, by the commaundement of the Earle of Lude, in few dayes hee fast and undermined the walles at the foote, the which hee vnderpropt with pilles, which were made hollow and filled with powder, with an intent to giue fire to it, and to ouerthrow all: the which he hauing done very secretly, as he thought, it was notwithstanding discovered by one of his owne gunners, called great John of Liborne, who for some question hee had had with a souldier, was retired to the Spaniards, and had revealed this businesse to D. Lewis de la Cueva, brother to the generall D. Bertrand: wherefore a great number of men of those vallies, being all souldiers, did presently assemble; and were sodainly led by the said commaunder against this castle, euen as the French, hauing drawne forth their Artillerie, and all that was within it, did abandon it, and hauing already kindled certayne matches to conduct the fire to the powder and pillars which supported the walles, which the Spaniards prevented with great diligence, quenching these matches, and so preferred the Caste, whose walles they did repaire, rampire vp, and fortifie againe, and as a matter of great moment could keepe it well. Ochia of Asia was made captayne of that Caste with an hundred souldiers.

C The French finding their owne error, sought afterwards to recover it, there being an enterprise made by some gentlemen of the Countrey of Labbord, amongst which were the Lords of Ortuaba and Semper, who hauing leuiued about a thousand men of that Countrey, and ioyned vnto them a regiment of Germans old souldiers, which were in that frontire in the Kings pay; they led them to the passage of the riuer of Bidaso, which diuides Fraunce and Spaine, where they were staied by the resistance which they of the Caste made with their artillerie, and the Commons of the Countrie: whereupon seeking an other foard, and other wayes by the mountains, thinking to surpris the garrison, they found such resistance of all the Spaniard forces, which had bene drawne thither, as they were defeated, and in a manner allaine. This was called the rout of Saint Martial, for that it was giuen on Saint Martials day, the last of Iune, this year 1522. In the which the emperor Charles returned into Spaine and landed at Saint Ander the five and twentieth of Iuly, from whence hee passed to Vailledolit, where hee heard the ambassadors of many princes, and also the deputies of the realme of Valencia, who came to craue pardon, for that they had ioyned in union with the rebells of Spaine, and were the last which submitted, whereof they executed themselves vpon the hard vlsage of their viceroi D. Jaques de Mendosa, whom hauing fauourably heard, he comprehended them in the generall pardon, which he caused to be published, himselfe being present, and sitting in his royall throne in view of all the world: hee depriued Mendosa of the gouernement of Valence, by meanes whereof all the strong places and castles of the realme, were yeelded vnto him: In that of Xariua there had bene till that time detained D. Ferdinand of Arragon duke of Calabria, sonne to D. Frederic the disposessed king of Naples, who died afterwards in France: him hee deliuered, and kept him neere him, with honour and fir entertainment: commending him that hauing bin solicited by the rebells to be their head, hee had refused it: and in time hee caused him to marry Queene Germaine (who had bene wife to king Ferdinand his grandfather, and

Beoyuia a castle
of great importance abandoned by the French.

Rout of Saint Martial.
Returne of the emperor into Spaine.

1522

and was then married againe to the Marquesse of Brandeburgh, who died soon after) to which Queene Germaine he gaue at that time the gouernement of Valencia.

Seeing the troubles ended vpon the firm land of Spain, he had news that the city of Ma-iorca, & the whole Iland were reuolted, at the instigation of a poore Artisan called Calon, wherupon he speedily dispatcht the viceroi with some gallies: who thinking to reclaim them by mildnes, was beaten back by them with their artillery, & forced to go out of the haueu with his gallies, being incensed the more for that he had refused to shew them the letters of pardon, which he said he brought them from the emperour, before they had laid downe armes, and deliuered him the towne. And in this fury they began to fall vpon them which aduised them to acknowledge their prince, and to yeelde vnto his mercie. The Viceroy being fortified with more shipping, went to an other part of the Iland, where hee landed his men: there many of the Ilanders came vnto him, and offered him seruiue: having mustered his armie, he found that he had about tenne thousand fighting men, with the which seeking to inuest and besiege the citie, the rebellles sallied courageously forth, and came twice to handie strokes, and were twice repulsed within their walles, the which caused great trouble within the towne: for many fainting would haue the gates opened, and make triall of the Emperours clemencie: but the greatest and strongest part, being obstinately desperate, reiected this wholefome counsell with outrages, hanging and cruelly murdering those that were of this aduice, if they could get them, setting their heads vpon the publike places and towers of the towne, a grievous and fearefull spectacle. And then they discharged their rage vpon the wiuers, children, goods and houses of them that were absent with all barbarous cruelty. Wherefore they were besieged and battered both by sea and land so as seeing themselves forced, not able long to hold out, and without hope of any succours, or meanes to escape after that they had endured some assaults, and shewed that they had courage, they yielded, vpon condition that the people should be pardoned, yet there were twelue referred at the Viceroyes discretion, the which were deliuered vnto him: among them was Calon the Author of the rebellion, found in a priue where hee was hidden, who being led so deliued to his punishment vpon an Aile, and his companions following him on foot, they were all pincht with hot yrons and quartered, and their heads set vpon the towers and gates of the citie, which payed a certaine summe of money in consideration of a fine, and for the charges of the warre. These troubles being thus suppressed, the Emperour spent some dayes in sports, and would himselfe runne at the tilt, to the great contentment of the Spanish nobilitie, with whom hee got the reputation to bee a good man at armes.

During the Emperours abode at Vaileddolit, he granted the combat to two gentlemen of Arragon, and did see them fight with those ceremonies which were then vsed in combats, both in Spaine and elsewhere: the report whereof it may be will not be displeasing vnto the Reader; for that now they are left off, and they proceed after another manner.

Peter Toreilla and Ierome Anca (for so the contendants were named) both borne at Sagorosse, great friends before and alied, yong and fierie, neither of them being yett fye and twenty yeares old: falling out at play, they had bene already in field, vnaccompanied with their rapiers and cloakes, where it happened that after many thrusts and blows, and neither hurt, either of them hauing very good knowledge in his weapon, Anca with an ouerthwart blow stricke his aduersaries weapon out of his hand, who seeing himselfe disarmed, confessed generously that he was vanquished. But he intreated Anca to do him this curtesie, to rest satisfied with the victorie, and not to tell any one that they had bin in field, as their quarrell was also secret, and no man had bene acquainted therewith, the which he hauing promised they embraced each other, and returned good friends to their lodgings, thinking that not any one had seene them fight. Two or three dayes after Toreilla vnderstood that all the court talked of this fact, whereat being much grieved, hee blamed Ierome Anca, saying, that hee had sayled of his promise, and that through vanitie, and to dishonour him, he had published that which had passed betwixt them. Anca protested that hee had neuer spoken of it, but one had told him that a Curate of the next

1522

A next village, walking at the time of their fighting about a troupe of his that was feeding, had seene them fight, & had told it, for the which hee was sorry. The Curate being demanded touching this matter, answered doubtfully & seemed to speake all in fault of Ierome Anca, which did confirme the other in his opinion, that he had broken his faith: so as hee told him resolutely, that he had done at a vt vnworthie of a knight of honour, and that he must do him reason by arms: who admitting no excuse, he made his petition to the emperour, that he would be pleased to graunt him the combat against his enemy, to make it knowne that hee was a traitor, disloyall and vnworthie to beare the name of a gentleman, and withall hee sent him a challenge. The emperour referred this difference to the iudgement of his Constable D. Inigo Fernandez of Velasco, who did what hee could to reconcile them, but seeing there was no meane, he put them into the field, with the formalities vsed in those times. In the publike place at Vaileddolit there was a plot measured out, which was 50 paces long, & 36 broad, & railed round about. On either side 160 waies without the lists was a scaffold set vp, one on the one side for the emperour, & the other for the Constable, either of them being couered with rich tapestrie, & in them chaires couered with cloth of gold. At the other two ends were two other scaffolds built lower for the kinsmen and friends of the combatants, and ioyning to either of them was a paulion in which the chaplions should take their armes: the place had bin made very euen and couered with sand, that they should not slip. About 11 of the clock the emperour came accompanied with a great nobility, the marshalls of the field and his gards both of horse & foot. Being set in his seat vnder a cloth of estate, they deliuered a golden rod into his hand, the which being cast by him should part the combat. Soon after came the Constable with a graue & seled countenance, being about 60 yeeres old, hee did weare a long robe of cloth of golde, and was mounted vpon a Genet of Spaine, richly furnished, hauing alighted from his horse, hee came and past before the emperour, to whom he made a low obeysance, there marching before him forty gentlemen & a Squire carrying the royall sword (shedded as his Maiesties lieutenant, and after him another Squire carrying the Constables armes and his coat of armes. After whom came other gentlemen pages, & young Squires richly apparellled in blew fatten imbrodered with gold and silver. Hauing in this pompe gone about the campe and viewed it, he went vnto his seat which was right against the emperour, whose guards did presently compasse in the field without the lists. Then Toreilla the challenger presented himselfe being accompanied by his godfather, the duke of Beiar & Albuquerque, the admirall of Castille, and many other noblemen and gentlemen: hee was attyred in a short luppe of silke, imbrodered with gold, & furred with fables, before whom there was carried a battle axe and a sword, a scutcheon with his armes, & a cassacke to weare vpon his armes. Hauing presented himselfe in this manner before the emperour, hee made him a low obeysance, and hauing done the like vnto the Constable, hee went to the paulion which was prepared for him. On the other side Ierome Anca entered the lists, accompanied after the same manner, and with the like furniture, except his luppe, which was furred with ermines; the Marquesse of Brandeburgh was his godfather, and hee was followed by the dukes of Nagera, of Alua, and of Benarent, the Marquesse of Aguilar, and of other noblemen and knights, who hauing made the like submissions to the emperour and Constable, hee went to the paulion which was prepared for him; and the scutcheons and coates of armes of both combatants were carried and planted before the Constables scaffold. During these shewes, the ayre did echo againe with the sound of drummes and trumpets, the which being commanded to cease, the two knights were brought by their Godfathers before the Constable, where a booke of the Gospell and a Crucifix being presented vnto them, they putting their hands into a priests hands did swear that they came to this trial of armes with an intent to defend a iust quarrell, wherein they would behaue themselves like loyal knights, without fraud, chams, or any other thing, professing to imploy only the force and dexterity of body and mind, trusting only in God, S. George & the virgin Mary, and wish the aduice & counsell of their godfathers, who caused a cofer to be brought before the Constable, in the which were the armes, wherewith the champions should fight, and be couered the which were weig-

Yyy

ed

Rebellion in Maiores.Maiores vanquished and quartered.Combat betwixt two Arragonis

ed in his presence, according to the laws & customs of combats, by the which the weight was limited to 90 pounds of the country, at the least. This done, they were chosen & carried to either Pavillion, where the champions did arm themselves in the presence of some that were appointed by the Constable, to witness that there was no fraud; while they were arming, the trumpets and drums sounding againe. The constable went from his seat to dispose of that which was fit within the lists, the which he did with great gravitie & ceremonies: Then he wet & sat him down at one of the corners of the field, accompanied with 12 knights, sending the like number to the other opposit corner, commanding them that they shold not remoue fro thence before the end of the combat. To either of the other two corners, he sent 3 noblemen of quality instructed in like maner. Then hauing commanded silence, one of the marshals of the field cried out with a loud voice in the emperours name going to euery one of the 4 corners, that it was forbidden vpon pain of death for any one to make a noise whilest the champions did fight, nor to make any signe by deed, voice or word, neither in spitting, coughing, blowing of the nose, sneezing or whistling, nor by beating of hands or feet, lifting vp of the hands, nor by shaking of the head, or any motion of the bodie to giue them aduertisement, courage, feare or amazement, nor otherwise to instruct them in what they haue to do, except their godfathers in their charge & duty: And then the two knights entred the field in compleat armor, holding in their hands their battel axes, & their swords by their sides: Peter Toreilla the first, (for that he was challenger) accompanied with his godfather, presented himself before the constable, who demanded of him what he was, & for what cause he was entred so armed: hauing received his answer he caused him to put off his head peece to know him, & then he caused him to put it on againe, & sent him to one of the corners of the camp, where he was received by the three noblemen, that were plaist there. Then he past to the other corner opposit, & being set in the midst of the 12 knights that were left there by him, he made the like demands & ceremonies to Ierom Anca, who was also presented vnto him by his godfather, & from thence sent to the other corner fight against his aduersary, where he was in like maner received by 3 noblemen. After al this the constable went to his first seat, & then the trumpets did sound again, which hauing done, the knights which shold fight, & their godfathers sel vp to their knees & praied, which done, either of the godfathers hauing embraced his chapion, & exhorted him to fight valiantly, he bad him farewell, & then they retired into their Pavillios. After which, one cried out that they shold let the good champions go. Then they came & affronted one another courageously fighting a long time with their battel axes, sometimes one reeling, sometimes another, vntil they had broken them in peeces. Being thus vnarmed they had no leasure to draw their swords, they were so neere one vnto another, so as they fell to handy gripes, one seeking to ouerthrow another: But the emperor who would not lose the cast his rod, in sign that they shold part them, saying that they had done enough, and that he held them both for good knights, whereupon all they that were set at the four corners, being 30 in al, ran, but they had great difficulty to part them, they wer so incensed one against another, crying & contending for honor and victorie, whereas either of them thought he had the aduantage. In the end the respect of the emperor made them retire, yet wold they not be friends, but threatened one another bitterly, condemning the constables persuasions, who told them that they shold rest satisfied & reuerence the emperours testimony, who had pronounced with his own mouth, that either of the had behaved him self valiantly, & had done his duty, so as their honors were vntoucht. The emperor was constrained through their obstinacy to send them both to prison, fro whence they parted not, vntil they were recóiled, at the least in few, for they were neuer perfect friends. If of two bad things we must chuse the one, as some think it necessary, the maner of combats practised in the time of our predecessors, wold seem more tollerable then that which is vsed at this day; for in that they made a certain kind of trial of doubtful things. The princes leue, or of his lieutenants was required, who first of al took knowledge whether the cause did merit, that two men of quality and honor shold hazard their liues who might serue the publike in better affaires, or their Soueraigne, or their owne families. If after mature deliberation they held it fit to grant the combate, they came vnto it with great ceremonies, as we haue shewed, witnessing that in those times they made no little esteem of the life of men.

A man. They did carefully procure a certain equality, preventing surpises, by any aduantage, in armes, strength and dexterity of horse or otherwise: They wold them sweare that there was no slander in them, but that they came to fight for a iust quarrel, & to defend their honors. The point wherein it did consist in those daies, was to reuerence God, their princes, & the lords of the see, & to be loyal & true to al men, courteous, quiet, & modest among friends, & valiant & courageous against their enemies in war. If it were known that in this point of honor, any one were falsly blamed, or wronged by deed, with aduantage of time, place, or company, with vnequall and extraordinary armes, or that hee had otherwise iust cause to complaine, they caused speedy reparation to be done of the wrong, as the cause required, either by the lawe, or militarie customes, which did neuer allow the combate when there was any other remedy. Much lesse did they suffer a gentleman of honor to come to the vncertain trial of armes, with one that was convicted of rafines or manifest slander. He that was vanquished in the combat was held guilty of that whereof he was accused, for a slander & a yare, & if he did line he was punished ignominiously by degradation, & sometimes by death. The combat was most commonly continued or staied according to the pleasure of the prince, or of iudges that were appointed, who most commonly did part the champions before they came to the extremity, declaring them both vpon the place to be good & hardie knights, which did also shew a wise affection to preferre the nobility, to better vses. If any were found so froward & disobedient, as, notable to get leaue to fight in the countie of their natural prince, should go vnto some other soueraigne, neere or far off, to grant them a place of combat, hauing fought, they were not to return into their country, for they were held for mutins, yea felons, & guilty of high treason, & there was great difficulty to obtain letters of abolitio for such offences. But in our daies al this is out of vse, & their proceedings in combats is very different. For if it happen that any man offend another without cause or reason, the point of honor is, that he must maintaine his deed, & not giue any excuse, nor confesse that he hath erred, for that were a signe of base cowardise. It were better (saith the point of honor) to be insolent and rash, than to subiect himselfe to that modestie which wold be taken for weakness in a man that maketh profession of armes. Another that hath taken iust for iniury, or is offended at a free word spoken by his friend, the which in effect is not iniurious, will take it in so ill maner, as he will admit of no excuse nor reparation: what? must he so little esteem honor? I were better (saith the point of honor) to be quarrelous, froward & vnfoiciable, than to vse such facilitie, & base courtesie derogating from cheualry: there is no friendship that binds, he must needs fight. If the prince or some great officer wil heare, and end their quarrell: they fear those iudgements more than lightning, they fly, they wil be followed, & they fight in corners, whether it be that they are ashamed to discouer the ground of their quarrell, which is most commonly so foolish & impertinent, as they wold blush to speake of it; or that they are posselt with a thirstlesse desire to shed mas blood, & with an appetite of reuenge, accompanied with pride & vanitie. It were better (saith the point of honor) to be rebellious & vnciuil, then to submit himselfe to that discipline, for they wold say it were want of courage, & that he wold fly the lists. And thereupon they conclude, according to the point of honor, that it is not in the king to rule it, according to the limitations of his justice; & that gentlemen doe not know any other iustice or equity, than the custome of duels received among gentlemen, which giues this prerogative, priuiledge & authority, to do all, & not to suffer any thing, & to maintaine themselves by the sword in this possession, although it be vniust, and vltured but of late. Thus they are easily drawn to the combat a this day, and they must not seeme to drawe backe vpon any pretext whatsoever, neither of God, the king, nor his edicts: he must goe being called, else he shal be held base & ignoble, & therefore shal be exposed to the outrages of him that did challenge him with such aduantage as he shal please: for it were better (saith the point of honor) to be a murderer, than to go to field with one that had refused a challenge. Be they ready to fight, either will make prouision of a long rapier, of an excellent horse, with other such helps which shal be neither visited nor measured: for these are neither godfathers nor witnesses in their combats. Euery one must looke to himselfe (saith the point of honor) & it were better to exceed something in that respect, than to be short; although we may iustly say afterwards, that the honor of the victorie belógs rather to the armes & horse than to the knight. Yet they goe in their shirts, & the point of honor wel obserued require, that they run one another through like boars, rather thā to slip a side, when the thrust comes, or to seeke to auoid it by fensling, & it were better to die (saith the point of honor) then to seem by any gesture or countenance to fear death. It is then a wonder that these men ordained for murder & slaughter, who thinke they are not come into the world but to kill or be killed, should vouchsafe to arm themselves, when they go to the war, & they shold not impute it to want of courage to couer themselves with hamess, like vnto the Cimbrians and ancient gaules, for there is in a manner the like reason. But behold the most subtil and very quintessence of the point of honour: It is lawfull for them that go to fight in duel, to insure a second & a third if they wil, the which shalbe bound to fight against the like number chosen by the other part, & kill them with whom they neuer had any quarrel, yea, their deare friends, as it often happens: It is the law of duels, It were better (saith the point of honor) to be a murderer of his own soul, than to refuse a knight which doth him the honor to intreat him to second him in his quarrel, bee it iust or vniust. If it happen that the second kills him against whom he fights, he must come & succor his partner, and help him to kill his enemy, although it seeme outrageous to fall two vpon one, who it may be is also forewounded. These are tollerated murders; and it were better (saith the point of honor) fo to kill him who thou thinkest hath wronged thee, than to leaue him his life, vnlesse he demand it of thee: For it is the fruit of duels, either to kill his aduersarie, or to brag that he hath giuen him his life. Being returned from fighting, much contented when they haue vanquished, they wil tel wonders of courtesies, done vnto him whom they haue thus slaine: He is dead (wil they say) through his own folly, by his overweening, by his ostinacie, wherein they cannot be gainsaid, for that they die all winneces and ludges.

If he that suruiues be wounded and dies soone after; he consorts himself in that point of honor, that he hath done himself right by his sword, and that he hath caused his aduersarie to die first. But for the health of their soules, they think they haue provided sufficiently, if going to the combat with an heart vndered with a deadly hatred against their neighbour, posselt with a spirit of reuenge, and a vaine opinion of their excellency, dignitie, and valour, they fall vpon their knees, entering into some Church or Chappell, and pray vnto God heartily that hee will giue them the grace to kill their enemy, or to force him to acknowledge his life from them. They will confesse themselves to a priest or some religious man, they wil demand absolution of the sinne which they are going to do, & will giue money to haue masses said for him or them that shall die in this fight. Yet it is the least of their cares: for if they meet with any church man that hath wit and conscience, who seeks by holy admonitions to diuert them from this bad resolution, and refuseth to absolve them, they will say that hee vnderstands not the point of honor, and will goe from him in a rage or will mocke at him. It is not from God that these duellists haue leamed or will leame that which doth truly honour Nobility: But they doe rather seeke to instruct themselves in their false point of honor, by the precepts and suggestions of the enemy of mankind, who was a murderer from the beginning, and who is alwaies delighted in murder & blood. By the instigation & conduct of this godfather, we see them go cheerfully to yeeld vp their cursed soules, most of this humor liuing without god, without king, without law, without friendship, & without knowledge of ciuil vertues, hauing for their sole vertue, a violence which they call courage, the which they haue common with brute beasts. If there were euer barbarism like vnto this since the foundation of the world was laid they may iudge which be me, hauing retained some light of reason, & may conclude pertinently, that there is not any thing among human actiōs in this miserable age, that is more repugnāt to the law of god, more absurd in nature, more preiudicial to good gouernment, more in contempt of kings & magistrats, & to conclude more offensive before God & man, than these modern duels. Not that we should allow or giue place to the ancient manner of combats, whereas there is a king, or some other soueraign power, who ought not to grant nor suffer them according to the rules of iustice wel administered: & without the authoritie of which soueraign power, it is not lawfull for any whatsoever to draw his sword, according to the laws of Christendome. Being most certain that combats in the best form that they were euer practised (it be not against an enemy that prouokes in open war) are the inventions of cruel & barbarous nations which are ignorant of piety, iustice, and gouernment.

Returning

A Returning to our Historie, wee find this yere 1522, James of Aillon, earle of Lude, gouernor of Fontarraby, being so long disquieted by the enemy, & wanting things necessary for the defence of a town of war, which attended a sieg houly, he aduertised the French king his master of this estate, intreating him to releue him, & to send another gouernor: the which the king performed aswell as he could, for he was otherwise busied, the war being hot both in Italy, & Picardy, betwixt him & the emperor: The marshall of Chastillon was sent thither, who dying at Dax, his charge was giue to the marshall Chabanes, who victualled Fontarraby, in view of the enemy, & changed the garrison, drawing forth the earle of Lude, and making captain Franquet gouernor in his place, who had alwaies had the reputation of a good foldier, but he lost it in this charge. They of Fontarraby hauing a little before made a sally vpō the enemy which lay at Yrun, it had succeeded ill, in the which they had lost the signior of Chanfarron, & many good soldiers; and after the coming of captain Franquet, they made many skirmishes, most of them preiudiciall to the French.

In the yere 1523, the marshall D. Pedro of Nauarre a prisoner in the fort of Symanca died, whose death was diuersly published: it is most certain that it was violently, & by the sword; the Spaniards impute the fault to himself, saying, that being too much affected to K. Henry of Albret his naturall Prince, & seeing himself so long detained in prison, for that he would not swear to another, he fel into such despaire, as hee slue himself: hee left one son of the same name, who did then serue the Frēch k. in Fontarraby. At Rome Pope Adrian also dyed, the 30 month of his raigne, in whose place Iulio de Medicis was chosen, & was named Clement 7. The same yere the emperor entred into Pampelone, where providing for the defence of this countie of Guipuscoa, he sent the constable D. Inigo Fernādes of Velasco, with the prince of Orang, who led an army of about 24000 mē, by the pace of Beoyua into Bearn, & camped before Saluaterra, the which yielded, where staying, they made shew that they would conquer the country of Bearn, or attempt Bayonne, and so they held the minds of men in suspēce. The lord of Lautrec, gouernor of Quienne, gaue good order both for Bayone & Fontarraby, being doubtful what designe the enemy had, who hauing remained 4 daies at Saluaterra, returned into Guipuscoa, hauing done nothing memorable in that voyage, but taken the Cattle of Vidaxone, belonging to the lord of Gramont: D a great part of this army died of cold and want in this voyage.

21 In the beginning of the yere 1524, the emperor leauing Nauarre; retrayed to Victoria, where he resolved of the sieg of Fontarraby, which was begun in the beginning of February, the Constable of Castille being general of the army, assisted by the prince of Orange, and many other noblemen and knights of name, among which was William of Roccandolphe Colonel of 3000 Germans: the batterie was planted towards Miranda, against the queens bastion, & it was furious & continuall, yet they gaue not any assault, for the Spaniards desired to take it by famine & without the losse of their men: the place was reasonably wel furnished to endure a long sieg, yet captain Franquet yielded it vpon composition, to depart with their armes & baggage saued, & their colours flying, as the Spaniards had done, Franquet excused himselfe, vpon the intelligences which D. Pedro of Nauarre had with the enemies: notwithstanding he was degraded of his nobilitie, vpon a scaffold in the citie of Lion. D. Pedro of Nauarre was sonne to the Marshall D. Pedro, who died a prisoner in the Cattle of Symanca, and was nephew to the Constable of Castille, by whome being solicited, he went to emperors seruice. The place was found well furnished of all things, whereunto hauing added other prouisions, the gard and defence thereof was giuen to Sancho Martines de Leyua, brother to Anthony de Leyua, who was then reputed a wise and discreet Captaine in the warres of Italie. Besides the gouernment of that towne, Sancho Martines was corrector of the Prouince of Guipuscoa, the which hath not hapned to any one, to haue had the charge of waite and of iustice. Those which haue gouerned in Fontarraby, successiue vnto our time, after Sancho Martines were D. Sancho de Leyua his son; then D. Diego of Caruajal lord of Xodar, & in our time D. John d'Acugna.

In Nauarre the king appointed D. Diego of Auellaneda, bishop of Tuy, to bee Viceroy, gouernor & reformer of the iustice: And then the heights of the faction of Gramōc, which had followed the kings of the house of Albret, returned into their country, & to the emperors seruice, to whom they did swear as to their king, namely D. Pedro of Nauarre.

Y y y j i j

uarre,

Franquet gouernor of Fontarraby.

1523
Death of the Marshall of Castille.

Emperors into Pampelone.

Exploits of the Spanish army in Bearn.

1524 Siege laid by the Spaniards to Fontarraby.

Fontarraby yielded to the emperor.

Punishment of Captain Franquet for the yielding of Fontarraby.

Diego d'Acugna Viceroy of Nauarre.

1524 Grammontes returne into Nauarre to the emperours seruice.

Francis the French king taken at Pavia.

Warlike Council of the bishop of Osma.

1525

Passage of king Francis being Prisoner into
Spaine.

uarre, who obtained the dignity of Marshall, which his father had held, and the Marquisate of Cortes. Hee was defended from D. Lionell, sonne to king Charles, the second of that name. As for the earle of Saint Stephen, when as he came to the emperours seruice he had the title of Marquess of Falces given him, and the office of high chamberlaine of Nauarre, with other fauours; since which time that realme hath bene held by the house of Castille, in peace, and without troubles.

22 On Saint Mathias day, being the 24 day of Februarie that yeare 1524, the computation of the yeare beginning at our Lady day, was that memorable battle of Pavia, where the French were defeated, and king Francis taken prisoner by the imperials, whereof the chiefe were Cont Charles of Launoy, viceroy of Naples. Ferdinand d' Audos Marquess of Pescara, and Charles duke of Bourbon, who for some discontentment had left France, and followed the emperours party. What were the causes of this great overthrow, and what succeeded after, ye may read at large in the History of France, whereunto I referre the Reader, to auoid needlesse repetitions. The emperor was aduertised of this defeat and prison the tenth of March; the news were pleasing vnto him, as wee may coniecture, yet he shewed himselfe verie modest, shewing no tokens of pride for this great successe. There were two opinions debated in his council, the bishop of Osma was author of the one, to suffer this great prisoner to depart freely, & to bind him vnto him by a frank and brotherly deliuerance; the other was to keep him still, and to draw from him all the profit and aduantages that might be. This last aduice proceeded from D. Frederic of Toledo duke of Alua, & was followed by the emperor, wherefore there were certaine articles drawn and sent with a speed vnto the king, by the lord of Reux, who reiecteth these as unreasonable.

Hereupon the Viceroy of Naples perswaded the king not to take it in ill part; if he were led into Spain, to treat himself with the emperor touching his libertie, assuring him that he desired it, shewing him letters from his friends in court. But his intention was in the meane time to lead him to the castle of Naples, and there to attend the opportunity of a passage, for they were not strong enough at sea for the French, who had Andrew Dorias Gallies at their deuotion; Neither did hee much trust his armie at land, which wanting pay, hee feared would mutine; Besides, he was iealous of the Pope, Venetians and other Potentates of Italie, who were discontented at the prosperitie of the emperor his master, wherefore being thus resolu'd, he conducted the king to Genoa, and from thence to Porto Fino: whereas the marshall of Montmorency comming vnto him with fixe French gallies, without any souldiers, by the commandement of the Queene Regent, the kings mother, he changed his aduice, & hauing furnished those gallies with Spanish souldiers, and ioyning them to those which he had, thinking that he might easily passe, whilest that the French expected his going to Naples, he suddenly bent his course for Spain; & laded the prisoner at Barcelona, before that it was known, or that he had aduertised the emperor and from thence hee conducted him to Valencia: But passing by Tortosa, the king was in great danger among the mutyned Spaniards, who pursued the Viceroy tumultuously for their pay, forcing him with their shot to escape ouer the top of his lodging, the bullets flying nere vnto the kings person. The emperor hearing of his arrival, commanded he should be put into the castle of Xatua, a place ordained in old time to be a prison for great men: but the viceroy obtained that he might liue in certain houses of pleasure, about Valencia vntil that he had commandement to conduct him to Madrid. The emperor was resolu'd not to fee him before the hee had concluded for his liberty, for the treating whereof, besides the archbishop of Ambra, who was afterwards Cardinal of Tournon, and Selus the first President of Paris, he gaue a safe conduct to Marguerite of France, duchesse of Alanson, who arrived at Barcelona in September, & passing from thence by Saragosse shee came to Madrid, whether she found the emperor was come to visit the king, who had bin brought almost to deaths doore with a violent feuer.

This had a shew of charity, to comfort him, giuing hope that he should be soone set at liberty, but it was rather a cruosity, that he might visibly see in what estate he was, fearing to lose the fruits of his prize if he should die. It is said, that being in consultation whether hee should see him or not, hee was dissuaded by his Chauncellour, who told him, that

A if he saw him, and did not set him freely at libertie, the world would thinke that hee had been brought thither by couetousnesse, thrust on with a mercinarie charitie, and a seruile feare, to loose by the prisoners death the price of his ransom: a noble aduice, and worthy to be obserued. But the duchesse of Alansons presence was the best remedie to recouer the king, where she remained almost three monethes: what she effected, and vpon what termes the king was deliuered, you may read in its proper historie.

23 These things past in the yeare 1526, in the which the Emperor Charles married D. Isabella of Portugal, daughter to the king D. Manuel. D. Alphonso Fonseca, Archbishop of Toledo, and primar of Spaine, with D. Ferdinand of Arragon, duke of Calabria, were sent to receiue this princeesse, who conducted her with great state to Seuille, where the mariage was celebrated. Of this mariage was borne, the one and twentieth day of May, in the yeare 1527, D. Philip, who succeeded in all the realmes, lands, and seigniories of the Emperour, as well hereditarie as conquered. A memorable yeare, for that by the Emperours armie, consisting for the most part of Spaniards, whereof Charles duke of Bourbon was generall, the citie of Rome was taken and sackt, and Pope Clement, with many cardinals, ranomed, and hardly intreated; the greedie and insolent souldiers not sparing the cardinals of their owne nation, prophaning by all acts of crudelie and excess, in their disordered appetites, the places and persons dedicated and vowed to religion, notwithstanding that the prince, for whom they made warre, heire of the realms of Spaine, carried the title of Catholike, purchased by his predecessors, for the good offices they had done to Popes and to the sea of Rome. The same yeare king Francis being returned into his realme, he caused the mariage to be accomplished betwixt D. Henrie of Albret, and Marguerite of France, widow to the duke of Alanson, father and mother to queene Isabe, heire to the realme of Nauarre.

King Francis being come from his imprisonment discontented, he entred willingly into league with the Pope, the king of England, the Venetians and Florentines, for the libertie of Italie: But when as he vnderstood the cruelties vsed by the Imperiall armie at Rome, he allied himselfe more strictly with the king of England, vnder colour to free the Pope and the territories of the Church; whereupon the lord of Lautrec was appointed D to lead an armie into Italie, at their common charge.

The Emperour being aduertised, that king Francis not onely refused to performe his promise, but had also declared himselfe his enemy, he caused monsieur de Gramont, his embassadour in Spaine, to be put in gard, and the French king did the like to Nicholas Perrenot of Granuelle. These kings sent two kings at Armes into Spaine, namely, Guienne and Clarence, to proclaime war against the Emperour, but before their arrival the embassadors were released. They proclaiming war against the emperor, and complaining of the Popes imprisonment, receiued this answer, as some write.

That he might not proclaime warre against him, being by right his prisoner, although he were at libertie, hauing given his sonnes for hostages, that not obseruing his promise, which he had solemnly sworne, for that he was hindered by his subiects, he should return againe to prison, for that he could not by the law of nations, being not yet freed from his oath, proreft warre against him. But if he did repent him of this accord, he should returne into his power, and breaking the first contract, the French should recouer that which they had held. That he did wonder at the complaints of those kings touching the Popes affliction, as if they were ignorant, that all had bene done without his priuite, and that he had long since giuen commandement the Pope should bee set at libertie. Du Bellai writes, That king Francis talking to Perrenot, touching the Emperours speech, answered, That he was not Charles his prisoner, neither had he euer giuen his faith, but had made a promise by force, being depriv'd of his libertie: but being now free in his kingdom, he did not know any man that could force him to keepe that promise, neither was he voluntarily bound to obserue that which constraint and imprisonment had made him to promise.

In Spaine the Infant D. Philip, being a yeare old, was sworne and declared Prince of the Asturias, and heire of the realmes of Castille, and the dependances, with the lands annexed, in the towne of Vaileddoliz: after which the Emperour Charles and D. Isabella had coupled.

1526
Governours

Marriage of the Emperour Charles

1527

24 Rome taken & sackt.

25 Marriage of king
Henry of Albret

League against the Emperour.

Answer made by the Emperour to the French
king.

Speech of king Francis touching his promise to the Emperour.

Genealogy of Castille.

Genoa
of Portugal.

Portugal.

Voyage of Ferdinand Magellane.

Land of Giants who have Winter when we have Summer.

Strait of Ma-gellan.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 27.

had another sonne named D. Ferdinand, who lived little, and two daughters, D. Maria, who was married to Maximilian of Austria, her cousin german; sonne to Ferdinand, and D. Joane, married to D. John of Portugall, grand child to the king D. Mmanuel: Wherefore I haue thought it fit to returne vnto his actions, during the three yeares which hee lived after his third marriage, which was in the year 1518, who begat of his wife D. Leonora the Infant D. Charles, and D. Maria an after birth.

26 In the discourse of the raigne of D. Mmanuel, we made mention of two of his discontented subiects, D. Ferdinand of Magellanes, and Ruis Faller, who had addrest themselves vnto the Councell of the Indies in Castille; and demanded leaue and meanes to discover the rich islands of the Molucques, the which they obtained at the comming of K. Charles, who being at Barcelona, sent them with letters & necessarie provisions, to Seuille, there to prepare themselves for so long and so important a voyage. Ferdinand Magellanes married in Seuille, with the daughter of Edward Barosa, capitaine of the atcennall of that citie; and for that Ruis Faller, his companion, fell in adde, he was forced to make his preparation without him, having five ships, that is, the Victoria (the pilot whereof was John Sebastian del Cano, borne at Guetaria in Guipuscoa, he that in the same voyage went about the world) S. Antonie, S. James, the Conception, and the Trinitie, in which ships were two hundred thirtie seven men, souldiers and mariners, with the which he parted in the year 1519, from the port of S. Lucar, and passing by the islands of the Canaries, and Cape Verd, he failed toward Saint Augustines cape, betwixt the South and the West, vntill that he came three and twentie degrees beyond the Equinoctiall, where he found a land whose inhabitants were wild Giants, & of so great a stature, as some were eleuen, twelve, and thirteene fathmes high: which country he called The land of Giants. He stayed in it May, Iune, Iulie, and August, which is the Winter in those quarters. The king D. Mmanuel was much discontented, that king Charles, his brother in law, had employed these Portugals, and attempted this voyage, to his great prejudice; yet he did comfort himselfe with a conceit, that Magellanes could not performe what he had promised. This voyage of Magellanes was verie difficult and full of lets, by reason of the discord betwixt him and his companions; so as one of his ships, called S. Antonie, returned into Spaine, leauing the rest as farre as the strait or cape, called Eleuen thousand Virgines, fiftie three degrees beyond the Equinoctiall, whereas the nights haue but six houres in the end of October. And they so called this cape, for that they toucht there on Saint Vfalues day, which is the one and twentieth of October. The same of the islands of the Molucques, and others which were rich in spices, was so great, and of the profit which might be made there, if they could find meanes to shorten their voyage, as not onely the Spaniards, but other nations, sought out wayes for this traffike and negotiation. Paul Centurion, a marchant of Genoua, going for this cause into Muscouie, gaue Basilus prince of that country, to vnderstand, that there was meanes to bring the spices into his country, by diuers riuers which he declared vnto him; saying, That those which the Portugals brought into Europe, were for the most part corrupted and falsified. The way which he meant, was, to bring the marchandise vp the riuier of Indus, vnto Batei, from whence they must carrie them by land to the riuier of Camu, and from thence by Citraca, and the Calpian sea, to bring them into the riuers of Volga, Oeca, and Mosque. But this passage had bene with greater charge, paine, and danger, than Centurion did conceiue, yea to distribute them after they were come into Muscouie, by Liouonia, Polonia, Prussia, Saxonie, and other parts of Germanie.

Ferdinand Magellanes, besides the ship which returned into Spaine, lost another in a storme: with the three others he past the strait which was called by him Magellan, the which is aboue sixscore leagues long, and scarce two leagues broad, the entries of the which from the North to the South seas, are about two and fiftie degrees from the Equinoctiall: the waters are verie deepe, the shore full of high rockes, and barren, covered continually with snow. In this passage, & for a great space in the South seas, they thought to die of hunger: in the end they came to the island of Inuagada, repassing the line eleuen degrees, which they called Good signe, where they found wherewithall to satise their hunger; and from thence they came to the island of Sebut, where they past the least

Lib. 27.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A of Easter in the year 1521, and perswaded the king of that countrey, called Hambab, to become a Christian, receiving victuals and presents from him, with information of the Molucques. In the same island there was another king, enemy to Hambab, called Calupolo, lord of Mautan, against whom Ferdinand Magellanes going to fight, was slain there in battell, the 27 of April 1521. John Serran, who was chiefe pilot of the same, retaining the chiefe, was soone after taken by king Hambab, who had been called Charles at his baptism, and put to death with seuentie other Spaniards; Wherefore the three ships parted from thence, hauing but an hundred and fiftene men remaining; and came to Cohol, where they burnt one of their ships: there they trimmed vp the two others, and then went B to Bornoy, where they were courteously intreated by the king Sapida, a great and mightie lord, who releued them with all necessaries: in which countrey they saw great riches and deuises of gold and siluer. Then passing by the island of Cinibon, they came to the island of Tidore, which is one of the five of the Molucques, where of the other foure are, Terrenate, where, seuen monethes before this arrival, died Francis Serran, a Portugall, kinsman to Magellanes, who gaue him first knowledge of these islands; & indouged him to go thither, Mate, Matille, and Maehian, which lye vnder the Equinoctiall, of the carbons, verie small, but abounding in riches, being distant from Spaine aboue an hundred and seuentie degrees. The king of Tidore, called Athanasius, although he yete a Mahometist, suffered these Spaniards to traffique freely, and was pleased with their arrival, and C with the friendship of the king of Castille. The discouerie of these islands in the time of the king D. Mmanuel, did cause great contentions betwixt Castille and Portugall, the Portugals pretending that they were thereby interested; and hindered in their course assigned for their navigation: Yet the king D. Mmanuel moued no debate, for before that the newes of this discouerie was knowne in Spaine, he ended his dayes, towards the end whereof there happened a great plague, and famine in Portugall: During which afflictions the marriage was concluded betwixt the Infanta D. Beatrice, second daughter to the king D. Mmanuel, and Charles duke of Saouoy, to whom she was sent this year 1521, with a fleet of three and twentie sailes, of the which D. Martin of Castillblanc, earle of Villanoya, was general, being accompanied by D. Martin of Acosta, bishop of Lisbon, with D other noblemen, and by D. Leonora de Sylua, and a daughter of the earle of Faro, with many waiting women. The Infanta was then sixteen yeares old and seuen monethes. After the returne of this fleet, about the end of the year, the king D. Mmanuel died, little lamented by the Clergie of his countrey, of whom he had leuied new and vnaccustomed subsidies, hauing reigned six and twentie yeares and three monethes, in the three and fiftieth year of his age. He was buried in the monastrie of Belem, which he himselfe had caused to be built.

D. Iohn, third of that name, fifteenth King of Portugall.

28 His sonne D. Iohn succeeded him, the third of that name, at the solemnitie of whose reception there were present some of the Infants his brethren, D. Jago duke of Bragance, the master of S. James, the earle of Tentugal, the earle of Taroca, D. Iohn de Meireles, prior of Saint Iohn, the great master, the marquisse of Toumouo, and Villa Real, with other noblemen and gentlemen of the realme, and the cardinall D. Alphonso his brother, in whose hands the oath was taken. This prince was fat and vnwieldie, verie religious, and a loue of learmed and valiant men. He was founder of the Vniuersitie of Coimbra, and of the royall colledge of Saint Paul, the which he endowed with great reuenues, and large stipends, for the Regents and Doctors: wherein hee was followed and assisted by the cardinall D. Henrie, his brother, who built in the citie of Ebroa the colledge of Iesuites, with professors in the tongues and sciences, both sacred and prophane. The queene D. Leonora, widow to king Mmanuel, was in the year 1522, deliuered of an after birth, named D. Maria, which was not married.

This

Death of Ferdinand Magellan.

Five islands of Molucques.

27

Marriage betwixt the duke of Saouoy and D. Beatrice of Portugall.

Death of the king D. Mmanuel

Vniuersitie of Coimbra erected

Colledge of Ie-suites built at Ebroa.

29 Voyage of John Sebastian del
Cano.

This new king continued the navigations began by his predecessors with great affection, and had great convention with the Emperour Charles, in regard of the Moluques, whereas the ships of Castille had bene well entertained, as we have said, by Alonso, king of the island of Tidore, whereas the Castilians stayed five whole monethes, and made a kind of bartering, by the which king Alonso promised to give so many cloues for a certain number of red cloth, blew cloth, or linnen, and so proportionably of other spices. The two ships of Castille remaining of Ferdinand Magellanes armie, that is, the Victoria and the Trinitie, divided themselves, and disposed of their returne, so as the Trinitie should hope his course to Phoama, upon the coast of new Spaine, which they held to be but a short voyage, and John Sebastian del Cano, with the Victoria following the Portuguese voyage, should secure into Spaine, by the cap Bon Esperance. The Victoria then parting from Tidore in the month of April 1522, with fortie seven Spaniards, and thirtie men of the island of Tidore, they came to Zumatra, in old time called Taprobana, and there repassing under the Equinotically, and the Winter Tropike, they doubled the cap of Bon Esperance, and arrived in the port of S. Lucas of Barameda, in September, having bene about three years in this long and dangerous voyage, in the which it is thought that this John Sebastian del Cano made about foureteene thousand leagues at sea. The other ship, called the Trinitie, commaunded by a capitaine called Spinosa, sayling towards new Spaine, was put back by contrarie winds, to Tidore, whither Antonio Brito, a capitaine for the king D. John, was come with five ships of Portugal, by whom the Castilians were taken and spoiled, and carried being fortie eight, to Malaca, so as of five ships which parted with Fernando Magellanes, the Victoria onely returned into Spaine, besides that of S. Antonio which would not follow him.

Conference for the limits of the Navigation betweene Castille and Portugal.

The voyage of the East Indies hath alwayes bene more succesfull for the Portugals than the Castilians: and at that time the king D. John intreated the Emperour Charles, not to suffer his subjects to goe to the Moluques, to avoid the ruine of armies, which are sent to discover those countries: whereunto he yielded (not knowing what Antonio Brito had done to the Castilians that were in the Trinitie at Tidore) vntill that expert men in the Mathematicke and Navigation had decided it. This cause was debated in the yere 1524, at Yelbes, whither came, for the king of Portugal, the Licentiate Antonio de Azevedo, Coigno, Diego Lopes of Sequeira; Pero Alphonso of Aguiar, Francisco de Melo, Simon of Tabitra, and others: and at Badajos, the Licentiats, Alegna, Barrientos, and Pedro Mamel, D. Ferdinand and Columbus, son to the Admirall Christopher Columbus; John Sebastian del Cano, Pero Ruiz of Burgos, & others, for the Emperour. These deputies of either part having conferred many dayes vpon a bridge on the river of Caja, which diuides Portugal from Castille, they parted in greater disorder and confusion than before, the Castilians maintaining, That the Moluques, yea, and the islands of Zumatra and Malaca, with a good part of China, fell in their Strait and Navigation, according to the line drawne by Pope Alexander the sixt, and the accord made betwix king John the second, and king Ferdinand the sixt, in the towne of Tordesillas: The Portugals affirming the contrarie, with their reasons.

Marriage of D.
John king of Portugal, and the Emperours
sister.

In the yere 1525 died queene Leonora, widow to king John the second, who was called. The mother of the poore, for her great charity. She had the hospitall of las Caldas, and the monasterie of the mother of God, to be built. In which yere king John the third then reigning, being two and twentie years old, married D. Catharina, daughter to king Philip of Austria, and sister to the Emperour Charles, being then eighteen yeares old; which marriage was solemnized at Ebora. Of this marriage were borne the Infants following, D. Alphonso, who lived little, D. Martin, borne at Coimbra in the yere 1526, she was princeesse of Castille, D. Catharina, who lived but a while, nor her sister D. Beatrice, D. Manuel, who in like manner died soone, D. Philip, and D. John, who were borne at Ebora, and D. Antonia at Lisbonne.

Castille.
First voyage of the castilians to the Moluques.

The Emperour Charles, persuaded by them that had bene at Caja, betwixt Badajos and Yelbes, rigged out seven ships of Biscaye at the Groine, to seeke a passage to the Moluques, by the land of Bacalaps and Labrador towards the North, if they might find any meaning to make a storehouse for spices at the Groine, from whence they might be distributed.

A distributed into Spaine, France, Flanders, Germanie, England, and other regions: from the which D. John king of Portugal sought to diuert him by intreaties and reasons, offering to pay the charges of the armie, and to give him many other gifts, which the Emperour refused, persisting still in his resolution: Wherefore these seven ships parted from the Groine, being commaunded by Garcia Geffrey of Loaysa, borne at Cité Real, a knight of S. John, who had John Sebastian del Cano for his lieutenant, who were all lost, or went astray, except the Admirall, which came to Tidore, without her general Garcia Geffrey, who died at sea. D. Garcia Henriques of Ebora, was then general for the king of Portugal the Moluques. In the yere 1528 Fernando Cortez, gouernour and conqueror of new Spaine, sent from the countries conquered by him, two ships, by the kings commandement, wherof Aluaro of Sahuedra Ceron, was capitaine, to seeke out the Moluques, but he was as vnfortunat as the rest: which made the Emperour to yeeld more easily to an agreement with king John, his brother in law, being prest by other weightie affaires, which called him into Italie, for the Crowne of the Empire, which he should receiue from the hands of Pope Clement; for which voyage the king of Portugal lent him three hundred and fiftie thousand ducats, in consideration wherof the Emperour engaged, or suspended the controuersie for the Moluques; wherein the Licentiat, Antonio de Azevedo, deputed by the king of Portugal, hauing negligently negotiated, and left the business almost in the same tearmes as it was at the conference of Badajos and Yelbes, was punished: whereby, in time, the quarell was reuined betwixt the Portugals and Castilians.

In the yere 1529 Lewis of Beaumont, earle of Lerin, and constable of Nauarre, died there, whom his son succeeded in all his lands and dignities, bearing the same name. The Emperour Charles did alwayes honour him much, acknowledging him for his kinsman, for that he was defended, by the mothers side, from D. John king of Nauarre and Aragon.

32 The treatie of Cambray was concluded the yere following 1530, in the which Louis of Sauoy, mother to the French king, and Marguerite of Austria, the Emperours aunt, had long laboured to reconcile these two princes: By the which the Infants of France were deliuered, in regard of two millions and five hundred and fiftie thousand crownes, payable at severall payments, as well readie as otherwise, in discharge of the Emperour to the king of England: and it was said, that the king should renounce the feoffment of Flanders and Artois, and his pretensions to the duchie of Milan, and realme of Naples. That he should marie the queene D. Leonora, and if there came a sonne of this marriage, he should be duke of Bourgonie, with many other conditions, which are to be seene in the said treatie, and here omitted, for that they did not hold. The articles of this treatie being performed, as farre as might be at that time, the Emperour came to Barcelona, from whence he past to Genoua, in Andrew Dorias gallies, who hauing a little before left the French kings seruice, was come vnto the Emperours. From Genoua he went to Bolonia la Grasse, wher as Pope Clement attended him, and there he receiued the Imperial Crowne, one of yron, which the Emperours haue bene accustomed to receiue at Milan, and one of gold, which he should take at Rome; but the Romans had not yet forgotten the sacke and spoye which the Spaniards had made. This coronation, which was performed on Saint Matthias day, verie happily for the Emperour, had bene purchased of the Pope, with the price of the Florentines libertie, and the change of their commonweale into a principallitie. After this solemnitie the Emperour hauing heard certaine princes, and the embassadours of many Estates in Italie, he tooke his way to Trient, and past into Germanie. Whilest that they were making preparation for the Emperours coronation in Bolonia, he receiued aduertisement, That D. Isabella, his wife, was deliuered of another sonne, whom he would haue called Ferdinand, by his grandfathers name. There was great joy and triumph for this birth both in Spaine and Italie, and especially in Bolonia; but this joy was of small continuance, for he died within few monethes after his birth.

At the Emperours passage into Italie, to his coronation, hee had bene attended on by the gallies of Spaine, of the which Roderigo Portundo was general, who in his returne backe,

1530
Treatie of Cam-bray.

33 Coronation of the Emperour
at Bolonia.

Ferdinand Infant of Spaine borne.

Roderigo Portundo defeated and slaine by pirats.

1530

backe, bearing that there were certain pyrats of Barbarie in those seas, the chiefe of which was Haydin Rays of Smima, called Chafe-diuell, which spoyled all men, he resolved to defeat them: wherefore having well furnished eight of his gallies, both with souldiers and slaues, and leaving the other seuen in the island of Yuifa, he directed his course towards Formentana, where he understood the pyrats lay with certaine galliots and foists, but he knew not their number. But as he was of an vndaunted courage, and discouered with reason, that those small barks of the Barbarians, commanded by diuers men, and for their owne priuat interests, would rather flee than fight, he did not respect the number of his enemies, but, after the Spartane maner, fought where they were. All which, it may be, had succeeded happily, if he had not advanced too hastily with his Admirall, the which was boarded, and he slaine by the pirats, before the other gallies could succour him, the which, as they advanced one after another without any order, they were enuioured, and fought withall by the enemies: so as of the eight gallies onely one escaped by flight, the rest were taken, and all the Christians slaine, or made slaues. John the sonne of the generall Portundo, was taken prisoner. With this noble spoylle Haydin Rays presented himselfe to Haradin Barberousse, who by the death of Harufco his brother, remained king of Alger, and head of all the pyrats of Barbarie: so as growne confident (being so fortified with gallies and slaues) to be able to attempt some matter of importance; whereon whilest he did meditate, he drew into his companie Simon Cefus of Smima, who was called the Jew, a famous pyrat, who retired with his vessels to Gerbe. He called also another desperat pirat, called Alicotto of Caramania, who scoured the seas with foure foists, and two gallies, the which he had taken when Florence was besieged, at Montargentaro, where they had laden certaine munition, conducted from Naples, for that enterprise. Barberousse having at the last 60 vessels of warre, great and small, had resolved to surpris Cales in Spaine, and to get a rich bootie, by reason of a Raige that was kept there. Whilest that he prepared all things which he held necessarie, he commanded Alicotto to goe and conduct bisket, artillery, and other necessaries, to the armie lying at Alger. During this preparation in Africke, Andrew Doria went to sea with a great armie, desirous to purge that sea of pyrats, and to reuenge the wrong and great losse which the Emperour had sustained by the rashnesse of Portundo. Being therefore aduertised, that the Barbarians armie was diuided, and where it lay, he went towards Cerelli, whereas Alicotto remained with 17 vessels; where he arrived so suddenly, as the pyrat had not any time but to vnfirmish his vessels, to chase the Christian slaues into a caue, or secret prison vnder ground, and to retire himselfe with his men into the castle, sending messengers with all speed vnto the Moores of the neighbour mountaines, to come and succour him. Doria being arrived, he became master of the town without any difficultie, and of the port, where he tooke two gallies, and seuen galliots, and burnt the rest. He caused a diligent search to be made for the slaues, and finding them, he set about 1000 free. Notwithstanding he lost about 400 souldiers, who going rashly to spoile the towne, were cut in peeces by the Moores which came, and by the Turkes which sallied out of the castle with Alicotto, or else forced to run into the sea. Doria L. having caused his gallies to go from the shore, to the end he might fight for his own safetie, there were sixtie taken & made slaues, with George Palaucino, an Ensign. And this losse which Alicotto made of gallies and galliots, was the safetie of Cales.

Andrew Doria
takes many collies of pyrats.

1531 Inundation.

Ferdinand chosen king of Romans.

1532 League betwixt the Pope and
the Emperour.

The yare 1531 was memorable for the earthquake and inundations at sea, which happened as well in Spaine as in Africk and Flanders, whereas many towns & buildings were ruined, and much land drowned, and infinite numbers of ships swallowed vp by the wonderfull spring tides, with the losse of a great number of men. This was at such time as the Infant D. Ferdinand was chosen king of Romans at Coullen, & that Germanie was threatened extraordinarily by Solyman the Turke, who having raised a huge armie, entred soon after into Hungarie, with an intent to besiege Vienna, the chiefe citie of Austria, and the rampar of Christendome on that side: to withstand whose power the Emperour being assisted by the princes of Germanie, went thither in person, which disappointed the designs of that great enemy. He being retired, the Emperour returned into Italie, whereas Pope Clement & he had an assemply at Bologna, in shew to treat of a general Councell, which was not verie pleasing vnto the Pope, although he made shew to inuite all princes: but

K

L

M

1533

A the chiefe end of this enterprise, was to make a league betwixt them, and the other Potentates of Italie, for the assurance of their estates against the enterprises of the French. Which done, the king returned to Genova, whose he embarked in February, in the yare 1533, and past into Spaine.

34 During these affaires the Castilians continued with great diligence, their discouerie of new lands, whereas Francisco Pizarro, borne at Trugillo, who had lived long at the Indies, discovered the countrey of Peru, from whence a such abundance of treasure hath come: by reason whereof the Emperour made him marquisse of Newallies. He had some time before discovered an island, and in it a towne, which he called Saint Iago. Continuing his course, he coasted along the firme land of Peru, and there planted a colonie, which he named Saint Michael; then, entering farre into the countrey, he found a fit opportunitie to doe his businesse, in a warre which fell out betwixt two brethren, contending for the realme of Cusco; whereof the one was, called Chisear, and the other Atabalipa. Chisear finding himselfe the weaker, had recourse vnto Pizarro and the Spaniards, who promised to succour him; but it was with an intent to ruine them both. Ferdinand Pizarro was happily come to the Indies at that time, with new forces from Spaine, who having joined with the forces of his brother Francis, and the Indians of Chisear, they made a strong armie, sufficient to assaile Atabalipa. He for his part attentive to all occasions of warre, did not stay untill the enemy came vnto him, but went to meet them, having in his armie above six score thousand Indians, and gaue them battell about the towne of Casacabana, yett (as somewhite) within the circuit of the same towne, which was yett greater, in the which Pizarro had put himselfe; finding it without dwellers, and was there entertained in that time by the Barbarian king, vnder colour of treating friendship with him, but they could not agree. The Spanish capitaine had caused Atabalipa to be summoned, and solicited, That he should not disdain to submite himselfe to the Emperour Charles, as his vassall, and to pay him tribute; and moreover, to make himselfe a Christian; els he threatened him, that the Pope would deprive him of his realme, and would giue it wholly vnto the Emperour: the which he might well doe (sayed they) for he was Gods lieutenant on earth, of God, who had made all the world of nothing, and who to deliuer and saue men from the slaue of the euill spirit, had made himselfe man, had died vnder the crosse, and was called Christ Iesus. Father Vincent, a Iacobine Monke, was messenger of this summons. To whom Atabalipa answered, That hee did much esteeme and desire the Emperours friendship, and would send him presents, as to his friend; but to pay him tribute; he would not doe it, the kings of Cusco being accustomed to make others tributaries. That as for the Pope, whose power hee did alledge, hee held him for some madde man; seeing he presumed to giue vnto another that which was not in his power, and where he had no right. And in regard of Iesus Christ, and of his seruice, hee said, that he had no knowledge of it, and therefore he would not leaue the ancient gods of Cusco, and especially for that he understood by him, that Christ was already dead. He would therefore adhere rather to the Sonne and the Moore, which did not. And touching that which hee did assure him, that the Christians God had made heaven and earth of nothing, and finally all the world, he demanded of him where he had learned it; for he thought that the world had euer beene, or at the least many thousands of yeres: wondering much, that the Monke, who was not yet much advanced in the first hundred of the course of his life, did speake so confidently of such ancient things.

Peru discovered.

Colonia of S. Michael.

Frier Vincent replied, That the Emperour Charles was a great Monarch, whom many kings, as mightie as the king of Cusco, obeyed, and therefore he should not make trial of his force, nor compare himselfe vnto him: and holding in the one hand a Crucifix, and in the other a Bible, he told Atabalipa, that that Image had instructed him what the creation of the world had beene, and the booke contained the certaine historie. The king taking this booke in his hand, opened it, and turned it ouer, he smelt it, and layed his eare to it, hearkening if it spake any thing vnto him; but seeing there was no feeling in it, and that it spake not any thing, he cast it to the ground, saying, That both the booke and the Monke mock him. Wherefore Frier Vincent hauing taken vp his booke, returned to Pizarro, to whom hauing related all, he persuaded him to take some cruell reuenge of the im-

perie

Z z z z

1533

pietie of that Infidell king. The two armies therefore being so neere, as one might say, G they were mingled within the circuit of the great citie of Caxamalcan, the Spaniards ran vpon the Indians with a great thunder of muskets and artilerie; and the found of drums and trumpets: wherewith the Indians being not acquainted, were daunted and confounded: Atabalipa himselfe was so amazed, as forgetting the due tie of a generall, not giuing them any signe, nor commaunding to fight, he saw them slaine by heapes, neere vnto the place where he was set vpon an high seat of gold, carried on his gards shoulders, who sought to retire him out of the prease, and to flie away with him; but they were staid, and their king ouerthrowne and taken; being abandoned by all his people, most of them escaping by flight.

Atabalipa defeated & taken

By this victorie, and the taking of the king of Cusco, the Spaniards made themselves easily, masters of all the townes of that great and rich kingdome, and the souldiers were instantly made rich with the spoyle of the kings monables, and of the noblemen of his traine, with a wonderfull quantitie of gold, siluer, and slaues, among the which there were found five hundred maids and wiuers, which did serue king Atabalipa, who for a time was honourably guarded, in hope to be set at libertie, for the which he promised to glut the couetousnesse of the Spaniards, whom he saw to be verie greedie after gold and siluer; yea he offered to goe into Spaine, or whereas the Emperour should be, and was perswaded to be baptised. But notwithstanding all this, they strangled him cruelly, and having halfe burnt him, they caused his bodie to be laid in a chappell built to that end in the market place of Caxamalcan, for that they would haue all men honor his funeral, excusing themselves of the execution, vnder colour of iustice; for that (said they) hee had treacherously made secret leuies of souldiers in the realme of Quito, to surpris the Spaniards, and to free himselfe by force out of their hands; and also, for that he had put his brother Guscar to death, after the same maner, being their allie. The which he dissembled not, for that (said he) he had attempted to take away his life, to raigne. In the place of him that was dead, there was set vp by Francis Picarro the gouernor, for a shew, another brother of his, called Mangay (others name him also Atabalipa) who discovered vnto them part of the treasures: so as the present fruits of this victorie amounted to many millions, drawne as well out of the kings houses, as out of the Indians tombes, being accustomed K to burie with the dead bodie, the most precious things they had: and in like maner from their temples in the towne of Pauca Canu, & in that of Cusco, which is the chiefe of the realme. This great citie of Cusco is situated 17 degrees beyond the Equinoctiall line, towards the South sea, in a temperat region, yet their Winters are somewhat sharp in their season, that is, when we haue Summer, for those people are almost Antipodes to vs, & the cold continues, and is the greater, for that the high mountaines of that countrey are most part of the yeare covered with snow. Soone after this conquest of Picarro, James of Almagra, who had a good share in the honor thereof, went and invaded the region of Chile, or Chiliane, but he found more difficultie than he expected: for besides that his men were in daunger of death through cold, hee found stronger resistance, the people being L more warlike than they of Cusco, whom notwithstanding the Spaniards do not represent vnto vs, without dexteritie, or martiall discipline: for they witness, that in their armies they did obserue a foreward, a battell, & a reward; that they had scouts, and forlorne hopes, which were excellent casters in slings, as in old time they of Majorca were, who furiously began the fight, casting a shewre of hard polished stones, as big as an egge, & carrying a targuet on the left arme. Their chiefe batallion where their king was, did consist of men richly armed, with cuerasses quilted with cotton, & boners of the same, reasonably strong to resist a handie stroke, enriched with plates and threds of gold and siluer: and for offensive armes, some had clubs about foure foot long, and the heads as big as two fists, hauing five or six sharpe pikes of metall; others carried hatchets like vnto our halberds, which M they could handle well. As for their reward or subsidarie squadrons, to releue the rest, they were all pikes, whose heads were better armed than ours bee. Francis Picarro found the Indians of Peru in this equipage to resist him, it may bee (say they) that haue written of his enterprises) to make his conquests more admirable vnto vs: For not confessing that either he or any one of his captaines made any account of

Discipline of them of Peru at the warre.

1533

A of the Indians of the countrey, whom they had drawne vnto their partie, and joyned with them in the about mentioned combat of Caxamalcan and others, they vaunt, that this great king Atabalipa, was vanquished with all that great multitude of men of war which did accompanie him, by lesse than five hundred foot, and an hundred and twentie horse of the Spanish nation, whereof most of the footmen were crossebowes, hauing few harquebuses: yet they confesse that they had some peeces of ordnance, whereunto they attribute some part of their victories, saying, That the Indians were almost dead for feare, seeing these engines spit fire, and hearing the noyse thereof, wherewith they had neuer been acquainted; the which hath some likelihood.

B Atabalipa was sonne to a warlike and valiant prince, called Cusco, who coming out of the prouince of Quito, which is directly vnder the Equinoctiall line, towards the South sea, had conquered by armes from many other kings and lords, those ample regions wherof his sonne was in an instant dispossessed, at the coming of these Spaniards: and hauing there built the citie of Cusco, had called it by his owne name, and made it the seat of his empire, which was about three hundred leagues long and broad, stretching from the South to the West. At his death he left an hundred children, males and females, most of which liued when Atabalipa was defeated and taken. To Guscar (whom some also call Cusco) he had left the greatest part of his conquered countreys, and had giuen to Atabalipa the realme of Quito, where he was borne. But Guscar, not satisfied wlesse he might haue all, C did first moue war to dispossesse his brother, wherein he was vnfortunat: for after many vnhappie incounters, he was quite defeated, and taken, by Chilichuma, lieutenant to Atabalipa, by whose commandement, although he were a prisoner in the Spaniards hands, he was strangled: the which did so displease the gouernor Francis Picarro, as he conceived a mortall hatred against the king and his lieutenant, not ceasing vntill he had put them to death; yet after that he had discouered, by their meanes, the treasures of the realme, had seized of a good part of them, and was assured the rest could not escape him. In the distribution of which treasure he did afterwards shew himselfe verie vniust and false, as well towards his souldiers, as to the Emperour his master, whom he did frustrate of a good part of his right of the sists. It seemed that God, by this sudden & easie conquest, had prepared D a fit subiect for the Emperour Charles to settle a perfect estate at Peru; but his ministers did corrupt it. All things were there according to a mans desire, to execute a great and memorable designe: the which had bin admirable to posteritie, were it in regard of the glorie of God, or temporall commodities, in regard of the riches, and all sorts of blessings, the which heauen and all the elements doe powre downe abundantly vpon that region, but especially for the aptnesse of the people, who were found ciuile and capable of reason, much more than they that had bin first discouered at the islands, or vpon the continent of those Westerne Indies towards the North sea. They did not find them naked, and without shame, but apparelled, both men and women, handsome in their garments, industrious in their buildings, and in all other arts and workes; tillers of the ground, feeders of E pastures, marchants, sociable and courteous, as well among themselves as to strangers, and religious also, although it were after the Pagan maner: whose imperfections should not be censured with rigor, but excused, with an intention to reforme them in time, by good examples of pietie and charitie, and by iustice well and duly ministred: considering that in their religion and maners, they were not more sauage and barbarous than the first ancient Spaniards, before they were ciuillized and instructed, of whom we haue made mention in the beginning of this historie. They did beleue the immortalitie of the soule, & the resurrection of the body, and therefore they buried their dead with honour, and did graue F makes vpon their tombes, which did shew the forepassed life of the deceased: into whose tombes they did cast precious jewels, and brought meat and drinke thither, and many times their wiuers and seruants did shut them in there, & did willingly flauie themselves. They did punish adulterie with death, and did put out the eyes of the euees. Their childrens children, or some other of their bloud, did inherit their goods, and not their owne children, except those of kings. Men might take as many wiuers as they would, and did often marie their owne sisters. Thus among the seedes of pietie, humanitie, and policie, they had errors and blemishes, like sensuall people, which knew not the

Beginning of Atabalipa.

Manners of the people of Peru.

1533

the true God nor his justice. The which they did not measure by the perfect rule of nature, but according to their corrupt imaginations and their breeding, destitute of light and good gouernement. Through this defect they did worship the starres as gods, and especially an Idoll, which had its temple in the citie of Panacacami, who spake Oracles vnto them, and from whom they attended all their prosperities. It is the vsuall course of the Gentiles, to whom the mysteries of saluation are not reuealed, which are special graces. And had not these poore Perusians, vices in that regard, which were common with the auncient Egyptians, Grecians, Romans, and other such famous nations, who haue benee happily drawne from Paganisme to Christianitie, among whom the world hath seene so many goodly Churches to flourish, by the bountie of kings and Emperours, and by the doctrine, diligence, and exemplarie life of good bishops? But the Spaniards nor their commanders had no such intent, as their actions written doe witness.

It was sufficient for them to command these ignorant people proudly, to make profession of Christians, in assisting at the ceremonies, vpon paine of death, or seruitude. And it fell out often, I know not through what charitie, that many which for feare had caused themselves to be baptised, were by them instantly slaine, that they might haue no leasure to denie it: And thus, they sayed, they procured their soules health. These courses, which could not bee pleasing vnto God, drew his wrath vpon the heads of the Picardes, and their companions, who made miserable ends: for it was not long before Francis Picarte, and James of Almagra, fell into a great quarell for the gouernement of Peru, and so to ciuile warre, whereof followed their punishment and ruine: A worthie reward for their cruelties and rapes, as wee will hereafter shew. These two men haue benee the chiefe leaders and conductors of the enterprise of Peru, bothouldiers, but of obscure and base families: for Francis Picarte was a bastard, borne of an vnschaft woman, who had left him at the doore of a church at Trugillo, from whence a captain, called Gonsal of Nauarre, caused him to be taken, and to be bred vp at a ferme of his in the country, like a clowne: But being growne great, he ran away to Seulle, and so past to the Indies, where he got reputation: and being held for the sonne of the foresayd captain, there came vnto him three of his brethren, by the fathers side, Ferdinand Gonsaluo, and John Picarte, and a brother by the mothers side, called Francis Martin of Alcantara. As for James of Almagra, he was borne at Almagra, but of so obscure a father, as no man euer could leame his name. He was in like manner valiant, but hee and Picarte were both grosse witted, and so ignorant, as they could neither read nor write; fit men to conquer and destroy, but not to edifie and preferre, ambitious, and without gouernement, as they did relinque by their actions. Simon of Alcafaua, a fugitive of Portugal, was also sent to the Molucces by the Castilians; but through his owne importunities hee was slaine by his men, before hee came to the strait of Magellan.

Beginning of Francis Picarte and James of Almagra.

1534

Mulcy Hascen
king of Tunes disposeth by Barberousse, & restored by the Emperour.

Virtue fittest to advance a man.

Barberousse
brethren.

35 The Emperour being in Spaine, he was solicited by Mulcy Hascen, king of Tunes, who had benee disposeth by Haradin Barberousse, to restore him to his realme, promising to hold it of the Crowne of Spaine. This occasion was willingly embraced, as necessarie for the good of Christendome, and verie honourable for the Emperour in particular: for Haradin hauing succeeded his brother Horusco in the realme of Alger, he was growne into great fauour with Solyman the great Turke, who had made him generall of his galleys, and with whose forces he had seized vpon Tunes, threatening all the Princes and Potentates about the Mediterranean sea, both Christians and Mahometists. Although we haue formerly made some mention of these two famous pyrats, yet in my opinion, it will not be impertinent, if we relate more particularly what they were, and by what means they came to that greatness wherein our fathers haue seene them: reporting, vpon this occasion, some of their desperate enterprises, vpon the coast of Africke, where they began first to appeare; to the end that by this notable example they which haue fame for their only object, may know, that neither the nobilitie of the race, nor the vertue of predecessors, nor wealth, nor the seruices of Court, can bring men to great and eminent honours, but their owne industrie and valour: Horusco then, and Haradin, brethren, surnamed Barberousse, were borne in the country of Turkie, or Turcomania, which the aunci-

1534

A auncients called Cilicia, or Tarsis: Some say, they were borne in the towne of Metelin, in the island of Lesbos, whose father was a Christian, but he did not continue in it; a poore pyrat, or theefe robbing at sea: Their mother was a Spaniard, of the towne of Marchena, taken by this pyrat at sea, who held her for his lawful wife. Their first institution and breeding was in their fathers trade, vnder a pyrat called Camal, and afterwards they put themselves in pay with the Emperour of the Turkes, which was Selim, father to great Solyman. Being sent for a conuoy to a Treasurer, who went to pay the garriisons of Coran and Modon, townes of Morea, they stript him, and fled with the money: with which money hauing armed out a foist, or brigantine, they joynd with Crocut, being then pursued by Selim his brother. He being dead, they fled for feare of punishment, and went to sea: Their first prey was of two marchants ships of Siracusa in Sicile; with which boorie hauing furnished themselves better, it happened, that theeuing with too great assurance, they were taken by Peter Villorie, captain of the Popes galleys; but through bad gard, this taker was himselfe taken, and lost two galleys. Being thus fortified, and growne more cunning, they got such reputation, as in a short time Horusco, who was the elder, was acknowledged for head and conductor of all the pyrats vpon the coast of Barbarie, hauing for his lieutenants Haradin, his younger brother, and Sconderrais, their brother in law. In this fauour hee presumed to surpris the citie of Bugia, one of the best peopled in Africke, the which was then vnder the protection of the kings D. Ferdinand and D. Isabella, of Castille, and garded by a strong garriison of Spaniards: but his enterprise succeeded not; for being master of one of the three castles, or towers, which are in that citie, as he fought for the rest, he was repulsed, and forced to leaue his prey, with the losse of an arme, so as euer after hee wore one of siluer. Hauing sayled in this enterprise, he retired to Alger, the lord whereof was called Selim Beni Tami, whom he succoured, in shew, against a brother of his, who made warre against him, and then hee slue him in treason, vnder colour of friendship, making himselfe Lord of the towne.

This was no act of vertue, but of hardinesse and policie, the which is much esteemed in this later age. Hauing gotten Alger, he seized vpon the towne of Circule, by the D likemeans, the which is the auncient Carcena. Into this he put Scanderrais for gouernour, and leitt the gard of Alger to Haradin his brother, and continuing to molest the world, he did also seise vpon the rich towne of Tunes, situated betwixt Alger and Oran, the lord whereof hauing fled into Spaine, hee had perswaded cardinall Ximenes to send an armie of Spaniards into Africke, against this theefe, vnder Diego de Vera, who was defeated there, and lost about eight thousand men, as we haue noted in the precedent booke.

Horusco being putt vp with these good haps, he aspired to greater matters, and to make himselfe king of Tremessen, a great and mightie citie, and the chiefe in all Mauritania, sometimes called Cesarientis. To attaine vnto the which, he thought to helpe himselfe E with superstition, to the which the Moores and Arabians are more giuen than all the people of the earth, procuring certaine Morabites (which are religious hermits of Mahomet's sect) who (to bring the king of Tremessen in hatred of his subjects) gaue them to vnderstand, That he had secret acquaintance with the Christians, and that they should be all damned if they did not chafe him away: the which they did, with the helpe which Horusco Barberousse gaue them. To couer his designe, which was, to subdue them, he counsellled them to draw a nephew of the kings (whom they had chased away) out of prison, hauing benee long kept in yrons by him, and to make him king; the which they had a will to effect: But this tyrant, seeing them to proceed slowly, and hee impatient and blinded with ambition, slue this young prince, and sought to seise vpon the citie, in despight of the inhabitants, whereof he slue many of the principals, which was his ruine: for the dispossest king was called home, and had means to recouer his kingdome, with the forces of Spaine, which he obtained easily. He pursued his aduerlarie so, as he forced him to flee into the mountaine of Abez, vpon the confines of Bugia, & to shut himselfe in a castle, where being besieged, necessitie forced him forth to fight, where he was vanquished & slain, and his head caried to Tremessen & stö thence stitious.

Moores Super-

Religion a cloak for tyrants.

Zzzz iij

1534

into Spaine to the great contentment of the Moores and Spaniards, for he was a subtle and dangerous enemy: Pride growing through prosperitie ruined him: But Haradin governed himselfe more discreetly, and did manage his fortune with more honour. Thus we see, that those which hazard themselves in dangerous enterprises, doe most commonly miscarrie, and make such as follow after them wise by their rashnesse, to whom they haue made the way.

Haradin, by the death of his brother, remaining lord of Alger, one of the best ports of all Africke, he was no more held a pyrat, but a prince, and withall a great captain at sea: so as Sultan Solyman, Emperour of Constantinople, made his Bastia and his Admirall, with whose incomparable forces he made himselfe a terror to all the countries of Europe, Asia, and Africke, which lay vpon the sea; where hauing taken infinit booties, and spoyled many townes, in the end he made himselfe master of the citie and realme of Tunes, in the year 1535, by this occasion.

A little before there had reigned in Tunes Mahomet, descended from Abdul Hedi, who was a Moore of Andalusia, borne at Seuille; he was wise and discreet: and being made by the king of Maroc gouernour of the citie of Tunes, which had rebelled, and had bene taken againe and punished, he following the example of many others, had made himselfe lord of his gouernement, when as after the battell of Muradat in Spaine, woon by the Christians, there was a generall reuolt in Africke, against the Almohades, Emperours, and great Miralimuns of the Moores, and Alarabes at Maroc. This Mahomet, issued from this race, had had many children by many wiues, who seeing himselfe old, and desirous to provide a successor to his realme after his owne humor, for certaine considerations, he made choyce of the youngest of all, called Hascen, whom hee had by an Arabian woman, called Grazia, and would haue him succeed him to the Crowne. It is this Muley Hascen for whose restitution the Emperour was perswaded to lead an armie into Africke. This jealous prince was no sooner seated in the royall throne, but he put Mamon, his elder brother, to death, and after dispatcht all his other brethren and kinsmen: (these be the fruits of Polygamie, in the followers of Mahomet their Prophet) Arraxide onely escaped, and fled to Bixacara, a towne of Numidia, where, with the aid of certaine Xecques, or lords Numidians, hee gathered some forces together, to inuade Muley Hascen; but it was in vaine: wherefore he had recourse to Haradin Barberousse, king of Alger, who hauing receiued him courteously, aduised him to go with him to Constantinople, to informe the great Turke of his misfortunes; promising to present him vnto him, and to doe him all fauour and good offices. Being come to Solymans Court, Barberousse was presently dispatcht with a good number of gallies, well furnished with souldiers, to come to Tunes, giuing it out, that hee carried backe Arraxide, to make him king, who notwithstanding was stayed at Constantinople.

Muley Hascen, a paracide, couetous, voluptuous, iniurious, and a coward, amazed at this great preparation of armes, which came to assayle him, staid not, but fled to his kinsmen by the mothers side, Ismael and Doraz Alarabas, of the lineage of Vled Aixia, which are a member of Vled Yahya, of those which led a vagabond life in the plaines and deserts of Africke and Numidia: a mightie people, but disloyall, and of no friendship. Finding not such succours there as he expected, he followed the aduice of a Genouois renegado, called Ximaa, which was, to implore ayd of the Emperour Charles: and this Genouois was he which made a voyage into Spaine, who could so persuaide the Emperour, and season his request with liuelie reasons, and infinit promises, as he obtained that which he pretended, which was, To persuaide the Emperour and his counsel, that it was both profitable and necessary for him to restore Muley Hascen to his realme: Euery one weighing the importance of this businesse, and foreseeing how it might prejudice Italie and Spaine, if the Turkes, which did already hold many ports vpon the coast of Barbarie, should set footing into Tunes, a great and mightie citie, fit for the situation (which is neere vnto the ruines of old Carthage, sometimes concurring in power with the Romans) to make ordinarie and prejudiciall impressions in that State. Barberousse, who had found the place void of souldiers, or Commander, did easily seise vpon the towne, castle, and fort of Goulette, which

Abdul Hedi Remoue of the last king of Tunes.

1535

A which stands on the entrie of the lake which the Sea makes there. But hee did not thinke the Christians had taken this so ill, as hee found by experience, and therefore hee was not so carefull to provide all things necessarie to preferre such a conquest, against the power which the emperour brought: who as soone as this honorable enterprise was concluded, hee did aduertise all Christian princes, and invited them to contribute men, money, and ships to this warre, whether hee would goe in person. The rendez-mous was appointed at the port of Caillieri in Sardynia, whether the emperour came with the galleys of Spaine, those of Genoua, and the particular galleys of Andrew Doria. D. John king of Portugal sent him twenty galleys, and one great gallion, vnder the command of D. Lewis his Brother.

The Pope armed nine galleys at Genoua, at his owne charge, of the which Paul Iustini-an had the command, and Virgilio Vrsino, earle of Anguilare had the leading of the soldiers that were in them: And hee suffered him to leaue the tenths of the Clergie of Spaine. The knights of Malta sent foure galleys. All which ioyned at Caillieri, where (before the emperours comming) there arriued the royall galleys of Naples and Sicile, with many gallions and foists, armed by the noblemen of Naples and Sicile, at their owne charge, in which the Marques of Guast was transported with the old Spanish souldiers which he had drawne out of the garriisons of Italie. Thither also came many round and flat bottomed vessels, carrying victuals, munition, artillerie, horse, and a good number of foot, newly leuiued to that end in Spaine, Italy & Germany, so as there was found when this army weighed anchor, three hundred and sixtie saile, carrying besides the Court, the traine of noblemen, and many voluntaries, seuen hundred men at armes, two thousand light horse, and 12 thousand bisquos or new souldiers, siue thousand old souldiers, Spaniards, and sixe thousand Italian foot, & seuen thousand Lanquenets, men of experience. These forces being not lesse than forty thousand men, parted with a prosperous wind from the Illand of Sardinia, and came to land the siue and twentieth of Iune, this yere 1535, at a place called Port Farina, neere to the ruines of old Vitica, about sixe leagues distant from Tunes. There order was giuen by the emperour, for the landing of his men; the first were the old Spanish arquebuziers and the Italians, that they might keepe off the Moores, who had shewed themselves both horse and foot, to disturbe their landing, wherein the Marquess of Guast who was general of the foot, shewed great iudgement, for hee would not suffer the souldiers to leaue their standings and to pursue the enemy, vntill the army were landed with the victuals and munition, and the quarters made and fortified with a Trench: in the which they found great difficulty for that the sand was loose & not fit for that purpose, neither had they any bauiues or other matter to binde it with all. The army being lodged, the emperour called a Councell, where it was propounded, whether they shold first assault Goulette, or goe directly to fight with the enemy in Tunes, which was much more easie than that of Goulette: whereas attempting that fort first, being strong by situation, defended by valiant men, commanded by iudicious captaines, and hauing great store of artillerie, and which did most import, not being able to take their succours from them, neither by the lake, nor by land on the east part, either the action would proue desperate, and they shold consume their forces there in vaine, or at the least they shold spend so much time there, as not only Barberousse would grow stronger in men, & be of greater reputation; but the Christians campe being wonderfully afflicted with the violent heat of the Sunne in that region, and vnder that clymat, and, which did more import, the waters which they dranke being halfe salt, in short time being corrupted, would breed a great mortallitie, so as they should be forced rather to seeke to saue the reliques of their army, than to attempt any new enterprise. But the most iudicious shewing how dangerous it was to leaue such a fort as Goulette, with a great garriison, and so neere vnto Tunis behind, that the army aduancing, they should be in extreame want of victuals, the which not being able to be conducted but from the army, the enemies horse being many and venturous, scouring the fields continually, would at the least force the Christians to keep the greatest part of their horse and of their best foot, to gard their victuals which were ingaged. It was therefore resolued first to attempt Goulette: which fort Barberousse had furnished with great care: it is a great square Tower, with large rampers and flankers, and is set vpon the mouth or entrie

of

Forces of the Emperour at his going to Tunes.

Councell held by the emperour
for the besegging of Goulette.

Goulette the fort.

1535

Forces of Barberousse in Tunis.

of the Lake, which extends from it vnto the Citie, and is foure leagues broad: G (Campana writes that it is twelue miles long, and fūe miles broad.) The Citie of Tunes was great and well peopled, but at that time the walles were weake and low, hauing three suburbs open, greater and farre better peopled than the towne, in the which there dwelt many kindes of Merchants, some of the most industrious Artizans, and among them some other rich people, who were delicate and idle. For the gard of these places, Barberousse had about eight thousand good souldiers, whereof he had put a good part into the fort of Goulette (some write they were three thousand men) commanded by Sinan Cessut of Simima, called the Jew, and Agid, surnamed Chafedimels. The rest were with Barberousse, who had also leued great numbers of Moores and Alarabes, both horse and foot, whome hee sent, or led himselfe continually to the warre, and made continuall skirmishes to molest the emperours campe, to hinder the approaches, and the batterrie which was planted against this fort, the which they must force and take before they came vnto the citie, vnlesse they would bee betwixt two enemies, subiect to the great and ordinarie fallies of either of them, especially of the Moores, who ouerrunning the countrie, which was well knowne to them, might hinder the victuals, surpriseth them that went to forrage, seeking about all things water, which is rare in that countrie, and take from them the commoditie of the sea, if they had gone farre, and left this fort standing, and so had ruined the imperiall armie. Whilest they are buile at this worke, and about fūe weekes after the emperours arriuall, Muley Hassen I creeps out of his holes, and comes vnto the campe (hauing had a good conuoye sent vnto him) with two hundred horse, or there abouts, Moores, illattired and ragged, mounted vpon geldings or mares, peasantlike clownes. Hauing saluted the emperour, and kindly receiued by him, they conferred long together by truchmen, but they soone discouered that this Prince had neither friends nor meanes, although hee vaunted that hee had left, not farre from thence, sixteene thousand horse Alarabes, and eight hundred camels laden with victuals and refreshings, of the which they neuer saw head nor taile, assuring impudently that hee had great intelligences within the Towne, with the chiefe inhabitants, who notwithstanding neuer made any signe that they would fauour him.

Thus the winde carried away all the goodly promises, which his embassador had made in Spaine to the emperour, for he kept not any one, were it through inconstancy or impossibilitie. Notwithstanding the emperour continued constant in his resolution, to chase away Barberousse, and to restore this exiled king, to the possession of his realme, for he had made no account to be assisted by the Moores, and had beene drawne vnto this enterprise more for his owne priuate interest, then for any other consideration, and therefore hee was come well provided. Notwithstanding all the attempts of the Barbarians, Goulette was battered by land with forty peeces of ordinance planted in two batterries, and by sea with about 200, for the galleys being put into squadrons, whilest that one approached to discharge, the other retired to charge their peeces, and so they continued from the break of day vntill L noone, whilest that the two batterries at land thundred continually. The which did so ruine the tower, as the greatest part off falling, it couered or made most of the ordinance, within it vnprofitable: The ruines of the tower had made the way easie for an assault, so as the Spaniards, Italians, and Germanes being put in order, one nation after another, at their time appointed they presented themselves with ladders to the assault with so great resolution, as al the defence of the moors & Turkes was in vain, so as a great part of them were slaine or wounded fighting, neither was the slaughter lesse of them that fled along the lake, or that sought to escape by swimming, for they were slaine by the shot, or thrust through by the Germanes pikes, if they came neere the shore, so as it was reported there died about 1500, and not without the losse of some men of worth among the Christians, yet Campana writes there were not about thirty slaine. Goulette being taken it was brutted that they had taken 300 peeces of ordinance, & all *Barberousse*es fleet which was in the chanel of the lake; the number whereof is diuerly reported, some write 20 galleies, 20 galliots, and fūe soyfts, others fūentie & two, and some affirme they were 107. Three daies after the taking of this fort Fernad Gonfago came vnto the camp, who hauing certain

Goulette taken by the emperour

1535

Ferdinand Gorgega comes to Goulette to the emperour.

Council of the Imperialists to continue the warre of Naples.

A vessels appointed him by the viceroy of Sicile, brought many refreshings, for the which but especially for his owne valour, hee was joyfully receiued by the emperour, and by the whole army. There grew now some diuersitie of opinions touching the continuance of the warre, some cold flegmatike complexions, were of opiuiou the emperor should rest satisfied with the taking of Goulette, which was held impregnable, the which hee should fortifie and furnish with a great garrison, and good prouision of victuals to liue and defend it, with a designe to returne the next yere to besiege Tunes, Alger, and the other townes vpon that coast of Afrike. Their reasons were grounded vpon the great difficulties which the army did then suffer, in their drink, whereas the scorching sun did cause great thirst, and did force the poore souldiers to drink the pit water which was verie salt, which bred many infirmities, & many died of it, wherefore seeing the army much diminished by the former enterprises, and hearing that the enemy grew daily stronger, & that he did shortly expect a great number of Arabias, which he had hired, they perswaded the emperor that he might with his honor return into Europe, & prepare, as we haue said, for the next yere. But this was contrarie to the greatnes of *Cesar*s minde, who discouered with better reasons the weaknes of his enemy hauing lost Goulette; the little confidence the Turkes had in the Arabians & Moors, & the good disposition of the Christian army, especially after so great a victory, the which although it were diminished in numbers, yet it was increased in courage and resolution, so as Barberousse should haue means to furnish himself better for the next yere, & to obtaine greater forces from the Turk, to defend his possession in Afrike, the conquest whereof (which was not now vnpossible, besides it was not for the dignitie of so great an army, honoured with the presence of the Christian Emperour, to goe away contented with the taking of a Tower. The captaines of greatest resolution and experience were of the same opinion, the which was maintained by Muley Hassen with great reasons, who discouered particularly of the nature of that nation, of the designs of Barberousse, and of remedies for the thirst, perswading them to the enterprise of Tunes, and of the easinesse to take it, affirming that the enemy would neuer be drawne to a battell, neither had hee meanes to keepe the citie many daies: His reasons were beleued, and although his desire to returne into his realme, with the hazard of another, made him to be the lesse credited, yet the authoritie and will of the emperor, who was the authour of this counsell, did confirme it. Barberousse on the other side was wonderfully grieved for the losse of Goulette, so as hee could not forbear to complaine of Sinan the Jew, who might haue escaped, flying away with his men, from so great a daunger, in the which hee had lost many Ianisaries, and other good souldiers. It is written that Barberousse was once in an humour to haue slaine all the Christian slaues that were found there, the which for his better securitie, being diuers thousand, he had already imprisoned in the castle: and that Sinan the Jew, and others of authority had diuerted him from that wicked and cruell resolution, shewing him, that so foule and brutish a fact, would not onely bee a perpetuall blemish to his name, but also bring him into disgrace with Solyman, who was a generous Prince, and hated all such base and wicked actions, as that would be, to kill people who being in a trait prison, neither had nor could offend him. Being then dissuaded from these cruel imaginations which rage & greefe for his former losse did suggest, he began to provide for the rest, taking counsell of such as were about him what was to be done for their common health, with this resolution still, to keepe himselfe close, and to defend the citie, and not to come to battell with the enemy, hoping that in Autumne they should be forced to leaue that coast, & it might be their fleet would be beaten, & dispersed with stormes. The emperor being not freed from that feare, was carefull to haue the ruines of the fort of Goulette repaired, whereof he gaue the charge to Andrius Daria, with his sea-forces, F who caused it to bee cleansed from the infection of dead bodies, which were found there, both men and beasts, and the breaches to be raised: Hee tooke an Inuentorie of all the goods that were in it, where were found (as we haue said) three hundred peeces of ordinance, great and small; great store of ammes of all sorts, with an incredible quantitie of victuals, powder, and all other munition, Engines, and implements necessarie for the defence of places.

The

Forces of Barberousse in Tunes.

Battell betwixt the Christians & Barberousse in Affricke.

Barberousse flies into Tunes.

Christian slaues seize vpon the Castle of Tunes.

The emperor seeing all things in a readinesse, hee commanded euerie souldier shold carrie a bottle, full of water taken out of the prouision of the nauie, hee marche that way the twentieth of Iuly. Comming within fve miles of the citie, they found certaine welles of fresh water, which bred great disorder among the souldiers, who were verie greedy to drinke, so as the emperor was forced to come thither in person, to stay the souldiers greedy rage, who desired rather to drinke and die presently, as many did, for that the enemy had poisoned the waters, than to suffer a little, & to preserve themselves at the least to die fighting. Having past this danger with no final difficulty, they discovered Barberousse's armie, who was come forth of the citie, in shew to giue the emperor battell. The number of his army is diuersly set downe: Ylla writes that he had 70000 moors and Arabians, and 7000 Turkes, whereof two thousand serued on horsebacke, and Gualazzo affirms that he had twelue peeces of ordinance in front: others write that by the report of some Christian slaues, who had seene him take view of his men two daies before, he had 20000 horse, and about 100000 foot, moors and Arabians, besides his Turkes, vpon whom hee did chiefly relie. The two armies being in sight one of another, and it being generally beleued by the Christians that they should fight, their captains sought to incourage them with good words, notwithstanding that they were all verie ready and willing: the prince of Saleme made a speech vnto the Italians, Alarcon to the Spaniards, and Eberstine to the Germanes, and to all the nations the emperor himselfe, who going among them all, promised them a certain victorie, and filled them all with an assured hope, & importunate desire to charge the enemy, who stretching themselves out in length, thought to terrifie, disorder and put the Christians to flight. Barberousse had staied within three miles of Tunes, who began as soone as euer the imperial armie approached to discharge his artilerie, but without any great effect: On the other side D. Fernand Gonzaga, who serued that day without any charge, but being among the foremost, charged the enemies, and slue a Captaine of the Moores with his lance, making such a slaughter of the enemies, as hee was that day noted about the rest: Hee was nobly followed by others, and the Spanish Harquebuziers did so gall the Barbarians with their shot, as hauing scarce begun to fight they basely fled: neither did Barberousse shew any courage that day, who had no intent to hazard his life and state vpon a battell, but to flie speedily into the Citie.

There was no great slaughter of the enemy in this action, for that they fled presently, besides the Christians horsemen could not pursue them being but weake, and much lesse might the foot men do it, being tyred with their march in the sand, and with the extreme heat: wherefore the emperor lodged his army that night vpon the place whereas Barberousse had stood in battell, fortifying it with the carts of his baggage, yet standing alwaies ready in armes being so neare his enemy. Barberousse being returned into Tunes, full of disdain for this disgrace, being a proud man, he consulted what was to be done, seeming verie confident to be able to defend the citie: and then he entred againe into a resolution to murder the Christian slaues, and hee was againe dissuaded by his own people: God disappoynting so wicked a counsel, to make the Christians victorie more easie, for this pretended crueltie of Barberousse being bruted abroad, it did moue two renegados to compassi- on, Gieffer Aga, and Meni, the first was borne in Cataro, and was called Vinsenza, the second a Spaniard, whose name was Francisco, who was much fauored by Barberousse. They opening the prison doores to these wretches, who some write were sixe thousand, some ten thousand, and they hauing broken their chains, wherewith they were bound, got slaues and such other weapons, & became masters of the Castle, driuing away those few Turkes that were left there in gard, and with all they seized vpon the treasure, victuals, & armes, which Barberousse had left there: who being aduertised thereof, posted presently thither, seeking first by good words, and then by threats to be let in, but it was in vaine, they chafing him away with reproches, and the hazard of his life, if hee had staied.

All this hapned the day after the Battell, the emperor preparing to draw neere the towne, when as those slaues sought to make signes vnto him to approach, but the distance would not suffer them to be seene, and yet the emperor finding that there was some alteration, he sent two companies of horse to discover it. In the meane time Barberousse finding himselfe in bad termes, and fearing the inconstancie of the Moores, heere-
solved

A souldier to leaue the citie, by the gate next the mountaine, and went towards Bona, being followed by seuen thousand Turkes whom hee had persecuted to serue him at need: The Christian army marching towards Tunes, they were met vpon the way by the Embassadors of the citie, who offered to yeeld vnto the emperor, and to receiue what conditions he should impose, so as he would secure them from sacke, wherein some write that Muley Hascen intreated the emperor: so as at the emperours first entrance into Tunes, the souldiers carried themselves mildly: But soone after as some affirme, at the instigation of Muley Hascen, who desired to be reuenged of the inhabitants, which did not seeme to fauour him during the siege, the Spaniards fell to the spoile, vying all kinde of excessie and acts of hostilitie, as if they had bene in a towne taken by force, and assault. The Germanes also slue many Moores, and fell to their feeding, being forrie they found no wine in their sellers, for those people drunke not any.

The sacke continued foure and twentie houres, some write three daies, together, with great slaughter, and then it ceased, the emperor commanding euery man vpon greuous paines, to retire vnto his quarter. They say that this sacke was not much lesse than that of Rome, and that euerie souldier was rich. The Marquesse of Guast guided by a slaue, found thirty thousand ducats, buried in a caue of the castle, wherewith acquainting the emperor, he gaue him them. The emperor lodged within the Castle which was reasonably well built, and newly accommodated by Barberousse. There were great numbers of slaues found, whereof there were eightie and one Frenchmen, all which were set at libertie, apparelled and sent home vpon the retreat of the army. There was found in it much ancient armor gulte & grauen, which some thought were the spoiles of the French armie, which Saint Lewis had sometime led into that countrie, where hee dyed, and many of his armie, of the bloody flir. The emperor hauing remained some daies within the citie, and conferred diuers times with king Muley Hascen, touching his future gouernment and agreed vpon conditions, according to the which these arxe princes and their subiects should liue, traffike, and conuerse together, hee returned to the campe, making the more haft to depart, to the end that such as were fled into the mountaines might returne without feare to their houes. The armie was lodged close about a village called Lut, de, two miles from Goulette, where there past a little brooke of fresh water, whereof the countrie was much destitute, which was the greatest discomfortie they had in all this warre: from thence they went to the first lodging they had made before the taking of that fort, neere vnto a Tower which they called of waters, which was the common watering place of the countrie. Thither came Muley Hascen to the emperor to confirm and sweare the articles, which were these.

- 1 That king Muley Hascen did confesse and would acknowledge, for him & his successors kings of Tunes, that hauing bene chased out of his estate, he had recovered it by the grace of God, and by the arms and vertue of the emperor Charles king of Spaine, who had taken Goulette, an impregnable fort, and chased away his enemy Haradin Barberousse.
- 2 That in regard of so great a fauour, he shold set at libertie, all the Christians of what age, sexe, or condition soeuer, that were detained prisoners within his realme, what offences soeuer they had committed, without punishment, price or ranome; and that from thenceforth there should not any of the emperours subiects, nor of his brothers D. Ferdinand king of Romans, be made slaues within the realme of Tunes.
- 3 That it should be lawfull for al Christians to traffike at Tunes, and places depending thereon, stay, inhabit, purchase lands, build chappels & churches, & exercise their religion.
- 4 That the moors of Spain which had receiued the baptisme of Christ shold not be receiued into the realm of Spain, if they did not shew letters of permissio from the emperor or his successors kings of Spain, or from their lieutenants, viceroies, or Magistrates.
- 5 That Muley Hascen did resigne vnto the emperor and his successors kings of Spaine, all the right which hee had to any towne of Affricke, places and Islands held then by Barberousse and the Turkes to enioy them in propriety, if they did conquer them.
- 6 That Goulette, and two miles of the countrie round about, shold remaine in soueraigntie to the kings of Spaine, who might put in any garrison, and fortifie it as they pleased.

7 That the inhabitants of Goulette, and the territorie about it, & the souldiers of the G garrison should bee free both by sea and land, from all imposts and customes for that which they should buy for their own vse, and if they traded in Merchandize, they should bee vsed like to them of the country.

8 That they of Goulette should not bee hindered to receiue the tolles and customes of the kings of Tunes.

9 That to entertaine the garrison of Goulette, the kings of Tunes should pay vnto the gouernours twelue thousand crownes yearly, at two payments, in August and Februarie.

10 That the fishing for corall and the trade thereof, should bee referred for the emperou, and his successors, kings of Spaine, to dispose at their pleasures.

11 That in acknowledgement of the benefits done by the emperor to Muley Hafsen, hee and his successors should honour the kings of Spaine for ever, as their Patrons and protectors, and for an homage of that protection, they should bee bound to giue them euery yeare fixe faire horses, and twelue exquisite faulcons, the which he should deliuer into the hands of the gouernour of Goulette, the three and twentieth of August, vpon paine to lose fifty thousand crownes for the first time he should faile, and for the second a hundred thousand, and if they should continue to neglect this duty, to forfeit their realme to the king of Spaine, who might iustly dispose of them.

12 That vpon the like paine the kings of Tunes should not make any leagues nor alliances with any princes or states, Christians or Mahumetists, to the preiudice of the emperou or his successors.

13 That there should no entrance bee giuen, in the ports of the realme of Tunes, to any Pyrats, or robbers at Sea, commod enemies, not to the priuate enemies one of another.

14 Lastly that there should be good, sincere & perpetuall friendship, & free commerce maintained, betwixt these Princes and their subiects, and right & iustice mutually done.

These articles were sworne and signed in this forme reciprocally in the emperours campe neere vnto Goulette, the thirteenth day of August, in the yeare of Christ 1535, and in the yeare 942 of Mahumet, the fixt day of the moone of the month Cafa.

King Muley Hassen taking the othe drew out halfe his Cymiter, & touching the blade hee swore by the prophet Mahumet, and by the Alcaron, that hee would faithfully ob-serue all the contents thereof, and neuer breake them: and the emperor swore and promised the same, kissing his right hand, and taking hold of a cloake which a knight of Saint James there present did weare, on the which there was a crosse, he kist it also. And of this contract there were foure copies made, two in the Spanish, and two in the Arabian tongue, respectiue kept and carried by the officers and Secretaries of these princes.
There was also added to the said articles:

That from that time there should bee a supreme Iudge and Councell in Goulette, the which in the emperours name should iudge without appeale, of all ciuill and criminall causes, where any of his Majesties subiects should be a partie, traffiking or going into any countrie of the realme of Tunes: And in regard of the towne of Africke then held by the Turkes, if it came by any means into the power of the kings of Tunes, the emperor and his successors kings of Spaine should dispose thereof as they should thinke good. For witnesses to the said accord & articles, there were set downe for the emperor Xscholas Perenot seignior of Granuelle, doctor Fernand of Gueuara, and Anthony Peres, counsellors of State; And for the king of Tunes, Alcar Gomeis Mahumet of Tunes, Hamet Gamaza, and Abder Heymin Maier his counsellors, kinsmen, and officers.

This done Muley Hassen retired to Tunes, and the emperor gaue order for his returne. He had a great desire to serpon the towne of Africke, which lies right against Sicile, & was verie comodious, for the Turkes which held it, to make enterprises, but seeing Autumne approach, which flints vp the Seas for Gallies, hee deferred it to an other season. Hee left D. Bernardine of Mendosa, brother to the Marquesse of Mon-dejar gouernor of Goulette, with a thousand Spaniards, of the old bids. He sent Andrew Doria, along the western coast, to learne what was become of Barberousse, and to watch what Emperours returned from Tunes.

A what he would undertake, who found that at his dislodging from Tunes he had retired to Bone, and that hauing some notice of *Doria*s approach with forty gallies, he had left the place voyde, whereon Doria seized without any difficulty; who by the Emperours commandement put a garrison into the castle, and left the towne at the disposition of the king of Tunes, thinking that the Moores inhabiting there would maintaine themselves in peace better vnder his obedience. There is a suburbe at Tunes without the port called Bethelmenara, containing about a thousand houtholds, where there dwelt certaine Christians, called by reason of that suburbe Rubbattins, whose predecessours had bin brought thither by Ioseph Almanzor king, and Caliph of Marroe, ruler ouer all Africke, some 300 yeres since. Of those which made profession of the Christian religion, the kings of Tunes did commonly make the gardes of their persons, for most of them made profession of armes: and carried the countenance of gentlemen; they held lands by homage of the king, and were rich. The Emperour carried some of these Rubbattins into Europe, and did them good. Hee dismissed the infant D. Lewis of Portugall from Tunes, with his gallies, and did witness by his letters vnto king John his brother, that in this voyage hee had giuen great proofes of his iudgement and valour, and with this opportunitie he sent some of the noblemen and youth, which had accompanied him, into Spaine.

Barberousse flying from Tunes, being come from the river of Maggiordech, one of his chiefe pirates called Aidno of Smime, being very drie, drunke of that water and burst. At C his coming to Bone, he drew 14 gallies vnurnished out of a neere lake, which had been kept there for the like need, and hauing sodenly caused them to be armed, and all things ready to goe forth, fearing to meet with the emperours armie, he had caused that port to be fortified, but it appearing not, he went towards the East, meaning first to be reuenged of the Christians in some sort: wherefore hauing passed to Alger, and there provided for his affaires, and furnished his army well, he sailed towards the Iland of Minorca, where comming neere vnto the port of Maone, he set vp certain Christian flags which hee had taken the yeare before: the Ilanders thinking it to be a part of the Emperours armie, received them ioyfully; where afterwards they tooke great spoiles of goods and people:
hee sackt a shipp of Portugall there, and slew Gonsaluo Perdis the captaine after a long D fight: and so retiring with his prey to Alger, he set saile towards Constantinople.

The Emperour hauing dismissed part of his army from Goulette, he passed with the rest into Sicile, where he landed at Trapani, from whence he came to Palermo the thirteenth of September, where he made a solemne entrie: soone after they of the Iland made him a present of two hundred and fiftie thousand crownes, as well for the charges he had bin at, as for the preparation he meant to make the next yeare against Barberousse, whom he desired to chase out of Africke, especially from Alger. Going out of Sicile, hee past from Messina to Naples, which city he had not seene: in his voyage hee was sumptuously re-ceiued as well by the whole state, as by priuate princes his subiects, especially by the princes of Bisignuno and Salerno, vntill he came to Naples, where being royally receiued, that noble citie, the head of that kingdom, would not faile to make an extraordinary demonstration of their loue vnto their prince; so as on the third day of Februarie one thousand five hundred thirtie and fix they resolved in the monastrie of Saint Laurence, the Emperour being present, to giue him a million and five hundred thousand ducats, the which was speedily effected.

During the emperours absence D. Isabella the empress was gouernesse in Spaine as she had alwaies beene, with a councell of state appointed to assist her: by whose aduice and order D. Guttiere de Vargas Bishop of Plaisance caused a flecte of five shippes to be finished, the which had beene long before vnderaken, in the presence of D. John then prince of Portugall, who was come in pilgrimage into Castille. These shippes being well furnished were sent vnto the Moluques of the which onely one past the streit of Magellan, which discovered the shoare of that continent, from the going out of the streit vnto Arcequipa 25 degrees from the Equinoctiall.

36 After the emperours returne from Tunes to Naples, a new warre being kindled betwixt him and the French king, by reason of the duke of Sauoy, the Emperours brother in law, whom the French sought to spoile of his estate. Hee was not able to resist fo-
A a a a a

Bone in Africke taken by Andrew Doria.

Rubbattins Christians at Tunes.

Minorca strik-
ed by Barberousse.

Emperour comes into Sicile.

1536
Gift of the realme of Naples to the em-perour.

Shippes sent out of Castille to the Moluques.

Emperours voyage into Presternce.

potent

potent an enemy, and therefore he had recourse vnto the emperor for aid; who hauing gathered together a goodly army, consulted with his captains of the manner how he should make warre, whether he should stay in Piedmont, and recouer that which the French had taken from the Sauoiard, of which opinion the marquisse of Graft & D. Fernand of Gonzaga were, who alledged some reasons to maintaine their opinion, or that he should passe presently into Prouence, & leaue such forces to recouer Piedmont as should be thought fit, the which Anthony de Lena and Andrew Doria, did maintaine, but especially the emperor himselfe, who was confident for the enterprise of Prouence, and to that end he made an eloquent Oration vnto his Councell, in these termes.

Oration made by Charles the first vpon his passage into Prouence.

If the war we vndertake, & the enemy against whom we are to fight, were not known vnto vs, & withal, we were not assured in our felues that we should bring this war to a good end, without doubt we should not blame this your councell, or, to speak more properly, consideration; but should rather commend it, and follow it. But knowing that we make war against one that hath broken his faith, a perfidious man, who hauing no regard that the duke of Sauoy was comprehended in the treatie of Cambray hath made war against him, the which he knew to be against vs; we doubt not but God the iust Iudge of a violated peace, and of the breach of faith, will take a seuerer reuenge.

I will adde thus much more, that we shall warre against the same enemy, ouer whom we haue bin victorious for these 20 yeares: by which victories (to proue against that which you haue said that we haue wonne, & that they may confesse they haue lost,) we hold still the duchie of Milan, a glorious remembrance, & a rich spoile of our vanquished enemy; the which should giue hope and courage to you that be winners, and feare and dispaire to them. Besides, let vs compare our forces with our enemies, we shall find ours to exceed them both in number and valour: we see no such danger as you pretend, although we diuide our army, passe the Alpes, & go into France to assaile our enemy. But to answer first vnto this, & then to returne vnto our former proposition: It is not vnknown, and we can proue it by examples, how many being afflicted with warre in their owne estates, haue freed themselves by transporting the war into their enemies countries, & haue made conquests of their aduersaries states: But in our case we will rather ground vpon firme and sound reasons, than vpon examples, the which can hardly be found equal in all circumstances. You are of opinion, that before we transport the war into France, we should chase the enemy out of Piedmont, so as there may be no reliques remaying: and we on thother side, induced by many reasons, hold it much better, that passing into France we transport the warre thither, rather than to nourish it in our owne and our friends country, and maintaine it in Italie, the which hath bene so many yeares afflicted, and therefore it is reason we should preferue it, and giue it some time of rest, after so great and tedious miseries: so as it hauing felt for these 30 yeares, by means of the French, those miseries which do accompany war, let France in like manner tast of spoiles, burning, rapes, let it tast of feare, terrour, amazement and flight of citizens, let it make proofe of the sacking of houses, desolations, ruines, and the burning of cities. It fittes not to haue the cite of Turin, or the country of Piedmont the reward of our victories, but Paris, yea the very Crowne of France. We haue too long suffered that king, to make war in anothers country. I pray you let vs make him labour to defend his owne dominions, and let vs trie if the French be as much worth at home as abroad. But it may be their nature and disposition is not well known vnto you, whom you haue so often known by experience: At the first charge they are somewhat worth, but after some resistance, they faint, and loose their force: Besides, we haue knowne that king to haue bin off so great a mind (we will not say so rash) as he will hold it a great dishonor to suffer vs to enter and remain in his confines without giuing vs battell: The which if he do, who is there among you that wil doubt of a victory? Hold this for certain, that there is no other means to end the war, but that either he must adde Spaine and the empire, to that which he now enioyes; or we conquer the realme of France to our other possessions: for the effecting whereof we come to seek him in the bowels of his owne realme. We must not grow old here, expecting when he should come, and giue him means to preferue his owne country, from whence he is continually supplied with money, whereby he entertaines his armie here at our cost, who enrich themselves

A felues with spoile of those things, which should serue to pay our souldiers. And for that which you feare, that the French king may leuy new souldiers more commodiously, there is nothing more impossible to do; nor more vaine to speake, for that in bringing an armie hither, it drawes new souldiers with the hope of spoile, being accustomed to theale and winne in a Country wonne by the sword; the which without doubt they cannot doe in France: for being kept in Martiall discipline by the king, the respect of the countrey binding them, they will hold themselves for aduenturers, when it is halfe lawfull for them to liue with their owne pay, though hardly: so as few will expose themselves to wounds and death, for the miserable gaine of an ordinarie pay: and if the souldiers will seeke to haue it augmented, they must afflict the people, so as what the enemy can not get by warre, the companies will iniuriously take away, they will spoile the victualles and diminish the treasure, raising tumults, seditions and rebellions, and the rabble, if the matter proceed in such sort; as the king himselfe be the cause of this spectacle, wherein wee shall see a manifest example of Gods iudgements. And so hee which hath so often afflicted anothers countrey with fire, sword and spoile, shall be now forced, ruining and burning his owne countrey, not only to beare it, but also to do it himselfe. But me thinks I heare some of you feare, that he wil do that before our army arriues, whereunto he shall be forced. This should not moue you, neyther can there be any thing to hinder vs; but wee should abound in victuals, hauing provided for it; so as piercing into the heart of France, we shall haue great abundance, and without any charge. As for your doubt, that the king will gather forces together on this side the Alpes whilst that we are in France; and this country destitute of souldiers: we assure you that we haue provided him so much worke in other places, as he can hardly bend his thoughts to any other business: for that besides this army which will make him oppose all the vigour and force he hath, and another, which it may be you haue heard of shall be led by Nassau and Boissac to invade the confines of Picardy: there is yet a third which should come and ioine with vs in Prouence, the which at the enterprise intreaty, our people of Spaine haue leui'd: and to that end, we haue sent 23 gallies thither, & one with a particular commission, to informe her of my intention, & of the prefixed time of my voyage: we haue also taken order that an other shall be made ready, the which during the hottest of the war, passing through Champagne, shall invade Burgundy, and with the help of some of those two provinces, which are affected vnto vs, that army will worke no lesse effects than either of the other three. So as the king being thus busied in many places, and with such great preparations of war, hauing no means to leuy at one instant sufficient forces to resist so great a masse of armies, it can not be but on some side we shal pierce into the bowells of his realme, let him prepare what army he can. Let vs not feare to diuide our forces; let vs leaue what shal be fit for the siege of Turin, & the rest which we shall lead with vs shal be able to vanquish him fighting specially, if (as you haue propounded) he shal think to diuide his forces, to man those places which he meanes to fortifie against vs. Adde (the which you know as well as my selfe) what the French footmen are, whereas they desire to be more esteemed for their horsem, which indeed they practise more, & proue better; at this time they are much vnurnished. It is not vnknown vnto you, that at Fossan & Conflans we haue spoild them of 250 horse of seruice; there are 200 now in Turin which can not hope for any better successe: and of the other companies which came hither, halfe of them are consumed with the toile. So as they are not to fight with that old caualerie of France, but with some reliques thereof: Besides, they hauing heretofore wholly relied vpon the German footmen and the Switzers, they thought to haue what numbers they pleased, we doe assure you that thow whom they thought to haue what numbers they pleased, we doe assure you that thow row the helpe of God; and our diligence, they shal not haue any concealing what means we haue used to cause a good number of them that were with him to abandon him: And from the Switzers we haue gotten a firme promise (wherein we suppose they wil not faile) not to suffer any one to go out of the country to serue any Prince. Matters standing vpon these termes, let vs continue constant in our first resolution: that we leaue a conuent-army for the recovery of Turin, and that we passe into France with the rest, and with such men as shal be leui'd in Italie, & nothing stay'd by those difficulties which you haue wisely considered, we may go by the riuer of Prouence. As for the difficulties which you 1536 haue propounded touching the entrance, we will never suffer the French to deprime vs of G that honor, to haue endured it more constantly than we. Concerning victualles, there is sufficient provided, which shall be brought by sea, with the artillerie, munition, and other necessities, which otherwise would be very chargeable. Finally, the intemperance of the aire, which it seemes you feare in Provence, I hold it not worse than that of Africke, the which our souldiers haue constantly endured. And therefore all duly considered, I do not see why we should rather feare danger, than glorie in this victory, hauing to deale with an enemy who is vnprovided of valiant men.

Army of Charles the fifth going into Provence.

After this speech the enterprise was concluded, and preparation made accordingly, they write that the emperor had in his army 24000 Germans, 14000 Spaniards, 12000 Italiás & 5000 horse. The marques of Guast was general of the foot, the D. of Alua was general of the men at armes, and D. Fernand of Gonzague, of the light horse. How they entered, & what they did in this enterprise, you may read at large in the French history.

The prince D. Philip of Spaine, being now tenne yeares old, gaue great signes of wisdom and sufficiency hereafter, to gouerne those realmes, whereunto hee was borne an hereditarie successor. And to make his studies the more easie, they appointed him for his Scholemaster Iohn Martin Silueo a man not onely very learned, but of an innocent life, whose maxims did afterwards make him archbishop of Toledo and cardinal. D. Iohn of E. stuniga or Zuniga, a knight of great wisdom and iudgement, and commander maior of Castille, was made his gouernour: and to giue him an honourable Competitor in all his studies, and a sweet companion in that tender age, two yeres before D. Lewis his cousin, the eldest sonne of Sauoy, had passed out of Italie into Spaine: But this yong prince of great hope died this yeare on Christmase day at Madrid, to the great griefe of the prince D. Philip, who loued him dearly, and of the whole court, in the 13 yeare of his age.

Lewis prince of Sauoy dies in Spaine.

India. Exploits of the Portugalls.

37 I will now relate something of the progresse of the Portugalls nauigations at the east Indies, and how the Turkes came and besieged them in Diu, a towne which the Portugalls had so fortified, as they neither feared the fraud nor force of that barbarous and inconstant nation. But the better to vnderstand the war which was brought thither this yeare by the Turke, wee will make a repetition of some things that went before. In the yeare 1532 the king of Portugall had sent Nuncio d. Augusna general to the Indies, who hauing a desire to get footing in the realme of Cambaia, hee sent Antonio Silueria with a great army, to discouer that riuer, and to informe himself wel what might be expected. This capitaine made great proofes of his valor in that country, spoiling and burning some townes, and striking a great terror into that people of the Portugalls name. It followed after that the Balcia of Egypt, called Soliman by commandement from Soliman the great Turk, who could not quietly indure the Portugalls good successe at the Indies, whereby his kingdomes had received so great losse, being disappointed of the nauigation for spices, and other merchandise from the east, the which were brought by the Arabic gulph, vnto the ports of Egypt, and so distributed by his merchants ouer all Europe; he sent 2 Sangiaes, Mustapha and Sasar treasure of that province to take Aden, a strong towne with a port in the said gulph. Whilst that the Turkes labored to take city, being valiantly defended by the king, it hapned that Antonio Silueria scouring those seas with a fleet of Portugall ships, he heard of the Turkes attempt, and not pleased they should extend their forces beyond Egypt, he bent his course that way, whose arrival did so terrify the Turkes, being grieu'd of that conquest, & growne strong by the numbers that were come vnto them in hope of prey, as they dislodged. After which Silueria put the King in mind of the fauour he had done him, and did so magnifie the force & power of king John of Portugal, as he drew him to put himself vnder his protection, so as he should alway defend him against the Turke, for acknowledgement whereof he should pay a yereley tribute of 10000 crownes to the king of Portugall, or as they say, Serafini, money of Ormuz: But this Barbarian did not keep his faith long, for Silueria being gone, there came a ship lad with pepper to the port of Aden, the which he spoiled, & treacherously slue the men. There hapned woe after the Turkes flight, who being 600, and about 1000 Arabians, vnder the name Mustapha & Sasar, and in the same ships, they went to seek their reuenge by those riuers, so as comming to Diu at such time as Nuncio d. Augusna the Portugall gouernor was there, with a great armie

Nuncio d. Augusna affailes Diu in vaine.

A of about 300 fail wel furnished, with an intent to get that cite, hauing seized vpon a strong Island called Betelem, not much about 7 leagues from Diu, they were a great aide to Torcas who was lord of it. These succors (Mustapha hauing brought valiant men, harquebussiers, much artillerie, and himselfe a good souldier) made Nuncio attempts vaine, so as being often repulst with losse, he was in the end forced to depart & returne with his army to Goa, leaving Antonio Saldania and James Silueria with some ships & souldiers at Betelem, for that they should continually annoy the sea coasts of Cambaia, as they did: for the summer following Silueria entred into Diu, and sackt and burnt the towne, with some places thereabouts, for that Mustapha knowing that the Portugalls would not willingly desist from that enterprise, and that they should need greater forces to resist them, he was gone into Turkie, as an embassador for that king, to let the great Turke vnderstand how much it importted him, to take him vnder his protection, & to get footing in those Indian seas, hauing a great desire to chase away the Portugalls, whose power was feared in those seas. But Augusna grieued at the disgrace he had received by his retreat, made ready a nauie of 80 ships, in the which were 4000 valiant soldiers, & hauing called James Silueria with his forces to him, he presented himself before Bazaino a sea towne, which the K. of Cambaia did fortified with all industry, but it could not resist the Portugals valor, who ruined all the fortifications. There came a new gouernor of the Portugall army at the Indies, called Martin Alphonso de Sosa who made some attempt in Cambaia, & took the castle of Panam by force, the like a conqueror he ran vp that riuer as far as Diu, forcing that lord to sue for peace, and to yield Bazain and the neighbor Island of Salferta vnto King John.

Bazain at the last taken by the Portugalls.

G An. 1535 Badurio K. of Cambaia finding himself engaged in dangerous wars, he craued aid fro the Portugals, & gaue the liberty to build a fort at Diu, the which they called Thomas, for that it was begun on that saints day, & another neer vnto it, which they named S. Iames, either of them being strongly walled; this fort was raised in 49 days, whereat the K. wondered. To whom afterward the Portugals gaue great aid, & recovered for him certain places which he had lost; the leaving Emanuel de Sosa in the fort with 800 soldiers, & good store of artillerie, the gouernor returned to Goa. Soon after Badurio repented him that he had yielded so much to the Portugals in his realm, so as in the yeare 1536 he commanded Timarao gouernour of Diu, that vpon some fained colour he should seeke to build a strong wall opposite to the Portugals fort, the which being denied him, there fel a deadly hatred betwixt them. The viceroy Augusna, hearing that this king making a shew of friendship, sought to ruine the Christians, he failed to Diu with a great army, where faining himselfe sick, he drew the ill-aduised king, to visit him in his ship; but in his returne he was slaine by the Portugalls, with some of his people that had accompanied him, in which action there were some Portugalls also slaine, among the which was Emanuel de Sosa captaine of that fort. It was easie the for the Portugals to seize vpon Diu, & vpon the whole Island, whereas they got good store of mony of the kings treasure, abundance of victuals, instruments of war and ships of all sorts. In the beginning of this yeare 1537 they began to fortifie the castle better, fearing some new alteration of those Barbarians, knowing how much they

Fort built at Diu by the Portugalls.

Badurio king of Cambaia slaine by the Portugalls.

E were discontented for the death of Badurio, in whose place they presently set a child, his nephew by the sister, whom certain lords of the cuntry took the gouernment of with great authority, so as the realme seemed to be diuided among many, which was lesse dangerous for the Portugals: The gouernment of the fort at Diu, in the place of Sosa, who was slaine, was giuen to Antonio Silueria, and 600 soldiers appointed him for his garrison; who could not long rest, being still annoyed by them of the cuntry; fearing moreouer that they should be soon set vpon by the Turkes forces, hauing discouered that Badurio a litle before his death, had with rich presents obtained great succours from Ottoman, and that after his death his wife went vnto the Turkes court, and made greater instance; wherefore the great Turke caused a great army to be prepared at Suez, a port in the farthest bofome of the red sea, Soliman the Eunuch, Balcia of Egypt, who had the charge of it, surpassing so many difficulties as it seemed incredible: And hauing caused timber to be cut in Caramania, he made it to be transported wrought to Damietta, and then by the riuer of Nile to Caire, where the vessells being made, and ready to ioyne, they were in the end carried vpon Camels backs to Suez 80 miles. This army as some write, was of 63 gallies, of 26 barks, to the which there ioyned 6 galleons, 8 galeots, 2 foists or Oicadi, 20 ships of burthen, and many other small barks; so as they might well carry, besides the men of seruice, 20000 soldiers, among the which were 4000 lanizaries, with so much artillery, as they thought necessary for so great an enterprise. Towards the end of Iune, Solymán went from Suez with this army: in his voyage he strangled Zebith Novada lord of that place, by whom he had bin bountifullly entertained: then continuing his course, on the 5 of Iuly he came to Aden, a famous citie & port, standing vpon the left point of the Persian gulph. Here the Eunuch gaue a new testimony of his treacheious cruelty, for first he craftily sent some of his men into the city, where they were friendly entertained, and then he procured that K. (who we said had contracted friendship with the Portugalls) to come and visit him in his ships, faining himselfe sick, where this king complaining much of the tyranny that was vsed against him, being made acquainted with Solymán's mind, he was presently hung vp at the maine yard, with some of his people which had accompanied him. The army staid some daies at Aden, first sacking the city, & then leauing a good garrison to keep it for the Ottomans, and then they sailed towards Diu, where they arriued the 4. of Septemb. There they found the Portugalls ready to receiue them as enemies, for approaching neere 2 of their galleies were sunck with the Artillery, so as they were forced to retire, and to be more warie in their landing, which they did afterward with the great ordnance to batter the castle, Solymán's army was much augmented, by some lords of the country that ioyned with him, among whom there was one called Coffaro, his mother a Turk, his father a Christian, born in Chio; others say that his name was Coraçaffer, a renegado, borne in Calabria, who had bin very deere to the deceased K. of Cambaia, and had brought vnto him 20000 souldiers gathered vpe in the country. They ioynly besieged the fort both by sea and land; Silueria hauing but few souldiers in regard of the enemies number, & his continuall toiles, & with all he had not much pouldier for the vse of his artillery; wherof he did aduertise the viceroy being in Goa, crauing succors, and assuring him that they had made what defence was fit for them. There were in Diu, besides the chiefe fort held by the Portugals 2 towers of a reasonable strength, in one there were 60, in the other 50 souldiers, and being both battered by the Turks (who had treacherously sackt the citie in entring, without respect that they had declared theselues friends) the one was yielded vpon conditions, but it obserued, for hauing promised liberty to the Portugall souldiers, they made them gally slaues. The Bascha did also batter the castle, shewing more furie then iudgement: Silueria defended it with great iudgement & valor, making sallies vpon the enemy, & disappointing all their designs: the Turks, besides their huge artillery had with their pioners raised a mount against the fort so high as they might look into it, & discouer what they did, annoying the defendants much with their shot. But the Portugalls did speedily preuent it, making diuers Trauerfes, imploying therein all their cotton, timber, or whatsoeuer else they had. The Turks & they of Cambaia prest the siege hard, but more by land than by sea, for that they held it weakly on that side, so as battering a tower they made a great ruine, by the which they were in great danger to lose the whole castle, the enemy seeking twice a day to force it, which they continued all the month of October. Silueria did suddenly cast vp a rampiers with good flanks, wherby they might brauely defend theselues, making great slaughter of the Turks. On the 20 of October they attempted to take a tower standing towards the sea, for the defence of the Castle by scalado, but they were repulst with great losse: yet the next day they came with 10 galleies, & 33 armed barks, with great numbers of soldiers, to force the tower, but in vaine; for they were not only forced to retire by 50 Christians which defended it, but also flanked by the artillery of the castle, there were in 2 daies about 800 slain, & many vessels sunck. Three daies after at noon day, when they least expected, there was a fallie made by 150 Portugalls, who entred the Turks tréches, that were sleeping, with such resolution, as they slew about 260, & so disordered the whole army, as they could scarce put theselues in defence, but seeing the nuber so small, they offred to charge them, yet so late, as they had time to retire into the fort in good order, with the losse of 3 men only, & 6 hurt. Soon after Silueria sent a frigot to Goa, to craue aid frō Acugna, who had already sent 16 galeots, with pouldier, match, & some soldiers, but they were not yet come to Diu. At the coming of this second message to Goa, Garcia of Norogna was cometo be viceroy,

Army of Turkes prepared against the Portugalls.

1537

King of Aden hanged at a mainyard by the Turkes.

Fort at Diu held by the Portugalls besieged by the Turkes.

Sallie of the Portugalls vpon the Turkes
at Diu.

Garcia Norogna viceroy at the Indies.

1537

A victory, who took vpon him the charge to prepare a great armie, to succor the besieged, and to fight with the enemy, if need were. Arriuing the 11 of September, and taking vpon him the government, he gaue libertie to Acugna to returne into Europe, but he died in his voyage neere vnto cap Bone. Silueria, hauing bin gouernour for his K. tenn yeeres at the Indies, with much honor and reputation, Norogna came wel provided from Portugall, for this war, for that they had intelligence of the Turks preparation in Egipht, bringing 7000 souldiers in 11 ships; being at Goa he prepared 12 great ships of burthen, called hulks, 16 galecons, 25 charuels, 29 galleies of 26 banks, 15 galeots, and 20 foists, which in all made 117 great & small, but all wel armed. The 20 of Nouember, Solymán Bascha made his first attempt to force the castle of Diu, but he found a braue resistance. Silueria hauing the night before discovered the Turks intentions by their preparations. At the break of day there approached neere vnto the tower vpon the sea, about 50 barks and 12 galleies full of soldiers & engins, making a shew to assaile it, but it was only to draw their force thither, from the land part, where they meant to make their greatest attempt. But Silueria like a discreet captaine, knowing the strength of that part towards the sea, brought his greatest force, where there was most need, & where the enemy was likely to vie his greatest force. And so it fel out, for first of all there were 3000 Turks, which presented themelues to the assault, who for an houres space were brauely affronted by the Portugalls, and in the end repulst with great losse: but the Bascha renewed the fight with brauer men, but fewer in number, which did not a little terrifie Silueria, who had seen many of his men slaine in the first assault. He therefore commaunded his lieutenant Roderigo of Araue, who was in the tower towards the Sea, to come vnto him with his fresh band: the which was speedily effected, but vnfortunately for him, being slain with a shot, in whose place Emanuel Vasconcello was put, being followed by 30 fresh souldiers, for that the enemy omitted no force. Vasconcello carried himselfe brauely, the enemy being vpon the breach, whereas they were come to the sword, & in the end repulst. Hauing had some little rest, beheld ther fallied out of the tréches about 6000 lanizaries, Turks, & others of the realm of Cabaia, which Solymán had chosen & reserved for the last, to ouerthrow the Portugals forces, which were already much weakened; and at the same instant he caused a general assault to be giuen to the whole castle. The enemy aduanced to the rampires, and the Portugalls made resistance. Silueria went from place to place with a few choice souldiers, and comming wher hee saw greatest need, he turned him vnto his company, and said: Ah countrymen, do you not remember that you are the souldiers of Christ, for the confession of whose faith we haue put on these armes, follow me then, & sacrifice your liues gloriously in his seruice, who refused not to suffer a shameful death for our health. And without speaking more words, shaking his sword, he went wher he saw most of the enemies, wheras he made such resistance as after 5 houres that this last assault continued, he made the enemies attempts vaine. At the last night gaue an end to this cruell assault, not without great slaughter of the Mahumetans; they had lost that day, as some write about 3500, besides hurt men, of the Portugals there were 70 slaine, & about 300 wounded, so as they lay there remained only 12 vntoucht. But the numbers of the slaine and wounded are diuersly reported, yet they all affirm, that if the enemy had giuen another assault, they could not haue withstood it, wanting both men & munition, for they had no pouldier but what their ordnance was charged with, so as Silueria to provide for a future mischief, caused those peeces which were towards the sea to be drawne away in the night, & to be planted towards the land. But the Bascha seeing his attempts vaine, laied the blame proudly vpon Coffaro, & other Lords of the country, who had assured him that the fort was very weak, and not able to make two days defence: moreover he said they had abused him, and not assisted him, with such forces as they had promised him in the beginning, & assured the great Turk in Constantinople, so as full of wrath & shame, he knew not what to resolve, for that there was a fruit of a Portugall army which was preparing at Goa, doubting they wold fight with him both by sea & land, trusting litle in them of Cabaia, who in effect hated him generally, for the sacking of Diu & other great wrongs the Turkes had done them: Besides, they feared that this cruel man hauing chased away the Portugals, would put their new king to death, and seize tyrannously on the whole Countrey. Whilst they stood vpon these termes,

Death of Solymán
Acugna.

Army of Portugalls prepared against the Turkes.

Assault giuen
by the Turkes
at Diu.

Turkes valiantly repulst at Diu.

1537

the 16 galeots sent by Alengua arrived happily, being come the night after the 2 day of November within sight of Diu, foure miles off from the enemies army, the commanders thought it a politike stratagem, every one to carry 4 lanterns, she which succeeded happily, for the enemies thinking they had bin so many ships as they saw lights, and beleev-ing it had bin the whole army, they lay close and would not hazard to meet them: so as being favored by the darkness of the night, and the enemies feare, being terrified with the former successe, and the opinion they had of the army, they entred happily into the river, which made the port of the castle, bringing great joy to their friends, who were in that poore estate. The Bachá being first in doubt, was now resolved to rise, having no hope to better his condition, whose rising was with such disorder and feare, as it seemed a very flight. Soliman leaving at land about 150 pieces of ordnance as Obez writes, 1000 Turks that were wounded, & another thousand which were gone forth to forrage, all which were slain by them of the country, to reuenge the injuries they had received. The Portugalls got the artillery, with some goods of value to repaire the losses they had sustained in those combats. The Turkish army being gone from Diu in this confusion, Soliman reuenged his disgrace vpon those miserable Portugalls, which had bin taken in the Tower, whom he had treacherously kept in prison, causing them to be all murdered.

Turk retire-
ing from Diu.

The new gouernor Norogena, hearing that his men were freed, that there was no need to goe with an army to Diu, he resolved to secure all things in the prouince, in quieting the peoples minds, the which was easy to effect, through the reputatiõ which the Portugalls had gotten, in defending themselves against the Turks forces, & by the hatred which they had purchased by their thefts. He therefore made a peace with Mamudio the new K. sisters son to the deceased Badurín. Vpon these conditions, That the Portugalls should be masters of the fort, & port of Diu, but the king should haue half the customs of the said port; & that he might raise a wall right against the fort, but so farre off, as it should no way annoy nor hinder it; which concluded, he provided for the gard of the castell, sending James Sotol gouernor, in Siluerioes place, who required rest after so honourable a seruice, he had 900 men giuen him for garrison, with all fit prouisiõs. This yong king was not long quiet, but solicited by the ambition of some, and by his grandmother, desirous to reuenge the death of her son, he began to make warre against the Portugalls, vpon a pretext to recouer Bazain, where of there had been no mention made in the last accord: but it proued a war of no moment.

Mamudio K. of Cambisa: and an accord made by him with the Portugalls.Enterview of the Pope, Em-perour, and French king at Nice.Emperour and French king
meet at Aiguesmortes.1539
Deaths of the empress Isa-bella.

38 After the Emperours retreat out of France, the war being hot in Piedmont, pope Paul considering how many miseries this warre brought vnto Christendome, & fearing and foreseeing the ruine of Italy if it continued, hee procured an enteruiew of those two princes and himselfe in the towne of Nice, where there was no means to reconcile them: there was onely a truce concluded for ten yeares, of either side the Alpes, both of them holding what they had gotten: the pope hoping during this long truce there would be some means found to conclude a peace. The emperor returning frõ Nice towards Spain, he was staid by the weather about Marfeilles, where the king sent to intreat him to enter, and to rest himselfe vntill the wind were faire: for the which he gaue him thanks, letting him vnderstand, that he desired they might see one another at Aigues mortes. Whereunto the king consented, and went thither from Auignon, being vpon his returne towards France. The emperor landed, and dined with the king in Aigues mortes, & the king entred afterwards confidently into the emperors galley, where they discoursed long together, but what it was few men vnderstood, yet they parted with great shewes of friendship.

This yeare one thousand five hundred thirtie and nine, the emperor, the yong prince Philippe his sonne, his two daughters, and the whole Court, were full of sorrow and heauinesse for the death of the empress Isabella, she died the first day of Maie being deliuered of a sonne, which followed her soone after, they were both much lamented by the yong Prince, who beganne to feele the heauie crosse whereunto the miserable condition of man is subiect. Shee was carried from Toledo where shee died, with a funerall pompe befitting so great an Emperesse, to be buried in the royall Chapell of Granado, which honours were afterwarde religiously reiterated in all the Cities subiect to the Emperour her husband, and by King Iohn of Portugall, her brother,

I

K

L

M

A brother. After her death the emperor Charles remained alwayes a widower, during the which he had a base son by a maid whose name and family was concealed: he was called D. Iohn of Austria, whom he did not aduow until his death.

1539
D. Iohn of Austria

39 The emperor being a prince of a great courage and high attempts, embraced many actions, so as his reuenues could hardly supply the charge, wherefore he sought to draw money from the people & towns that were subiect vnto him, by diuers meanes, by subsidies, impositions, loans and extraordinary beneuolences. Among others he would haue the Castilians make him a present whereunto the Nobility should contribute, without exemption of any, having caused it to be propounded in an assembly of the lords & noble men of the country, giuing them to vnderstand it was for the charges of the war he made against infidells, whereof the profit and honor was common to them with him. Whereunto answer was by D. Inigo of Velasco constable of Castille in all their names: That the Nobilitie would neuer suffer their freedoms and liberties to be broken, wheret the emperor was very much discontented; & there hapned at the same time an accident, whereby he might see that the nobility of Castille, were not easie to be gouerned as they pleased that counselled him: and this it was. There being a tyme held without the city of Toledo, where the court lay, whẽ the sport was ended, & the emperor desirous to return towards the citie, the presse being great, an Alcaide or Prouost meaning to hasten those that marched before, hee stricke the duke of the *Infanta*sgos horse with a riding rod vpon the cropper, he being the chief of the Médofas, & one of the greatest noblemen of Spain,

Impositions cause of troubleAll of chol-er done by the fantasie.

C who sodenly drawing his sword struck the Alcaide on the head, telling him that he should learn to execute his charge with respect, whereupon the dukes seruants would haue slain him presently, but he staid them. The Alcaide being al bloody, presented himself before the emperor, wheret he seeming to be offended, doct Konguillo one of the 3 prouosts of the emperors palace, aduanced as if he would lay hold on the duke to carry him to prison: but he was willed to forbear vntill he would receiue as much as the other, and that hee should go and learne his duety better: wherein Konguillo shewed himselfe nothing obstinate. The duke retired to his lodging being followed by al the nobilitie, leaving the emperor in a manner alone: who dissembled this act, lest hee should cause some trouble in Castille, where they had so freely refused him the donatiue, which hee had demanded, and the better to couer his discontentment, hee caused the Alcaide to be put in prison, as hauing exceeded in his charge, sending the duke of the *Infanta*sgo word, that hee would cause him to be hanged to giue him satisfaction. The duke came and gaue the king thanks with al humility, sued for his deliuey, had him cured at his charge, and gaue him 500 crowns, wherein he shewed himselfe generous. The emperor soone after passed into Flanders, where he vnderstood that the Gantois were rebelled by reason of subsidies and imposts, which Queene Marie of Hungarie gouernesse of that country had laied vpon them, and discharged his cholour vpon that people.

Satisfaction done by the em-perour to the duke of the InfantaRebellion of the Gantois for imposts.

The Emperour at his going out of Spaine towards Flanders, he left the prince D. Philip his sonne, his lieutenant and vicegerent there, being then not fouretee yeares old, he was assisted by the same Councell that the emperesse his mother had, he took his way thorow France, where hee was roially entertained, and accompanied by the Infants of France. Henry Dauphin of Viennois, and Charles duke of Orleans, whom the king his father desired much to see duke of Milan. What passed in his voyage betwixt him and the French, the French historie relates. But the Gantois were severely punished, and kept in awe by a strong Citadell, which was built, furnished and garded at their owne charge: the Emperour being the more incensed for that hee heard of nothing but mutinies and rebellions in all places for want of money: for that at the same time that hee punished them of Gant, the Spanish souldiers which were in Lombardie mutined against the Marquess of Guast gouernour of Milan, for want of pay, but they were pacified by a generall taxation layed vpon the Countrey, the which they did willingly paie. D. Bernardin of Mendoza had more difficultie to content his mutined garrison in Goulente, being forced to shew his wisedome and to saue both himselfe and the place from their furious disobedience and mutinie, which made him feare that they had some intelligence which the Moores of Tunes or the Turks of Alger, and that they would de-liuer

1540

Citadell of Gant built.Mutinie of the Spaniards in Lombardie.

1541.
Rebellion at Guelma.

litter the fort into their hands. The duty we owe unto God, and reasons of State match not in one ranke in our policies. D. Ferdinand having advertised D. Fernand Gonzague viceroy of Sicile, of the danger wherein he was, and had good correspondency with him, he intreated, coniured and battred the Spaniards in such sort as he filled them with hope to receive their pay in their time holding them in this expectation until the coming of the galleys of Sicile, bringing new soldiers to change this garrison: and then it behoved him to lie, and assure them with the most religious othes that might be, that their money was all ready at Messina, to be paid them as soone as they should land, and that the emperor remembred the good and faithful services they had done him, and desirous to reward it, drew them out of that barbarous land, to lodge them in a more pleasant and delightful country where they should be freed from their toyle, perswading them with such good words, as they gave him credit, and imbarqued in the same galleys: But they were much amazed, that coming to the port of Messina they would not suffer them to enter into the side, and that they told them there was no money for them, and that they fought to divide them into diuers garrisons. Until that the Emperour had otherwise disposed, where one being transported with fure and shame, to have been thus circumvented, they began to entraine the country, and to spoile houses in open villages, with all the insolencies that might be imagined: they first of all gave an assault to the towne of Castroreale, and had almost forced it: their insolencies were such, as ioyning other mad men vnto them, they were a terror to all the land, the viceroy being forced to assemble the nobilitie and commons to suppress them by armes, seeking in the meane time to winne and draw away the heads and ringleaders of this mutinie, so as having won some with clemencie and promises of impunity, and hope of pay, he had means to disperse them into diuers small troups, after wards he caused the most seditious to be easily apprehended and to be executed by way of Iustice, filling the townes and high wayes with gibets well furnished, for examples sake. This severitie caused the Spanish nation to beare a deadly hatred to D. Ferdinand.

Punishment of the mutinous Spanish gould-ens.

Portugall.
1541.
Portugall would not suffer the Castilians to saile to the Ma-lacquet.

The Castilians of the east Indies, whereof D. Antonio of Guenara was gouernor, sent forth in the yeare 1541 a new army to the Moluccques, vnder the command of captain Villaboy, which arrived safely at Tidore and Gilolo, but hee was as vnfortunate as the rest, which had gone before him, he himselfe with his ships and men falling into the Portugalls hands, having retreats and forts in those Ilands, and could not indure the Castilians should vnder take that voyage. The like successe they all haue had, which haue since attempted it: whereby it seemed that it was the will of God the Portugalls should inioy them: who haue vsed this navigation with great honour and profit as well to their owne nation, as to other countries of Europe: hauing made storehouses for that trade, and for the distribution of their merchandise and drugges, in the city of Lisbonne, euen vnto the kings palace, vpon the riuier of Tayo, the which are called the house of the Indies. To giue more ornament to the realme of Portugall, the city of Eborra had bene the yere before 1540 made an Archbishopssee at the instance and request of the king D. Iohn in fauor of cardinall Henry infant of Portugall, the kings brother, who was the first Archbishop, hauing the bishop of Silues for his suffragan. So as from that time there were three Metropolitans in Portugall, Braga, Lisbonne, and Eborra.

Eborra made an archbishopssee

Castille.

The Emperour hauing settled his affaires in the Netherlands, he went by Metz to Spire, and from thence to Karisbone, where hee had appointed an imperiall diet, as well to provide for the warre against the Turke, as to bring the Protestants vnder the obedience of the Pope and Church of Rome, which was a faire publique pretext: but hee had other designs for the aduancement of his owne house, which hee did hope to attaine vnto, vnder colour of religion, as it appeared, and vsing at that time this shadow of religion, hee thought to stay the French king from making war (being much offended, for that Cesar Frege and Anthony *Rin*son his embassadours, were murdered vpon the riuier Po, going to Venice) by vnder taking the conquest of Alger, for the which hauing assembled what forces hee thought sufficient out of Germanie, Italie and Spaine, hauing seene Pope Paul at Luques, respecting obstinately the wise counsell of Andrew Doria and other great Captaines, aduising him to deferre the enterprise until the Voyage of the emperor to Alger.

A the Spring following (by reason of the season of Autume which would be come before hee should land his men, and the bad disposition of that yeare: but he imbarqued in the port of Luna, and came in view of Alger with about two hundred and fiftie vessels, of the which there were threecore & five galleys which caried two and twenty thousand foot entertained, with some three thousand voluntaries, and twelue hundred horse, besides the traine of noblemen and captains which did accompany him, whereof the chiefe were D. Fernand Gonzague Viceroy of Sicile, D. Ferdinand of Toledo duke of Alua, Andrew Doria prince of Melfe, Virgilio Vrsino earle of Anguilara, Augustine Spinola, and Camillo Colonna. Barberousse had left Assan Aga a renegade of Sardinia gouernour in Alger, being accompanied (besides the Moores inhabitants) by many Turkes, of the which there were 800 horsemen, for the defence of the towne, & without it there were great numbers of horse and foot, Alarabes and Africans entertained, or otherwise drawne thither with the hope of spoile: For this vagabond nation doe like vnto rauens or vultures, who by a certaine instinct follow armies, being assured to finde whercon to feede: So this people when they heare of any tumult in the country, they stay not till they be invited, but flie thither in great troups, as people which haue no other care nor imploiment but to theue, by whom the emperours army was much annoyed in the landing, which was on the East side towards Cape Metasulo, within 7 miles of Alger. They diuided the army into three battalions; on the left hand were the Spaniards with Aluaro de Sante marshal of the field, and with D. Fernand Gonzague viceroy of Sicile, and the duke of Camerino. In the battel where the emperors person was, the Germans marched; and on the right hand towards the sea, were the Italians with their colonels, the earle of Santa Fiora, and other noblemen aduenturers. That day they marched only 2 miles, and staid neere vnto a fountaine that night, hauing still sight of the Moores and Arabians on horse backe, but they durst not approach to charge the Christians; but at night thinking they had bene at rest, they came downe from a neere mountaine on the fourth side with great cries, & charged the Christians, by whom they were easily repulsed with losse. The Emperour at his first landing had sent to trie Assan Aga the gouernour, if hee would yeeld vnto the place to his Majestie for reward, and not subiect himselfe to the danger of a mighty and victorious enemy. But the Aga answered with a smiling countenance, that hee was to defend that place against the Christians, as it had bene done twice to their great losse, and some write, that hee grew thus confident, not that hee found himselfe so well furnished for his defence; but through the words of an old Inchauntresse, who having foretold the vnfortunate attempts of D. Diego de Vera, and D. Hugo de Moncada, had also affirmed that the Emperour of Christendome should suffer great losse there. The next day they marched three miles, and camped within two miles of Alger, in a place strong by nature, being flanked by two torrents which fall from the mountaines, the Spanish foot (whereof the Duke of Alua generall of the horse was the chiefe) took their lodging vpon a little hill, from which the army might haue been much annoyed. The sea being also growne somewhat calme after a great storme, the galleys came within canon shot of Alger, and the E shippes drawing neere, they did with great toile vnship their horses, there being a great skirmish betwixt the Spaniards and Moores vpon the hill. But in the meane time they gaue order to land their victuals, artillerie and munition. Towards night the sea began to swell againe, & there fell such abundance of raine all night, with a cold northern wind, which is dangerous vpon that coast, as both the campe at land, and the army at sea did suffer much, and the enemies embracing this occasion, thinking they could not be much annoyd with the Christians (not meant to assaile them at the breake of day, And so the Arabians which were abroad, and the Turkes and Moores within the city being ioynd, made a great attempt on the Spaniards and Italians quarters, towards the mountaine and the sea shoare, the Germans being something more backward: but the Spaniards repulst the enemy valiantly, although they could not vie their harquebuses, & did win much more commendation than the Italians, who keeping a gard vpon a bridge which was vpon one of those torrents, suffered them to winne that passage, so as the enemies horsemen came euen vnto their quarter. Camillo Colonna was that day in gard, who with great valour withstood the Barbarians force, and putting them to flight, chased them beyond the

Assan Aga go-uernour of Alger.

Disposition of the Alarabes of Africa.

Imperiall Armin landed at Alger.

Italians opposed by the Turkes
at Alger.

1541

the bridge, thinking it sufficient: But it was the opinion of D. Ferdinand of Gonzaga to pursue the enemy, that they of the towne not being able to vie their artillerie by reason of the raine, the Christians in their pursuite might happily enter pell mell with the Turkes, and so sending Spinolaes regiment after them, they pursued them vnto the port of Algier, the which they finding shut, the Turkes went about the wall, and being well acquainted with those places, escaped from the Italians: who retiring encouraged the enemy to sally forth, and to pursue them with great numbers, they being new souldiers, tired with the raine and myre, not knowing the country, and wearied first with pursuing the enemy, they fainted and disbanded, so as the Barbarians made a great slaughter of them, for Assan Aga falling forth with his horsemen, and fresh foot, they were easily put to rout, but some knights of Rhodes, colonell Spinola, count Iohn Francisco de Bagna, with some few captaines and old souldiers, making a stand at a bridge, withstood the enemies force: And yet worse would have happened considering their great aduantage of armes, vsing arrowes and stones, whereas the Christians could not vie their harquebuses, vnlesse the emperor, who that day, and alwayes performed the duty of a captaine, a sergeant, and a souldier, had not come to succour them with some companies of Germans; whereof the first being put to flight, he with an invincible mind giuing courage to the rest both with words and action, in the end he repulsed the enemy, and retired his men out of that dayes danger, hauing lost about 300 men, and 200 hurt, but few men of accopt: D. Carlo of Lanoye sonne to the prince of Sulmona was wounded. But the fortune of the armie at sea was more miserable, which tolt with the waues and windes, had continued from midnight vntill noone the next day, in a hard and insupportable conflict, against the furious violence of those enemies. The ships which had no other shelter, but to commit themselves to the mercy of the raging windes, fought to vnburthen themselves, casting their ordonance or any thing else of weight into the sea, & cutting downe their masts; yet many perished, being either swallowed vp in the sea, or beating one against another were driuen on shoare, to be a prey the Barbarians. With the like misfortune, but with more art, and force, the gallies did strue. Doria, and the other captaines of iudgement laboring to preserve them with many anchors, & with the industrie of their oares, they also casting their artillerie ouer boord; but they still finding themselves in exceeding great danger, some hoping to saue their liues at land, cut their cables, and ranne on ground, which was a most miserable spectacle: for the gallies breaking, whilst that the mentired with the toile, being vp to the chin in water, fought to saue themselves, & held it for a happinesse to be accepted for slaues, the Arabians and Moores which stood ready, to make the vnfortunate condition of those Christians more miserable, shewed themselves to be greedy of their blood and death, killing them most barbarously without any mercy. Amongst which Iannettin Doria Admirall ranne on ground neere vnto the Emperours campe, so as it might well be relieved by his maiestie, who presently sent some companies of Italians, to suppress the furie of the Arabians, and saued that valiant yong man, with the greatest part of his companie. There perished foureteene gallies, some write fifteene after this manner, whereof eleuen did belong to prince Doria, and the rest to Anthony Doria, to Naples, and Spaine; of greater vessels some say fiewe, and some a hundred and fifty, of shippes, carauells, and pinaces. At night it grew somewhat calme, so as in the morning the gallies drew neere vnto the shoare, where they lay first, but towards euening the wind grew high againe, so as prince Doria did persuaide them to retire to cape Matafuso, holding that place to be lesse dangerous, for that there were few rocks, the which the emperor perceiving, and seeing that there were no victualls in the campe, the souldiers having bene the day before without any meate, he resolved to rife and march that day six miles with his whole armie. The which he had put in good order, for that the enemy was still behind him & on his flanks, yet they durst not charge them, the sick & hurt men being put in the midst of the squadrons, vsing all care to saue them, yet many were slaine by those Barbarians, being so weake as they could not be carried. For wanting all kind of victuall, they had relieved themselves those two daies with the roots of dates which they call palmette, & horse-besh, some being slaine to that end. They came that day vnto a riuer, which the Moores call Agaraz, the which was so risen

Shipwracke of the imperiall
army in Algier.

A with the raine, as it was not possible to wade through, where by reason thereof, and to see if they could get any victualls, they staid that night, and gathering together the masts and yardes of broken ships in that riuer, they made a bridge to passe the Germans and Italians the next day, the Spaniards hauing found out a foard somewhat higher. The Turkes and Moores of Algier did not pursue the armie any further, and the Arabians did little annoy them, so as within two daies they came vnto their galleys. Heere the emperor did somewhat refresh his army, drawing some victualls out of the ships, and then hee gave order for their shipping, which was on the last day of October. The invincible and vndaunted courage of the emperor, was admirable; who was a great consolation to those afflicted troupes: but in the shipping of the armie there was great pietie noted in him; thinking it impossible that ships shaken with the rage of the Sea, should carrie so much people, hee commaunded that all the horses whatsoever should bee cast into the Sea, were they of neede so great price, nor regarding the intricacies of their owners, desiring rather to saue the basest soldi-
C There is a memorabile accident reported of two ships full of Spaniards, which in the tempest were driuen on shoare neere vnto Algier, the souldiers within them seeking to preserve their liues by being slaues, but the cruell Arabians thirsting after mans blood, refusing to accept them, they made a braue and generous resolution, so as keeping close together, they marcht fighting euen to the very gate of Algier, where they gaue Assan Aga to vnderstand that they were come to yeeld themselves his slaues, hoping that hee being borne a Christian, would not suffer them to betome in peeces by the rage of the Arabians, whose liues might be a greater benefit, & so they were preserved by that仁gedd with more shew of humanity. The gallies which were with the emperor person, turning the same fortune recovered the port of Bugia, and there they refreshed themselves a little.
D and then the seas being somewhat calmed, they sailed towards Spaine, where the emperor landed at Carthage, from whence hee sent to Occagay to visite his daughters, ha-E uing first met with the Prince, D. Philippe, who went speedily to doe his duty, and to re-joyce at his returne, who with an invincible courage, speake little of his losse, shewed how we should beare the crosses of humane accidents. Prince Doria who yeelded not to any in greatnesse of minde and constancie, being arrived in Itale, where the miserable successe of this enterprize, was already knowne, he did comfort such as came to console with him for his losse, and sought to comfort him: But the emperours bountie repaired his great losse, for he did not onely giue him three thousand ducats of money for euer out of the fines at Naples, but he also made him Protector of that kingdom, which is the fit of the seuen principall offices, the which the prince Iohn Andreu his nephew hath now enjoy.

4341 Hunger in the Emperors army.

Constancy and pietie of the emper Charles

Spaniards preserve their liues generously against the Ara-bians.

Emperor
Charles his returne into Spain from the Port of Alger.

Bountie of the emperor to Prince Doria.

41 Warre betwixt
the French king
& the emperor.

41 At the emperours returne from Algier, hee found himselfe engaged in a difficult warre, against the French king, the which would not suffer him to make any long abode in Spaine. The king pretended that the truce had bene broken, and the first violated by the Marquesse of Gnaft his lieutenant in Lombardie, by reason of the marriage of Evgense and Rinjon: which fact being sufficiently verified, it was assembled by him, where upon the French king, began the warre in many places. In Burgundie and the Lowes by the lord of Longueuall, and Martin van Roye, in the duchie of Elkemburg by the duke of Orleans: The Dauphin Henry was come into the countie of Roussillon, & did besiege the Towne of Perpignan with forty thousand foot, two thousand men at armes, two thousand light horse, and great store of artillerie, one of the goodliest armies the French had of long time drawne together; the which proued to be of no effect, for that proceeding so slowly, the duke of Alua had meane to put some troupes into the town (which was ill furnished) by land, and D. Bernardin of Mendoza newly made generall of the galleys of Spaine, to supplie it with victualls and all other kind of munition by sea,

B b b b b

so

so as the Prince seeing it was not easie to force, and hearing of great succours G which did aduance both from Spaine and Italie, hee retired. In Italie the Lord of Langey made warre for the king, and in Picardie the duke of Vendosme: what the successe was, the French Historie will fully satisfie you.

The emperor feeling yet the bad successe of this affaires of Barbarie, and slung by the French in so many places, fainted not: but that which did most trouble him, was the due tie he ought vnto Germanie as emperor: for besides that Sultan Solymán had newly repulst the forces of the empire from before Buda, hee was aduertised that hee prepared to returne, this year in person into Hungarie with a mighty armie: and that which toucht him nerer, he vnderstood that by the persuation of the French king, and of Captaine H Paulin, his embassador in the East, Barberousse was at Sea, with a great number of gallies and foales, with an intent to invade his Countreies of Naples and Sicile, and to spoile Spaine if hee might finde any opportunitie.

To prevent all these mischiefs, hee went to Barcelona to passe into Italie: where whilest they made the gallies readie for his passage, and that the Souldiers came which should goe with him, hee went into Nauarre, and caused some roads to bee made into the neere frontier of France, and the Towne of Saint John de Luz to bee burnt. And seeing himselfe thus prest, hee held the support of Henry the eight, king of England, to bee needfull, with whome hee entred into league.

Having concluded together how they should make warre, the emperor came to Genoua with forty gallies, and some troupes, when as Barberousse sackt and burnt the coast of Calabria, and had taken the town of Regium in the streit against Sicile. Then the Turkish armie came to Oflia, which did much amaze the Romanes, but they did only water, and so past, not doing any harme to the territories of the church, which were recommended by the French king, then leauing the ruer of Genoua, hee came to Marcelles.

The French king had sent Frances of Bourbon, duke of Anguien to bee his lieutenant in Prouence, and to receiue the Turkes armie, who attending Barberousse, and thinking to surpris the Castle of Nice, had like to haue beene surprisid himselfe, by Janetius Dorias, who watcht for him within the Port, with twentie gallies; for hee beleueing one, who had laied this double plot, aduertured to goe with some of the kings gallies, whereof four which hee had caused to aduance were taken, and hee himselfe, escaped by flight, Barberousse being come, Doria quit the Port and Towne of Nice to the Turkes, who sackt and burnt it, but the Castle held good, being valiantly defended by Paul Simeon, a knight of Malta, the place being of it selfe vncasie to batter, and worse to assaile, but after a while they tooke an occasion to leave the siege, Barberousse retired with his gallies to Antibio, being much discontented against the French, for the bad prouision hee had found in Prouence, for the warre, for hee saw many necessarie prouisions to faile them suddenly, and that the kings men were often forced to borrow powder, match and other necessaries from the Turkes, so as hee grew often into such a rage, as hee did threaten Captaine Paulin to an abuse and lyer, hauing made infinite promises to the great Turke, whereof hee saw no effects; the which hee had done if the prince of Anguien had not somewhat pacified him with good words. Being at Antibio, hee vnderstood that the Marquess of Gualt, and the duke of Sauiy were come into the port of Villafraia, with prince Doria gallies, and that being ready to enter into Port, they had been surprisid with so great a storme, as foure gallies thinking to get to sea, had been cast against the rockes and broken, and that wherein the Marquess was, in danger to be sunke: The Turke ready for all occasions went thither with his gallies, but hee came to late: he gathered vp part of the ship-wracke, and drew the ordinance out of the sea: After which he went & wintered at Tolon, from whence he sent five and twenty gallies to Alger, with the spoiles which hee had taken, the which they increased with many poore prisoners of either sex, passing along the coast of Catalogne and Valencia, and with a ship and a galley, which they found neere vnto Palamos, which they carried away.

I must speak some thing of Fernando Cortez, who conquered Mexico, from whence hee was

S. John de Luz burnt by the Spaniards.

Barberousse besieged the Castle of Nice.

Fernando Cortez deprived of his government of Mexico.

was called being viceroy, by the meanes of some which entied his greatnes, being accused in Spaine vnto the emperor, and forced to come and yeeld himselfe a prisoner, in theyear one thousand five hundred and forty: he could not so soon iustifie his innocencie, although hee were in a manner set at libertie, following the emperor to the warre of Alger, yet hee had no command; and as one in disgrace with his Maiestie, hee was neuer called to counsell in those dangerous accidents, although hee were a great Captaine, and had been tryed in greater difficulties, whereof hee had giuen good proofes in all his attempts.

Hee carried with him indiscreetly in this expedition, five admirable emeralds, the B which hee lost, whose forme and qualitie being held rare and precious, it is fit there should be some mention made of them. One of them which was valued at forty thousand ducats, had the forme of a scopye buttan, whereof was a great pearle, and the foot of pure golde, the second was like a little bell, the clapper was of pearle verie properly made: the third had the figure of a fish, on the head whereof there were eyes of gold, artificially wrought, the fourth was cut like a home, and the fifth like a rose. After the return from that vnfortunate attempt of Alger, he laboured five yeres to proue his innocencie, and in the end had leaue from the emperor to returne to Mexico, and to hold his first honours and estates, but he could neuer enjoy them, for being sixtie yeares olde, hee died in the beginning of December one thousand five hundred forty seuen, leauing an honorable testimony behind him, to haue beene valiant, modest, and religious.

C After the taking of the Citie of Culco at Peru by Francis Pizarro, the Spaniards went to take the towne of Quito, which was great and rich, and stood in an excellent ayre, almost vnder the South line, the which, besides that it abounds in mines of metall, hath great store of quicke siluer of yellow colour as they write. There came other Spaniards from Panama, vpon the heare of this great store of gold which Pizarro had found in that province, and they soone made good purchase, though not so great as they expected.

There came also from S. Lago in new Spain, Pedro de Almarado, with a fleet of some ships, thinking to effect some great matters, but Pizarro would not suffer him to make any profit D in the countrie which hee had discovered, and was his government: wherefore they agreed to leaue his ships with Francis for 100000 crowns, and Almarado returned from whence he came. In the yere 1535 the citie of Lima was enlarged, and many dwellings made for Spaniards by Pizarro, he made it the residence for the counsell of the realme, and called it the kings citie, choosing it for his dwelling, & giuing the government of Culco to Almagro.

This yere 1542 the emperor caused the Prince D. Philip to be sworne future king of Spaine, by the estates of the Countrie, seeking to draw his subjects to giue him good helps for the future warre, wherein hee was well assisted by this treasure which came in those daies from the West-Indies for his fifth part, besides a great summe of money which was lent him by Merchants, and others, giuing them assignments out of the ordinarie reuenues of his realmes. He was come to Barcelona, to be neere to Perpignan, or to any other attempt of the French, and there he caused the Spanish footmen to passe, which had been in Sardynia at his returne from Alger, the which hee would haue remaine vpon those frontiers, if need should require, or be transported elsewhere vpon any occasion. From Barcelona he went with the court to Tarazona, from thence to Tortosa, & then to Valencia, the Prince making a solemne entrie in all these places, where he was entertained with great feasts and pompe.

After which, they past the feasts of Christmas at Alcalá of Henares, wheress their ioy was doubled by the presence of the two Infants, two marriages being concluded at that time; one of the Prince D. Philip and D. Maria Infanta of Portugall, daughter to king John the third, the other of D. Isabe prince of Portugall, a youth of fourteen yeares of age, and D. Isabe the emperours second daughter. They continued in Alcalá with great feasting, vntill the end of the yere, and then went to Madrid, where hee made his entrie the first day of the yere one thousand five hundred forty and three, where they made preparation of new solemnities for the future marriage, as also for the warre, the emperor being resolved to passe into Italy in the Spring.

B b b b ij.

The

Emeralds, five exceeding faire

Proceedings of Pizarro at Peru.

Lima called the Kings Citie.

D. Philip sworn future king of Spaine.

Philip prince of Spaine contracted to the Infanta of Portugall

1543 Marriages of the Prince and Infant of Spaine.

Tremessen rebels against the emperor

Earle of Alca-dette as the enterprize of Tre-messen.

The marriage of prince Philip concluded in winter, was celebrated in March after, with great pompe and state, and in like manner that of the Infanta his sister; the Emperor neglecting nothing touching his preparation for warre, as well against the French, who had the yeare before annoyed him in many places, as also against the Moores of Tremessen, who according to their naturall inconstancie, had insinuously rebelled. To suppress the which hee had in beginning of this yeare, sent D. Martin of Cardone, earle of Alcadette into Africke with eight thousand foot, and about fiftene hundred horse, what succeeded there you shall hereafter heare. After which hauing provided a great summe of money; and such force and horse as should passe with him into Italie, hee gave order for the gouernment of those Realmes vnder the charge of the king D. Philip; to whome hee appointed for his chiefe Councillours, the commander Cousas, and the Duke of Alua; fore-seeing many matters of great importance, and providing for them all with great care, as hee that sought to make his forces greater, to free himselfe from the molestations of France, and frustrate their practises which they had in Germanie, where they had those Princes ready to make any alteration, being not greatly affected to the house of Austria: wherefore hee sought to settle the greatness of his house, for many ages, according vnto humane wisdom: And therefore hee had matcht D. Philippe his Sonne to the eldest daughter of Portugall, and to the sole Prince of the realme had giuen his second Infanta, onely with foure hundred thousand crownes dowrie, although his Sonne had receiued double the summe, and for Maximilian, eldest sonne to Ferdinand his brother, hee had reserved his eldest daughter for all doubtfull euents of succession in those great dominions.

In the beginning of the yeare the emperor (as wee haue said) had sent the earle of Alcadette to the enterprise of Mostagan; who going with eight thousand foot and fiftene hundred horse from Oran; in the beginning of Februarie this yeare, neere vnto Tabida, had a skirmish with the Moores, who charged him in thereward, but it was of no moment. The next day at the passing of a riuer neere vnto Tabida, they found a greater armie of Moores, both horse and foot furnished with good shot, yet the Spaniards marcht in such order, and shewed themselves so valiant, as notwithstanding that the enemy stood ready on the other side of the riuer (which they were to wade through) to receiue them, yet they repulst them with great losse, and advanced to take Tabida.

Hauing rested there a while, they marcht on the next day, but somewhat late, towards Tremessen, lodging two leagues from the citie, being continually molested by the Moores, with often charging and flying away. The king was in Tremessen where hee had leuiued what souldiers he could both of horse and foot, hauing entertained about 400 Turkes which were in garrison vpon that coast, so as the next morning the earle did with great indgement put his men in battell, lest that (being faire inferiour in number to the enemy) he should be inuained by so great a multitude, & disordered, being charged in front, flanke, and rere: and therefore hee so disposed of his troups, both horse and foot, as they might fight and succour one another, fortifying his rereward as much as might be, for that he vnderstood they had laied an ambush, and would charge them behind. They had sent the woman and children with their richest moueables into the mountaines which were neere, to preferue them whatsoeuer should happen; and the king hauing disposed of his troups, would not be present at the battell, but attend the euent in a place of safety. The two armies being joynd, the Spaniards shewed no lesse valour then was needfull, the enemies foreward being greater then all their army, and although the Moores in the beginning shewed great resolution, & discharged a great volley of shot, yet they did it so disorderly, and so far off, as there was not any one slain, and but three lightly hurt, the Spaniards giuing them no time to charge again, & the horse coming vpon them with great violence in the fight continued about two houres; and the General hauing placed some loose shot in the head of the foreward, they made a great spoile of the Moores and Turkes; so as in the end the enemy was put to rout on that side, whilst that they fought with great obduracy in the rereward. Thither the earle sent two companies, who charged with such resolution,

As on, as the Spaniards taking new courage, & the enemy being amazed, hauing seen their companions put to rout, the battell was ended (hauing continued about three houres) & the Christians won the victorie, but there was no great slaughter of the Moores, who desired rather to saue themselves by flight than by fighting obduracy, to giue their enemies any cause to feare a new encounter. The king of Tremessen, who expected the doubtfull euent of this battell, hauing a signe giuen him by smook that it was lost, he provided for his safety by flight among the rest. The earle of Alcadette did win great honor in this battell both for his valor and iudgement, being worthily imitated by his three sons, D. Alfonso, D. Francisco, & D. Aluaro, the first leading a part of the foreward, & the second of the rereward: D. Alfonso of Villaruolo marshall of the field, D. Martin of Cordoua, D. John Pacheco with other noblemen of marke, were much commended for their prowess that day. This victorie was won the fift of Februarie, the victor hauing lost few men, and most of them were slaine with crossbows, whereof there were not about a hundred among the Moores, and about fife thousand Harquebuziers. The Spaniards desirous to enter the Towne, the generall sought to stay them that night, fearing the slaughter would be great, or there would be some great disorder committed in the sacke: wherefore he lodged the army without the towne, among certain Oliue trees, giuing good instructions vnto the captains, to prevent all dangers which might grow by their too great confidence of the victorie, or the disorders which doe accompany spoiling; as it hath often fallen out, either by the small authority of the generall, or by indiscretion, or want of militarie discipline.

About this time the state of Tunes (which the emperor had conquered and restored to Muley Hassen) fell into great combustions, he hauing only retained Goulette, with an homage and small tribute for the kings of Spain, as we haue said. The occasion was that Muley Hassen, being desirous to confer with the emperor, had past into Sicile, with an intent to come vnto him to Genoa, or wheresoeuer he should be at his last passage out of Spaine; after which hee came to Naples, and meaning to continue his course by sea he was staid there some daies by a tempest, during the which D. Pedro de Toledo, viceroy of Naples, receiued a commandement to will him not to depart from thence, vntill hee receiued farther newes from the emperor, who was busied with the warres of France, and would not haue any thing to diuert him. This king as it was reported, had a meaning to demand some forces against the Turkes which held Constantine, a towne within his realme, the which was rich and strong, and did much annoy him, and for that at the time of his passage into Sicile, Barberousse was at Marseille, hee feared also that in his returne he would fall vpon him.

He thought in like manner that in leauing the countrie he should auoid some great accident wherewith the starres did threaten him, if hee remained in Africke at that season, this prince being studious of Astrologie, and too credulous of such diuinations. During his absence, such as loued him not and desired some Innoation in the state, bruted it out that the king was dead at Naples, after that he had beene baptized; and prest his Sonne Amide, (who had the command of certaine garisons which were appointed to withstand the inuasions of the Turkes, and the thefts of the Alarabes, which did aduere vnto them,) to hasten his coming vnto the Citie, and to seaze vpon the Castle and his fathers treasure, before that his younger brother called Mahomet (who remained in hostage at Goulette) should prevent him, and make himselfe king with the helpe of Francis de Tovar, then Gouernour of the fort. Amide did easily credit that which it may bee he desired, and although in the beginning he found some resistance, which was made him by the Manufette of Tunes, (who as it is were the kings Lieutenant general in that Countrie) yet in the end hee prevailed, and slue all his fathers friends & seruants, yea, hee abused his wiues and concubines.

These newes being brought to Naples, Muley Hassen was much troubled, & making great hast to depart, he made great instance to haue some forces, the which hee obtained of the viceroy, who suffered him to leuie 1800 men, such as were banished & condemned by justice, to whom impunity was promised, if they went to this warre; & they had a gentleman of the countrie appointed for their commander, whose name was Baptista Lefredo: with which troupe the King did assure himselfe that hee should bee able to surpris his rebellious

1543

King of Tremessen defeated by the Spaniards first.

1545

Moores 42.
Muley Hassen
king of Tunes
disposeth again.

Moores curious and superstitious.

Sonne disposed to seize the father.

Amide incestuous.

B b b b i j j

1545

bellious sonne before hee were settled. Being come to Goulette the Gouverneur G fought to dissuade him from going into the Towne; no nor to approach too neere, before hee vnderstood how the people were affected, and whether there were any men of authoritie of his faction, to assist him: notwithstanding that, some Africanes came to visite him, promising him by ceremonies, othes (setting their daggers against their throates, according to their manner) to aide him, and to die with him if neede were, whome the gouernour wisht him not to trust.

Notwithstanding all that Tonar could say vnto the king, and to Lofredo, they would needs march towards the towne, before they came thither, they knew that they had bene well aduised by Tonar, for they fell into an ambush which Amida had laid for them, and were charged by so great a multitude of horse and foot, as they had no meanes to saue themselves. In this defeat there were slaine about thirteenth hundred Christians vpon the place; the rest with great difficulty recovered Goulette, disarmed (having cast them away) and wounded. Among the which the king had escaped, had hee not bene discovered by the perfumes wherewith hee was annointed according to his custome; whereupon he was hotly pursued and taken.

Being deliuered to his wicked sonne, hee caused his eyes to be presently put out, the like crueltie hee vsed to Nahsar and Abdulas his younger brethren, who were taken with the king, to whome hee reproached that hee did him but iustice, for that he had in like manner made his Vncles blinde, and in the end had slaine them, to raigine. Which being done, Amida renewed with Francis of Tonar, all the conuentions and accords which his father had made with the emperor, and did the same homage. The which Tonar thought good to accept by provision, applying himselfe to the time, drawing (for that hee would not seeme too carefull of that which had hapned) a certaine number of ducats from the new tyrant; who also deliuered twenty knights, Rabatins of the blind kings gard, who had been imprisoned for that they had shewed themselves too affectionat to his seruice; yeelding vp also the ensignes, which had bene taken from Lofredo, and his body, without a head, that they might burie it after the maner of Christians: And moreouer Amida deliuered into his hands for hostage a sonne of his called Seithen. But notwithstanding all this, Francis de Tonar, detesting the fact of Amida, as vnworthie to bee tollerated by the emperor, hee did aduertise Abdamelec one of the brethren of Muley Hascen, (who had escaped with Araxid, and liued then in exile with a Lord of Numidia, called Anensseba), wishing him to come speedily to Tunes, hauing wach an opportunitie by the absence of Amida, who was gone to Biserte to receiue that rich custome of fishing which was neere. Abdamelec was not shastfull, but coming secretly to Goulette, hee found meanes to enter into Tunes by night, with a good number of horse which had accompanied him, going directly to the Castle with his head and his face couered, and wrapt in a sheet after the maner of the Countie, where hee was receiued without any difficultie, they thinking it to bee Amida who was returned from Biserte, but they soone found their owne error, and being amazed and thought to fall to armes, but they that were most forward, were presently slaine, and the rest so terrified, as they yielded: Abdamelec being Master of the Castle, hee caused many of the towne which did fauour him to come, by whome hee was saluted and acknowledged for king of Tunes, but hee raigned but thirte and fixe daies, dying of a pestilent burning fauer. Before his death hee drew Muley Hascen out of prison, who receiued this good from him whome hee had persecuted, and retired to Goulette, where hee had left in the hands of Francis Tonar, many Jewels and mooneables of great price, whereof hee gaue him no verie good account. The Tunesians in Abdamelec's place, did choose for their king a Sonne of his called Mahumet, being but twelue yeares old, to whome they gaue foure cheefe men for Councillors and Gouernors of his youth; which were Abdulages, who held the dignitie and office of Manufete, Abdelchirin Mefuar, which is another dignitie, and Xeriffe, borne at Burga, a Moore learned in the law of Mahumet, and with them one John Perell, of the order of the Rabatins. Abdelchirin, for that hee was an honest man, was slaine by his companions; who afterwards made a Triumuirat betwixt them, committing all ex-

Defeat of Christians.

King of Tunes taken. Crueltie of the sonne to his father and brethren.

Amida disposed of by Abdamelec his vncle.

Disloyaltie of the Regent to the young king of Tunes.

1545

A cesse and villanie, concerning the kings youth, and promising vnto themselves all impunitie. Among other infolencies, Perel hauing seized vpon the Serrail, where the wiues and concubines of Amida were, he rauisht them all, which haply was the greatest displeasure Amida receiued, for those people are wonderfull jealous of their wiues: but hee tooke a cruell reuenge, hauing soone after surprised the citie, with the helpe of his friends and partisans, so suddenly, as the young king had scarce leasure to get into a little barke and flied to Goulette: he caused Perel to be cruelly tortured, and hauing cut off his priuie parts, the instruments of his sinne, hee caused him to be burnt aliue in the market place. He put them also to death which had adhered to Abdamelec, and among others fortie Rabatines, whose bodies were eaten with dogs, a punishment which he vsed for them which had committed any haynous offence, causing them to be torne in peeces aliue, and deuoured by his famished dogs. Amida raigned about fiftene yeares after, vntill that Aluch Ali, whom they called Lacciali, gouernour of Alger, deprived him, surprising the towne in the yeare 1560, which hath euer since bene held by the Turke, but for some short interruption, whereof D. John of Austria was the cause, as we will shew. As for the poore king Muley Hascen, hee caused himselfe to be conducted to Naples, and from thence went to the Emperour to Ausburg, where he reported his misfortunes, and complained much of Francis de Tonar, who detained his Jewels. The Emperour ended this difference, by a composition made betwixt the parties, and he appointed that Muley Hascen should haue a pension paid him during his life, by the Sicilians, and so he was sent back into Italie, and Tonar soone after called home from his gouernment.

Revenge of Amida.

THE

THE 28 BOOKE OF THE Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 Birth of D. Carlo prince of Spaine.
- 2 Agreement betwixt Pope Paul the third and the Emperour Charles, to make warre against the Protestants of Germanie.
- 3 Warre betwixt the Portugals and Turkes, at the East Indies.
- 4 Mariage of Ioane of Albrecht, heire of Nauarre, with Anthonie duke of Bourbon.
- 5 D. Philip prince of Spaine goes into Flanders.
- 6 Muley Balan, a prince of the Moores, demands succours in Spaine.
- 7 Councell transferred from Trent to Bolonia.
- 8 Sedition at Peru for the gouernment.
- 9 Octauio Farnese excommunicated, cause of new warre betwixt France and Spaine.
- 10 League betwixt the princes of Germanie and the French king againe the Emperour.
- 11 Aless besieged by the Emperour.
- 12 Afrique a towne in the realme of Tunnes, taken by the Spaniards.
- 13 Birth of Henric of Bourbon, king of France and Nauarre.
- 14 Birth of D. Sebastian, future king of Portugal.
- 15 Mariage of D. Philip and Marie queene of England.
- 16 Death of queene Ioane the Emperours mother.
- 17 Death of Henric of Albrecht king of Nauarre.
- 18 The Emperour Charles gines ouer the gouernment to his sonne, and retires into Spaine.
- 19 Truce for five yeares betwixt France and Spaine, soone broken.
- 20 Mariage betwixt king Philip and Elizabeth of France, and a peace concluded.
- 21 Death of the Emperour Charles the fifth.
- 22 Death of D. Iohn king of Portugal.
- 23 Persecutions in Spaine for religion.
- 24 Spaniards defeated in the island of Gelues, pr Zerbi, by the Turkes.
- 25 End of the Councell of Trent.
- 26 New bishop in the Netherlands.
- 27 Contention betwixt the French and the Spanish, for Precedence.
- 28 Oran defended, and Pegnon de Veles taken by the Spaniards.
- 29 Malta besieged by the Turkes, releued by the armie of Spaine.
- 30 Enteruiew betwixt Charles the French king, and Elizabeth his sister, queene of Spaine.
- 31 The Victory of Sicile in disgrace.

The

A The Realmes of Castille, Leon, Arragon, and Nauarre, remaine vntied in D. Philip the second.
Portugal by the death of the King D. Iohn, is gouerned by Queene Katherine his widow, and the Cardinall D. Henrie, during the Infancie of D. Sebastian.

- B 1 His yeare 1545 the Emperour had two seuerall aduertisements, the one of great joy and content, the other of much sorrow and heavinesse: He had newes, That the prince D. Philip had his first son born in Vailladolid, the ninth of Iuly, who at his Christening was called Charles, at the which there were great & solemne feasts prepared; but within three dayes after all was turned into mourning and heavinesse, by a strange accident: for the prince's mother, the young child's mother, died, for that (as they sayd) she had eaten something disorderly, contrarie to the state wherein she was; which happened by the negligence of the duchesse of Alua, and the wife of Comez, the high Chanceller, to whom the care of her being committed, they absented themselves a little, being desirous to see a certaine fight, so as at their returne they found her dead, or dying. The prince felt that force which is visuall at the losse of so deere a person, yet bearing it with that constancie that was fit for his royall mind; but the loue hee bare her, being a prince of singular vertues, made him to retire himselfe for a time. Shee was much lamented and wanted of all men, for her great bountie and charitie. She was honoured with a royall funerall pompe: her bodie remained for a time in Saint Pauls church in that towne, in the custodie of the Dominican Friars, untill that it was carried to the royall chappell of Granado. D. Philip had this sorrow increased soon after with a new griefe, for the death of D. Iohn of Tavera, Cardinall, and Archbishop of Toledo, vnder whose D wise gouernment he had bene bred vp from his infancie, so as he loued and respected him much.

The Emperour Charles hauing concluded a peace with the French king, he presently began to imbrace the affaires of Germanie, which were in combustion, by reason of religion, since the preaching and writing of Luther, against the Pope, to whom some princes of that nation, and many townes, did adhere: Which controuersie many graue and religious men did beleue, might haue bene easily reconciled by the Emperours onely authoritie, being assisted by the Estates and Princes of the Empire, without crauing any other helpe. But, according to the common opinion, this prince and the Popes were posselt with one humor, to rule absolutely, the Popes aspiring to bee sole Iudges in matters concerning religion, and Charles aspiring to the like soueraigne power in temporall things depending of the Imperiall function, and not to gouerne himselfe by a certaine necessitie, according to the aduice of the assemblies of the Estates, which they call Diets, by the which hee thought hee was kept in awe.

2 Pope Paul and he concurring in one designe, made a league the six and twentieth of Iune 1546, by the negotiation of the Councell of Trent, and they concluded to pursue the Councell of Trent, published the yeare before, and begun in December: and for that the Protestants did not allow of it, nor would not submit themselves vnto it, it was said, the Emperour should force them by armes, and if he entred into any treatie of peace with them, hee should not doe any thing to the prejudice of the Church of Rome. That the Pope should consigne an hundred thousand crownes at Venice, besides an hundred thousand which he had alreadye assigned, to be employed in this warre. That he should moreover entertaine twelue thousand foot, and five hundred light horse, for six monethes, ouer the which he should appoint a Legat, colonels and captaines. That the Emperour might for this warre take the one halfe of the reuenues of the Clergie,

1545
Birth of prince Charles of Spain.

Death of Marie of Portugal, wife to D. Philip.

1546 League betwixt the Pope and Emperour.

Designe of the Emperour against Germanie

Clergie, and sell of abbie lands to the value of five hundred thousand crownes: And if any prince should seeke to hinder their resolutions, they should joyne their forces together to resist him. This was at such time as the Councell began, whereas they made preparation for warre against the Protestants, both in Germanie, Spaine, and Italie, the Emperours designe extending farther, for his intent was (as it appeared since) and was not then vnknewne) That after that he had routed the Protestants, which made the greatest power of Germanie, he would subiect the Estates of the Empire to his will, that he might keepe the Empire in his familie, and make it hereditarie. And to give some proofoe of this absolute power which he did affect, he had made a truce with the Turke, the better to attend this warre, without taking the aid of those princes and States, who had contributed great summes of money, to raise an armie against that common enemy of Christendome. The Protestants had long before made a declaration, That they tooke the Pope and Sea of Rome for their aduersary, and therefore they would not haue him for Iudge, accusing him of impietie, sacriledge, false doctrine, and of usurpation ouer the magistrats appointed by God, and of many other crimes. They offered to giue vndoubted proofes to a free Councell, lawfully called, were it generall, or national in Germanie. They complained, That the Emperour had often put them in hope, but now they saw themselves frustrat: yea, that contrarie to the decree of the last Diet of Spier and Wormes, where it was concluded, That to prepare the way to so holy an assembly, there should be a conference of Doctors, and men of State of either part, which should bring in writing the meanes to liue in peace and unite one with another, attending the determination of such a Councell, and that in the meane time all proceedings against the Protestants should cease: yet they saw the Archbishop of Cologne pursued and condemned, for that he sought to reforme his Clergie; the conference made frustrat by the policie and importunitie of some Monks; the Pope to vse his absolute authority, and all Germanie to be full of armes; their aduersaries picking quarels, with the spirituzie of the Emperour and Pope, so as they were forced to defend themselves, the which was falsly tearmed sedition: Vpon which discontents there were many embassadours sent vnto the Emperour, from the Protestant princes, whereof the chiefe were Frederic duke of Saxonie, Elector, and Philip Landgraue of Hesse, who drew after them many princes and barons of great place, their friends, allies, or vassalls, with the chiefe Imperiall townes, all which demanded peace, and assurance that it should not be broken by any decree of the Councell of Trent, and a present reformation of the Imperiall Chamber, where there were some of their protest enemies.

Demands of the Protestants.

To which demands the Emperour made dilatorie and ambiguous answers, to win time, to the end hee might draw his forces, which came from all parts, into one bodie: so as they, seeing no other remedie, began also to arme, Ausbourg, Vlme, and other townes of high Germanie, being assisted by the duke of Wirtemberg, came first to field, and fell vpon the subiects of Ferdinand king of Romans, taking Eireberg at the foot of the Alpes, comming out of Italie, with other places. The duke of Saxonie, the Landgraue and their confederats, raised a mightie armie vpon the marches of Franconia, and marcht towards the riuer of Danow, passing quietly through the lands of the bishop of Vitzbourg, and of other Clergie men. The Emperour, who prepared his campe with all speed about Landshuot, vpon the riuer of Iler, proclaimed them as troublers of the publicke peace, and guiltie of high treason. Being fortified hee came and lodged vpon the riuer of Danow, betwixt Ingolstade and Ratisbone, hauing receiued tenne thousand foot, and five hundred light horse, from the Pope, led by cardinall Farnese, Legat, and Otiluio his brother, prince of Parma and Plaisance, assisted by many worthie captaines, whereof the chiefe were Alexander and Paul Vitelli, John Baptista and Frederic Sanelli, Iulio Vrsino, Sforce Paluinio, Alphonso of Este, and Ralph Bailloni: And they had brought him out of the garrisons of Italie, six thousand Spaniards of the old Regiments, vnder the command of Ferdinand of Toledo, duke of Alua, Marshall generall of the armie, John Baptista Castaldo, Philip of Launoy, Aluaro Sandu, Alphonso Vives, and other auncient and approued Captaines.

Protestants
preclaimed.

Captaines of the Pope armie.

Captaines of the Emperours forces

In

A In this Imperiall armie the cardinall of Ausbourg had the charge of the viqualls. There was with the Emperour, Maximilian, sonne to the king of Romans, Emanuel Philibert, prince of Piedmont, with many princes and noblemen, Geimanes. The Protestants armie advanced, being much stronger than the Emperours; they had two generals, the Elector Frederic, and the Landgraue, with equal authoritie, which, if they may be, was the ruine of their armie. They had with them John Ernest, brother to the duke of Saxonie, and John Frederic, his eldest sonne, Philip duke of Brunswic, and duke of his sonnes, Francis duke of Lunebourg, Wolfgang prince of Anhalt, Christopher of Henneberg, George of Wirtemberg, Albert of Mansfield, earles, Christian of Furstemberg, Regrad and Kessberg, colonels; with six companies of Suisses. The two armies lay neere together for some dayes, and the Protestants offered battell to the Imperials; but the Emperour would none, assuring himselfe, that the enemy could not keepe those great forces long together, and that in the end hee which gets the profit of the warre, hath the honour: besides, hee expected Maximilian, earle of Bure, with foure thousand horse, and ten thousand foot, of the choise bands of the Netherlands.

The Landgraue, who was a resolute souldier, and therefore feared more by the Emperour than all the rest that were in the Protestants campe, made offer to force the Emperour to fight, if they would giue him credit; but the Elector would not yeeld to it: so as these two commanders not concurring well together, lost many occasions, The earle of Bure came to the campe, and many of the Emperours faction in Germanie, spoyled the Protestants lands, whilst they were in the armie; yea some Protestants, being woon by the Emperour with goodly promises of aduancement, and perswading them, that the warre was grounded vpon other causes than religion. Among them was Maurice of Saxonie, who desirous to get the Electorship, was entred into duke Frederics country with forces, wherewith king Ferdinand had furnished him, out of Bohemia and Hungarie, and had by loue, or force, seised vpon all the townes and places of Turingia, Misnia, and other prouinces adioyning, vnder a colour of charitie; saying, That it was to preclude the duke Electors countrey, and lands, the which would haue bene ruined, if any other had bene employed by the Emperour in that conquest: yet the Bohemians and Hungarians vsed as great crueltie and violence, as if they had made warre against the Turkes. The Protestants armie being verie great, and not able to draw the Emperour to battell, being in some want of viqualls, but much more of money, the which they were forced to beg from the townes and comminalties, the confederat princes hating no support from the kings of France and England, as they had expected, hauing sent embassadours vnto them with full instructions, touching that which the Emperour pressed by this warre, to the paeiudice of Germanie, and the neighbour Estates. The heads being also jealous of their owne houes and lands, which they saw invaded whilst they laboured for the common cause, they thought to draw the warre neerer to their owne commodities, whereupon they dislodged, and marched towards Norling, the Emperour still coasting them.

The townes of Vlme, Ausbourg, and others, holding the Protestants partie, seeing the armie retire farre from them, hauing done nothing of import, they began to think of their estates, and the rather, for that the Imperiall armie increased daily, there being a fresh supply of six hundred men at armes come from Naples, vnder the conduct of John Baptista Spinelli: and the confederats being retired, they made shew as if they would besiege Vlme, one of the richest townes of all Germanie. Being troubled with these considerations, and terrified when as they vnderstood that the Landgraue had left the duke of Saxonie, and was retired home to his house, leauing the whole conduct of the warre to him, and that the duke marcht towards his owne country, without any longer delay they sent vnto the Emperour, to make their peace. Vlme was one of the first that obtained pardon, paying an hundred thousand crownes, and twelue peeces of ordnance, with their furniture, and receiuing a garrison of ten companies of foot. Ausbourg did the like, and paid an hundred and fiftie thousand crownes, and twelue peeces of ordnance, and receiued the like garrison.

Heads of the Protestants armie disgres.

Maurice of Saxonie turns
the Emperour.

Protestants
league dissolved

Di-

Diuers other towines yielded also, and in the end the duke of Wittenberg would make trial of the Emperours clemencie: so as being assured of high Germanie, he began to follow the Protestants amie, and came to Nuremberg. The Prince Elektor rooke some small towines in his way, bending towards Franckfort, to draw money as well from his friends as from the Clergie; and then he turned towards his countrey, his amie decreasing much, for that many, seeing the Emperour to prosper, abandoned him. He being come into Turinga and Misnia, Maurice dislodged, having put good garrisons into Leipsie and Dresda, which places he onely preferred, for all the rest the Electors recovered, and then he retired to Ferdinand; and they both together came and joyned with the Emperours campe at Egge, vpon the confines of Bohemia. The earle of Bure was come towards Franckfort, with commaundement to enter into the Landgraues countrey, for whom many princes, and among them Maurice, his sonne in law, did sue vnto the Emperour for his pardon; but to small effect, for he had a great desire to haue him, thinking him alone sufficient to raise the Protestants affaires, if they were ruined. Bure tooke Darmast by composition, and then Franckfort, where they were in great feare to loose their Faires, which many of their neighbours did affect. Strasbourg, a great and rich citie, did also compound. The Emperour coming with great speed to the riuer of Elbe, hauing found a foord, where the Spaniards did him great seruice (for the passage was defended by the Protestants amie) he past his troups, and pursued the Elector, who sought to recover Wittenberg, the chiefe towne of his Electorat, being strong and well fortified: but he slayed him neere vnto the forest of Lochane, the Elector having scarce halfe his forces, for he had not leisure to gather them together, being dispersed. Being thus forced to fight with disadvantage, he was vanquished and taken, being wounded in the face. Ernest of Brunfwic, sonne to Philip, was taken with the Elector: his eldest sonne recovered Wittenberg, being hurt, whither many others escaped from this conflict. The Emperour hauing this prince his prisoner, vnto him roughly in speech, and king Ferdinand more. He was giuen in ward to the duke of Alua, who committed him to Alphonso Pines to keepe safely. Within few dayes the Emperour gaue sentence of death against him; the which notwithstanding was reuoked, at the suit of the marquisse of Brandebourg: but to redeem his life, he was forced to vndergo hard conditions: Among others, he did quit the dignitie of Elector, which was giuen to Maurice, with all his lands, by the Emperour, who did confiscat them, as being guiltie of high treason; he and his children promising to obey the Imperiall chamber, such as the Emperour should erect; and for his entertainment, Maurice was charged to pay him a yearely pension of fiftie thousand crownes: The towne of Wittenberg, and the castle of Goth, were deliuered to Maurice, leaving it to his discretion, to suffer Federics children to dwell in Goth: and as for himselfe, hee should remaine the Emperours prisoner. There were many other strange conditions imposed vpon him, all which he signed; and refused but one article, which was, a promise to obey the decrees of the Councell of Trent, the which hee constantly reiected, saying, That he had rather die than yeeld to it: wherefore the Emperour caused it to be rased out. Duke Maurice being now Elector, and hauing joyned to his owne patrimonie the inheritance of prince Federic of Saxonie, he began to be a suitor for the Landgraue of Hesse; his father in law, imploring all his friends, as the marquisse of Brandebourg did in like manner, who in the end obtained a promise from the Emperour, to pardon his life, to remit all other punishments due to rebels, to leaue him his countrey with one fort, furnished with artillery: so as he did renounce all leagues, to the preiudice of him or his brother Ferdinand, obey the Imperiall Chamber which the Emperour should establish, giue him all the rest of his ordinance, pay him within foure moneths 150000 crownes, for the charges of the warre, to deliuer the prisoners which he held, and come and craue pardon of the Emperour.

The Landgraue hauing accepted these conditions, by the aduice of his counsellors, considering the present danger, he came to Hale in Saxonie, to the Emperour, on the eight and twentieth of Iune, where, before he presented himselfe vnto him, they brought him the former articles to signe: but for that they had added many things which were not contained in those which the marquisse of Brandebourg and duke Maurice had sent him,

Landgraue forced by the Emperour.

Defeat of the Elector of Saxony, and his King.

Conditions imposed vpon the Elector of Saxonie.

Confluence of the Elector Frederic.

Conditions proposed by the Emperor to the Landgraue.

A he would not doe any thing, for the which there was great question betwixt betwixt him and the bishop of Arras, who would needs haue him signe it. Among other things, they had added, That the Emperour did reserve vnto himselfe the interpretation of euery article, and that the Landgraue did submit himselfe to the decrees of the Councell of Trent, for the which he should giue caution.

The Landgraue being prest and threatened, remembering that Brandebourg and the new Elector, had promised to maintaine the confession of Ausbourg, he signed, That he would obey the decrees of a holy, free, and generall Councell, where both head and members should be reformed, as Maurice and Brandebourg would doe. This done, they led him into a hall, whereas the Emperour was set vpon a throne, where kneeling downe before him, and confessing, That he had offended his Maiestie, and deserved punishment, he craued pardon, and implored his clemencie. The Emperour made answer by George Seide, That although he had deserved grieuous punishment, yet vnto his clemencie, and yielding to the intreaties of many princes and noblemen, whom he desired to gratifie, he remitted the punishment which he had deserved, either by losse of life and goods, or by perpetual imprisonment. Which done, the Landgraue was carried backe to the duke of Aluaes lodging, where he slept; where, hauing played late at dice, he was amazed, when as offering to goe away, he was staied, and had a gard giuen him: whereat the marquisse of Brandebourg and Maurice were much discontented, but there was no remedie, the Duke of Alba and the bishop of Arras saying, That it was the Emperours pleasure. This proceeding, which the Emperour sought to iustifie by glosses, depriued him of the fruit which he pretended of his enterprises: so easily are mans desires and imaginations ouerthrowne.

3 We must now retume to the Portugals at the East Indies, where the Turks sought to expell them. They hauing honourably defended their fort at Diu, and concluded a peace with the Indians of Cambaia, in the yeare 1537, whereas the young king Mamudo had succeeded after the death of his vnkle Badurio, into whose fauour Zaffer the Renegado did still seeke to insinuate himselfe, and to whose wicked practices this last warre is chiefly attributed; deuising still how hee might expell the Portugals, for the effecting whereof he made such secret preparations as hee thought necessarie, drawing men together from other barbarous nations, making of armes, ordnance, and harquebuses: hauing with exceeding charge drawne fure master workmen from Constantinople, and yet they circumvented the Christians, making them beleue, that it was to make warre against the king of Patanao, an ancient enemie, which confined vpon them; and yet they fought with great secrecie to incense the lords of the neighbour provinces, against the Portugals: Notwithstanding they intreated them verie louingly, and obsequiously, knowing that it was pleasing vnto the king. With which policie they had made them so secure and carelesse, as they were wholly giuen to the game of marchandise, and to propagate the faith of Christ in those parts. The Portugals had beene growne so secure, and had so neglected all care of warre, as whereas Garcia of Norogoa had left nine hundred foot in garrison at Diu, there were not then aboute two hundred and fiftie, vnder the gouernement of Iohn Mascaregna, who had succeeded James de Soja; and which was worse, they had no munition to make fortie dayes defence, and for that the souldiers had wanted their pay, many of them had sold their armes; all which was well knowne to Zaffer, and to king Mamudo, which made their designs more easie, and their hopes greater to be effected from the Portugals. To make their enterprise more easie, Zaffer began to giue it out, That the king had giuen him that citie, and that hee would soone come and take possession thereof: And although it seemed strange, it being one of the chiefe towines of Cambaia, and brought great profit vnto the king by trade of marchandise, yet it was the more credible, for that the towne was reduced in a manner vnder the Portugals dominion, and many times annoyed by the Turkes, so as it was not so beneficiall to the lord as it had bene, who long before had giuen another strong place, called Sorrao, vnto Zaffer, besides many other places which he had either purchased, or gotten by fauour. He writ vnto Mascaregna Submission of the Landgraue.

Portugals at the Indies.

C c c c c

caregna

1547
John Mascarena governour
at Diu.

Mascarena, as a friend, rejoicing, that by the kings bounty he had means to be his neighbour continually, and to enjoy more freely the fruites of their friendship: but knowing how distastful new lords were vnto their subjects, he should be forced to come with some numbers of souldiers, to keep them in awe that should not like of his government in the beginning: whereof he thought it good to aduertise him, to the end that Mascarena should not suspect, that they would not enteraine peace with king John and the Portugals. But Mascarena began, in the end, to fall into consideration of these things, thinking, that these great preparations could not be against the king of Patana (as they had giuen it out) who notwithstanding did not moue; which made him feare that it was against the fort of Diu: Whereupon he did write to D. John de Castro, Viceroy of the Indies, remaining then at Goa: Hee did also write vnto Antonio Sosa, gouernour of Chaul, and to William Meneses, gouernour of Bazain, to let them vnderstand in what a strait the fort of Diu was, and what need he had of helpe; and therefore they two should seek to stop the victuals which should come by sea from that coast vnto the enemies, who stayed not long to enter the towne of Diu, with Zaffer, being then about six thousand, but with such a number of pioners and labourers, for their workes, as some affirme, they were almost thirtie thousand. Most of the souldiers were Turkes and Abissins.

Diu besieged by the king of Cambaia.

Among other aduantages which the king of Cambaia, and Zaffer; his generall in this enterprize, had gotten, this was most important, to haue begun the warre in the beginning of Winter, the which begins, in those countries, when as the Spring begins with vs, about the beginning of March. But Mascarena knowing with what policie the enemy had wouen this web, and seeking with the like dissembling, to win time, and to provide for himselfe, he dissembled the jealousie he had of Zaffers designt: he seemed content with his coming to Diu, and to discouer his mind fully, hee sent Simon Fco, a man of great judgement, to visit him, and to congratulate his coming; who, with like counterfeiting, was joyfully and honourably received by the Renegado, yet seeking to effect his designs, he began to discouer plainly to what end he was come thither. He propounded vnto Fco, That hee would build a wall which should diuide the commerce of the fort from the towne (the which had beene granted at the peace making, so as it were no hinderance to the fort) whereof Zaffer made not any mention; but hee complained, that the traffique at sea was reduced to that point, as the king of Cambaia, to his great dishonour, could not dispose of it, being expelled out of the possession by their violence, whom some few yeares before hee had of courtesie received into his realme, to make them partakers, as other strangers, of the trade of marchandise in those countries.

All this being related to Mascarena by Fco, he found, that the Barbarian desired as much to haue an occasion to fall to open warre, as he sought to avoid it for the reasons aboue mentioned, and therefore he sent again to Zaffer, to let him vnderstand, That whereas by order from the king he would renew some treatie touching the Navigation, it must be done with the Viceroy Castro, who being not farre off, would soone resolve, and according to equitie: Touching the building of the wall, hee was not to hinder it, persuading himselfe it should be according to the conclusion of the peace, whereof he sent a copie by Fco. The Renegado tooke occasion vpon this writing to breake out into ames, who growing into a rage, rare it, and put the embassadour into prison: Then giuing the Portugals no more respite, hee began to make his approaches; and to assault the fort. Mascarena foreseeing all this, had made such provisions as time would giue him leaue, and having an especiall care of their want of victuals; he had sent away the weakest women, with the children, and other vnprofitable persons, in two marchants ships, to Bazain and Chaul: and for that the fort was large, hee had seven bulwarke, and hee so weakly manned, hee diuided his souldiers and commanders, appointing twentie to euery bulwarke, and the rest where necessitie should require. He had also drawne into the fort many Christian marchants which did traffique in the towne, and did provide for all things necessarie for a siege.

The

A The fear of this rocke was in an island where the towne stood, made by a riuer which falls into the sea: (Some haue written, it is Indus, making no difference betwixt Diu and Diu:) That part of the island which lies betwixt the sea and the riuer, makes an angle, and fifteth with certaine steepe rockes; there the fort is built: so as on two parts towards the sea and the riuer, it is safe. Towards the citie, besides the strong walls and bulwarke, there was a large deepe ditch, which did stretch from the sea vnto the riuer. Within the riuer, right against the fort, there was a strong tower, not easie to bee battered, for that towards the chanell (which was betwixt it and the fort, whereas the marchants ships lay) there could no enemies ship come in, being subiect to the canon on either side:

B but in the other chanell they had entrance, but in small barks, the water was so low; and yet the souldiers could not wade through. The Portugals reserved two ships in the great chanell, the which vnder the command of James Latta, hauing also armed two smaller vessels like gallies, Mascarena commanded they should scoure that coast, to stop the victuals and other commodities which came to the enemies: Wherein Latta shewed such diligence, as in a short time hee had taken foureteeen barks, laden with victuals and diuers other things for the vie of the armie. But Zaffer, who had long before deuised how this enterprize should bee gouerned, and therefore had brought such a multitude of labourers, in one night he caused a fort to bee made vpon a little hill betwixt the towne and the castle; and hauing made

Fort raised by the Barbarians against Diu.

C the outward part of stone, many foot thicke, within hee filled it with earth, leauing some loope holes for ordnance. The like hee made in the towne, the which was so high, as it did equal the highest part of the fort, hauing safe parapets: Hee armed the wall on the out side with sackes of cotton, to defend it from the enemies ordnance. This fort being seene in the morning, did not amaze the defendants, being prepared to resist the Barbarians assaults euen vnto the last gaspe, for the honour of Christs name, and the seruice of their king, labouring with all industrie and valour, to frustrate the designs of a treacherous enemy: and then the ordnance of either side began that cruell warre, which did much honour the Portugals name in all the East.

D To the first fort Zaffer added a second and a third, with the like speed, both towards the sea shore: and for that the ground was stonie and hard, so as they could not well make their trenches, but with losse of time, they advanced a wall of stone, trauesed in such wise one before another, as whilest they advanced, they were safe from the ordnance of the castle; and with this art they might easily come within a stones cast. There hee began to rayse a strong rampar of stone, thirteene foot thicke, and behind fortified it with earth, the which they brought from the sea vnto the riuer, and so they enuironed the fort on that side towards the citie, where it might be assaulted: And for that there was a great distance betwixt the first great forts, they made some lesser along the wall, in the which they placed small Corps de gard, to defend the workes against the enemies sallies; this renegado planting ordnance and small shot, with great judgement, to batter the fort continually.

E Hee had a designe also to take the tower vpon the riuer, and thereby not onely make the way more easie to take the fort, but also hinder such succours as should come by sea vnto the Portugals, for being master of that port, the armie which came from Goa, should with great difficultie land any men. To attempt this tow-
F er, they had prepared a great marchants ship which they had kept in the haven, making a sort of wood vpon it; and fortifying it with cotton against the defendants shot, and it was made so high, as being brought vnder the tower at a full sea, it did reach to the top of it: With these and with certaine boates of planks which they thought to make fast at a low water; they resolved to assault the tower; whereof Mascarena was aduertised, who feared the successe would be dangerous: Wherefore hee commanded Latta, That he should come in the night with his two ships, and fire that engine within the port: for being deprived of that ship, they should hardly at that season provide another, the riuer being carefully kept by the Portugals. On the sue

Ccccc ij

and 1547

upon the walls, but within the houses, where falling to spoyle, they found some little resistance made by the women who were there remaining, who both there and at the walls, did vie armes, and assist their husbands and brethren in so great danger. Whereof Masfcaregna being advertised, he with a discreet secrecie (for that he would not amaze them that defended the breach) taking some souldiers with him from places least in danger, went and charged the enemy, whereof some he slue, the rest cast themselves from those rocks into the sea, but few escaped. They fought obstinately at S. Thomas bulwarke, where there were about 1000 of the assailants slaine, and they were so wearied, as they were forced to retire: but soone after, having brought fresh souldiers, they gave a more furious assault than before, and were as valiantly repulsed by the Christians: and it is reported for a wonder, that in this cruell encounter there were onely seven Portugals slaine, but many were hurt. Two dayes after they gave another assault, whereas they lost about three hundred souldiers, in which Fernando de Castro, and Lewis de Sosa, did win much honor. The like did Francis de Almeida, who having the gard of S. Thomas, about noone time, when as other men vie to take their rest, the enemies ran furiously to the assault, the which he with twenty five souldiers maintained valiantly, untill that some others came to second them, where the fight was cruel for some houres, with great losse to the Barbarians, where they lost 800 men. But the defendants began to be out of hope of victorie, their numbers being diminished by death, and weakened, for that many were hurt, and the assailants on the other side were much fortified, there being come vnto the campe, a supplie of foureteeen thousand souldiers, vnder a certaine lord of Cambaia, called Moiatecan: besides, within the fort they had great want of victuals, and many hurt and sicke for want of good feeding. Afterwards the Barbarians began to make mines, with great secrecie, making shew of other approaches; but on Saint Lawrence day, having brought one to perfection, vnder S. Johns bulwarke, they made offer of an assault, to draw many thither to defend it, but when they thought it time, they retired without the compasse of the mine, and then gave fire to it, which blew all that building into the ayre: in which accident there dyed about sixtie valiant souldiers, and men of account, among which were D. Fernando de Castro, the Viceroyes sonne, a young man of great worth, John of Almeida, Lewis Mello, Diego Sotomaior, Alvaro Ferriera, Roderigo Sosa, Lorenzo Faria, John Brandano, George of Almeida, Tristan Sosa, Francis Lupio, and Garcia Ferracia. It is written, That Masfcaregna doubting of some fraud, when he saw the Barbarians retire, advertised Fernando de Castro, That he should leaue that place; but he was not obeyed. The Infidels would not looke the opportunitee of this ruine, but suddenly advanced to enter into the place, where they found foure souldiers onely to make resistance, for that of twenty which were remaining alive, the rest were so amazed at this accident, as they could not doe any service. In the meane time those foure, more by the assistance of God than any humane force, staid the enemies furie, untill the coming of Masfcaregna with some choyce souldiers, who repulsed the enemy, being fauoured by the approaching night: And in the meane time others labouring behind, they had raised vp a wall of stone, without mortar, sixtene spans thicke, the which they did afterwards rampar with earth: and thus they repaired the ruines of that bastion. They continued their mines to other places, especially vnder Saint Thomas, where the Portugals countermines auailing them nothing, they ruined a great part of it. The like they did to others, and were aduanced into the place, and had gotten footing vnto Saint James church, from whence the Portugals could not expell them, so as they drew a wall through the middle, and it remained a lodging for them both some dayes.

The Viceroy being advertised of the progresse of this siege, foreseeing their need, sent another sonne of his, called D. Aluaro, with foureteeen vessels, who parting from Goa on Saint James day, which was in the countrey the very height of the Spring, he arrived (notwithstanding the foule weather) at Batrin: and for that he knew it would be impossible (by reason of stormes) to come all together to Diu, he gave order, they should all get thither as they could, so as all of them arrived, soone or late, as they could worke it out at sea. D. Aluaro de Castro, and Francis de Almeida, arrived the eighth of August with the greatest part, having not brought about 400 souldiers, who had much courage, but

Surcouer sent from Goa to Diu.

Bulwarke of S.
John blowne up with mines.

A second assault.

A third assault.

1547

A not so much militarie judgement, as the state of their affaires required. They pretended that standing alwaies vpon their defence, they had lost much, and therefore they should fully forth courageously vpon the enemy, and hinder his proceedings.

The good reasons of Masfcaregna, did somewhat restrain their forwardnesse: when as hearing that the enemy fought to draw two great peeces of ordnance out of one of the ruined Bastions, they held it an insupportable affront, forcing Masfcaregna to giue the leave to fallie forth, who to auoide a greater mischief by a sedition, yielded to this necessitie remedie, to whome he spake after this manner. That it was fit souldiers should be gouerned by their Captaine, and not gouerne him; that they should attend their ensigne, and not take it by violence, as it did behoue a commander and his Councillors, to know how to mannagewarre. But you having now in a manner laid violent hands vpon me, and presented your selues before me with seditious words and lookes, the Maiestie of command is ouer-ruled by an vnreasonable desire, by an indiscreet hope: Go on and God make it successefull vnto you; let them know your valour and the force of your armes: I will be content to follow you, who by right should lead you; & although it be in an vnseasonable time, yet will I be partaker of your toile and daunger. Remember that in going into the enemies trenches, & in fighting, you continue as valiant and resolute as you haue shewed your selues before the fight.

After which speech, when occasion & time serued, he diuided his little army into three small squadrons leauing some few to gard the fort. The first he gave to Aluaro de Castro, the second to Francis de Meneses, and himselfe remained with the third to succour where need should require: which action was performed with as little discretion as it was beguine: For they were no sooner in the enemies trenches but they began to doubt of the euent, and although they did terrifie those that were then in gard, killing some, and putting the rest to flight; yet when as they saw the great squadron began to march from the bodie of the armie, they were so surprised with feare, as they had no care but how to saue themselves by flight, neither could they which had retained more valor, make the retreat without disorder. The losse was great; for among a hundred that were slaine, there were diuers of great worth, as Francis de Meneses, who led the second squadron, Francis of Almeida, D. Lope Sosa, and Edouard de Meneses sonne to the earle of Feria, who would not be partaker of his companions defect, but making a stand to withstand the furie of the Barbarians, contemning their horrible cries, and fighting valiantly, exhorting the rest both by his words & example, to vanquish with the sword and not by flight, he dyed honourably. D. Aluaro de Castro, mounting vp a wall, had a great blow on the hinder part of his head with a stone cast out of a sling, the which battering his head pece did hurt him verie sore, causing him to fall backward, where hee had bene slaine, if Masfcaregna had not come presently to succour him, & carried him into the fort, as he did all the rest that were wounded. This vnfortunate action, which hapned the first of September, did much weaken that small garrison: yet Masfcaregna fainted not, but provided such remedies for his defence, as time and means would giue his leave: The enemy did for ruine the Bulwarkes and courtines with his mines, as planting diuers peeces of artillerie in those mines against the Portugals, they did wonderfully annoy them within the fort, wherefore the besieged were forced to labour day and night, and to make new defences, either fighting or working continually, having little leasure to eat, or rest, their number being so small.

The Viceroy D. John de Castro had bene advertised of the death of his sonnes, who suppressing his particular griefe, vied great diligence to provide a remedie for the generall good: He therefore first of all dispatched Aluaro de Albuquerque with order to gather together those few Portugall ships, that were in those seas, and having put souldiers into them to faile presently to Diu, the which he effected, comming thither the last of September, with five ships and so many men as the garrison was increased to twelue hundred; so as they might with more ease make head against the enemy. Soone after he sent five other ships from Goa with four hundred souldiers; and with them many Artificers, and some Architects for the vse of building, as as they grew daily more confident, neither did they feare, (having heard that a certaine kinsman of Ziffer, who had bene

Importunite of some Portugals

Success brought to Diu.

1547 Victorie of the Portugals at sea

D. John Collo
the viceroie comes to relieve
Diu.

beene sent to Caire to lewie men, came sailing towards Diu) to encounter him with their armie, whome hauing fought with all, defeated and taken him with many others prisoners, there being sunke or dispeised at Sea, they returned ioyfull to their Companions. They would not saue one of their prisoners aliue, but being slaine, they cast their heads into the current of the riuer, to carrie newes vnto the enemye, except that of Xassers kinsman, which was set vpon the top of a lance. But the Viceroy with all his diligence, could not draw such an armie together, as hee might hope to raise the siege, before the middest of October: so as hauing about seventy ships great and small, hee beganne his voyage, and hauing surmounted all difficulties, being forced by soule weather to stay some daies at Bazain, hee came to the coast of Diu, the seventh day of Nouember: where hee presently sent for Mascaregna, being desirous to vnderstand particularly in what estate they were, where they tooke counsell how to put souldiers into the fort, and to charge the enemies camp, which being done, Mascaregna returned, and prepared to receiue the succours on the side towards the Sea, where the enemye least suspected it; and hauing planted ordinance in all places, where they might annoy them, they did it in such sort as it did much aduance their affairs, neither did the enemies shew themselves fearful, but they answered them with the like art and courage, and foreseeing that they meant to charge the campe at one instant, both from their armie at Sea, and their fort at land, they did fortifie that part towards the riuer, with a gard of fiftene thousand Souldiers.

The Viceroy had fore-seene all this, and therefore hee vsed a politike stratagem, on the ninth day at night, hauing drawne two thousand souldiers out of the ships into the fort, hee caused the whole fleet to stand as it were in armes, some holding burning torches, some held two-lances, and some an oar hand, and a match light in the other, all men of no seruice, causing the ships to moue but softly, as if they would giue an assault to that part of the riuer, where the enemies feared most, and to gouerne all these things hee had left some captaines, himselfe being gone to land.

All things being readie, the souldiers hauing reconciled themselves vnto God, in the morning they went out of the fort, the Viceroy hauing caused all the gates to bee set wide open, and leauing a gard within the fort, commaunded by Anthonio Corrigia, they did not feare with fife and twentie hundred souldiers, to goe and charge an armie of forty thousand in their owne trenches. The enemye was verie watchfull of the landing of the Armie, where they most feared the daunger, for that they were perswaded there could not come any great numbers from the besieged, wherefore they had placed the best of their forces on that side, which made the Portugals victorie the more easie. Mascaregna had the fore-ward, with foure hundred choise souldiers, who being entred into the Barbarians trenches, had fought valiantly, and they began to retyre, when as fresh men arriuing, hee had good need of succours, and so they did fight often that day, with an interchangeable inclination of victorie, yet the Portugals aduanced still; and hauing wonne one of their forts; in the end by their exceeding valour and the fauour of heauen, they defeated the Barbarians; and put them to flight, some escaping by a bridge which they had made, ioyning the Island to the firme land, all the rest of what age and sexe soeuer, were made subiect to the reuenging sword of the Conqueror, who incensed with crueltie vsed against them at that seege, by a bridge which they had made, as they not only slue men, women with childe, and infants, but euen their tame cattell.

Victorie gotten by the Portu-gals at Diu.

Rumecano the Sonne of Zaffer (who had the chiefe charge of the army) was found dead, with Audecano a Capitaine of Cambaia, who came the day before vnto the armie with fife thousand Souldiers, and Adecano a Capitaine of strange souldiers. They tooke the royall Standard of Cambaia, with many others, they recouered their lost ordinance, and tooke thirtie and fife peeces of the enemies; but the spoile gotten afterwards

A wards in Diu did much enrich the Souldiers. They write that this cruell seege continued eight moneths: there dyed one thousand fife hundred Portugals, and in this last battell onely sixtie, and foure thousand Infidels. The Viceroy hauing taken order for the repaying and new building of the fort, hauing also rewarded the well deseruing souldiers, returned to Malaga.

4 During the warre in Germanie, whereof wee haue formerly made mention, there was a marriage concluded in Fraunce, betwixt Ioane of Albret, the heire of Navarre, and Anthony of Bourbon, duke of Vendosme, a prince of the bloud royall of France, the marriage was celebrated at Molins, in Bourbonnois. This realm of Navarre was reduced vnto a Province, when as the duke of Alua sealed thereon in the name of the king D. Ferdinand in execution of the sentence of pope Iulio the second, and had been alwaies gouerned by Viceroyes and Lieutenants, as wee haue said. In the year one thousand fife hundred fortie and two, D. John de Lauega, Lord of Grayal, was viceroy, in whose time D. Ferdinand of Toledo, grand childe to the duke of Alua, raised the walls of Lombrie, which stood vntill that time: D. Lewis of Mendosa, Marquess of Montedear succeeded the Lord of Grajal in the gouernment of Navarre, in the yere one thousand fife hundred forty and three; and in the year one thousand fife hundred forty and fixe, D. Aluaro Gomes Manrique of Mendosa, entred into the gouernment, and succeeded in the year one thousand fife hundred forty and feuen, D. Lewis Velasco, at which time this marriage was consummated.

The emperor hauing gotten so great and absolute a victorie, as hee thought, he now held the reynes of all Germanie in his hand, he sends D. Ferdinand of Toledo, duke of Alua into Spaine, to persuaide his Son to come vnto him into the low countries; whether he went carrying his prisoners with him in triumph, leauing Ferdinand king of Romans his brother to gouerne the affaires of the empire in his absence, and for that D. Philip coming out of Spaine, he must leaue some great one there, with the title of gouernor; and to giue that dignitie to any lord of the countie, it would breed ieaousie in the rest, he resolved to send Maximilian of Austria, prince of Hungarie, his nephew thither, to whom hee had designed for wife D. Maria his owne daughter, with a dispensation from the pope; for they were cousin Germans. This Prince came and imbarked at Genoua, soone after the duke of Aluas departure, being accompanied by the Cardinal of Trent, the yong duke of Brunswike, the earle of Mansfield and other noble men, & arriued at Barcelona, with a prosperous wind, whereas all the chiefe noblemen of Arragon and Castille came and met him as their Gouernour and Viceroy, and conducted him to Vailledolir, where the marriage betwixt him & D. Maria was solemnized. These princes being married, they gouerned Spaine for a time in prince Philips absence, who parted in the same fleet, & in the same vessel that had brought Maximilian. Being arriued at Genoua, he staid there fifteen daies, where he was visited and honoured with gifts and presents, by all the princes and potentates of Italie, and by the estates of the emperor his father. From Genoua he came to Milan, where he had a solemne entrie made him, and then by Mantoua & Trent hee continued his voyage through Germany & came to Brusselles, where the emperor attended him, who made a progresse with him through all the prouinces of his hereditarie countie, causing an oth of fealtie to be taken vnto him as to his onely heire.

At the estates of Castille who were held at Vailledolir in the year 1548, it was decreed that the emperor should be intreated againe, (as he had bene often) to pay the money which he had borrowed of the king of Portugall, by colour whereof he did not pursue his right vnto the Molucques, for the which there were deputies sent vnto him into Flanders; who offered him in the name of the estates, to discharge that debt, so as hee would graunt them that traded for sixe yeares, making the landing and entring of Spices at the Groin, as he had formerly ordained; which sixe yeares being expired, the emperor should receiue the benefit of the trade; whereunto he gaue no great care, for that hee would not displease D. John king of Portugall, to whom he bare great affection.

6 At that time there came vnto Maximilian of Austria, and D. Maria of Castille his wife, gouerning in Spaine, Malley Basfon, a Prince of the Moores, and Lord of Velas de la Gomera in Africke, who had bene brought into Spaine by D. Bernardino de Mendosa.

Navarre.
Marriage of Ioane heire of Navarre to Anthony duke of Bourbon.

Castille.

Prince Philip goes into Flanders.

Mendosa

Malley Basfon a Moore demands succor in Spaine

1548

Mendes, generall of the galleys, to demaund succour, against Muley Mahumet Xetife of Marroco, who had expelled Muley Hamet his kinsman, of the race of the Morins, out of the realme of Fez. This Moore was honourably entertained by Maximilian, but touching his chiefe businesse, hee aduised him to goe vnto the emperour, the which hee did, and past through France, but hee could not obtaine that which hee pretended, notwithstanding that hee offered to doe homage to the emperour, and to pay him tribute for the realme of Fez. Hee knew well there was no great assurance in the promises of those Barbarians, who are naturally disloyall, and that it was in vaine to make any enterprises in Afrike, if hee did not altogether follow it selfe it would proue but a fruitlesse toile and charge. After long soliciting, Basfon returned into Spaine, and made a like sute vnto D. John king of Portugall, who gaue him some succours, the which had like to haue ruined him, but afterwards hee made good vse of them.

7 The Councell continued at Trent vnto the seventh Session, touching the doctrine and reformation of Prelates, and the Pope seeing that Germanie was in such a combustion, as there was no likelihood of any reconciliation, hee thought it expedient for his affaires of Cologne to draw the Councell out of Germany, and transference it to Bologna, a towne belonging to the church, causing a decree to bee made in the eight Session, as if this translation had come from the motion of the Fathers that were assembled, by reason of the indisposition of many which fell sicke through the bad constitution of the ayre and the discomforts of the cold and moist country. The Legats went, and were followed by the Prelates and Doctors of Italie, but the Germanes were discontented: wherefore the emperor vpon the complaints which were made, sent his embassadors vnto the Councell of Bologna, (which hee called an assembly) which were Francis Yarega, and Martin Velasco, to the end the Councell might be setled againe at Trent.

The Princes and States of the empire being assembled at Ausbourg, did also write verie earnestly vnto the Pope, beseeching him to cause his Legats to returne to Trent, and to continue the Councell there, vntlesse he wold poole that which had bin wel begun. The Pope referred it to the fathers that were at Bologna, who could not be induced to retaine that which they had refused by a common consent, and as it were (said they) by the inspiration of the holy Ghost.

The emperor being discontented at the Popes obstinacie, thought to finde some means to reconcile the controuersies in Religion, without attending a councill any longer, for the which hee caused a booke to be made, which he called Interin, containing in substance all the doctrine of the church of Rome, & the ceremonies thereof; and to giue occasion to the Protestants to receiue it, they were allowed to communicat vnder both kinds, and for Preests to marrie. It was censured by the Pope in those two articles, and was reiected by some of the Protestant Princes: but afterwards the Councel was returned againe to Trent, after the death of Paul the third, vnder Pope Iulio the third.

8 The emperor being come this yeare, one thousand five hundred and fiftie, out of the Netherlands, to an imperiall assembly at Ausbourg, doctor D. Pedro Gualta, (being newly come from Peru, where he had commanded four yeares) came unto him to giue an account of his gouernment, of the fruits whereof hee brought him a great summe of gold, the which did much further his affaires. This man by his wisdom and good gouernment, had ended the sedition and rebellion of the Pizarres in that countrie, which had continued many yeares much vnpleasing to the emperor; and therefore hee was very welcome: wherefore I haue thought it conuenient to make a breefe relation of the whole action. Wee haue formerly made mention of the quarrell betwixt Francis Pizarro and James of Almagra, either of them seeking to command ambitiously ouer his companion in that rich countrie, which they happily conquered with mutuall duetie, and their common armes: wherein they had gotten great honour if they could haue maintained themselves, but they grew into factions, and to ciuill warr, pretending nothing lesse in the end, then to make themselves absolute Lords, and it hapned after many attempts and enterprises, to the preiudice one of another; that Francis Pizarro had bene vanquished in a great encounter, in the yeare one thousand five hundred Council transf.

ferred from Trent to Bala-ria.

Interim of the emperor rejected by the Pope and Protestants

1550 Sedition at Peru for the go-VERNMENT.

Lib. 28.

Lib. 28: died forty two and his brother Ferdinand taken who notwithstanding was soone after set at libertie, yet not without great difficulty. . . . the mis-

Having afterwards repaired their forces, and comming againe to fight, the misfortune fell upon Almagro, who being led to Culco, hee was there publicly, but beuillfully, beheaded, by the commandement of Ferdinand Pizarro, who was a little before his prisoner. The son of Almagro carrying the same notice, born in that country of an Indian woman, desirous to reuenge the vniust death of his father, found means to come by night into Lima, (otherwise called the towne of kings) where hee surpris'd Francis Pizarro, and a brother of his, and cut their throates in their owne lodging, and if Consaluo Pizarro their other brother had beene there, hee had past the same way, but hee was gone to make warre at Quintero, in the prouince of Caucaza, Gonzales, being aduertised of this accident hapned to his brethren, brought backe his Souldiers, and beganne to make a cruell pursue against young James of Amegra, and hee on the other side to make head against him, so as the whole Countre was for some yeares miserably afflicted with these factions, vntill that the emperour sent a gouernour thither with some forces called Vasco de Castro, who did somewhat suppress these feditions, going first against James of Amegra, whome hee besieged in Culco, forcing the Inhabitants to deliuer him, hee causing his head to bee cut off without any long processe.

C Ferdinand Pizarro, (who had put his father to the like death) being come at that time into Spain with great treasure, it may bee for that hee would not bee in Peru at the coming of Pédro de Castro, and give an accompt vnto him of his actions) was there committed to prison in the Castle of Medina, where sometime after at the instance of the kings Attorney generall, and vpon the accusations which were sent from the Indies, his proceesse being made, hee was condemned to loose his head, and the chiefe reason was; for that hee had vniually and rashly put James of Almagro the father to death.

Almagra the father to death.

It is said, that through the quarrels of these mutines vnto that time, there had perished one hundred and fiftie thousand Indians, sometimes taking part with the one, sometimes with the other. By the death of the heads it seemed the troubles had bene ended and suppressed, there remaining none but Gonsaluo Pizarro, who kept himselfe close: but the change of the Governour made them greater than before. For it seeming to the emperor, or to the chiefe of his Council, that Felso de Carrifra was not fit to gouerne that prouince of Peru, hee called him home, and sent Vasco Nugnes de Pelez, in his place, with so absolute and seuerer a Commission, as seeking to execute it, he caused in a manner all the Spaniards that were in that countie, to renolt with the Indians, hauing for the first act of his Tragedie declared all them guiltie of treason, which had carried armes, were it for the Pizarros, or the Almagras, not considering how farre this generalitie did extend, for among all the Spaniards in Peru, and the Guldiers entertained there since the Conquest thereof

1550

Francis Pizarro murdered.

- Sentence inconsiderate and unjust.

Gonsalvo Pizarro
10 head of the rebels,

Death of the governour Vase Nugnes.

D. Pedro Gus
fca governour at Peru.

Disturbance of Gusfca with the rebels at
Peru.

their commander, Gonfalso was such after this restraint of the Gouverneur, they of the Councell disagreeing among themselves) as they were forced with all speede to deliuer him; to gouerne this warre, the which prooued difficult, for Pizarro being assisted by Francis of Caruaial, a great Captaine, and an old experienced Souldier, hee then declared himselfe openly against the Emperour, and contended for the Soueraigntie of Peru, hauing made the Towne of Cusco the chiefe of that countrie, his store-house for the warre. Vaseo Nugnes striving to resist them somewhat rashly, was slaine in an Incounter neere vnto the towne of Quitoa, and his head was carried to Cusco, and there made a publike spectacle, and sorne to all men, a brother of his called Vela Nugnes, being then a prisoner, who had no better fortune afterwards.

To bee reunning of this rout, John Anuares, James de Silva, and James de Centon remaining heads of the emperours part, vntill there were some other order taken, gathered all the souldiers they could together, but they were also defeated by Francis Caruaial, so as they had great difficultie to mainteine their masters authoritie vnto the yeare one thousand five hundred fortie and sixe, that the Emperour after long deliberation, and by the aduise and choise of his Councell, sent D. Pedro Gusfca thither, a clergie man and of the Councell of the Inquisition, a graue, wise, and discrete man, to whome hee gaue a more ample power than to any of the precedent Gouvernours, with the title of President of the royall audience of Peru: parting from Seuille that yeare, he came to Nombre de Dios, notwithstanding that hee vnderstood that there was there in garriſon Ferdinandus Mexia de Gusman, vnder Pedro Alfonso Hinoioſa, Gouverneur in that Countrie for the party of Gonfalso Pizarro, who had a litle before put Melchior Verdugo, one of the emperours Captaines to rout, and chased him as farre as the fort of Carthagena, which is vpon the North Sea, Hinoioſa remaine at Panama, which is opposit vpon the South sea. It is the narrowest place of all the firme land of the Indies, betwixt the two Seas. D. Pedro Gusfca did in this action shew a great resolution, for hee had bene aduertised at the neere Islands of this rout, and that the port of Carthagena was the onely landing place for him, yet hee would needs cast anchor neere vnto Nombre de Dios, which place was held by the said Mexia, with a garriſon of eightene hundred Spaniards, where hee sent Alfonso Aluaredo to land, in ioyning him to aduertise Mexia of his coming, and to sound him how hee stood affected. The which Aluaredo performed so well, as Mexia and hee parted good friends in effect, though they made shew to the contrarie. For some daies after the President Gusfca was received honourably into that place, yea, with ioy and content of the whole garriſon. Thus this religious man being politike and modest, did for the first fruits of his coming, winne this fort and them that held it, without any tumult or blowes, who thinking himselfe well fortified, began with grauitie and authoritie to sollicit the rebels and their leaders, that they should acknowledge their errors, to repaire the which, hee gaue to vnderstand, that they had nothing to doe, but to imbrace the emperours clemency, and the grace and pardon which hee offered them. Hinoioſa who was at Panama vpon the South sea, had bene aduertised of the presidents arrival, and although hee were none of the most obstinate rebels, yet would hee see how hee would carrie himselfe at his first entrie into his government, being somewhat discontented that Mexia had spoken with him without his leave and priuie, writing in choller vnto him; but Mexia was nothing amazed thereat, but by the Presidents aduice went freely to Panama, to Hinoioſa; what discourse they had, the euents did shew: for Mexia returned as freely as hee went, and presently the President departed, and went towards Panama, where hee wrought so with good words, persuasions and promises, as he drew Pedro Alfonso of Hinoioſa, and all them that were with him to the emperours obedience. They say, that the greatest motiue to make them resolute was, that they saw with the President the Marshall Alfonso of Aluaredo, who had bin a dear friend to Francisco Pizarro. These things succeeding thus happily, the president holding it a great advantage to haue won Hinoioſa, hee thought it now time to presse Goncaluo Pizarro, to come vnto himselfe, and to acknowledge his master. He gaue him hope

of

A of good viſage, if hee did obey, if not, he protested his vtter ruine, writing vnto him, and sending him letters in the Emperours name (from whom he had brought many blanks signed) the bearer whereof was Ferdinand Panguada borne at Placentia in Spaine. The emperours letters were dated at Venloo in Guelderland the 17 of February 1546, & the Presidents the 26 of September following. Gonfalso was at the time of this dispatch in the citie of Kings (so called for that the first foundations thereof were laid, the day before the feast of Kings, which wee call Twelſe day) where hauing some intelligence of the Presidents coming, hee had called all the heads of his party vnto him, to consult what was to be done; in the end they resolved to send vnto the emperour, and to informe him of the causes of their rising, and to iustifie themselves for the death of the governour Nugnes, and it was concluded, that the Deputies should carry letters from all the townes in Peru, and that they should demand the generall gouernement for Gonfalso Pizarro: That in passing by Panama, they should informe themselves of the president Gusfca authority, and should acquaint him with the cause of their voyage, with protestation, that if hee attempted any thing, or did presume to enter into the Countrey of Peru in armes, before their returne and the Emperours answer, they would resist him by armes. The deputies were Ierome Leyſa Archbishop of the city of Kings, Lawrence of Aldana (who commanded the garriſon there) Thomas of saint Martin prouinciall of the order of saint Dominicke at Peru, and Gomes de Solis de Carceres, some of which being suspect to Pizarro (namely the prouinciall) he was glad to be rid of him, and to estrange him from his designs, procuring the bishop of Sancta Martha to goe the voiage with them. Thus the deputies being dispatched, they imbarke in diuers ships, and sailed towards Panama, causing Lawrence Aldana to aduance, and aduertise them what was done there. In the meane time there was a conspiracie discovered against the person of Gonfalso, which had bene practised, as they said, by Vela Nugnes, the deceased governours brother, who was then a prisoner, following Pizarro, but not in custodie, for the which hee lost his head, being publicly executed, to the great griefe both of Spaniards and Indians, who sawe well that this would make the peace more difficult. Lawrence Aldana being come to Panama, and hauing conferred with Hinoioſa, and spoken vnto the president, he was presently wonne by them, hee forgot his companions, and took an othe to the Emperour, perswading the president Gusfca, to go to field to fight with the rebels, if they giue him not a good answer. The other deputies coming neere to Panama, and aduertise what Aldana had done, did the like, and ioynd with the president: who gaue foure shippes of warre to Aldana, with some souldiers, commanding him to run vp Southerly and Westward, and to trie if hee could seize vpon the port & towne of Kings, there to make a body of all those that desired to maintaine the Emperours maiestie, and to giue all hindrances hee could to Pizarro: he left a good garriſon at Panama, hee paid his souldiers bountifully, hee made Hinoioſa generall of the imperiall army in field, hee confirmed all the other captaines in their first places, and filled them with hopes and promises to haue better: Hee caused the prouinciall Thomas of Saint Martin, a man of great authoritie with the Spaniards, to imbarke with Lawrence Aldana, being fit to fortifie the imperiall party, to whom hee gaue many blanks signed by the Emperour, that hee might fill them with letters directed to the captaines that were with Gonfalso Pizarro: Hee sent D. John de Mendoza into new Spaine, to D. Antonio de Mendoza the viceroi to bring him some succors, and others were sent by him to the gouernours of Saint Domingo and other prouinces, to the same effect. Whilſt that Pizarro expected newes from Panama, and from his deputies, they brought Fernand Panguada bound vnto him, who (as we haue said) had bin sent from the president Gusfca vnto him, with letters from the emperour, and had bene slaine by him who commanded in the fort of Saint Michael for the rebels: The Councell was assembled to heare the charge and report of this prisoner, but Pizarro suppress the letters. Being heard, al their opinions were nothing but Roderonades, rebellions, fire and murder, and to conclude that they must keep the Emperours army from entering into Peru: whereupon they sent for Francis de Caruaial who held the second place among the rebels, and was then at Plaza: hee came to Pizarro with 150 Spaniards, 30 field peeces, and about 400000 crownes; passing by the towne of Kings, they told him that they had discouered foure shippes at sea, but they knew not what they were

Gonfalso aduertised by his chiefe adherents.

D d d d

were, nor whither they went: James de Mora gouernour of the fort of Truxillo, was sent forth to discouer them, who found that it was the little fleet of Laurence Aldana, with whom hee spake in the port of Malabriga, and hearing what had passed at Panama, hee staid with him encreasing his armie with his shippe; and so they went all to Truxillo: from which place Mora was sent towards Caxamalcan, a neere Province to draw all them together which had a desire to serue the Emperour, carrying with him many blankes, the which hee filled with good words, assurances of pardon and promises to the Captaines of that Countrie, all which in a manner did abandon Pizarro, who being at that time much troubled for the reuolt of James de Mora, thinking to provide for the fort of Truxillo, hee sent Doctor Garcia de Leon thither, but hee reuolted in like manner, and added an other shippe with twentie fouldiers to Aldana's fleet. Gonsaluo Pizarro was then certified to what end Aldana was come into that Sea: being full of rage that hee had bene thus abandoned, hee deuised with himselfe how hee might stay the rest, being resolute to make warre with all violence. Hee went to field with about a thousand Spanish footemen, and three hundred horse, and a great number of Indians which followed him. The Captaines of whom hee made accompt, were Francis of Caruajal his lieutenant (pretending to share the fruites of his victories with him) Doctor Caruajal and Doctor Cepeda, John Acosta, Vélez de Guevara, John Torrens, and some others of lesse note. In his armie the Generalls Standard was with the Emperours armes alone, but all other ensignes and cornets had Pizarro's blacons and deuises, testifying that hee termed himselfe King of Peru. Martin Silueira and Alphonso de Mendoza were left to guard the towne of Plata. Anthony Robles was made gouernour of Cusco, and others in other places: all which hee enioyned to send fouldiers and money speedily to the campe, and to publish his declarations and patents in their gouernements, that hee was not in armes against the Emperour, but against D. Pedro Gasca, who ambitiously contrary to the Emperours commandement, had proclaimed warre against him, and assailed him first. All that were surprized going to ioyne with the imperiall troupes were forced to march vnder his ensignes, or to die. Hee caused Peter of Villosa a Iacobin frier, to bee put in yrons, for that hee went in the disguised habite of a souldier amongst the troupes publishing the Emperours pardon, which he offered to all those that would returne vnto his seruice: and he sent John Acosta towards the sea, to hinder the descent of Laurence Aldana, who had newly withdrawnne the gouernour of Guanico, and all the fouldiers, and had sent them to ioyne with the troupes of James de Mora, at Caxamalcan, in reuenge whereof Pizarro caused Guanico to bee fired. To encrease his miseries, the Inhabitants of Cusco, disdaining to be gouerned by Anthony Robles, a man of no worth, in the night they opened the gates to James Centon, who, liuing in the mountaines and woods in great miserie; cuer since that hee and his companions had bene defeated, seeking to reuenge the death of the gouernour Vasco Nugues, had now come out of his holes, vpon the occasion of this warre, which was made by the President, and had put himselfe into the citie with some rattered fouldiers, which hee had gathered together; being fauoured and fortified by them of Cusco, both Spaniards and Indians; where hee defeated the gouernour Robles, who going towards Pizarro's campe; with most part of his garrison, and one hundred thousand ducats, hearing of Centon's enterprise, had turned head: They fought within the wallles, where hee was defeated, taken and his head cut off, retaining all his fouldiers which were appointed to succour the rebelles, by force or faire means. Soas Centon finding himselfe fortified with foure hundred foote, and two hundred horse, he led them to the fort of Plata, to chase away Alphonso de Mendoza who had the guard thereof.

Cusco being wonne, the towne and forts of Saint Michael, Mercedille, and Procellin, their gouernours, and fouldiers, abandoned Gonsaluo Pizarro; all which garrisons went and ioynd with James de Mora at Caxamalcan. Luke Martines who should haue guarded Arequipa; could not get thither; for hee was raised prisoner by the way by his owne fouldiers, who made those of Jerome Villega for their head, and went to Centon's troups. Against whom Pizarro marched, causing John Acosta to aduance with those forces he had Captains of Pizarro's partie.

Cusco reuolted from Pizarro.

Townes & forts abandoned Pizarro

A had with him at Quitoa, but confounded with such ordinarie reuolts, not knowing whom hee should trust, hee beganne to vie crueltie, and without anie other reason then distrust, hee caused some captians to be slain in his presence, the which did not secure him no more than a new oath, which hee caused the fouldiers which hee had remaining to take. Laurence of Aldana with his fleet of six shippes had come neere vnto the towne of Kings, and had caused three of his shippes to enter into the channell of the river, to see if hee could execute the Presidents charge, wherefore Gonsaluo Pizarro marched thither, and lodged his armie neere vnto the shoare, hauing commanded the inhabitants to bee in armes, and some of them to follow him vpon paine of death. Whilst hee laie there in campe, there passed many messengers and mediators from either part, to come to some composition, according to the Presidents instructions, who desired to end this warre by the mildest means that might bee, but it was in vaine; Pizarro could not awaye his owne ruine; neyther could hee by anie care or diligence stay his men from running to the imperials campe, which should haue made him resolute to embrace the pardon which was offered him. Euerie day there were some wanting in his campe, notwithstanding that hee put them cruelly to death that could be taken: Francis Brano Laguna, being taken by his horsemen which were sent forth to scout, hee commanded that hee should be strangled, but at the intreatie of many, especially of D. Agnes Brano, wife to D. Nicholas of Ribera hee gaue him his life, notwithstanding Laguna's fled away, wherewith Pizarro was in a manner madde, and hee grew so furious, as no man durst come neere him vntill hee called him. His affaires being in these bad termes, all that were in his armie, were amazed and discouraged, but hee himselfe and his owne followers were most of all, whenas they vnderstood that James Maldonado aduertized by Martin de Robles, that they sought him to put him to death, was fled vnto the enemye, and that Martin de Robles, who had leaue to goe to the towne of Kings that was neere, had gone to horse backe the next day early in the morning; and going forth by the port which leadeth to Truxillo, hee had said openly, that hee went to the President Gasca, the Emperours lieutenant, and that whoeuer loved his life, and would not die like a traitour, should follow him, and leaue the tyrant Pizarro. The same night Martin Lopes fled out of the campe, and there grew such a tumult, as the fouldiers were ready to kill Gonsaluo: wherewith hee was so terrified, as hee dislodged, and went and camped two leagues further from the towne, giuing the charge of marshall of the campe to Doctor Carnual, commanding him to keepe a carefull guard that none disbanded, but hee also abandoned him that night; leauing willingly his rich moueables and furniture, where hee had many goodly horses of seruice, and about twentie thousand ducats in coine, and got to Truxillo, being soone after followed by manie other gentlemen of name and qualitie: Gonsaluo Pizarro did not beare the retreat of anie one more impatiently, than of Doctor Carnual, complaining often that hee himselfe had made him reuolt: for that (said hee) hee had made shew to trust more in John Acosta than in him, hauing lately sent him towards Cusco, by the mountaine, to trie if he might recouer that hee had refused to giue him the daughter of Francis Pizarro his neece in marriage: And hee it is remarkable, that being in these perplexities, hee sawe with his owne eyes two of the common fouldiers flee out of the campe, trusting to the swiftnesse of their horses; crying out as loud as they could, God saue the Emperour, and confound the tyrant Gonsaluo Pizarro. Then hee resolved to dislodge from thence, taking the way to Arequipa; whether hee brought not the fourth part of his men, for most of them had left him by the way, so as being come into the province of Nascana, he had not about 300 men in his armie: Hee had recommended the towne of Kings, to Anthony Ribera, Martin Pizarro, Anthony de Lyon, and other Spaniards, whom hee held faithfull vnto him, but whenas they sawe him retired, they called the people into a field without the towne, where they had planted a standard with the Emperours armes, and there they caused the letters of a generall pardon to be published, which they had formerly received and kept, the which was ioyfully embraced by them all: Then hauing taken the othe, they did Crueltie of Pizarro.

Pizarro abandoned by his fouldiers.

D d d d ij aduer.

aduertise Laurence Aldana (who lay there by at anchor) that hee should come and take possession of the towne in the Emperours name, the which hee did, leaving the charge of his shippes to John Fernandes, aduertising the President Gonzalo presently of all that had passed: and that Gonzalo Pizarro was gone from thence some eight dayes iourney, with a small traine. As for John Acosta who had bene sent to Cusco, he had like to haue bene slaine by the way, by Pasco, Sotomaior, and other conspirators, who escaped and came to Aldana.

Acosta being freed from this danger hauing caused some of the conspirators which he had taken, to be strangled, hee came to Cusco, and was let in (for there were no souldiers in the towne) there hee reformed the gouernement, displacing those Magistrates which Centon had made, and substituting others, leaving a sufficient garrison vnder the command of John Visco, Taxis, and with the rest of his troups hee went to seeke Pizarro towards Arequipa; but hee was not farre gone, before that they of Cusco had changed all that hee had done, and restored Centons old officers. Centon who went to Plata, drew vnto the Emperours seruice Alfonso de Mendoza with all his souldiers, and then all together beganne to follow Pizarro, to see that hee should not escape out of the Countrey of Peru, all the towne beeing in a manner reduced (some hauing expelled, and some hauing slaine their gouernours with their garrisons) and vnwillingly acknowledged the Emperour and the President Gonzalo his lieutenant generall, who vpon the newes of this happie successe, went from Panama by sea, with five hundred Spaniards, old souldiers, and great prouision of armes, and munition: he came nere vnto Toinben, whither Embassadors and Deputies came vnto him from all partes, to offer him men, money, obedience and seruice in such abundance, as hee had reason to countermand the succours which hee had demanded of the viceroy of new Spaine, and of other gouernours of the Provinces of the west Indies. From thence hee sent Hinojosa to Caxamalcan to command the troups, which were there assembled, and himselfe came with the armie to Truxillo, appoynting them all a time to come in the valley of Sanfaua. Gonzalo Pizarro beeing come to Arequipa, hee found not any creature there, for all were gone to ioyne with Centons troups, who aduanced to fight with him, the which hee did, but to his owne losse: for hee was defeated, and forced to fle, hauing three hundred and foure score souldiers slaine vpon the place, with some captaines, and almost as many taken prisoners, with which Pizarro fortified his army, distributing them among his bands: and of his part there were onely one hundred men slaine. By this good successe some others were induced to runne the same fortune with him, he promising them great recompences: so as holding his forces to be sufficient, hee returned towards Cusco, with an intent to fight with the imperiall army, wherefoeuer hee should find it, the which beeing assembled in the valley of Sanfaua, there were found to be fixeene hundred harquebuziers, five hundred pikes, and seuen hundred horse Spaniards, whereof the captaines were Peter Alfonso of Hinojosa, commanding in qualitie of Generall, Aluaredo marshall of the campe, Doctor Caruial, Pedro of Villos, and other Captaines: Gabriel de Roias was master of the artillerie: The leaders of the horsemen were Pedro Cabrera, Gomes of Aluarado, John Saneira, James Mora, Ferdinand Mexia, Roderigo Salezar, and Alfonso Mendoza, all which had revolted from Pizarro. The President had for his counsell, the Archbishop of the towne of Kings, Thomas S. Martin, provinciall of the preaching friers, with many others. Peter Valduia gouernour of the Province of Chiliane, came and ioyned with his armie, a man of great experience in matters of warre, worthe to be opposed against Francis Caruial, who was the most redoubted captaine the enemy had; and in the end vnfortunate Centon came and ioyned with them, with about fortie horse. Being all together, they marched towards Cusco, whither they vnderstood that Gonzalo Pizarro was come with his army. The Countrey by the which the imperials did march, was rough, defart, and without victualles, so as they suffered much, vntill they came to Andaguara, where the Countrey is peopled, and furnished with victualles and other commodities: wherefore they stayed long there, for that they would not be consumed with trauell, and the tediousnesse of the winter, if the enemy should Victorie of Pizarro.

Army imperiall pursuing Pizarro.

A should seeke to prolong the warre, the which he might easily doe, hauing the towne of Cusco, and the river which passeth by the valley of Seguinagrane at his deuotion. In the Spring time of the year, one thousand five hundred fortie and eight, the President caused his army to dislodge from Andaguara, and crossed many narrow passages of the mountains without any difficultie, and many rivers; whereas Pizarro might haue annoyed them much, if hee had not bene negligent, and then came and lodged vpon the declining of the hills; in a discommodious place, about the valley of Seguinagrane, in the which Pizarro was camped; who wanted not any thing, hauing the towne and ciuer behind him at his commandement; whereas the imperials suffered much hunger, cold, and other discommodities: yet notwithstanding the President did forbear to fight; being aduertised that a good number of the Spaniards that were with Pizarro, did but watch an opportunitie to abandon him, and to revolt, which he desired might be before they did fight, that he might haue the weaker opposition. But they could not temporize long in that bad lodging, whereas the cold which was great in that season, did so benumme the souldiers, as they could scarce hold their armes; and also for the needrenesse of the two armies which were daily in skirmish; so as they were forced to come to a generall battell, the which was sone ended. For the ordinance was scarce discharged, but many of Pizarros armie disbanded openly, among which were Doctor Cipeda, Garcilazo de la Vega, and Alfonso Pères flit captaines; and all the souldiers which remained at the rout of Centon, went away in one Squadron to the imperials, which made the rest retire and to fle the battell, some going towards the citie of Cusco, which was five leagues off, and others to other places: they that were most affected to Gonzalo, and most guiltie remained about him; who being foure in number, were of opinion to cast themselves into their enemys troups, and to die fighting valiantly, rather than to be led bound to an ignominious death; but Gonzalo told them, that seeing Fortune had turned her backe, it were better to die Christianlike, acknowledging their faults, than to perish like pagans in such vanities. Being then enquired by the imperiall horsemen, he yielded his armes to Pedro de Villos, great Prouost of the armie, who led him before the President, by whom hee was much blamed for his obstinacie, yet hee shewed himselfe nothing dejected, but answered resolutely to what hee was demanded. Being giuen in ward to James de Centon, he was for some daies well and modestly intreated, not suffering any one to disquiet him either in word or deed. All the other Commanders were in a manner taken that day, either with Gonzalo, or in the pursuit, except Francis Caruial, who was afterwards found and deliuered by his owne souldiers, being hidden among the reeds in a moore, thinking to renew the warre if hee might escape. All the rest were somewhat lamented, but not hee; for hee was exceeding cruell, and the chiefe author of Pizarros rebellion; and it was said that by his inhumane counsell, Pizarro had caused above fixe hundred gentlemen to be murdered, and thrice as many good souldiers, Spaniards, with an infinite number of Indians; and that he neuer was at the death of anie one, but he did reuile him with all the opprobrious words he could invent. The rebelles campe remained a prey to the imperials, whereby they were greatly enriched: and to prevent reuenges, which do commonly follow ciuill victories, Ferdinand Mexia, and Martin Robles were sent thither with two companies. Afterwards the prisoners processees were formally made. The chiefe of the rebellion were condemned to die, as guiltie of treason. Gonzalo Pizarro had his head cut off, the which was for a time set in the market place in the citie of Kings, for a publike spectacle with this Inscription. This is the head of the Traitor and Tyrant Gonzalo Pizarro, who being rebelled, and hauing taken armes in the realme of Peru, against the most mightie Emperour Charles the fifth, his prince, was vanquished fighting against the standard royall in the valley of Seguinagrane, and hath bene thus worthily punished. All his goods were forfeited: his proud palace which hee had built in the citie of Cusco was ruined, the soile sowed with salt, and a pillar erected with a table containing the sentence of his condemnation. He died constantly retaining his accustomed proud look, he was royally attired in silke imbrodered with gold and pearle; which the executioner had. His bodie put into a coffin was honestly buried in Cusco. Francis Caruial

Death of Pizarro.

Death of Gonzalo Pizarro.

1550 was executed in like manner with nine other captaines, but their bodies were quartered and hung in the high wayes. Many also of the most seditious were hung vpon trees on the high wayes. The President hauing thus punished the chiefe mutines and rebelles, hee caused a generall pardon to be published in Cusco to all the rest, forbidding any one to reproach the fault hereafter, vpon paine of death.

This victorie was wonne the ninth day of Aprill, one thousand five hundred fortie and eight, happie doubtlesse for the Emperour, for if Pizarro had wonne it, Peru had bin lost for him, and Spaine deprived of the treasures of that Countrey, which are great and incredible. The President found himselfe much grieved when hee came to reward such as hee had drawne from Pizarros faction, to whom hee had made great promises, for there was not any common fouldier but he held himselfe worthy of a gouernement: and he could not please them all, but he supplied this defect with store of ducats, which abound in that golden region. Then hee beganne to settle some order in regard of the Spaniards, which were feudatarie Lords over the Indians, how they shuld carrie themselves to the Indians their subjects. Hee created a Parliament or royall Audience in the city of Kings; to the which any man that was grieved might appeale, and giuing hope to them that remaind at Peru, by the aduertisement hee said hee had receiued from the Emperour, to haue a Viceroy very soone hee had them farewell, and went away in December one thousand five hundred forty and nine, carrying with him about two millions of gold for the Emperors part. He came from the city of Kings to Panama, where hauing rested some dayes, hee went by land with his baggage to Nombre de Dios, vpon the north sea, where hee arriued happily: For, had hee staied a little longer at Panama, hee had bene in danger neuer to haue seene Spaine more. For that certaine other rebelles led by Fernand and Pedro Contreras (whose father was Victroy of Nicaragua) came and seized vpon Panama, thinking the President had bene there, and spoiled it: and mistaking him, they pursued him, thinking to finde him vpon the way, and to stripe him of his treasure, making an attempt to enter into Nombre de Dios, but they were repulsed by the garrison and the inhabitants. The gouernors and garrisons that were neere made a head, and went to field, and disperfed them in some encounters, in one of the which one of the Contreras was slaine, and the other lost, so as hee was neuer more heard of.

This second reuolt did somewhat stay the voyage of the President D. Pedro Gasca, who embarqued in July 1550, hauing suppressed two importaunt rebellions at the West Indies, beeing followed by a great number of noblemen Spaniards, who were rich in gold and siluer of the spoiles which they had taken, or for recompences in these seditions; hee arriued happily at Saint Lucar of Barameda, and from thence went to Seuille, where hauing rested some dayes, hee passed into Germanie to the emperour, whom hee found at Ausbourg, by whom hee was graciously receiued and honoured for his good seruices, who in reward thereof some moneths after made him Bishop of Valencia which fell void.

But let vs returne to that princes affaires in Germanie, and what hee had to treat of at Ausbourg, whereas all things did succeed according to his desire, the negotiations of great Kings being like vnto other mens, seasoned with sweet and sower, by him that gouerns the whole world, and for the good of men, who else would forget him if they should alwayes prosper. This mightie Emperour, a Conquerour and wise, according to the world, and the common opinion of all men, finding after much toile, by a hard and preiudiciall experience, that hee was farre from that which hee pretended to doe for the good of his house, by armes and force, against the libertie of the Electors, and the Estates of the empire, hee sought to attaine vnto it by the means of some convention, and therefore hee did presse his brother Ferdinand to resigne vnto prince Philip his sonne his right and dignitie of King of Romans, whereupon they grew to a great quarrel, to pacifie the which Mary Queene of Hungarie their sister, was forced to returne to Ausbourg, from whence shee parted a little before: He pursued this resignation by all the means and policie hee could, for that it was the next infallible stepe to bring D. Philippe to the empire, but Ferdinand would neuer yeelde to it, thinking that if hee made

Emperour solicited D. Ferdinand to resigne the dignitie of King of Romans to his son Philippe.

this

A this dangerous alienation, all his sonnes (hauing a good number) should remaine without estates and meanes, wherein hee had reason. Hee had sent into Spaine for Maximilian his sonne to come to the diet, being a milde and courteous prince, and very pleasing to all Germanie. D. Philippe hauing layed to be king of Romans, parted from Ausbourg, and tooke his way towards Genoua to returne into Spaine to gouerne it.

Peter Lewis Farnese Duke of Placentia and Parma, hauing bene slaine the yere before by his owne subjects, some thought by the Emperours procurement, for that Fernand Gonzague gouernour of Milan, did instantly setze vpon the towne of Placentia, Ottauio Farnese his sonne, distrustful the Emperour his father in lawe, hauing married his bafe daughter, and seeing himselfe contemned by the new Pope, hee sought support and protection from the French; whereat pope Iulio was so offended as hee thundered out a sentence of Excommunication against him, by the which hee declared him fallen from his estate, giuing it in prey to the Emperour: whereupon D. Fernand Gonzague spoiled the territorie of Parma and the French sent succours to Duke Ottauio, which caused a new warre betwixt the Emperour and the French king.

9
Ottauio Farnese excommunicated, the cause of new warre.

1551
Extortions of the emperor vpon the Germans

This warre beganne in the yere of our Lord God, one thousand five hundred fiftie and one, by means whereof the Germanes freed themselves from manie violences, which had bene offered them both in generall and in particular by the Emperour, beeing made proud with his victories, which hee sought to make all men feeble, as well Catholics, as Protestants, vnder diuers pretexts, offsome to be satisfied for the charges of the warre, which hee said hee had made for the libertie of Germanie; of others by the waie of chastisement, for that they had reuolted, wherein hee said that he proceeded mildly, quiting much of his right to ease and spare them. By this means there was neyther towne nor countrey, estate nor condition of men, amongst the Germanes, which were not vexed by taxes, and by sower speeches and threats, if they presumed to tell him of his due tie, or to put him in mind of his conuentions and promises. Finally, hee would haue all depend vpon his owne will. Thus hee heaped vp a great treasure; and they say, that hee had wrested from the Princes and Protestant townes, about five hundred peeces of great ordnance, wherewith hee did furnish his places and forts in Italie, Flaunders and Spaine. In these discontents the Towne of Magdebourg vpon Elbe, which had bene proclaymed and straightly besieged, for that it resisted his Edicts, was now more slowly prest, so as they had meanes to free themselves vpon honest conditions, Maurice Duke of Saxonie thinking it best to compound this warre, hee beeing the chiefe of it, and to attend the deliuerie of the Landgrau of Hesse his father in lawe, whom hee had brought the Emperour, vpon a promise, that hee would not detain him prisoner, and yet hee kept him, and carried him vp and downe as it were in triumph: Whereupon hee often besought the Emperour to haue regard vnto his honour, which was engaged, and seeing him make no accompt to set him at libertie, hee entred into league with Albert of Brandebour, the Landgraues children, and others, and all they with the French King, who marched speedily with a great armie towards the Rhine, giuing it out, that it was to restore the Germanes his good neighbours, and auncient friends to the French, to their true and first libertie, which was taken from them by Charles of Austria, tearing himselfe Emperour. The Protestant Princes went to armes also, and committed great spoiles in Germanie. But that warre was ended by the deliuerie of the Landgrau, and by some things that were granted or promised to the Protestants.

10
League betwixt the princes of Germany and the French king against the emperor.

1552

The French King beeing come neere Strausbourgh, and hearing of this accord made by Duke Maurice without him, hee returned discontented, retayning for his charges and paynes, Metz, Thoule, and Verdun, Townes belonging to the Empire: And the Emperour finding himselfe bound to recouer them, hee layed not, but came and layd siege to Metz in the beginning of winter: What the successe was you may read in the French historie.

Metz besieged by the emperor

The

Port of Barcelone sounded by Leon Strouff.

Dragut a sea-mon pirate.

Africke a towne in the realme of Tunis taken by the Spaniards.

Munitieria in Africke taken by the Christians.

The fathers being yet at Trent, Maximilian of Austria with his wife D. Maria of Spaine passed there, being returned out of Spaine, who crossing from Barcelona to Genoua, had bene in some danger, being pursued by the gallees of Fraunce, whereof Leon Strouff was generall. Alittle before hee had entred into the port of Barcelona, and carried away some vessels which had bene prepared for Maximilian's passage, whereof the imperials complained, saying that there was no open warre.

Whilest the Emperour toyled both mind and body in Germany betwixt the storms of the Councell, the Protestants, and his owne affections, being also entred into a new warre against the French king: the Turkes and pirats of Africke spoiled the coasts of Naples and Sicile, whereof Spaine was not free. The chiefe Leader of these theues was Dragut Rais (whom others call Orgus) who had surprized the towne sometimes called Aphrodisium, and in our time was named Africke by vs, and Mehedie by the Moores, belonging to the realme of Tunis, sometimes a rich towne opposite to Sicile. This Dragut had succeeded Barbarousse in boldnesse and policie, and was bred vp vnder him; of a poore gallee boy, hee grew a noble pirate: hee had bene taken about the Iland of Corfica by Lactin Doria, and made a gallee slave; but after some time he deliuered him for a small ransom, to the great preiudice of Christendome. Being growne more insolent than before, he committed infinite spoiles vpon Sicile, Calabria, Naples, and the coasts of Genoua and Spaine, and thrust on with the like ambition to the two brethren Barbarusses hee would haue a retreat for the safety of his thefts, and beallo called Xec or King. Whereupon hee surprized this towne of Africke, which was then well peopled and of great trafficke: by the wealth whereof he made himselfe fearefull to all the coasts of Italie and Spaine, and of late scouring the Tyrene Seas, whilest that the gallees were busie to passe and repasse the princes D. Philippe and Maximilian, had sacked and burnt Rapallo. So as the Emperour was daily importuned to chase him out of that dangerous nest, who commanded D. John de Vega, viceroy of Sicile, and Andrew Doria prince of Melfi, the chiefe Author of this enterprize, to gather an army together with all speed for this action. Many voluntaries came to reuenge the publike and priuate wrongs, and to win honour, but especially with the hope of spoyle, which they thought would be very rich, for besides the great booties, which Dragut brought, he had with large rewards drawne many merchants thither, and namely the Lewes which were expelled Spaine and Portugal were retired to that towne. Andrew Doria soliciting the preparation of the fleet, whereof hee was generall, the Emperour hauing giuen the charge at land to the viceroy of Italie: and for that he thought that before the whole armie should be ready to goe in to Barbarie, this cunning pirate might doe some harme vnto the Christians, he therefore aduertized D. Bernardin de Mendoza generall of the gallees of Spaine, to stand vpon his gard on that coast. Hauing then receiued three gallees from the duke of Florence, foure from Malta, and three from the Pope, with those of Naples and Sicile, making in all foure and fiftie gallees, well manned both with souldiers and mariners, in the end of Iune they bent their course towards the towne of Africke: hauing viewed it, and burnt some vessels belonging to the Moores, it was resolved first of all to take Munitieria a little towne neere it with a castle, the which hauing few inhabitants, Dragut had fortified with a good garrison of Turkes being to bee feared that whilest they were at the siege of Africke, he might annoy them continually from thence, if the pirate who was then abroad should make his retreat thither with any number of vessels, as hee was pretended to doe, neither was hee out of hope to succour them. The towne was taken with small toyle, but finding it a worke of more difficultie, to force the castle, being brauely defended by the Moores and Turkes, they caused D. Garcia de Toledo generall of the gallees of Naples to land, who battering the Castle with eleuen peeces of ordnance, made a breach, the which they defended long, but in vaine, for in the end they were all slaine or taken prisoners: the Christians hauing lost about three score of their best souldiers, besides a cannon breaking in one of the gallees, it split and suncke, yet they saued all the men and furniture. Then they turned towards Africke, Doria hauing furnished himselfe with munition at Goulette, and sent to leuie more men in Naples

Situation of the
towne of Africke

Aples and Sicile: and then did D. John de Vega passe, hauing left his sonne D. Aluaro to gouerne the Iland. They spent some time about this new prouision, so as the Turkes within Africke had more leisure to fortifie themselves, both with men and all other necessities: which made the siege tedious and difficult to the great losse of the Christians, for that Dragut hauing an intent to draw the army from that enterprize, spoiled the coasts of Italie, and burnt some weake places, doing the like at sea to the Merchants, so as Bernardin of Mendoza had worke to defend the coast of Spaine, whilest that this pirate annoyed the Ilands of Majorca, Corfica, and Elba: but this could not remoue Doria from his resolution, who held it an vnprofitable thing to spend that summer in running after Dragut. The Christians fleet being returned well furnished to besiege the towne of Africke, and the situation and strength thereof being well obserued by Vega and other captains of experience, there were diuers opinions among them, for the difficulties that were propounded by one and other. The towne stands vpon a long tongue of land, right against Sicile, being three miles in compass, it lookes towards Malta, and Gerbe, and is enuironed by the sea on three partes, the fourth being to be attempted by land, and therefore it was so secured as it could not be battered with anie armed vessels, but on two narrow flanks, the rest of the channell being so shallow, as no vessel of anie burthen could approach; so as they found this enterprize more difficult than they did at the first conceiue it. They held the wall towards the firme land to be well fortified, with five towers of equal distance, and a great ravelin in the most eminent place, the which did come farre forth, and was well flanked. The question then was, on which side they should batter it, for to attempt it by sea they held it impossible, for that none but small gallees could come neere it: some would haue the ravelin first battered by land, for that it would annoy them much that should goe vnto the assault, if they should batter the curtain: And others maintained that it was more easie to make a breach in the Curtine, and hauing battered the defences which flanked it, to secure themselves with it, and with some trauesse: for that it was not the custome of warre to attempt a place where it was strongest; but weakest: with this aduice they planted their ordnance, and beganne to batter from the breake of daie vntill night, finding that old wall more hard to ruine than they expected: wherefore hauing viewed the breach, and finding it not sufficient, they left it to make another: And in the meane time they had so battered the defences of the ravelin, as the defendants could no more vse them, and the rather, for that the Spaniards were so farre aduanced with their trenches, as they ouerthrew any that shewed themselves with their small shot, so as they thought they might well attempt it there by scale. They had already retired their ordnance from their first batterie, holding it fruitlesse, and wholly relying vpon their second: wherewith the Generalls were much grieued (not well agreeing among themselves) knowing what a blemish to their reputations, and a losse to Christendome their retreat would bee: wherefore they laied hold of that course, which was held to bee the onelie means to take the towne: They had spent great store of munition in their batteries, and beganne to be scant; and therefore they were fully resolved to scale the ravelin, and to make a diuersion towards the sea, the gallees should at the same instant make an offer to assaile the towne on that side. Wherefore on the second daie of Iuly the Spaniards of the regiment of Sicile, giue an assault to the ravelin, with great courage and resolution, and entred it, where they might haue preuayled, if they of the gallees had come forwards with the like courage, or at the least with that order that was set downe: but hauing shewed themselves too late, they made no diuersion, and they that had entred the ravelin, were repulsed with great losse: which successe did wonderfully assist the whole campe, not knowing what course to take to saue their honours, so as there was small hope in this siege, through the disagreement of the Commanders, either of their seeking to execute his charge apart, whenas the situation of the place required an vnion both of minds and forces.

They wanted souldiers by their continuall skirmishes, the Moores and Turkes defending it with an vndaunted courage; they wanted munition, and were shortened for victualles, hauing none but what came from Sicile, which could be in time provided.

1553

It was therefore resolved to send Marc Centurione to Genoua for new men, who brought in tenne gallies twelue hundred Spanish foot, which were given him by the gouernour of Milan, and some munition from the common weale of Genoua, and the Duke of Florence, which fortified the campe and gaue them courage to make new enterprises. They were aduertised by a Moore, that Dragut being retired into Barbarie, was resolved to relieue them by land, who hauing made the Moores his friends, by his great bounty and valour, gathered a great number of them together, which ioynted to seuen hundred Turkes, hee thought might worke some good effect, who making often attempts, and they of the towne falling out at the same instant, did much annoy the Christians, till in the end many being slaine in a furious skirmish, and many more hurt, hee dispaired of euer doing good. It was not without losse to the victors, who had manie slaine, and of great valour; amongst which was Fernando de Toledo: Some say hee was gouernour of Goulette, and others, marshall of the campe to the Spanish foot. Matters being thus bettered within the campe, for that after this attempt, Dragut retired himselfe to Gerbe, to attend the ruine of his nest, they resolved to make triall of their last force, and not suffer themselves to be surprized with the fall of the lease, which ypon that coast would hazard the losse of their fleet. They concluded therefore to make three batteries, two by land, and one by sea, with a caualier or mount made of timber and earth, and set vpon two gallies, whereon they might plant some peeces of batterie.

Dragut seeks to relieve the townes of Africke

This being brought vnto the wall towards the sea, wrought a wonderfull effect, and so did those at land, for that vse had taught them better the nature of that place, where they had made many attempts and spent much munition. On the tenth day of September they came to the assault with great resolution and good order in all three places; where they found very great resistance, but it was first entred by the sea, where they found the wall weakest, and therefore had made the greater breach: they wonne it foot by foot, and in the end many of them being retired into the rauenin to make their last resistance vnder a Turke, which was their leader, they neuer gaue it ouer, vntill death, so as the slaughter was great: There were manie prisoners taken, some say about tenne thousand, others but seuen thousand. The wealth was not so great as was expected, for that euer since Dragut was Lord thereof, it was nothing but a retreat for theues and pirats. The prisoners were carried into Sicile, whereas the women and children were sold good cheape, the men that were fit for labour, were distributed among the gallies. The viceroy caused the breaches and ruines to be repayed, and left a garrison of Spaniards there, vnder the command of D. Aluaro his sonne. Whilest that the armie remained there for the finishing of the fortifications, they had a cruell storme, which continued foure daies, and did them much harme, after which they returned all home safely to the great ioy of all Italie, for this victorie. Muley Hesen the dispossessed king of Tunes died at this siege. Soone after the Viceroyes returne, it was resolved in the Emperours counsell, that the towne of Africke should be raised, as a place lying too farre off, of great charge, and hard to be kept.

Birth of Henrie Bourbon King of France and of Nauarre.

13 This yere one thousand five hundred fiftie and three Joane of Albret the presumptiue heire of Nauarre, was deliuered of a sonne, and he was named Henrie, who should ioyne the rights of Nauarre to them of the house Bourbon which made him apprehend the Crowne of France.

Dragut after the losse of the towne of Africke, being retired into the Island of Gerbe, hee aduertized Sultan Solymán of this losse, who retained him into his seruice, and honored him with charges. Doria being aduertized in the Spring, that Dragut was gone to Gerbe, whereas by a long narrow channell, hee entred into a poole, wher hee might at ease trimme his gallies, and goe out to his theeuing at pleasure, Doria's armie came sodainly vpon him and besieged him, who to defend his vesselles had a Towrie which garded the channell, and withall, hee had built a Bastion to couer him. Notwithstanding they must in a short time haue all perished with hunger; both hee with his Turkes, and the Moore which was Lord of that Island, who being loath to breake his faith, would not yeelde him prisoner to Doria, yet hee perswaded him to

Dragut besieged at Gerby by Doria's fleet swimming.

1554

A to finde some meanes to escape, else they should bee all famished, for that the Island was but little, barren, and had small provisions to liue withall. Being then forced by necessitie, hee set all his Turkes, Moores, and slaues to worke, who beganne to make a channell in a lower part: the which hee continued daie and night vntill hee came vnto the sea, neyther was hee discovered by the enemies. And lo in the night time hee escaped this imminent daunger with admiration, Doria being much discontented that the Turke had circumvented him with such a stratageme, and moreover that in his retreat hee had taken two of his gallies: but not so satisfied, pursuing this pirate, hee lost seuen more, which were cait away in a storme, with the death of about a thousand persons. The Turkes armie being then at sea, and Dragut ioynted with it, being in all a hundred and fise gallies, and thirtie other vesselles, they entred into the streight of Messina, and tooke the towne of Augusta in Sicile, which in auncient times was called Megara, from thence he landed in the Island of Malta, and attempted the strong Castell of Saint Angelo in vaine: then comming to the Island of Goze, they sacked it, and carried away many slaues. Finally he came into Barbarie, and tooke Tripoly from the Knights of Malta, hauing held it forty yeeres.

And now Doria's gallies left.

There was some discord betwixt Amida King of Tunes, and D. Lewis Perez gouernour of Goulette, who pretended that the Barbarian after the vsuall manner of the Moores had broken his faith with the Emperour, touching the accord made with C. Muley Hesen, when he was put in possession, and therefore hee annoyed him much: so as Amida fearing worse, made a new accord, and bound himselfe to giue euerie yere vnto the Emperour twelue thousand crownes, to pay the garrison of Goulette, and moreover fiftene Barbarie horses, and eigheteene falcons, to furnish wood for the vse of Goulette, to release all Christian slaues within his realme, and not to suffer anie more to be made, and finally, that hee should not receiue anie pirates, but should aide and defend the Emperour with all his forces against any one that should seek to offend him.

Amida a King of Tunes makes a new accord with the emperor.

The marriage of D. John prince of Portugall, sonne to King John the third, and of D. Joane the Emperours daughter, was consummated in the yere one thousand fise hundred fiftie and foure, the which confirmed the friendship and alliances betwixt their houses and states. But this yong prince who was not fully seueenteene yeeres old, dyed within a yere after his marriage, leauing the princeesse his wife with child, who eigheteene daies after was deliuered of a sonne, whom they named D. Sebastian, King John and Queene Katherine hauing not any more children remaining: D. Joane being risen from her child-bed, went into Castille to gouerne the realme in the name of the Emperour Charles her father.

1554 Portugal.

14

Birth of D. Sebastian of Portugal.

The Emperour finding himselfe much broken and troubled with many infirmities, made his will about that time at Brussels, committing in the meane time the execution of many things to his sonne D. Philip, for that which concerned the affaires of Italie: And as for Flanders and the Countreies adioyning, hee himselfe with Queene Marie his sister, widow to Lewis king of Hungarie, would gouerne.

15 This yere a marriage was concluded betwixt D. Philippe prince of Spaine, and Maria Queene of England, for the effecting whereof the Prince made preparation to goe into England, hauing foure score great shippes and fortie carauells, in the which, besides the noblemen and knights which did attend the Prince, with their ordinarie traine there were foure thousand foote, Spaniards to defend the fleet, and to serue in Flanders, in the warre against the French: hee tooke shipping in Biscay hauing a prosperous wind, leaving for gouernesse in Spaine D. Joane his sister, who (as we haue said) was in the beginning of the yere, left a widow by the prince of Portugall. About the middle of Iulie hee came within sight of Hampton, where there was a fleet of sixe and thirtie shippes, some of the Queenes, some of the low Countreies attended to gard him, it being dangerous sailing vpon that coast; there came from South Hampton a shippe royally appointed, being followed by tenne others, which were sent by the Queene to receiue the princes person, and his whole Court, in the which were many noblemen of England land sent to that end, and to present vnto him the order of the Garter, which he received with a ioyfull countenance, and put the garter on his left leg. Hee would not haue anie go into the ship with him, but the duke of Alba, Ruy Gomez de Silva, Antonio de Toledo and Pedro Lopez, the first was his lord steward, the second lord chamberlain, the third master of his horse, and the last a steward also; but afterwards other noblemen and the whole court landed, with their furniture, which continued three days. During the princes stay there, he was entertained with all the state that might be desired, from thence he went to Winchester, where the Queene attended him, and where the marriage was celebrated. On the 25 of that month, there was first read the renunciation of the emperor his father, by the which he resigned vnto him the realme of Naples, & then the articles of the capitulation made in regard of that marriage. The Emperor would not, neither did the English thinke it fit their Queene should marrie with any one that had not the title of a King, so as the realme of Naples was assigned vnto him, and soone after the Duchie of Milan. Whereupon the Marques of Pescara was sent to Naples, to take possession in his name, which ceremonie was done the 25 of Nouember, with great solemnity in the presence of cardinall Pacheco, then viceroy, and of the prince of Bisignano, who was created Syndic of the city to that end.

Marriage of D. Philip and Maria Queene of England.

1555

Philippe made king of Naples.

Death of pope Iulio the third.

Death of pope Marcell.

Pope Paul the fourth.

Death of queene Isabella the emperours mother.

Death of Henry of Albrecht king of Nauarre.

Gouernours of Nauarre.

Death of D. Pedro of Nauarre Marquesse of Cortes.

In the yeere 1555 died pope Iulio de Monte, hee was of a quiet disposition, louing his people, but irrelolute in his greatest affaires; which grew of a desire he had to be friend both to the French king and Emperor, who hauing not that art that was requisite to reconcile their old quarrels, hee found himselfe often deceiued in his designs, and was not beloued of any of them. He was succeeded by Marcell Cernin of Montepulciano, cardinall of Sancta Croix, a man of a verie good life, giuing great hope of his good gouernment; but hee died within three weekes after his election, confirming a common opinion in the people of Rome, that the Popes which change not their name, die presently. His successeur Iohn Peter Caraffa cardinall of Ostia, failed not to change his name, whom they named Paul the fourth; hee was called Cherish or Thietin, of the name of an Order of religious men, whereof hee had bene the Author, at such time as hee was Bishop of Chieti or Thieti in Abruzzo, he was also surnamed the Warrior.

16 The fame yeere Queene Joane mother to the Emperor died in the towne of Tordeillas, hauing benee alwayes troubled in her fences, and distracted, since the death of king Philippe her husband, vntill that she was threescore and fiftene yeeres old: this princeesse troubling her selfe infinitely for that she thought she was condemned, and that they kept her as a prisoner, this ambitious humour of command would not suffer her to take any rest, so as this sharpe and violent humor of melancholie, which she had as it were by inheritance from the Queene D. Isabella a Portugall, wife to D. Iohn the second King of Castille her grandmother, was continued and augmented in her.

17 Henry of Albrecht king of Nauarre died about that time at Pau, in the fiftieth yeere of his age. He ordained as the Kings his predecessours had done, that he would be buried in Pampelone, whose bodie was layd at Lescar in Beame. To whose possessions, and right to the realme of Nauarre, Joane of Albrecht his onely daughter succeeded, being married to Anthony of Burbon duke of Vendosme. This realme detained by the Emperor, was in the meane time gouerned by Viceroyes: about the yeare one thousand fife hundred and fiftie by D. Barnardin Cardenas duke of Magueda, in whose time D. Philippe prince of the Asturias and heire of Castille, Arragon &c. was sworne prince of Viana: and in the yeare one thousand fife hundred fiftie and two D. Bertrand de la Cueva duke of Albuquerque took vpon him the gouernement; it is hee that was in Guipulcoca whenas the French held Fontarrabie. By him there were certaine light enterprises made vpon the frontiers of France, and vpon the towne of Saint Iohn de Lus in the precedent warres, and by the diligence of the said Duke of Albuquerque, the prince D. Philip was declared king of Nauarre with the emperours consent, by the Estates of the Countrey, being assembled at Pampelone, in the yeere one thousand fife hundred fiftie and sixe. About this time D. Pedro of Nauarre Marquesse of Cortes, and Marshall of the realme of Nauarre, died at Toledo, leauing for heire to his possessions D. Ieronimo of Nauarre, in fauour of whom her husband D. Iohn de Benavides, was made marshall.

The

1555

A The warre had benee verie hot these last yeares betwixt the French and the imperials, vpon the frontiers of Artois and Picardie, and in Piedmont; the which had extended into Tuscaine, whereas Peter Stroff, who commanded the French forces, was defeated in battell by the Marquesse of Marignan General for the emperor. Sienna had benee long beleaged by the Imperials, and defended by the French, but in the end it was yeelded, and made subiect to the duke of Florence. But the French notwithstanding this bad successe in Tuscaine, began to grow strong in Piedmont; and seemed to threaten the duchie of Milan, where there wanted a Gouernour, D. Ferdinand Gonzague being called in Flaunders to iustifie himselfe, as hee did, of the flaunders wherewith hee was taxed by D. Iohn de Luna a Spaniard, Castellan of Milan and the Chaunceller Tancerne. Ruy Gomez de Silva embraced this occasion, who being much beloued by king Philip, and finding the duke of Alba to be a great competitor in his Maiesties fauour, hee had practised long by all the policies of a Courtier to send him from Court, besides hee was suspected to fauour them that did molest Ferdinand Gonzague, to the end that being called thence, the duke might haue means to be sent thither, with a large authoritie, the which succeeded according to his desire for the warre increasing in Piedmont, and ill managed by them that commanded, the king resolved, the emperours Councell being also of that minde, to send the duke of Alba, to reduce it into some better estate. But hee would not accept of that charge, which indeed was great and weighty, if hee might not haue such authoritie giuen him, as hee might gouerne with honour, and hope of good successe. Wherefore hee obtained a title, which was neuer before granted to any of the emperours Ministers, passing with full power and authoritie to gouerne the realme of Naples, and the duchie of Milan, as well in peace as in warre, and to gouerne all as if his Majestie were there in person. And for that hee knew how weak the forces were in Italie, for want of money, before his departure hee would haue great prouision made both from the lowe countries, Spaine and Italie; so as with an opinion to doe great matters, not onely by the same of his authoritie and valour, but by the great sum of money which was assigned him, he gaue order for his speedy passage beyond the Alpes. Hee sent Commissions before to haue men, artillery, munition, victuals, and pioneers in a readinesse, and himselfe came in post the twelfth of Iune to Milan, the successe of that warre you may read in is proper historie. The duke of Alba hearing of some alteration intended vpon the confines of the realmes of Naples, was invited to goe thither (notwithstanding that the king had already sent Bernardine of Mendoza thither, with the title of Lieutenant, in the place of Cardinall Pacecco, who went away hearing of the dukes arriual in Italie) making Iohn Baptista Castaldo his Lieutenant in the state of Milan.

Sienna iustly her liberte.

Duke of Alba sent Viceroy into Italie.

Emperor Charles resignes the Government to his son.

18 The emperor this yeare one thousand fife hundred fiftie and fife, broken with toyles of the world, and willing to free himselfe of so great a burthen, and to satisfie the desire of his sonne king Philip, to whom although he had giuen the title of King of Naples, and afterwards of duke of Milan, yet the government remained at the disposition of the emperours councell, he resolved to renounce the absolute government with the titles of all those realmes & states, except the empire, so the which his brother Ferdinand should succeed. So calling his sonne into Flaunders, he made this renunciation with great ceremonies in the town of Brussels, the fife and twentieth day of October in a great assembly of the Nobilitie, Prelates, and deputies of towne, the Queene of Hungarie, and Maximilian the emperours sonne in law, with some other princes being present, but all Spaniards, officers & others of what qualitie soeuer, were put out of the hall, and not any suffered to stay, but such as had busines, or had benee called: So as from that time all matters were handled by the said kings Councell, and he was called both king of Spaine and Castille. But before the resignation of all his realmes and estates in this honourable assembly, he gaue these instructions vnto his Sonne for the better government of his estate.

Eeeee

The

The instructions of the emperour Charles, when hee resigned his estates, vnto his Sonne Philip.

I Haue resolued (most deare son) to come now to the point of resigning into your hands the full administration and absolute gouernment of al my estates & realms, as I haue often told you; wherefore my pleasure is, that against the morning you giue order for the performance of this act with all due ceremonies: you shall also giue order with speed, by sending messengers into euery part, that both gouernors, inferior magistrates and people, acknowledge you (as in duty they are bound) for their superior, yielding you due obedience, & that al persons (except such as are subiect to the empire) take the oath of allegiance. The like oath I will haue the generals of armies & al the commanders of martial forces take, that they may from henceforth in the point of loyalty depend vpon your selfe & no other. The more rare this president is of princes which haue bin content to resigne their estates vnto their successors, the greater are the signs not only of my loue to you, but of the assurance I haue of your good inclination, & my great care to see your estate settled. I could defer this act (as most princes doe) vntill my death; but hauing a desire rather to imitate the smaller number of fathers in this point, I haue chosen willingly by this act in my life time, to make my selfe superior, rather than a companion to any. It is a weak trial of the valor & resolution of a prince, to subdue kingdoms by force, in comparison of conquering himselfe, being thus far content not only to bridle al ambition & desire of rule, but to submit himselfe to a certain kind of obedience. Against this course, sensuality doth strue with all her force, and in exchange of al worldlie satisfactions which are enjoyed by the prerogative of absolute authoritie, setteth before our eyes the rigor of the laws, to which as to a common bounder, princes (setting their authoritie aside) must leuell all their actions, as well as priuat men. To blind our vnderstanding farther with like veiles, the same sensuall consideration stirreth vp by way of admonition a prouident forecast of diuers inconueniences wherinto many fall, that haue made themselves subiect to the will of other men, by the diuersitie of their conceits and censures, the which by the corruption of the care of priuat interest are apt to swarue from the right rule of integritie. It may be that some will be terrified with this common supposition; that princes which are once possessed of authoritie may resigne it at their owne pleasures, but they must resume it at the pleasures of other men. Yet fatherly affection hath preuailed in me more than all these zealous considerations, and quietie also in some part, for finding my selfe now aged (which may be accounted greater in regard of my sickely estate) my satietie of glory in this world, and wearinesse of toiles, finding moreover that by my continuall trauell vnto this day, I could not satisfie in any part the dutie which belongeth vnto the profession of a Christian; I find my selfe inflamed with a most earnest desire to free my selfe from so manie troublesome incombances, and then retire my selfe to a meere religious kind of life, and sit for a Christian. On the other side the consideration of your age, being now ripe and fit for gouernment, together with the expectation which you haue gotten in the world by managing the greatest affaires of Spaine with great iudgement, do moue me the rather to proceed in my resolution. Being moued by all these good considerations, I haue thought it fit to lay this weighty burthen vpon your shoulders, and to cast mine owne, which time and trauell haue now weakened & disabled. I do confidently hope that the subiects of al my provinces shal haue cause to thanke God first, and then me, for this resolution, in respect of his gracious vantage they shall receiue at your hands, succeeding in my place: neither is it burthensome vnto your selfe, that by his occasion during my life, you shall settle your selfe more firmly in my dominions.

It remaineth then (my most deere Sonne) that with the same tender and fatherly affection which hath moued me to this, I put you in minde; also, that about all things you set before your eyes, the feare of God, which ought to be the ground of ciuill gouernment, and so to frame (as much as in you lies) the hearts of your subiects, keeping carefully in mind that which we cannot prouide (by reason of this short & transitory life) by any other means, more worthily & more honorably, than by leauing vnto the world

wher

A when we are gone a good report of our commendable actions. Persuade not your selfe (deare sonne) that because the prerogative of commanding many estates giues great satisfaction and libertie in this world, which euer flattereth the sense of man, that it is not in like manner accompanied with many crosses, and often intermingled with a kind of subiection, either by the restless ialousie with which the mindes of Princes that demeane themselves disorderly are tormented, or in respect of the continual care which they take for the preservation of their estates. Deceiue not your selfe in beleeuing that the regiment hath any kind of proportion with those mightie burthens which are imposed on you by my giuing place; for whereas Spain is a realme of continual succession, and therefore firme and secure, the estates of Flaunders, Italie, and Germanie, are more strange vnto you, besides they are more variable and troublesome in their owne disposition, and their opportunity of crauing aide from Princes which are mighty & buffe which confine vpon their countries is more dangerous. Ad hereunto that many kingdoms bring many cares, for euery final addition (where the burthen was sufficient before) putteth al things out of order, euen as a stomack which hath once receiued what sufficient nature, euery superfluous bit causeth an indigestion & surfet of that which should serue for sustentance. He makes a great trial of himselfe that gouerns one state well, but to gouern more than one well, is almost above the force of man. No man can at one time attend diuers actions, for euery ship must haue her proper pilot, euery armie his general, & much more doth euery estate craue a particuler gouernor. But the greedines of man hath so much exceeded these prefixed bounds, & forced reason with such violent assaults, as the greater princes are the more desirous they are to get. It is now held basenes, not only to depart from any thing already gotten, being more than enough, but not to seek by al means to increase it. But seeing reason is so far ouermastered herein by sensuality, and that our age is wholly disposed to ambitious designs, I will forbear to spend any more idle words, in persuading you to that, the contrarie wherof is generally obserued. I will rather yeeld this libertie to the worlds abuse, with this excuse notwithstanding, that either all, or the greater part (and especially those that are accounted generous) do the like, and would euer do, if opportunity and means were answerable to their desires. But yet I require you with all loue, that you endeavour by all means to correct this common error, and aspiring humor in your selfe, aiming at a greater good, which is, to gouern wel those subiects that are vnder your command: the which is honorable to the world, & acceptable in the sight of God. To this end I must let you vnderstand that the liues of princes stand like glasses before their subiects eyes, who looking daily into the same, as the liuelie mirrors wherunto they should endeavour to conform their courses with al obedience & loyalty, they discern more easily the good & bad that is therein exemplified: wherefore how circumspect and powerfull shoult princes be, they must not thinke that their actions can bee concealed from the world; for although during their own liues they may sometimes scale vp their subiects mouths, stay their tongues and restrain their pens, yet soon after they will breake out with greater violence, & inueigh more bitterly against their honors. Wherefore let your carriage be such towards your subiects, that in respect of the great care they find you haue of the, they may the better like of your directions, repose themselves vpon your wisdom, & liue securely & contentedly vnder the protection of your valor, for that the mutual affection & loue betwixt the prince and his subiects, doth vndoubtedly spring from this root. Remember alwaies, that it is fit that he which gouerneth a state, shold be as vigilant & careful of the quiet & safety thereof, as a shepheard is of his flock, or housholder of his familie. To giue a certaine rule concerning this point, I would haue you to vnderstand that all the cares which princes take of their estates are referred to the consideration of one of these two times, that is, either of peace or war, betwixt which two al our actions are spent, and therefore it is wisely said, that the maiesty of a prince hath as great need to be assisted with a council of great policie & wise fore-cast in time of peace, as of a great and strong armie in time of war. Wherefore a princes whole care & course ought to be in the first time to haue a respect to his subiects quiet & content, and in the later to their securitie, from whence growth satisfaction on both sides. And men without all question are more securely gouerned with good intreaty vnder a voluntarie subiection, than by enforced seruitude, and more firmly kept in obedience

Eccccij

ence

ence by loue than by violence. A Prince should euer prefer the leauing of his dominions to his successors by means of the peoples loue, lesse absolute & more durable, than by their feare, lesse durable, yet more absolute: It is feare, that holds the subjects loues, and bindeth their inuoluntaries, but no longer than some fresh occasio is offered to shake this feeble yoke from their necks, and so settle their loues and loyalties vpon some other mightie potentate, who shall bee both willing and able to protect them from all wrongs, which being once done, they will neuer be willingly drawne to their first obedience. It doth also often happen that the secret hatred which proceedeth from feare, inforceth them without any respect to make attempts for their deliuerie. Some hold that the best way for a prince to keepe his people quiet, is to keepe them poore: but in my opinion they stray much from the path of policie: The reason is, for that euery hope or likelihood of bettering their estates vnder other rulers, moueth them to lay new plots, and to desire innovations. I doe as little allow of their policie, who to diuert their subjects from practising any alterations hold them in continuall action, especially if their employments be barbarous and base; for besides that it breakes their hearts, experience doth teach that for desire of ease they will affect alterations, for as the end of feare deserues reproofe, so the means that leade therunto are also reprouable. How much the way of winning the peoples loue ought to be preferred before the course of keeping them in awe, may easily appeare by a due consideration of the causes from whence these affections haue their beginning: The causes of the peoples loue are iustice, gracious vsage, and fauours, all which deserue praise: The causes of their feare are grieuances, ill vsage and oppression, which merit blame. Look what the cause is, such is commonly the effect, whereby it followes necessarily, that as out of loue is drawne a regiment more firme and stable, though more moderate, so out of feare proceeds a kind of power more absolute in shew, but yet lesse durable: the like proportion holdes in the peoples hearts, for where they loue there is all satisfaction, mirth, sweet conuersation and dutifull respect, but where they feare, there is suspicion, strangeness, discontent, quarrels, melancholie. Out of the impressions which feare breeds wee can expect no better fruits than hatred, but from that deuotion which loue kindly assured confidence, whereupon we ground the common prouerbe, Loue is among kind folkes, and feare among enemies. The parts which beside respect of Religion, are required in a Prince for the better government of his estates, & settling in his subjects hearts a loue, and reuerent respect both of his person & state, are chiefly three, Faith, Iustice & Continencie: Faith makes him intire in all his proceedings, and a man of his word, for without it no man would giue credit either to his practises or promises: Continencie makes him to be reuerenced with respect, and imitated with commendation; it giueth him an excellent aduantage in a large field; correcting severely the faults of subjects that offend in that degree, the which he could not doe without blushing if himselfe were culpable: Iustice teacheth a prince how to reward the good and to punish the bad, to giue euery man his due, to restraime men by correction that are apt to erre, & to encourage others by his rewards that are desirous to deserue wel: besides it makes the princes blood, his honor, and his estate secure, without which vertue no force is able to keep the subjects faithfully affected to their Soueraigne, for it is the propertie of all people when as they neither find reward of good deserts, nor punishment of offences, to grow first into distrust, & then into despair, which passions corrupt their mindes, hauing once gotten the masterie. Wherefore let the due consideration of what is iust and honest be alwaies preferred in all your princely purposes, that being once settled in the subjects hearts, that iustice is duely administered, they will euer remaine satisfied with your direction, especially if besides this fauour, they liue in abundance, hauing free traffike to all parts, and quietnesse of minde, for men toile and trauell during the course of their liues, not only for their Princes & superiors, but for themselves and families. Doubtlesse, to maintain the people in abundance of all things necessarie for the preseruacion of their liues, is not only commendable in a prince, but doth worke great effectes in winning the hearts of men, the which may bee easily provided for, by a carefull fore-sight of the times of death, making diligent prouision for necessities in due time, so as the benefite may wholly

A lie redound to the peoples ease, and not to the princes gaine, by inhaunting of prices and preferring of priuate benefite before publike content. A prince may alwaies hold himselfe rich when as his subjects that liue vnder him, are rich; for vpon any extremitie he shall bee frankly releued by their beneuolence: good vsage setteth their loues, and bindeth their deuotions. Experience teacheth, that fauours of this kind are neuer forgotten, that a small consideration in time of need winnes more vnfaigned loue than greater benefites when there is plentie: And that those fauours haue alwaies had deepest impressions in mens gratefull thought, which concerne maintenance and the preseruacion of life in time of necessitie. It is sufficient for a prince in this cause of prouision, to take order that hee lose not by the bargaine, or if hee desire to gaine something for the releefe of other charges, let it bee no more than an honest merchant with a good conscience may gaine, for to these boundes may the politicke prouision of princes ayme, but no farther, either in respect of honour or authoritie. If a Prince will bee beloued of his people, hee must giue them cause to thinke that hee loueth them; assuring himselfe that their thankfulness must grow from his desert, their loue from his prouidence, & their content fro the peace and securitie which they enioy vnder him; and that according to the fruits of fauour which the people reape by the Princes policie, they frame themselves to liue contentedly, vnder the gracious shadow and protection of his princely wings, relying vpon his wisdom and carefull gouernement. Otherwise there is no doubt but, subiection being in it selfe both burthen some and odious, they would soone take some new course to settle their quiet and securitie by some other means, freeing themselves from all cause of feare, which (as I haue said before) is lesse durable, and lesse secure, and therefore lesse pleasing to the state of a Christian Gouernour. Let no Prince imagin that with solemne shewes and publike sights alone subjects are delighted and pleased in their own conceits, for those things are not acceptable, but whe as their minds are satisfied in matters which do import them more. Vpon this ground and to the same end I must also aduise you in any case to vse that moderation which is fit in charging the people with tributes or any other kind of impositions, for albeit that States cannot bee ruled without some kind of releefe, in respect of the manie occasions and excessive charges wherewith Princes are D burthened in times of peace, but much more in time of war; yet vnto euery thing there belongs a meane, which in all occurrences is the perfect rule of humane actions, especially those which any way grieue the subjects hearts, considering that euery princes power is grounded vpon their conformitie to his directions and vniforme assent to seruice and honor him: wherefore this meane must be sought out with all care, & being found it must be put in practise with great temperance; and worthily preferred before all other courses, seeme they neuer so commodious and profitable. If the continuall toile of warre hath inforced mee at anie time to holde a heauie hand ouer my subjects in this kinde, I protest this course was alwaies against mine owne liking. Touching this point of obseruing a conuenient meane in all impositions and taxes, you must consider that the reuenues of a prince, whether they be publike or priuate, are raised two waies, the first by augmentation of the old, the other by addition of new, for vnto these two heads all the intentions to get money which are put in practise by the princes of our age may be reduced.

In like maner the waies by which money may be drawn from the subject & others, are voluntary or forced. The voluntarie may be contained in the sale of customs, offices, and other like alienations of commodities and rents. That which is forced may in like maner be exemplified in such taxes and ordinarie tributes, as are imposed vpon the people with out recompence: the first hath in it a kind of sweetnesse, for that it is seldom vrged by necessity: wherefore it is requisite to limit the other kind by this, and when necessity requires rather to sel offices & rents, than to inuent any new grieuances to the people. I haue many times resolved with my selfe to deale after this maner, but haue euer bin diuerted by occurrences from bringing into my state that custom of selling of offices, and making magistrats for life, which is vsed in the court of Rome, for it is a matter of great import, & a means to bring a sudden gain into the princes purse, for the next vacatio, either by remoue, imprisonment, or death, yeeldeth as much or very little lesse than the ordinarie rent, which by their accompt is to bee answered. No doubt this was a course of great consideration, and of especiall commoditie to the superiour, as may bee gathered by this reason of experience: That the Popes in how great povertie soever they finde the Church at their first entrie to the Sea, yet they neuer want meanes to procure money after the first beginning of their government.

1555

It is true that in the Court of Rome, as it should seeme, the sale of Offices, which haue annexed vnto them ordinarie administration of iustice, brings not so great danger vnto the State, as it would doe in other Realmes; for that auarice is not the chiefe object in that place, of mens intents, but rather hope to raise themselves to greater honour from this ground, and access to all times vnto the Pope, vpon this occasion, which carrieth with it many other especiall comodities. But the Princes of the world may in like manner deuise to set ambition in the eye of Officers, as the object and end of their offer to buie Offices, by rewarding such as carrie themselves well with great honours, and disgracing those that shall deale otherwise. By this meanes you may change the object of your Officers; from courtousnesse to a desire of rule, and to supply the humours of authoritie, which is alwaies accessarie to Ambition.

The second meanes to seeke reliefe from the subiect (which I termed forced) is heauie and odious, yet by the good discretion of Ministers which deale in those affaires, and by the presidents of other countries lying nere about, where they are oppressed by their Governours, this grieffe may bee much qualified. The Prince in this case may doe much good vnto himselfe, by giuing easie access vnto his person when occasion doth serue; for hee must take a fit time to acquaint them with his occasions, hee must seeke in some sort to free himselfe of their hard conceits, and ease the other part by fauours of other kinde: hee must iustifie his actions in the iudgement of the world, eyther by prouing the cause of this grievance to bee verie vrgent, or colouring the same so cunningly as it may at the least appeare so, or endeavouring to send some away satisfied, if it bee possible. This not voluntarie, or forced way, is subdiuided into two other parts, into perpetuall burthens, as customes, or temporarie: as subsidies: and this later at the time of the first imposing, makes people to grieve for a while in respect of the paine which pincheth them, but this grieffe cannot long endure, for that one instant, and one paiement freeeth them, especially if the prince make protestation of his vnwillingnesse, and with all make apparent to the peoples meane capacitie; the necessarie cause that vrgeth him thereunto. The other kind is farre more grievous and offensefull, albeit in time the people grow better acquainted with that course, and beare it as well as they can, for that there is no remedie. Sodaine impositions, although they seeme grievous at the first, yet by a prince whose lineall succession is not well settled, ought to bee preferred, as portions which are more sharp and yet more quick in operation, are before those that are more gentle, yet long and tedious in curing the sick; and the rather in this case, for that Princes colers are suddenly replenished. Above all things you must haue a great care, that during the leuie of this aid, your Officers adde nothing to the burthen, either by extremitie, dissatisfaction, or demand of fees, for we find daily that by such extraordinarie extortions, men are more incensed in respect of the wrong and violence, then with the principally, which is disbursed for the satisfaction of their Soueraigne. The subiect is much impouersished by this hard course, and yet the Prince reapes no benefit thereby; nay, when hee shall haue need to craue a new supply and aide from them, hee findes them more feeble and lesse able to relieue his wants. Rents increase by raising new impositions vpon occasions; by bettering the trade, by reducing forfeitures to the princes pleasure, by limiting all necessarie charges, and cutting off such as are superfluous. The field of raising new rents is exceeding large, yet the prince is bound to walke in it with all possible respect, so farre as it concernes the peoples grievance: hee must especially abstaine from imposing of heauie customes vpon such things as his subiects are enforced to send abroad, as Sicilie doth graine, and the Realme of Naples wine and Silke. The like consideration is to be had of things brought in from foraine parts for the supply of other wants at home: for

117

1555

A vpon these two reasons experience and time hath grounded the ordinarie traffique that holdeth betwixt countries for their naturall necessities. Wherefore in these causes princes ought to haue a care that their reuenues may bee answered in a meane, rather than by excess; for the more moderate customes are, the greater store of needfull things are brought home vnto our doores, in respect of the great gaine which marchants make by selling at the second hand: and for the like respect the greater store of superfluous things are transported by the subiects into foraine parts. By this meanes the rent is rayled large about the measure which a great imposition would yeeld: The people want no foraine commodities for their reliefe, and yet their purses are filled by the vent of superfluous things at home; so as they may be the better able both to satisfie their princes custome, and contribute also vpon such reasonable occasions as shall occur in policie: vpon other things which are rather brought in for wantonnesse and pleasure, than for necessarie vse, a more weightie imposition may bee layed, for the estate (which may well forbear the losse of commodities) is not dammed thereby, if some, to satisfie their humors, will needs buy, it skilleth not though they pay somewhat deerer for their fantasies. Besides, some are discouraged sometimes with the great price, which otherwise would acquaint themselves too much with the pleasures which make men effeminate. Princes that seeke to increase their old rents, by raising of their wonted impositions, must be careful, that they doe it rather with a limitation of the customers commoditie and gaine, than leaue it, than with the peoples losse, that answers it: for a grievance in this kind were in effect as ill as any other imposition. There must be a care also taken, that a convenient respite may be allowed the subiect for the payment of his taske. As for example, if the prince haue need of money in Summer, then to seile the subiects the Winter before; for they are apt to take the time of this delay for a kind fauour. This leuie of money must beput into the hands of ordinarie officers, and not to appoint any new to disquiet them, or to rise their wealth, vnder colour of seruice to the State; for such parts are most hatefull vnto them. But, as I sayed before, a prince ought first to consider, whether it be possible by selling or ingaging some part of his reuenues, to supplie the vrgent occasions of his estate, before hee seeke to helpe himselfe by the purse and sweat of his subiects: for otherwise, as the wiser sort perceiue that, whatsoeuer they doe or say, they shall bee still forced to contribute to their superiour; that on the one side their old burthens are increased, and on the other, all meanes cut off, by which they might haue vent for their commodities; all traffique either ouerthrowen, or much decayed, by the which they were wont to releue their wants with foraine commodities, it is not possible but they will eagerly desire an alteration, and attempt it by all meanes possible. Touching this point of molesting the subiects with impositions as little as may be; it importeth much, that they be agreeable to the nature of the country where they liue; that the people may beare the burthen more easily; for from those places which yeeld nothing but men, princes may not demand money. England yeeldeth an example of this kind; for on that side which lyeth next to Seeland, they selle not their borderers. You your selfe may draw some money out of Spaine, Germanie, and Flanders, when occasion doth serue, but out of Italie both men and treasure. Moreover, when you impose any burthen, it is not amisse to set the rate in the beginning high, that the people may hold it as a fauour, when as, at their request, it is brought to some reasonable tearmes. They may be eased also, by admitting their excuses which they make in respect of time, and giuing care with patience to that which they are able to alledge for some tollations; you must alwayes haue a care to leaue them satisfied in some sort, at the least to comfort them with kind words, and make them capable of the just cause that moued you. You must lay before them the times, the reasons, and the occasions which inforce this course, providing alwayes, that all gracious dealing may be thought to proceed from your selfe; and whatsoeuer is offensefull, sharpe or odious, referre it to your officers. You must moreover haue an especiall care, that all profits so deerely purchased with the peoples groanes, be brought to your owne hands, and not employed on distributed to the priuate vse of persons that are put in trust to gather it vnder you. It importeth also, your estate very much (deere soine) to keepe credit with the marchant, which will alwayes succeed happily; so long long as you assigne vnto them conuenient commodities, in consideration of their bonds, G and maintaine them euer in securitie, especially with the state of Germanie you must take this course, for the holding them thus engaged in your estates and realmes, by reason of their interest and bonds, without erecting of any sorts, which they detest much. You may no lesse assure your selfe of that Estate which is of great importance in Italie, than the French king held the Florentines tied vnto him by the trade of Lions, as wee haue found by plaine experience. Now seeing it is not possible that a prince of many estates and countries should alone be able to gouerne them all, nor any one of them (all things considered) it is requisite that this defect be supplied by the meanes of ministers and de- H puties, that may helpe to support so great a burthen: Whereupon it followes of necessitie, that to chuse such as be worthie and sufficient in all respects, is a matter which doth much import the State; wherefore I will speake vnto at large of this matter, to the end you should not want a rule to know them, and employ them in the seruice of the State. I would haue you consider, that the properties belonging to worthie ministers are these:

First and principally, wisdom and vnderstanding how to manage their affaires that are committed to their charge; secondly, loue to their superiour; and lastly, vertue in themselues: to the end that by wisdom they may haue knowledge, and by vertue disposition to execute the trust: for otherwise, either through ignorance they shall not know, or by frowardnesse refuse, or through malice grudge, to discharge their duties. These are the qualities without the which the prince cannot relye vpon their worth, nor the peo- I ple be pleased with their actions. But as there is great difficultie both in finding out and observing such, so experience doth teach, that all princes which haue beene serued by men of such sufficiency in these degrees, haue ruled happily, with great contentment to their subjects, and eternall glory to themselves, notwithstanding that they haue themselves bin somewhat dissolute: for what made the name of the Emperour Iustinian immortal, besides his profound knowledge, but the great worth of his counsellors & ministers, both in peace and war; for by their helpe in both seasons he effected great matters. Doubtlesse it is an argument of great wisdom in a prince, when as nature hath not enabled him in the first kind of perfection, which is, out of his owne sufficiency to rule the State, yet at the least to marshall himselfe in the second ranke, which is, of such as employ men in their ser- K uice that are capable; for thus they draw the quintessence of many pregnant wits to their owne vse, and grow to vnderstand more than a number that know by themselves: as foure eyes must needs see more than two, by the course of nature. But wee may hold that prince vnfortunat, which refecth in a third proportion, being neither able of himselfe, nor willing to giue eare to others that are more sufficient. A prince can neuer want meanes to replenish his owne Court with men fit for his seruice, if he will be carefull to seeke them out where they are, esteeme them, and acknowledge their deserts, by good effects. Let him rather make the first motion, and not deprive himselfe by daintinesse of a worthie seruant:
for that prince is rather proud than politicke, who perswadeth himselfe, for that his treasures are greater than other mens, therefore euerie man should creepe before they L call, especially the wise and vertuous, who many times carrie minds as haucie as princes, and in that respect desire not to submit their liberties to the will of any man, preferring the freedom of a meane fortune, before the golden fetters of a prince that either knows them not, or regards them not. The reason is, for that wisdom and vertue are in themselves a kind of superiouritie, or rather the verie true superiouritie it selfe, for that wee see that Empires, treasure, fortunes, fauours, and natures ornaments, are subiect to corruption and change, by alteration of time, or accidents, as it pleaseth God to dispose: But the riches of the mind, such as wisdom and vertue are, can neuer be diuided from the partie that possesseth them. The minds of honest men are much estranged, when they find how little their superiors esteeme them, preferring a wicked and lewd person before a loyall heart, a flatterer before a faithfull minister, a man puffed vp with vnderferued fauours, before him that seeketh to purchase grace by desert, an idle drone before a painefull officer. Those princes erre exceedingly, which want iudgement to conceiue, that vertue cannot bee valued, that it deserueth more than any one congiue: that all fauours which a prince bestoweth vpon worthie seruants, are both honourable

A rable and profitable, and that a prince cannot employ his treasure with greater gainie by interest in any trade, than by rewarding such as are both vertuous and politike. Nothing can bee made more plaine; nothing can be found more necessarie; considering how impossible it is, that any prince should either winne great honour, or achieve great matters, without able ministers. Beware you erre not in this point, but seeke for worthie seruants, and retaine them in your seruice with all honour and preferment, setting this downe for a Maxime, That in a matter of importance a resolute and wise Counsellor shall stand you more in stead with his sound aduice and iudgement, than your legions of souldiers with their armes, or whole mountaines of treasure in your cofers.

B Doe not beleeeue, for that a prince is wise and vigilant himselfe, he therefore needs not any able ministers; nay, you may obserue, that the greatest princes of the world haue alwayes sought to draw vnto them the greatest number of rare men. Who was euer attended on by a greater number of this qualitie, than Cesar? whom I hold to haue beene the greatest prince that to this day, both in peace and warre, hath either ruled ouer prouinces, or commanded armies. It seemeth rather, that these proportions and qualities are linked together with an indissoluble knot, that when the prince is valiant and wise, so are his officer, when the prince is faint-hearted, so are his ministers.

C If we allow a grounded excellencie in the prince, it is to be presumed, that the same can neuer brooke an insufficiency in those that attend on him, whereas the weakenesse of the princes iudgement cannot be capable of his seruants excellencie. From hence our common prouerbe taketh his first originall; Like will to like: Equals are most apt to consent in loue; and hee that will ghesse probably of the disposition of a stranger, whom hee knoweth not, must consider with whom hee keepeth companie. Consider of this point of employment and election with an especiall care (my most deere sonne) and herein it shall be sufficient for you to imitate and follow me, your father, alone, who during the course of my life haue indeuoured to haue about me men of greatest esteeme, both for counsell and execution. To the care which is to bee had in respect D of them, for their vertue, wisdom, integritie, and loue, I would haue you also for your owne part bee carefull to employ such persons in the affaires of Italie, as are best acquainted with their humors, and are most suitable to the conditions of that State; providing that they may bee thoroughly instructed in those points, without respect of any priuate interest, or speciall loue or bond to any. The like course I would haue you take in Spaine, and your other Estates, especially in chusing the leaders of your armies; for vndoubtedly the fitnessse of your ministers for those places which they hold, is a matter of verie great importance in all actions of gouernement. Wee read of Hanibal, That he was most fortunate at land, yet verie vnhappie in all actions belonging to the sea. And how many doe wee find in generall experience, which are E exceeding fit for the nature of one people, and vsuit for another. Sometimes wee meet with persons absolutely wise, and that carrie themselves with great commendations in all places, and at all times, and vpon all occasions that are incident to their charge; but wee find them rare: of others that are onely fit for speciall affaires there is no great plen-tie in the world, and therefore they must bee employed in that facultie wherein they are held most sufficient to serue: for it is a matter of no small importance, to make choyce of such a minister to any end, as is found most excellent in his owne profession.

F Make your speciall choyce out of diuers ages, and diuersitie of gifts, for so shall you bee sure to light on those that are most fit. Bee carefull that vnder your most trustie and most sufficient Counsellors, some may be trayned and instructed for the seruice, when their date is at an end, least otherwise the fortune of your great gouernment seeme to be bounded within the terme of their continuance; for priuat persons haue their periods, but policies in States well gouerned should be perpetuall. Let the Romans serue for an example in this case, who to prevent the danger that might grow by committing the burthen of direction to one onely man, assigned by way of succession (in case he

he should perish that had the chiefe command (sundrie gouernors vnto euerie armie. In any case beware you do not lay your most important causes in a time of danger, vpon the shoulders of such persons as were neuer made acquainted with affaires of equal weight: When any such occasion doth happen, your safest course is, alwaies to preferre the judgement of your eldest counsellors, who speake out of experience.

Aime not at honor in the choice of your counsellors; respect those of a middle age, where gifts are answerable: for as the younger sort is commonly euer credulous and bold, so others that are neuer called vntill their later daies, are suspicious, incredulous, irresolute, and commonly leaue the world before they can be made fit for their calling: but they that haue made proofe of their sufficiencie for the space of many yeres, and vpon verie dangerous occasions, waxing white headed with the toile of seruice, and the cares of gouernement, ought euer to be reuerenced and respected, as a necessary wret to turne the jarring strings of disagreeing humors at a councill boord, to perfect harmonie. I would also haue you in this point of imitating the militarie discipline of Rome, to make a medley of your councill, betwixt wise old men, and yong men of great hope: for such a speare, like vnto that of the Pithagorians, consisting of so many fundrie parts, as treble, meane, & base, will yeeld that sweet consent which is to be wished in all policie. By this meane princes shall not need to make their musicke of one string, they need not build vpon one hope, nor addict themselves to one certaine qualitie: for many times among those that are yong of yeaues, we find persons old of vnderstanding, and among aged men, counsellors that haue greene heads, and flourish both in wit and fortitude. In this case, such yong men are accounted old, and such old esteemed yong: The middle sort are to be marshalled on either side, as their conditions and qualities incline to one or other, more or lesse; for ministers ought not to be respected for their yeaues onely, but for their judgements, manners, and conditions in the execution of their charges. And yet, besides these ordinarie obiects, according to the age and qualitie of euerie one, seeke also to haue knowledge of their natures and priuat affections: for it is not sufficient for a generall that conducteth an armie through any countrey, to haue a generall Idea of the countrey in his mind: but it is requisite he should haue a particular knowledge of the countrey it selfe, whether it abound with water & other necessarie prouisions, or be in want, which first of all causeth a dearth, and then ruine. A prince must euer presuppose, that although the quicke conceit of some ripe heads, makes them soone to take instruction of a new charge, recommended by superiors, and to grow fit for the managing thereof, the greater part notwithstanding is for a time vncapable, and during that time may commit disorders, and offend the subiects in their customes, priuiledges, and rights: which, seeme they neuer so sleight, either in respect of themselves, or of any other accidents of lesse account, yet must they needs be valued according to the rate which they had in generall opinion, and the great disturbance which is bred by want of obseruation; for small sparkles may kindle a great fire, if they be not quencht in due time, with moderation.

Now that you may the better know who are the wise and worthie ministers, that deserue imploiment in your estate, you must vnderstand, that true wisdom may be gotten by foure meanes especially: The first is, by experience of occurments in the world; wherefore it is said, That they which practise much, must needs learne much: And this kind of wisdom our auncestors exemplified in their owne kings, the Greekes especially in Agesimachus and Meneleus: who by varietie of matters put into their hands, and by occasion of that which by their accidents and consultations they generally vnderstand, may easily grow wise, and learne (as the proverbe saith) at the charges of other men. The second meane is, by the instruction of histories; for thus they come to knowledge both of actions and reasons, in times past; they make their applications and effects, and thereby setting downe rules vnto themselves, for the direction of their owne affairs, not onely purchasing honor and reputation by their knowledge, but wax great by the toile of other men. Of this kind we may find paterns both in Solon and Socrates. The third course is, by travelling into diuers countries, and by obseruing the diuersitie of lawes and policies: for this particular collection of foraine wisdom, may be sensibly applied to particular occasions of their owne. And this kind of wisdom is ascribed vnto Nisser by Antiquitie. The fourth

meanes

meanes to attaine vnto it, is, by long life: for although a man should learne but one good lesson euerie yere, yet time, at length, would make him generally wise. Neslor may stand in this degree for a faire president, of whom it is plainly said, that he vnderstood very much for that he had liued very long. And I cannot see how a yong man may be capable of a try of the other three first kinds of wisdom, both for that he cannot in a short time gaine so great experience as is necessarie to this effect; and moreover, youth wanteth that well seasoned consideration that is requisite: neither, are a few yeaues sufficient for men to, travel, well, and to obserue that which breedeth judgement. Lastly in respect of the defect and want of time, he cannot draw a true picture of that apprehension which old age hath gathered. I denie not, but by the meanes of some prudent ministers & counsellors, a yong prince may attaine to all foure kinds at once, if he retaineth about him a conuenient number of men, wise in their degrees, and not onely vse their counsell in his great affaires, but with all regard follow it.

Wherefore there ought to be great regard had in the choice of these men, especially to chuse wise men, which by way of instruction and historie, can conceiue, especially with any small experience, of the affaires of the world, and the benefit of their many yeaues, which is the most secure, and least deceitfull mixture of these kinds of wisdom, that can be limited, saying that those persons which are best furnished with all these kinds, ought to be preferred before all others. The wisdom of ministers ought to be referred to the same two times we haue formerly spoken of, of peace and warre, whereunto all the considerations, forecast, and prouisions of a prince, ought to be directed.

The goodnesse of ministers and officers, which is the second part that is required in them, may be judged of by the good name which they do carrie, and by their good behaviours. A man is said to do well foure waies, by chance, by cunning, by the beginning of the habit it selfe, and after that by vsage and practise, if it be fully perfected. Good workes done by chance, or to a cunning end, are distinguished from those that are done at the first beginning of the habit, for that they neuer spring from any virtuous intention, as the other do, though both may be indifferently accompanied with good effects. And for that the secrets of the mind are hard to be discovered by the judgement of man, for that God alone doth see the inward part of our hearts: wherefore men do greatly erre in making vse of them, being impossible to attaine to a perfect knowledge of those persons, but by a continuall obseruation of their actions with speciall care. In the first kind, which is of things done well by chance, it is not possible there should be any good intention, for that the partienner thinks of that he hath in hand. Much lesse in the second, where all is directed to a cunning end, for that malice bears the sway. The third and fourth degrees, where men either begin a virtuous habit, or haue attained it, the intent is alwaies good; yet the effects and operations of the third doe not alwaies fall out so happily as of the fourth: for the third proceeds sometimes from a sence not fully seised, nor thoroughly corrected by the restraint of reason, & raines of vertue, which onely ruleth their intents, and accompanieth their actions, else there should be more difference betwixt the members of this distinction. They that by cunning will seeme vertuous, in respect of endlessse feare least their ill meaning should be brought to light, standing in the mid way to the marke which is common to all men, like a bow drawne from the other extreame, they cast false shadowes of suspicion, linger in mistrust, and affright themselves with fancies: their daies are troublesome, their nights vnquiet, their cares infinit, and therefore our Saviour might boldly say, He parietes pelles. But they that are sincerely and intirely vertuous, relying onely vpon their bountie, and worth, liue in continuall peace, with content of mind, and without all feare of oppression, I refresh in the will and duetie to their superiours, either by binding them by rewards and fauours, or by contenting them with honour and authoritie, or by sisting them with such commodities and pleasures as they most affect, or by setting their inclinations to deserue well, in offering occasions whereby they make proofe of their fidelities: For as it is most proper for mans nature, to proceed with courage where they find their seruice thankfully rewarded vpon iust cause, so princes are apt to trust vpon upon duetiall of their ministers integritie. But the way to make them constant and sure against all assaults, is, to tye them, not with any single bond, but with all these together, if it bee possible. Let no prince thinke, that it is more safe, in consultation touching his affaires of Estate, to trust domesticals, and such as are most deere unto him for other ordinarie causes, but lesse able to aduise, before others that bee farther off, so as they bee more fit, onely of feare to seeme more vnthankfull to the first, and deprive them of their due: for the end will be, that by this opinion hee shall preferre men of no worth nor vnderstanding, before others that are more sufficient and necessarie; which is the most absurd and sencelesse error which hee can commit, touching this point of election of ministers. I would haue all other considerations of riches, fauour, and all other gifts of fortune, yeeld in your esteeme to vertue and worthinesse: for where a prince finds qualities agreeable, it is his part to thinke how to enrich and aduance them; for the meane their estates are whom the prince shall raise to high degrees, the greater shall their bond appeare, and the more sincere and firme their duties and affections. In rewarding your seruants good deserts, I would wish you to endeavour as much as you may to gratifie them according to your desires, and to haue an eye to their owne ends: for some seeke ease onely, and abundance of commodities belonging to this life; others hunt after honour and authoritie; and some couet satisfaction in other kinds, according to their feuerall humors, or as such fauours either are indeed, or at the least are held by them most suitable to their conditions and qualities: without respect of these affections of men, a prince should often loose the thanks which bountie expects: for many desire rather to fast than to be crammed against appetite. Among other rules it shal not be amisse to note, that nothing bindeth loue more firmly, than when a prince bestowes a benefit out of his owne free choice, without the instance or soliciting of any fauor. The first we must ascribe to the fauour of our Soueraigne alone; the second we may diuide betweene the prince that giueth, and the friend that moueth it. Some haue commended and allowed a distrust and disagreement betweene ministers of State, as if it were the best meane to acquaine a prince with the truth; but this course was neuer pleasing to my humor, neither could I euer find how so bad a cause as discord, could euer produce any commendable effects in a princes service. A kind of emulation is not amisse, so as it tend onely to incite honourable minds to shew themselves more worthie of the princes fauour, to deserue better in his service, and to be fit for a better place when time shall serue, as we read of two of Cæsar Corporals: but in no wise let it grow to malice or dislike; for the prince may neuer shew more fauor to one than to another, as it falleth out sometimes, for that it will not be possible alwayes to keepe the ballance euen, but the partie which receiueth lesse is tormented with ialousie, fretted inwardly with spight, blinded with disdain, and all, in the end, turneth to the prejudice of the princes service, and the publicke action.

Among these, and out of these, ought the prince to make choice of a sufficient number to serue him in the place of counsell, and employ the rest in other seruices belonging to the State: for being guided by their aduice & counsell, he can hardly erre, but may rather rest assured, that his wortheie acts shal purchase honor & immortalitie to his name; wherefore strue to abound in these rather than in any other treasure whatsoeuer: and feare not least facilitie, in being led and directed by the aduice of worthie men, should rob you of the honor which belongeth to your rare deserts; for that the chiefeest commendation is not ascribed vnto him that either giueth counsel, or hath charge to execute, but vnto the prince, vpon whose resolution all depends, and who out of his iudgement and discretion, assigns to euery man that part for which he is most fit, in his owne opinion: for although there may be aptnesse in the timber, yet to make choice of the best for building, and employ it to the best vse, shewes the skill of a good workman. Besides, if the prince, out of a i jealous and suspicious humor, be mistrustfull in this point, how easie a matter is it at all times, vpon diuers colours and pretences, to change, alter, or deferre his resolution, so as whatsoeuer they inuent shal be ascribed to his own perfection. A prince can neuer want occasions to sound their opinions, and to make profit of their deep iudgements, without imparting the secret of his purposes to any one of them.

My meaning was to discourse with you about this point of chusing able ministers, at large,

A large, for that, in my opinion, the weight of this subiect required no lesse: wherefore I repeat it againe, That a prince can neuer become great, nor maintaine his greatnesse, without the seruice and assistance of sufficient counsellors & officers: And therfore (my most deere sonne) I require you carefully to open both your eyes and eares in this respect, and to be diligent in searching out the qualities of men, for your better instruction: All offices, administrations, and governments, which are giuen for a short limited time, are most secure from those suspicions & ialousies which long continuance in office and authoritie doth breed; being impossible, in so short a space, to make parties, or to procure followers. And although this course be not alwayes free from those dangers and discommodities, which are incident to gouernors, who either want experience, or acquaintance with state; yet a moderate exchange ought, in my conceit, to be preferred before a perpetuall: for the people (be the gouernors neuer so religious and iust) seele a kind of fastidie at the least, and as well in this point as in others, delight, in change; vsing the same as a counterpoise to that irksome loathsome nesse which groweth out of the continuall vse of any one thing without alteration.

Let your maner in giuing audience to suitors be easie, liberal, and ordinarie, whereby not only the subiect is pleased with the same, reputing this access as a respite, for that it giueth them opportunitie to ease their grieuances by their superiors fauor: but on the other side it maketh the prince more wise, when euery day by this meane he cometh to the knowledge of new accidents, new impressions, & new opinions. The prince also cometh to vnderstand all the affairs, humors, passions, and plots of his own subiects, and their interest, which is, as I said before, one kind of wisdom. To this end therefore, and for a thousand other good effects, a prince ought to visit all his estates often, but in such sort, as many progresses and extraordinary charges which belongs vnto them, may not be burthen-some to his subiects, and a blemish to his owne authoritie: for things that are accounted excellent, if they be made common, they loose a great part of their estimation in the eyes of the world. If their progresses be seldom, in like maner, they giue some suspicion of neglect, and carelesse regard of the peoples good; they giue encouragement to depuries and magistrates, to follow their own humors: and moreover, they make their subiects despair of all hope of refuge to the princes presence, and of recourse to the same in time of necessity: for, as I said before, this is a meane to ease the subiect, and to curre the magistrat. In giuing audience, let your care be to send euery man away with some satisfaction, or at the least with good liking of your affabilitie. Heare such as offer you petitions with patience, and answer them with compassion. Prouide alwaies, that the power of those that are most mightie ouerway not the right of them that are miserable; haue no respect of persons, but looke only to the iustice of the cause. If any man appeare before you in a rightfull matter, who is otherwise ill spoken of, regard not at that time his conuersation, but his complaint, nor what he is in life, but what he speaketh. Now to the end the parties which haue recourse vnto you, appealing from your officers, or charging them with corruption, may be more thoroughly conuincid by due prooffe, and more easily induced of themselves to confesse their faults, stretch out your hand as farre as in honor you may, in granting them new Iudges, or Commissioners, who together with other ordinarie officers, will be more careful to carrie themselves vprightly in such offices as are assigned to their cares. The way to plant a firme resolution in your officers, to deserue well, is, to reward them bountifully that haue shewed their worth: for by this meane, by the discharge of his dutie in a meane place, he will endeavour to be held worthie of an office of more esteeme: notwithstanding there is great reason why the prince, vpon these occasions, should haue due respect to the credit and honour of his officers, and to vse such moderation in this kind, as without wrong to the plaintifes, their reputations may be tendered. Examining weightie causes with deliberation; but be careful to giue quick dispatch to matters of small moment, especially if they concerne persons that are in miserie. Vse the like expedition in matters concerning poore men, orphans, dowes, churches, education; maintenance, charges left, tutorship, debts, and such like charitable causes, of which you are in conscience bound to haue an especiall care, and to protect them in necessity. That there can neuer prosper where such causes are neglected, for that God which makes no difference

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 28.

rence of persons, but assuredly vs. That he will alwaies haue one care open to the forrowfull complaints of simple soules which suffer wrong, will punish kings and magistrates for their contempt euen of their Christian subiects. I would exemplifie this danger by some speciall example of Gods iustice in my time: but the verie ground of charitie set downe in a word or two, may serue, and for the rest I leaue you to the tendernes of your owne conscience, and the counsel of your Confessor. The like course must be taken with tradesmen, artificers, marchants, and husbandmen; for these kind of people can neuer follow the court, nor without ruine to their estates, spend their goods, labour and time about suits: for it were better to be speedily dispatcht with some losse, than to be tied with a world of Processors, Aduocates, and Notaries, in hope of getting all; considering how much the losse of time, in regard of their trade, importeth them. Whatsoeuer may be ended at one hearing by your selfe, dispatch: what you are not able of your selfe to rid, recommend it by way of tables and memorials in other affaires. It shall not be amiss, for quicke dispatch of causes, to assigne to euerie officer his particular taske; for otherwise it were not possible for one man to run through all. In case of necessitie the prince may commit his office, for his owne ease, to his faithfull ministers, in imitation of the knife which in old time was used in the sacrifice at Delphos: for there was such a fashion deuised for the reliefe of poore men, which could not long attend without great losse, as one man alone was able by the helpe of its many parts, to serue all the priests. In criminall causes, where there is question of life and death, and other capitall punishment, proceed benignely with seueritie, and seuerely with benignitie, according to the state and qualitie of the cause. Applie your fences to the circumstances of the person, time, and place, the manner, and such like considerations. Be content to imitate the rule of Leibos in this case, which was apt to bend according to the obliquitie of the subiect vnto which it was applied by art: So must princes follow occasions, if they will rule with commendation. This is not to make difference of persons touching the right it selfe, but to iudge of right with wisdom and discretion, according to the kindred indifferences that are aptly offered; proceeding notwithstanding, where we find the like respects in all degrees concur with like consideration: for the people are not grieved with setting downe any resolution, how grieuous soeuer it may seeme, but diuersitie of punishments for one and the selfesame fault, where no certaine reason can be found of the diuersitie. If any conceiues this counsel to be in any sort repugnant to this Maxime, That all lawes should be equal, inflexible, vncchangeable, &c. hee must be answered, That it is onely understood of the dead letter of the law which as it neuer speaketh and resolue in one manner, so ought it in respect of it selfe, to be indifferently interpreted and executed: But there is another reason of the liuing law, which is the prince and his ministers, especially touching Commissions which bee received from him: for they ought to execute the dead letter of the law with such respect and moderation as hath beene mentioned before, so as they bend it with equitie, but breake it not with wilfulness: Wherefore there is a certaine power given vnto the prince about the lawes, and by the rule of conscience which is imprinted in the heart of him or them that are set vnder him, the cause is qualified according to the reason of the circumstance; for rigor is not alwayes right: neither may we say, that they rule best, which vrge the letter without respect to the reasons; that rather follow the words of a text which is mute, than the due consideration of a quicke interpretation, which is more sensible. Provided alwayes for the preservation of Maiestie, and maintenance of lawes, That howsoeuer it may please a prince out of his owne conceit to dispose, in ouertuling any matter, with respect either of the person or time, augmenting or abating the reward of any good desert, or punishing of any fault, the same be not drawne to consequence, or enforced as a precedent to those that shall liue after him. They that gouerne know better how to moderate these cases, than the lawyers that plead; and many things are incident to politike direction, which neuer come within the compass of an ordinarie Aduocate. Contention betwixt husbands and wives, masters and seruants, parents and their children, neighbours, kinsmen, friends, and such like, conjoynded in the strait linke of ordinarie officers, ought rather to be ended by a friendlie arbitrator, with spare of charges which belong to suits, than by a seuerer iudge, who decideth all things by extremitie. The best course for a prince

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A prince is to censure causes by due circumstances without partialitie, and that the difference which shall appeare betwixt his moderation and the written law, may rather seeme to arise out of a right in equitie, than an error in affection. I would haue all the courts of iustice offend rather in compassion than rigor or crueltie, vnlesse there be a notable example to be made for the terror to the multitude. In all kinds of rewards be bountifull above the common course, and alwaies chuse rather to leaue a light offender (whose crimes are not manifest) unpunished, than to condemn an innocent, or to leaue a peece of seruice unrewarded, at the least with favourable words, with praise and cause of hope, until time and opportunitie may yeeld a more ample satisfaction. Be careful that compassion & facultie in remitting punishments, be tempered with such a reasonable meane, as is neither encourage men to offend, nor give occasion of many errors which grow by too much lenitie. Let it suffice, that your subiects liue vnder you with industrie, and as becometh men without giuing scandall or ill example to the world. Proceed not to that kind of curiositie which makes many rulers to inquire & search what men doe in the most priuate and secret places of their houses: this humor is many waies offensive, for both in breedeth respect to the prince, and oftentimes great harme to the party, without desert. Though some be not absolutely chaste, yet so they be found wary in auoiding all cause of scandall & remainst of offence, the prince hath reason to reserve the judgement of the secrets of mens hearts vnto God, and the correction of secret sins to his diuine Maiestie: for where our eyes can see no vice, there is no reason that our hands should execute. Keepe one care alwayes open for the aduersitie parties; beware of slotting your judgement, especially in causes of iustice vpon the first impression; for time trauell eth for truth, and oftentimes graue deliberation ease the hee of her burthen. In those occasions a moderation should be had in such regard, as neither the subiect be induced by too great facility to attempt any practice of vnlawfull action for the furtherance of his intenc, nor discouraged by too great rigor for expecting reason at your hands; for both extremities are dangerous. Whilst that you are in choler, or haue made your selfe a prey to any other passion, or respect of priuate interest, be verie careful neuer to giue sentence, or at the least not to put the same in present execution, least afterwards appeales be made vnto your selfe from such vnjust sentences and executions; by the parties that are wronged, when you are come vnto your selfe. You may read in histories, of a poore woman that appealed from king Philip, being transported with passion, to the same king Philip, qualified with a due consideration: and of the penance which was enjoined by S. Ambrose to Theodosius, after the massacre of Thessalonica.

Touching the orders of your familie and Court, I haue discoursed with you at other times, out of which you may draw rules for the direction of those affaires: be alwayes mindfull that your guards be entertained about your person, according to the wonted manner, rather to set forth the maiestie of gouernment, than in respect of danger of your life for euident necessitie. Touching the wearing of your apparel, there is no doubt but princely garments, fit for your estate at certaine times, doe both grace your person, and strike a kind of awe into the peoples hearts: Notwithstanding to sute your selfe ordinarily more plainly, & according to that fashion which is most general, doth win great loue, as I haue obserued by mine owne experience: for nothing pleaseeth the subiect more, than to see sometymes a rarelesse contempt of those outward complements, in which some princes note their princelie felicitie. The like consideration must be had touching your diet, and other necessaries things belonging to your person and your Court, with a careful regard, that neither hatred be purchased by excess, nor contempt by too great equalitie.

To the time of peace likewise belong diuers kinds of works worthe of a princes care, which draw the subiects eyes to admiration, and his heart to thankfulness. In this degree we marshall whatsoeuer princes either build or repaire for the peoples good, as adorning cities, amending highways, repaying bridges, making riuers nauigable, charges in bringing waters, in repairing of churches, hospitals, guild-halls, publicke places, and towne walls, taking order for the reformation of abuses in religion, Vniuersities, Colleges, and iudiciall places, in limiting the fees of Counsellors, excluding auarice from courts of conscience, and corruption of magistrats in the bringing vp of orphans, marriage of poore maids, and redemption of prisoners. Blessed is the heart that thinketh on those things, and the hand that putteth them in execution; for by this it meanes the subject shall not onely be provided for in the common course of life, but the pleasures and commodities of persons, places, and conditions, sealed in happinesse: Yet in these cases also care must be taken, that the people be not overburthened, for it is all one to them, whether oppression creepe in by this or any other meanes; which they cannot remedie, and where the people themselves are urged to an extraordinarie charge, they hold not the prince to be an author, but an executioner. To the time of peace also belong many considerations, provisions, & forecalls, concerning warre to the end that whatsoeuer accident happens, the prince be not taken altogether vnprovided on a sudden, or driven to seeke shelter when the storme is imminent. But to auoid confusion about these times, I must warne you, for a conclusion in this point, that as an honorable peace is the end of war, so must your peace be gouerned by such great discretion & diligent foresight, as the war may also be secure to the state when it happens. I come now (my most deere sonne) to discourse with you of some points belonging to the time of war, whereon it standeth you in hand to thinke aduisedly; as well in consideration of your present estate, as also for the increase thereof, whensoeuer just occasion shall be offered. To these ends of preservation and enlargement by way of counsell and aduice in time of peace, and of armes in time of war, a prince ought wholly to addict himselfe, and neither spare paine, diligence, nor danger, in any enterprise, that enable him to attaine them happily. A prince ought to be more heedful to looke into the accidents & occurrences of war, than peace; for that war aboundeth more with vnexpected adions, with disorders not foreseen, and when they happen, for the most part, are irrecoverable: A gain, for that war is lesse restrained by the curbe of ciuile lawes and officers than peace, depending commonly vpon the will of him that is most powerful, as most commonly it is kindled by a greedie desire of one to raigne about the rest, and is afterwards maintained by the feare of a necessarie defence: both which affections are so forcible in the mind, as they will rather constrain you to make the satisfaction of your will the object, than to looke into the means whereby you may compass it. These cares and preparations for war, are most necessarie for princes & potentates, whose vnquiet estates are often troubled by foreine enemies, who lay plots to annoy them. These and such restless neighbors giue euery day just occasion to be offended by them. This is your case, who being seated betwixt the power of the Turk, & the iousie of Christian potentates, could not designe a matter of any great effect, though you gaue your selfe to rest. But let not this scruple greatly trouble you, for that discontinuance of professing armes, wil in time do you more harme, than the maintenance of your reputation by them can any way trouble you. Experience doth teach, that all men feare to incense an enemy who hath his armes readie drawne to strike. Besides, as men wax old with time, so states are weakened with sloth, and in effect consumed by the canker of idleness, whilst that others that cōtend with martial enemies, are not onely maintained in health, but augmented daily more & more in force and vigor, as mans bodie is by exercise. Vpon the laying downe of armes, & discharge of troups, the subjects grow wanton, and wild at home, finding so great a part of their wonted burthen eased: and this we daily see, that hauing bin long accustomed to this pleasing ease, you shall hardly bring them again in awe, to haue the patience to endure your impositions, & their former franknesse and readinesse to supplie your necessities. On the other side, the multitude of soldiars tainted with the libertie of ambition and other humors of camp, wil hardly frame themselves to lead an honest sober life at home, which hath often bin the cause of tumults & vprores in monarchies. Besides, I cannot see how a prince that ruleth many estates, can euer settle any resolution to liue in peace, in respect of their ambition & greedinesse that are about him, their emulation & iousie that are equal to him, and their feare and suspicion that are vnder him: For they that are of the first sort dispose themselves to giue occasion of offence, out of a desire to subuert the estates of other men, the second, to settle their own fortunes; and the third, to prevent oppressions & injuries: wherefore it is wel said in our proverb, that he which cannot take hard measure at the hands of other men, must keep them low that are most apt to offer it. It is therefore necessary for a prince, especially being possessed of so many estates as you are at this time, to dispose your selfe effectually to a care of such things as belong to warre, whereof hauing fit occasion

A to discourse at this present with you, & taking my beginning from the chiefe parts thereof, I say, That this care standeth chiefly vpon arms, forts, and garrisons, vpon order for provisions to be made for them, knowledge of the qualitie and conditions of States, & of the people that inhabit them. The care of an armie consisteth in the setting downe of a certaine and conuenient number, and in giuing good orders and directions for their maner of fight. The number must be such as will suffice for any braue attempt their Leader will vndertake. The rate will fall out fitly, if no error be committed either in too much or too little; for too little will not serue, and excess is euer a cause of confusion. Opinions haue differed exceedingly concerning this point, but the best and most expert agree, That an armie consisting of 3000 foot, and 4000 horse, is sufficient for the execution of any worthe enterprise. The reasons that are brought for prooffe herof are many, & of great force, for this proportion is reasonable, neither superfluous, nor wanting. According to this proportion an armie may be better disciplined, it may be better entertained with pay, and supplied with victuals and all other things necessarie. It is more easily repaired after some great losse, either by sickness, or any other accident, and it may be better employed and maintained in all places. The people that receive them find more ease in their charges. A prince may better stand vpon his gard with such a force; and a victorie gotten by a reasonable number is more honourable. To conclude, it is in all respects most agreeable to the maner of seruice in our age, as they can best iudge that haue often had prooffe thereof by their owne experience. Whereas huge armies are, we see few come to fight, and therefore a lesse number might serue the turne, as it did the Romans in their warres in many countries, when as they brought multitudes of men: As it serued Alexander in ouerturning Asia and might, perhaps, haue serued Hannibal against the great forces of Rome, if either he had receiued due supplie from home in due time, or could haue made the soldiars which he was driuen to leaue in other countries, as resolute as his owne, which was not possible. The Romans during the state of the commonweale, afterwards the Emperours, and the Turks at this day brings greater forces to field. To which presidents many answers may be giuen, especially, That this both was and is done rather for a kind of glory, to extend their forces ouer all, than for any other need of helpe in war: for an armie so proportioned, as I haue said, is sufficient of it selfe for any notable attempt, as may be proued by many effectual reasons: for hardly shall you find a place whereas a greater number than I haue mentioned, can be put in battell, by reason of impediments which grow by ditches, rivers, lakes, mountains, woods, & such like, whereas a reasonable armie may escape them by the conduct of a discreet General. This proportion is to be kept exactly by such princes as resolute and are euer enforced to stand vpon their gard, & keep their forces in a readinesse, whether their occasion be offensive or defensive: for by this mean they shall be able to beare out the charge, and dispose at all times of their companies, as aduantage shall be offered. The Turks policie is worthy to be imitated in this point, who notwithstanding his great numbers, hath drawne the resolution & glory of his forces to his Janizaries alone, which are a certaine number, and more easie to be satisfied. These standing fast, the rest are kept in order by that means, whereas otherwise it were very difficult to content all the companies. In the same respect Cesar gaue most honor to the tenth legion, but with another kind of moderation & respect to the rest than the Turke vsed. Some thinke, that in respect of many occasions to diminish the prefixed number, either by drawing some into garrisons, or by employing them otherwise, or by some accidents that may fall out, an army should consist of a greater number of sufficient men: but to one that hath the perfect skill of warre, this number doubtlesse may suffice, so as the companies that are withdrawn for other seruices be instantly supplied: for thus shall the number & the armie be the same, as the tenth legion was euer one and the same, notwithstanding accidents. Neither would I haue you to persuade your self, that by often changing armies wax weak, but rather, if supply be quickly made, more gallant & more courageous: for thus we reape the benefit of those forward & resolute men, which being newly come, are far more ready to hazard their liues, for that they know not what the danger means, nor haue not the consideration & stay which time brings: on the other side the valor of old soldiars is more thoroughly refined by experience. By this meanes also the readie wayes are opened, to recompence and honour those that battel to another, scoureth through all the ranks. Let vs ad the deceitful vse of late artillery and chiefly to offend the bodies of men in field. But for that the first shot may be made to play with great aduantage, where those squadrons are close, & other rules of that Romane discipline carefully obserued, you shall seeke out particular instructions among my notes: And moreouer what fit considerations may be vied in the choise of commanders to an armie, what moderation should be obserued in causing the common souldiers to depend vpon their Generall, & other commanders put in trust by him; besides other meanes for the setting of your best securitie.

I will now passe vnto other things which come into my mind to aduise you touching the carriage of your selfe in this time of warre: but by the way I must once againe put you in minde with great earnestnesse, that this care of finding out the best way of marshalling your forces in the field, ought in reason to bee one of the chiefest that you must embrace, as well for occurrents of warre, as to make your name immortal among all nations. Your fleets at sea ought in like maner to haue their particular respects, touching which there seldom chaunceth any cause of inuouation. The chiefest cares, that all necessarie imployments that belong to Nauies, be alwaies in readinesse: That the vessels be rigged, augmented, and imployed euer in some seruice for the state, so far as is conuenient with securitie. Aboue all things settle those affaires in such a certaine course, as your gallies and other shipping may bee properly belonging to your selfe, or to the state, and not to your captaines, officers, or other priuate men, for hauing reposid the whole weight of your fortune and reputation vpon the safegard of those vessels, they will not easily or willingly be brought to hazard them where the smallest danger shall appeare. The charge of getting ships of price into their hands, together with the difficulty of repairing and supplying them in case they should miscarie by any mischance, doth make men so fearefull of the worst, as oftentimes a publike opportunitie is lost, while priuate respects are tended. By taking of this order you shall bring all men to depend vpon your selfe, and you shall neuer need to depend vpon any: I speake not of the large allowance which will be made by officers, when they serue themselves for their owne commoditie. Cause your forces to be viewed and surueyed, & their munition to be reuiued & repaired: where you find the rate superfluous, abate, where too scant, augment it. Auid extremities in any wise, either of too much or too little discretion must be the measure of these considerations. Be carefull alwaies to furnish your places of strength, with sufficient gouernours and trustie garriisons. Let your number rather offend in excesse than want, for of both there is lesse danger in an ouer-plus, both for that the onely valour and resolution of the souldiers hath often supplied the weaknesse of the place, in respect whereof the Romans euer trusted more to the courage of their men, than to the strength of the place, as also in respect of those that fall sicke and die, or runne to the other side, or are cut off by any other meanes, so as the whole number is neuer scene to fight at one instant: fortifie your selfe with sure forces against the enemy, with your tents pitched, trusting rather to forts raised in the field, than to the situation of townes. On the other side when you beginne to quarrell and invade, you must rather assaile your enemies by the help of offes, and sconces, built of purpose to annoy him, than seeke to win his places of strength, with losse of time, and an intollerable charge. This course is secure and certaine, as the other is deceitfull and dangerous: whereof you shall find further profes among my notes for memorie.

Touching the maner of erecting forts with speed and litle charge, and the best meanes to settle a wauering estate, the best way is to make aduicely the whole position and situation of the place, and to fashion out of it the frame that shall be fit; applye your industrie to the plot of nature, with such certaine reasons and vndoubted rules, as both the whole may answer to the parts, and the parts vnto the whole in due proportion and workmanship. Thus must you proceed from one estate vnto another respectively, standing alwaies thus far refulore touching the rules of fortification, That although no place can be impregnable, yet it shall bee sufficient that ours be such as the enemy shall haue small hope to win them, either in respect of long time, or the great expence which such a labour will require, being threatened by many misfortunes & disadvantages,

A pages. The prouisions of war consist in victuals, artillery, munition, supplies and coine, which altogether in effect import no more than an abilitie to mainteine continually so great a force of trained men, as out of the same an armie (when great need requirerh) may be drawne by the Soueraigne, or forces sufficient in all respects for the vses aboue mentioned. Hereupon followeth, that a prince, who either resoluerh or is enforced to stand vpon his owne defence, must think vpon a kind of warre with which he may be able to rule both the charge and weight that goes with it. Wherefore I had a meaning to set downe a certaine order in my armies, which might be sufficient to bring this to passe, but I could neuer find any fit opportunitie to put it in execution. My intent was first to leuie a gallant army of Flemings, Spaniards, and Italians intermixt; being thus assembled; I meant to keep them euer in one estate, either in warre against the Turke, or some Christian Princes which I could not avoid without great danger, or great dishonour: Then I did thinke it good to capitulate with this armie, that all booties of great matters belonging to the publicke like state, as artillery, munition and such like things, being gotten either by the sacke of Townes or spoile of the Countrey, should be properly referred to the princes chamber, the rest left vnto the souldiers. Notwithstanding I resolved to bind the souldier to sel & deliuer vnto the Princes officers at a reasonable price for downe all victualles, garments, household-stuffe and other goods pertaining to their necessarie vses or their commodities. These things I would haue kept in store vntill the souldier should haue need of them againe, with some conuenient profit vnto my selfe; By this prouision both Prince and Souldier should be supplied, but the souldier most: For besides the comfort of receiving ready money at all times for that they get, they shall be also sure of all necessarie things at an easie price. If we compare it with their losse, who buy all things from the Merchant, or the stranger who still followeth the campe, it ought not to offend the souldier, that his Prince should draw some litle portion to his owne releefe of that vnmeasurable gaine which otherwise would be diuided among commorants. I thought moreouer that it would proue profitable to the souldier, and safe for the Prince, if a certain officer were appointed in the campe, into whose hands the souldiers (being imployed in any dangerous seruice) might confidently commit their money or the pillage of best price with full assurance that in case it chanced to them otherwise than well, all should be deliuered to their heires or to such persons as they would appoint; imitating in this point those captaines which to be the better assured of their souldiers, take vp money of the officers in presse to pay the companies. Cesar vsed the same policie, and thereby was free from all feare, either of the officers, whose credit he had by this means engaged, or of the souldiers whose pay was alwaies readie. Besides other obligations, a reasonable gain might be afforded after so much leaue their armor or their stocke vpon any dangerous employment, & that their contracts and directions touching those things shall be faithfully performed, whatsoeuer happen vnto themselves, they will hold it for a greater aduantage to leaue their substance in a truste hand, rather than to carrie it about with them: If any chance to die without heires in bloud, or limitation, in warre, who should succeed him; the goods may iustly be assigned to the Princes chamber, as wee see by the ciuill Law, the prince inheriteth their estates that die without any certaine heires. It may be jealousy, (which the baser sort is euer apt to conceiue of the princes policie, to enrich himselfe) may discourage some, supposing vnder euerie bait to find a secret hooke, vntill that experience hath cleared the clouds of this false imagination, wherefore the way to breake this ice, is to appoint a certaine number of the chiefest of the campe, whom we may most boldly trust, to beginne this order, and to bring in their shares; for who is either so suspitious or foolish, to be either priuar soldier, captaine, or Colonell, that had rather carrie all his goods about him, in continual hazard both of enemies and boores vpon euerie sinister accident; than leaue it in safety, and with some aduantage to themselves, or to their heires who may recouer it. It may be said that prouision for the carriage of these things will be chargeable; but that may be holpen by another meanes, if the souldier out of the gaie and interest of his goods laid downe in trust, be bound to answer it, for that the goods doe still remaine his owne, and the charge is satisfied with over-plus. Touching these carriages; you shall find a modell and memoriall memoriall among my notes, for the private souldier is greatly eased by this new invention, having nothing to care for but his armes and himselfe, so as the whole campe in generall should be more light: besides the greatest part of the treasure and goods of value belonging to the campe should rest euer in the princes hand, so as he might vie them for the furtherance of his attempts in warre, as wee see the proofe of things left by like trust in the hands of merchants. Thus by the money which shall remain in the princes hands, by their deceale without heires, either by descent or disposition of will, of such as were the right owners of the same, and by the gaine which doth accrue vnto the prince by selling victuals and other implements at the second hand, but yet to the souldiers ease, in respect of that which he should pay vnto the merchant or victualler for the like, the prince may make himselfe more able to maintain a mightie armie long, as you shall discover more particularly by my notes. But as I haue said before it is expedient that with this the prouision of valiant souldiers able leaders, and good orders doe concur, although the vulgar sort doe accompt money to bee the sinewes of all warre. I haue oftentimes had cause to iudge of this comparison, and therefore may be the better beleued in setting downe a difference: It is a strength where other parts more needfull are compleat, but a sillie sinew where the chiefeest members are disordred. Allow me those abilities and politike prouisions in a princes armie with perfection, whereof I spake before, and no doubt but the warre will maintaine it selfe: for we cannot find that a wortheie Generall and leader of a good and well directed armie, euer wanted courage to beginne, or means to maintaine the warre, as well with pay by means of pillage and such other gaine, as with victuals euen out of the enemies countrie. Besides, a prince may alwaies keepe his troups in heart, by putting them in hope of honour, profit and all kinds of reward, when time doth serue, although prouision for the present bee scant, so as they know the princes ability and fortune to bee sufficient to performe his promises. Then may the Prince, imitating the Romans, repose greater trust in souldiers that are both valiant and well affected to his gouernement, then either in deepe trenches, or places strongly fortified: I meane, such a Prince as either hath a will or is enforced against his will to hold his sword alwaies in his hand, and to looke for hard measure. If all the charges of warre should bee drawne out of a princes cofers, it were not possible it should continue long. To prevent this inconuenience, it seemeth good to some, to haue the warre made to a profitable end, but it is not verie easie as I thinke to giue an instance of this aduice, considering experience doth teach, that by offensive warre the countrie is ruined, the people spoiled, and the prince impouerished, and in a defensive warre, of what qualitie soeuer the gaine be, men may not expect that it should answere the charge that doth grow thereby. Imagine that this inconuenience may bee eased by good counsell, and applying batterie to the chiefe places onely, which either by their wealth, or the releefe which others bring in by their means, may yeeld satisfaction and recompence for any charge, without being forced otherwise to fight in vaine, or for the opening of a passage which is alreadye giuen you, into the enemies state: yet it cannot bee denied but for many other respects, and in sundrie other cases, the warre, which without such a kind of releefe is no way tolerable, by means thereof is made secure and free from all dangers and disorder of any moment.

1555

Now for that supplies are necessarie for the maintenance of a continuall armie in one and the selfe same estate, I thinke it verie requisite for the seruice of your campe, that throughout all your realmes and estates, the which in your choise are fittest to set out men, a particular muster bee taken, and a Register precisely kept of all the youth that are able to beare armes, so as it may bee done without offence to the people, or incensing the haucie hearts with rage and malice against their Soueraigne. M As I said before, your tried Souldiers must bee kept in practise, least their spirits grow dull and their bodies vnable by sloth and discontinuance, so would I wish those young souldiers were trained by sufficient leaders, that they may be the better able to serue when they are called for. In this generall muster especiall choise ought to bee made of such men as by nature are giuen to the warres, and apt of their disposition,

1555

A sition; that are in good estate to liue, and especially that haue families, for of such a man may looke for better proofe, and reliee more on, for that they haue somewhat to lose at home, they esteeme their reputation, and feare shame and punishment more, the which they that haue lands and goods to answer for their good behaviour, cannot so easily auoid as they that haue nothing: Besides they are encouraged by a respect of bloud to a care of their owne houses. These persons may in no wise be drawne out of families, that haue but one man in them, or so few, as the pressing of one man may indanger the whole familie for want of food, but you must presse them where they may be spared without danger, and encourage them besides with the hope of credit, and commoditie to bee gotten by their merits in the campe, for otherwise wee see that being brought with discontentment to the field, their deserts proue according. Thanks be giuen to God, you are soueraigne ouer many great realmes and great estates, in which you may raise such martiall troups without offence, as they may not onely bee sufficient to defend, but to offend others if you liue in vnion of good correspondence, with your friends and kinsmen of the house of Austria: by this agreement you shall settle your owne power, and become a comfort and support to those that loue you, and a terror to such as enue you: On the other side assure your selfe that discord among neere allies, will blemish your authoritie, put heart into your enemies to make designs against your greatnesse, and so distemper your friends, as they shall not be able to resolute which way to bend their affections. Standing thus vnited, you shall haue great opportunitie (besides the Italian & Spanish forces) to dispose of the Germanes, as your need shall require, the which is a martiall and a verie honorable nation. I know that this mixture doth oftentimes cause disorders in a campe: but yet by one that knoweth how to temper this light discord with a moderate emulation, they may be employed to most excellent and rare effects, in respect of the great difficultie and almost impossibilitie that euer they should ioinc or agree together in offensive mutinies, distractions and disobedience of any kind. I cannot forbear to report vpon this iust occasion what I haue often aduised you of before, that you respect with all due regard your cousin the king of Bohemia, to the greatnesse and inestimable value of whose mind, the greatest empires are too narrow bounds; D and doubtlesse vpon euerie fit occasion, you shall see effects answerable to this conceit which the world hath of his worthinesse. Beleeue this confidently, that there is more good to bee expected from the loue, which springeth from consanguinitie (although that sometimes causes of vnkindnesse may arise, than from the fairest shewes and greatest professions of good will that can bee made by any stranger. Now for that all offences and vnkindnesse are most bitter, growing among persons that are neere in bloud, if they be not quenched in due time: to prevent a greater inconuenience, cut off all iust occasions on your side, setting downe this lesson for a rule, that it is an art more wortheie commendation to yeeld in some sort to those that are allyed, to continue their affection, than to end quarrels & vnkindnesse with other persons, by enforcing them to yeeld to our authority. E But to conclude my counsell touching the care, which must bee taken of this trained youth, is, that it may alwaies serue as a Spring to supply the armie: for the better pleasing of their humors, and winning of their loues, it shall be fit to priuilege them with a libertie to wear weapons, especially on those daies that are appointed for their exercises, and to make the best shew they are able of their forwardnesse. I would also haue them graced with some speciall fauour, as occasion serues; and exempted from all seruile burthens in Countries. Then would I wish you wholly to direct your care to a due consideration of your estate in general, and of the countries in particular vnder you: Look vpon their condition, situation and qualitie, consider both of their abundance, and wants, and of sufficient meanes to liue, as water, wood and graine, that supplie being made from other places that haue greater store, all loue and kindnesse may be entertained among people that are subiect to one Soueraigne power. Though policie did not prescribe this care, yet christianity wold challenge it. Cause plots to be drawn of all their greatest tiuers, mountains, streits & passages, that by repairing vnto your map, vpon any accident, that shall happen, you may dispose of things with greater certainty. Be careful not only to know the dispositions & humors of the (which is very necessary for great princes) but also their alliances and

1555

and factions, whereby you shall be alwaies able both to bridle their vndutifull affections, and to prevent their praesides, if they breake out into extremities. The balance of authority is in your hands, all credit comes from your selfe, & therefore gouern the scales with some moderation, so as that side may be heauiest which is best affected to your party. Provide against all dangers, & serue your turn by all such opportunities, as may further your intention. If any countie doth liue in danger of an enemy, that doth frontier vpon them, secure them in such sort by captains, officers, & garnisons, as they may be freed from fear of all wrong. To be short, I would haue you cast vp an euen reckoning, & make a iust account of their inclinations, their power, their wants, their store, their agreement, their diuisions, their alliances, their habits, their customs, their affections, their dependances, their affinity, their comodities, & their discomodities, that by easing one & charging another, you may turn all things to your best content. Then wil it be time to turn your eye to the like consideration of their accompt. In this point you must resolute with ripe iudgement and great care, making fit proportions by comparing sundry circumstances of persons, places, times, natures, customes, neighbours, officers, adherents, and other accidents, as are incident to so strong a knot of ciuill policie. These things being vnderstood and wisely pondered by him that hath the helme in hand, there is no doubt but he may euer march vpon a firme ground in any enterprise he takes in hand, for in knowing our own & our enemies strength, in weighing circumstances with an equall hand, & being able to apply the best advantages, that wisdom & experience can find, to profitable vses, consisteth both the hope & hap of victorie. I know that diuers courses must be taken according to the diuers qualities of the nation, & the situation of the countrie. Touching the first, whether it be peopled, or scant of men, armed or naked, valiant or cowardlie, pleased or discontented. Touching the second, whether it be full of mountaines, valleyes, plaines, woods or riuers, whether it abound with victualls and all other commodities that are fit for war, or is barren or beggerly. Aboue all things be sure you neuer be drawn into quarrels, with any mighty potentate for the reliefe of such as rather burthen than ease, in danger than helpe your estate, which else may turn to your great disaduaantage. Besides these rules, I would prescribe a number more of like effect, the which long experience (the mother of true wisdom) hath imprinted in my heart, which other men perhaps which go more by aime than by art make small accompt of. War ought alwaies to be vnderaken vpon a iust quarrell, and directed to no other end than to a safe & honorable peace which cannot be purchased without wars. In war he that spendeth most in accompt, spendeth least in want; doubt of this opinion who list, my selfe can warrant it. It is not good to enter into a quarrell without forecast, how to make it good, but after it is once begun, there is neither dalliance nor delay without danger. To him that hath best skill & vnderstanding how to manage war, it will maintein it selfe, so as good order may be taken from the first beginnings, and the proofe of euerie peece of counsel that experience maketh good, may serue for found direction in other things that happen afterwards. Let provision of all things be made in the best kind, & euer with an ouerplus, for in that which is left can be little losse, & although there were, yet there is no proportion betwixt it and the dangers that may grow in weakening braue attempts with scarcitie. Let al your proceedings & inuentions tend to victorie, for that is the final end of the art of war, to which men attaine with seasonable prouisions, discreet orders, & wise gouernment. In the beginning wisdom, diligence, & warines is required, courage in the pursuit, & a constant resolution vnto the end; you must euer giue the first assault, rather then attend vntil you be set vpon: And although your fortune should be so bad as to be preuented in this course, yet must you seek by all means to diuert that force by the great aduantage that is gotten by making warre vpon some other princes countrie, or doing some good peece of seruice to stay the frowns of fortune. Repose not the only staie & hope of your martiall proceedings eyther vpon your companies of horse by land, or your fleet by sea, for they are things without fence or reason; & wee see that at sea the greater number preuaileth comonly, besides the deceits & vncertainty of the sea. But touching these instructions thus scattered and other considerations to be obserued in the whole course of war, I wil refer you to my noates which wil giue no smal light, how to demean your self vpon all occasion, the which (considering your present estate) are likely to happen.

I will

1550

A I will now speake first of the warre against the Turke, as that which I hold to bee of greatest importance, most certaine, and most daungerous, as well in respect of your profession and faith, which ought to be preferred by a Prince of your religion and conscience before all other ends, as also the Turke is the mightiest enemy, that either at this day you haue, or are like to haue. You may assure your selfe that he is a certaine enemy, not only through the malice which he beareth to your self and faith, but by the grounds of his owne politike, or rather tyrannous estate, which presse him to bee alwaies readie and in armes to withstand all attempts. It is hard for him to worke any great effects in Hungary, as well in respect of the long course of the riuer of Danow, and of the champagne country, as of the situation of Vienna, and the neighbourhood of Germanie. In other places likewise his next neighbours are either mightie or troublesome, and such as in proceesse of time may bee more easily brought vnder than at this instant, standing alwaies with their swords drawne to defend their liberties: They are not like vnto the Sophie, whose deepe wisdom and great valour makes his forces to bee feared more than the greatnesse of his owne estate: But God knoweth whether his next successours will be able to supply the want that is found in his fortune. In other places the borders are not all inhabited, for they lie waste most commonly vpon the greatest parts of the dominions and realmes that are possessed by this tyrannie for these respects: And for his soueraigntie vpon the sea side, besides the discord and diuision which is among the Christian princes of our age, there is no doubt but hee shall be drawne to turne his whole forces vpon the Ilands, and your estates in Italie. It is not probable to thinke that hee will breake with the Venetians before hee breake with you, for doublelesse hee will imagine, that in warring against Venice, your forces will come in to aide: but beginning first with you, it may be hee will hope that the Venetians will remaine reuters. One reason may be giuen in this respect, which is, their discontinuance from all exercise of armes for so many yeres: Another, for that commonweales consisting either of popularitie or peeres, in respect of the long life which they presume to be most certaine in their estates, and their hope of preferment from degrees of good to better, which is euer greene, do euer trust more in the aduantage of time, and such accidents as may fall out in the changes and alterations of the world, than in anie warre that is attempted by great Potentates, and will either not at all take armes, or so late, as they had done better, not to haue meddled. Moreover, hauing already fastned their tallons in his sides, and put a sharpe bitte into his mouth, by the possession of the Ilands of Cipresse and Candie, it is likely they will stand long vpon their gard, before they will hazard themselves to offend or defend any man. Adde herunto that the estate of Venice standing wholly vpon merchandize, they can not forbear the trafficke they haue in the Turkes Dominions: Now wee see that the Turke is by little and little growne proud, hauing multiplied your daungers by the greatnesse of his power, which is now so aduanced to the toppes of Fortunes wheele, as wee may rather hope that it will breake with its owne burthen, or that it may be weakened by policie, or warre, than looke for an ouerthrow by some miracle from heauen, or by the power of Christendome, for as men are sinfull, so God is iust.

No doubt but the Turkish Empire hath a period, but in Gods fore-knowledge, not in mans fore-cast, and therefore vntill wee chaunge the course of our euill liues, wee stue in vaine to moderate the plagues of his deserved indignation. I know many haue bene of the mind, and are yet at this day, that it is impossible for anie Potentate in Christendome, to set downe any course by his owne force to keepe vnder this aspiring miscreant. And therefore by a generall league and combination of all princes this worke must be effected. Notwithstanding, when I consider by the light of long experience what poore effects haue issued from this deuice, and what fraude doth often lurke amongst such consorts, I am of opinion that you should wholly relie vpon your owne strength: and before the attempting of anie famous enterprise, examine what your owne estates are able to performe, and then those which your neighbours and allies haue promised. I haue found, and you haue reason to remember how the French king carried

G g g g g

1555

carried himselfe concerning these occasions vpon a chasteiſe ieałouſie and a private ſpleene: men will have humours whiſt they manage the affaires of this world: your wiſeſt courſe is to provide that they may not prejudice you. The way will be more eafie by conſerring the good will and affection of your allies of the houſe of Auſtria alone. But for the full accompliſhment hereof with commendable effects, you muſt reſolve according to the proper and true meanes, which are, wiſedome and infallible conclusions out of the grounds of long experience.

The first point is to consider aduicely what kind of warre may most auaile you, to defend, offend, peruert, or diuert. Touching a defensiu warre, my opinion was alwayes to haue it absolutely excluded, for what is it else but a laying of our selues open to a manifest consumption of strength from time to time, not without great hazard of the whole in a short space, or by long delays, as things fall out, and with despair of any satisfaction or restitution. This kind of warre hath bene generally held by all men of experience that made profession of armes, to be the most vnprofitable and most dangerous of all the rest: but whenas men are enforced thereunto by necessitie. An offensive warre which reason persuadeth to be made against him in Greece, both in respect of our inferioritie by sea, and for many other reasons which concurre, I hold it very hard and in a manner impossible to bee brought to any good effect, seeing that diuertions are so easie and commodious vnto him: for as it is impossible to make preparation for such a warre, without discouerie, great charge and losse of time, so the Turke will plainly foresee our designs, and frustrate our executions. The warre which we call preuentiu ought to bee esteemed the more fite, for that the multitude of souldiers which the Turke carrieth alwayes with him to maintaine his owne designs, and to frustrate our purposes, is infinite. The course of diuersion can auaile as little, presupposing that offence goe before which I haue specified: whereupon I may conclude, that none of these simple kinds are for your good: I might proceed and discouife particularly, and according to their severall teames and differences touching euerie one of these; but by the strengthening of this discouife with sundrie other reasons of importance that concurre, it will appeare that out of the conclusions of these severall kinds, there ariseth a mixt kind of warre, most fite for your occasions: for seeing there is no remedy but you must haue warre against the Turke as I said before, since we can neither make a warre merely offensive for the reasons I haue laid downe, nor ought once to thinke of preuention without ports, we must presuppose that such a warre may bee defensiu in act, but offensiu in prooffe, yet simply neither offensive nor defensiu, according vnto the speciall rules and notes of both in simple rearmes.

Let this warre thus tempered goe forward with a wife care to diuert, and so by little and little it will take a safe course to prevent; and in the end procure meerey offensive to the enemye. But before I come to exemplifie this patterne, and set downe my plot, I must put you once againe in mind, that in making warre against the Turke, you must redie more upon stratagems and the Art of warre, than in multitudes of men, watching all opportunities, his troubles and incomburances in other warres, his losses and ruines by them, the partialities which fall out oftentimes betwixt the successfulls of the State, and the diuisions amongst themselves: All these things may induce a better knowledge how to make our partie strong, but about all things bind youn Gods fauour. But for that this fauour ought to bee procured, partly by such meanes on our side, as are incident to the discretion of reasonable men, you must vnderstand, that nothing can bee more expedient for you, than agreement and intelligence with your friends of the house of Austria, as on the other side proportionally it standeth them in hand, for the better effecting of any enterprise, to bee firmly vnited vnto you, and to acquaint you with their purposes. These things provided for, you may easily come to the knowledge of the true course which it becometh you to holde in maintaining this kind of warre: for if by any fit occasion which shall be offered, the Turke being either ingaged in other warres, or his estate declining at home, you shall see reason to beginne

1555

A the quetrell, and to prevent his resolution. You may doe it best towards Hungarie, making your vncle now designed Emperour, acquainted with your intent, keeping the warfare out of the champagne Countreies, and farre from the river of Danow, where-of the Turke standeth in great neede, in regard of his carriages for such an armie: Besides, forcing him to passe by places which are not fit for his great troopes of horse and multitudes of foote, there is no doubt but you may hope for a verie happie end of your designs. But in case not any one of these occasions be offered, yet you may procure one by your owne discretion, making the yeere, wherein he maketh his preparation to serve your turne, by temporizing warily and frustrating his designs by delays and shifts, according to the circumstances and advantages which shall be offered.

The next yeere when either hee doth not, or perhappes can not so speedily advance, or arme his troupes as hee desireth, in respect of the great prouisions hee is inforced to make, then would I haue you to aduance, and to fortifie that part of the Countrey which you haue gotten before that hee can bee readie to impeach your courses vpon the frontiers, and defend it with the like resolution. Againe, vnto the matter in such sort, as when hee begins to castrate his companies, and to retire his forces, you may bee ready to renew the warre, and thereby force him to make a new defence.
 By this meanes you shall inforce him to continue his great armie still in pay, which hee is not able to indure, or else to bring such meanes forces to field as hee may bee easily dealt withall, and by consequence change the manner of his warre, which were no
 C meane step to an honorable victorie, for thereupon setting downe a new and discreet course for direction, you may presume of a most fortunate successe. Wherefore you haue reason both to graunt and offer all kinds of aid, both of men and money. I meane to the King of the Romanes, who shall fitly serue your turne, to keepe the ballaunce euen, till you finde a fitter opportunity. And for that wee know, that vpon anie worthe peece of seruice the Turkish forces are verie apt to shrinke, for that they relie wholly vpon their strength, being also apparent that this blow must rather giuen by stratagem than by force, it shall not be amisse to touch those meanes which are likely to aduance our purposes: you must be very careful to drawe them into streit places, where the warre for want of carriages and other necessarie prouisions may proue D verie cumbersome, as both I haue specified before, and experience hath taught in the warres of Albania. Againe hee must bee encountered with so strong an armie of foot, as it may bee able to withstand his troupes of horsemen. Which in respect they are for the most part vnarmed, might bee easily effected. It is a point of especial confi-deration also to put forth a Squadron of choicemen to entertaine the Ianifaries in fight, from the beginning vnto the end of the battell, leauing in like manner conuenient forces to incounter the rest of his armie: for whereas the manner of the Turkish discipline is alwayes to referre the valour of the Ianifaries for the last supplie and recourse to vi-E ctorie, when the rest of the armie shall see that they haue bene charged from the beginning of the fight, they will, no doubt, bee much troubled with this alteration, and the Ianifaries themselves amazed and disordered with a stratagem vnlooked for.
 It cannot bee obiected, that this deuice will serue but once, for in truth it will force them to forsake that course for euer, when they shall see their policie preuented, by which they haue many times preytaied against the enimie. It cannot be denied but by meanes of this prouision Hannibal more than once defeated the Romane Legions, and the Romanes themselves vsing the like stratagem against the Latines, in the verie bowelles of their owne estate during the time of their dissentions and warre, obtained victorie. About all things bend your care to stirre the people to rebellion against their Gouernours, by good vsage, exemption &c. This may bee brought F to passe most speedily, by removing camps, and erecting forts in the Countrey, both for defence and offence, than by places inhabited, as you may find set out at large in my Memorials: I haue there set downe the meanes to make them speedily, and with small charge, the true reason by which they may be brought to good effect, the way to hemme in, to cut off, and to subdue securely with good prouisions, the Gaggas ii forces

G g g g g ij

forces

1555

forces of any great estate, with very few of them ; as we find that Cesar himselfe dwelt in France, by the report of his Commentaries. The least beginning of good successe, will presently draw downe the Turke, to make warre against them, where you shall bee best provided to encounter him : for it standeth him in hand to be ialous (as he is) of that reputation in armes, and opinion of superiouritie above all princes, which he hath hitherto held, for feare of disorders and reuolts, which euerie little declining of his might might cause in his mightie estate, by reason of the discontent wherein the people live in respect of his tyrannous gouernement.

You haue likewise to consider of your warres with the crowne of Fraunce, the which are of great consequence in respect of the solide and vnited forces of that realme, and the continuation and league which they may easily continue with other Potentates of Christendome, and chiefly with the princes and states of Italie, for the ialousie wherein they live of our greatnesse. But besides that point whereof I warned you before, speaking of the danger that is in leagues, and the small effect that comes of them, you haue besides this one secure and sound prouision in readinesse at all times for your further comfort in this verie case of France, that so often as you shall assault that king within his owne dominions, which is not hard to doe, considering in what manner his realme is enuironed on euery side, you shall be sure to draw him backe, and so diuert him both from Italie, and from other enterprises. Surely the French king warreth in Italie to his great advantage, as well in respect of the peoples disposition to innouations, as of the great gaine he sometimes makes by one only attempt, in comparison of his small expences: we should haue sene the prooue not many yeares since, if the French could haue made vse of that advantage which they held at Cerifoles, or at the taking of Cassal, after the great overthrow which immediately after the reuolt of Siena the Turkish fleet gaue to ours in the Sicilian sea. Besides, the Italians are so much grieued, being curbed by Milan, Naples, and Sicile, as they are glad of any oportunitie to weaken our suspected forces, and doe willingly offer themselves to any one that will promise to ease them of their burthen, and to set them free, not foreseeing that the French, if they were once masters of the like forts within the body of the state, would be as much, or more offensue to their liberties.

The warre of Piedmont will make the French king wearie in a short time, if you endeavour to fight hand to hand as they do : for by a custome which they haue long obserued, to leaue no enemy behind, you shall verie easily bring this to passe, if you hold some strong towne well fortified against their force, proceeding there from hand to hand as you find occasion : If they diminish or abate their armie, increase yours, so as you may be able to take some place of importance, which being weake you may fortifie. Thus by the helpe of places, and of so great an estate on your backe, you may make warre in winter. And to these ends if you be prouoked by occasion, I had once resolved for their speedie riddance and dispatch to cut off their passage out of France to Turin, raising two or three forts betwixt Turin and the Alpes : for when they shall be forced to maintaine a mightie garrison, and their prouisions on this side the Alpes cut off, it would be hard for them to furnish themselves with sufficient store of victuals and munition out of their owne countrey. In assaulting the French King at home, there are two kinds of warre which promise prosperous successe; the one is by the commoditie which you haue to draw your forces sooner together, and to enter into the heart of his Countrey, where you shall find abundance of victuals and other things to maintaine a sufficient army. Before the French king come into the field, I would haue you seeke to make waie for your selfe, and so to aduance, enlarging your owne course, and cutting off your enemies best oportunities by forts built in the Countrey, as I aduised you before speaking of your warres against the Turke, which course Cesar himselfe obserued, when he made warre in that countrey. Sometimes oportunitie may be given either by the declining of the aduersie partie vpon some braue attempt of yours, or by your good successe and their misfortunes. Whereupon you may so preuaile as afterwards you may lay plots to compass that which is not yet conquered. Diuisions may happen in the countrey, and a thousand other accidents, especially in this age, when as loue and charitie so decay, whereby an enterprise begunne with

1555

A with iudgement, may be greatly furthered; will men must not disdain to goe forwards by insensible degrees, for so goeth the Sunne about the world; for it is impossible that a kingdom of such strength, and at vnion within it selfe, should bee at one instant swallowed vp by anie foreine enemy. But if the least part which is one, bee drawne from them; and added to a stronger part than their owne, the odds will grow within a while to be so great, as they that find the want will smart for it. Surely, if I had vnderstood the reason from the first beginning of my proceedings against Fraunce, which I haue learned since by long experience, and the consequence of manie braue attempts which I haue made against this realme, vndoubtedly I would haue brought some rare effects to passe: But it may bee that God hath referred that for your greater glorie. One onelie difficultie is to bee thought on in this case, which is, that the French may sooner enter into Italie by certaine months, considering the season of the yeere, and forwardnesse of the Countrey, than wee can enter into Fraunce: But this aduantage must be prevented by another stratagem: for as soone as you find that the King hath entred into his charge, and made his prouisions, deuise to trouble him in Fraunce with so sufficient an armie, as he may bee constrained to increase his forces on that side; and so giue over all other intended enterprises. It is needlesse to set downe anie other rules for your proceeding in this course, so long as you are Lord of the Lowe Countries, and firmly vnited to your friends and allies in Germanie. Against this mischiefe I find two certaine remedies, the one by entertaining the French King in Italie, and assaulting him in France, at one instant: The other in making shew to be readie, and to set forward in so good time, as hee shall haue other matters to thinke on than his attempts against Italie. You shall easily attaine to your desired end, in proceeding after this manner, as well in respect of the ialousie which the King in his absence hath of that estate, as to auoid the danger that may follow, if hee leaue his frontire townes behind his backe enuironed both with forts and troups; as Cesar dealt at Marseilles, making warre against Africanus and Petrus. By this meanes smaller forces may serue your turne, and all the brauerie and terrour which the French intended in their coming forward, shall turne to your aduantage; and hauing another armie ready to aduance, you shall be master of the passages and force him to abandon that garrison which hee left enuironed with your forces vpon the frontire.

D The other way to inuade France, is to set vpon the frontires, and then goe forwards; but this requirerh too long time, and serueth rather to diuert the French Kings course from Italie, than to feede our hope with gaining by the match, in respect of the little likelihood to winne anie great townes vpon the frontires, for the French king is mightie, and will come armed to rescue rather than leaue it in daunger: Besides, the winning of a towne by batterie, requirerh a long time, and a wanton charge. It is verie true that the difficultie may be recompensed in some sort, by making choice of such places as import the cause wholly, or in the greatest part; but of all these waies the first hath most valour, and is most likely to prooue successefull. I remember well, that when I assaulted Fraunce towards Landerley, my intent was to haue entred into the bowels of that Realme, before the coming of the Suissers, but after that I had made some staie about the winning of certaine townes vpon the frontire, the facilitie that I found in preuailing against the first that were attempted by my forces, made mee to change my mind, and to engage my selfe there, with an assured hope that I might with the like successe go through with the rest; before the King should be strong enough to march: but being staid there longer than I either thought or expected, the King had oportunitie to make himselfe stronger with ease, to defend himselfe with greater securitie, and to constrain mee by force to retire, and to yeelde to an agreement which was then made rather (to tell you plaine) to colour my retreat, than for anie good effect that followed.

F Now if in making warre against France you should preuaile in your attempt, to the which (for that it were against the skill of Armes) I can not beleue you will be eter drawne without great likelihood of victorie; you must labour effectually to bring it to that point: Pursue your aduantage in such sort as I haue said, for by this meanes the king being forced for the most part to supplie his wants from countires farther off, before hee shall be ready with new forces, you may come vpon him with a fresh enterprise: But if hee worst should happen vnto you, (which God forbid) you shall alwaies haue leisure to repair your strength, and so much the more freely, both for danger and all other inconueniences, if you can put off the hazard nere to the point of winter, so as the credit which he getteth in that action may not further his affaires in Italie: To these ends a gallant armie consisting of a reasonable number, shall auail you more than huge multitudes. And against France also you may greatly strengthen your estate, by maintaining a continual number of foot, to match their ordinarie troupes of horse, as you shall find it set downe more plainly in my Reports, with full consideration of all accidents, augmenting your proportion against the Turke, according to the rate wherein he exceeds the French king and others, princes of Europe, in force. It standeth neither with your iudgement nor skill, in any of these cases which I haue set downe, to giue your first onfet vpon anie place which requireth long time, great forces, & excessive charge before it can be won, vnlesse you be first sure of some secret intelligence within the towne, or priuie to some great defect or want which pincheth them, whether it be of men, munition, leaders, victuals, and such like necessarie things which they can not forbear; or haue some certaine knowledge of the vnsettled humors of the people, or of some chiefe magistrates, or of diuision within the bodie of the state it selfe, so as you may assure your selfe before the cardes be dealt, to win the great rest by setting it vp.

These occasions ought not at anie time to be neglected, vnlesse you meane to abandon the due consideration of the Art of Warre, for otherwise the enemy gaineth too much time for the preparing of his forces, and brings his desires to passe; whereas on the other side, it is hard to maintaine an armie long with victuals and other provisions at a siege without making some roome at the first for the passage of his conuoyes. I remember well that I once undertook an enterprise against Prouence in France, my Rendez-vous was at Marseilles, which was the cause that my hopes were made frustrate, and my charges lost, and withall, my retreat was exceeding dangerous: And which is worst of all, the eyes of France the French King were opened by this meanes, so as hee plainly discovered the dangers of his realme, and forthwith sought to settle himselfe at Turin, and to make his residence in Piedmont where the French did afterwards make warre to their best advantage, discouraging the ready meanes of diuerting all attempts on that side against France, besides the credit which they got by the action with the States of Italie.

If they had knowne (as I haue said) how to vse this prosperous successe to their best advantage, I doubt not but they had often put all the estates you holde thereabouts in daunger: Seeke therefore alwaies to assault the French King in his owne Realme, and to prevent his first attempts, for otherwise you cannot when you will ridde your hands of him, by making a diuision from Italie, if hee may be suffered to put in his foote, for then the difficultie of repairing your armie with supplies of Spaniards, considering the situation will be verie great, wherein all consisteth, for they being defeated by anie mischance, it giues great encouragement to the States of Italie, to laie new plottes, especially the Venetians, whom euerie little blast doth easily awake. Persuade not your selfe that your deere friends in Italie, seeing your power decline, will euer adhere to your misfortunes with the hazard of their owne estates, but rather secretly reconcile themselves to him that hath the vpper hand, and follow the Victors good fortune. I would not wish you to applye your whole care about the recouerie of Siena, which will be hardly effected, I graunt the Duke of Florence hath bene jealous to that State, considering his oportunitie to annoy them, both by neere neighbourhood, and the power of his authoritie: This plot if it might take effect, will bee a notable president to all States, and make them warie how to intermeddle against your power: And which importeth your cause most of all, you shall by this meanes cut off all intelligence betwene the French Kings forces, and the States of Italie, who finding the French settled within the heart of their Countrey, will be more apt to ioyne with them in friendship, and relie vpon their strength, rather than when they see them farre off in Piedmont; and much lesse if they can be drawne on this side the Alpes, whereas their fauour cannot bee commodious, nor their displeasure dangerous. It shall also much auail

Auail in your dealing with the Crown of France, to bee fully informed of the humors and affections of all such persons as are in greatest fauour with the King, on that stand for the best offices; thrust your hand secretly into all their competitions, and drawe the strongest partie vnto you with all the Art you can: for neuer can the Theater of publique Actions afford more favourable shewes in your behaile, than when it shall bee moued vnder hand with inuisible deuiſes. If euer Fortune fauour you so much, as that either by alliance, or anie other kind of agreement, you shall bee able to remouue the French out of Piedmont, wincke, at all other things. Doe the best you can where-by the Realme may bee induced, to desist from armes; so shall you bee secured from tumults and many other kindes of crosses, which are more dangerous, and not knowne to euery man; if afterwards anie occasion be offered of doing your selfe good, forbear not to lay holde of it. Thus shall you euer be most secure concerning causes which belong to Italie. This is the ground vpon which in the end it behoueth you to settle the strongest sinews of your soereign power, and therefore haue alwaies an eye vnto it with an aduised consideration.

The reason is not all one for the French to bee now put out of Piedmont, and as if they had neuer held it, for in the opinion of the world it will be more disgrace vnto them, than the winning thereof before did yeeld them profit. Wherefore in all your capitulations and agreements let your eye leuell directly at this end, and your plottes of policie aime alwaies at this marke. For beleue me son, and I assure you out of my long experience, that Piedmont alone will benefit you more, than if on that side which lies next vnto Flaunders, you had bereft him of the third part of his owne kingdom. Seeing then wee are entred so farre into the State of Italie, and engaged in the highest mysterie of State, wee must proceed a little farther in this politike discourse. I will tell you once againe, that by the life of this one artere the pulse of all your great power doth beate. This waie your eyes must bee euer bent and open to all oportunities: First I would haue you vse all deuotion and curtesie to the holie father, and the apostolike See; I would wish you to bee verie kind to the members of the same, as the Cardinales, Bishoppes, Prelates and other of the Clergie belonging to the Court of Rome. Be euer readie for the defence of them and the Catholike profession. In all elections of Popes, D see that you labour not by anie vnchristian, vnlawfull, and indirect meanes to pferre anie of those Cardinales that are your especiall friends: Striue not to make one faster than another, so as all Competitors bee worthe of the place, for in these factious actions the holie Ghost doth worke: And it is better to submit our likings to the prouidence of God, which turneth all things to the best, as wee may vnderstand by that which is recorded of Mathias in the Text, than to follow humours or respect particulars.

There is no question but anie of them may bee wonne by due respect, and admit they should become strange, yet after you haue sought to reconcile your selfe into their fauours by such meanes as are prescribed you by the holie Ghost, hauing your territories included in the midst of their Countrey, you can neuer want the choice of manie meanes belonging to the world; by which for your last refuge, when there is no other meanes, you may insinuate your selfe more easily into their good opinions: I meane either by alliance with their chiefe friends abroad; or bestowing pensions and sundrie curtesies vpon such persons of the Clergie as they most affect at home, with as thousand such like complements, as may please them daily, without any hinderance to princes of your qualitie. This is the waie to make the Pope your friend, though at the first hee were elected by a faction of Cardinales which depend not on your affection, for hardly shall you find anie hawke so haggard but hee will prey vpon all apt advantages: Hereof you must haue an especiall care, the end whereof is the general good of Christendome, rather than anie respect of your owne priuate interest; though manie perhaps doe not so much regard those bonds which ought to moue them simply to make a Pope, as they doe the profit when a Pope is made to their purpose.

The territories of the Church lie (as we may say) in the very heart of Italie, but so inuironed with yours, as they may serue for a garland: if Siena were once recouered, they should should then be compassed in on all sides with your forces. So as the way which you shall take, according to the rule set downe before, shall be made more easie by your diligence, and the fauours which you meane to bestow, shall more readily bring forth those good fruits which you desire among them. So long as goodly men are preferred to that Sea, there is no doubt but charitie, religion, & care to keep the seamless coat of Christ vntire, will moue them both to tender and defende your loue. If men delighted more with worldlie honours should hold those places (which God forbid) yet would they be alwaies glad to make a friend of one who they are not able to incounter with hospitalitie, besides his deuotion to the popes theslues. The curtesies which you may likewise vse to the cardinals your speciall friends, wil much fortifie this warie & discreet cōsideration. Apply your care frō time to time to win many friends amōg the cardinals, as well old as yōg, the which may be easly effected, in giuing the prebends & such dignities as they desire. The like course I would haue you hold with the Bishops & other prelates of that Court: but haue a care to deale most bountifullly with such persons as are most inward with his Holines.

About all things ground your selfe vpon the conscience and equity of your demands, in dealing with the cardinals & other friends; but in cases that require grace and fauour, see that you rely vpon the bountie of the Pope himselfe, lest you be deceiued of your expectation. Stricke not to afford all commodities out of your estates to the court of Rome, with a bountifull and a willing heart, & if necessitie inforce you to breake with the Pope, yet vse the matter with such temperance and warinesse, as the world may rightly vnderstand the reason: and acknowledge that the cause of this stratagemme grew not from your desert, but that you were inforced thereunto for your owne safetie. Religion is the bond of loue, and therefore nothing is more contrarie to hope and expectation of good successe, than to leaue an ill opinion in the minds of men of your affection towards those that hold the place and credite of Gods ministers.

In matters pertaining to accēpts in general, conforme your self at all times with obedience & humblenes to the certen & infallible determination of his Holines, & howsoeuer causes of vnkindnes may arise, yet let the world see your religiō is vnchangeable. Touching the Venetians you may easly take order, if you find it good for your selfe to continue in the league with the, being as I said before, so disposed to rely wholly vpon times as they will wander between these vaine & idle expectations, suffering theslues willingly to be drawn on from day to day, & consuming still with a soft fire of ambitiō till at length they become a prey to some martiall power without any great difficulty. Moreouer the Turke, hauing shut the from Corsu, wil soone becaue the of Cipres & Candie, & restrain them much: And considering that the trade of Venice standeth wholie vpon merchandise, you may neuer vnder take anie enterprise vpon hope of their assistance, especially against the Turk, if it be not at such time as they are very lowe, and you in great prosperitie; and yet euen then also it might be thought that ielousie & feare of your good fortune wil work more in their suspitious conceits, than any other due consideration, or respect whatsoeuer. Experience hath taught that these mean conceits, whose humor is to apprehend more than anie can containe, lose more by emulation than they get by policie; but when soeuer you haue cause to breake league with them, assault them first, & with all celeritie, for as they desie in wait to worke vpon the first aduantage that their neighbors miseries doe afford, so states which haue often had proofe of this strange inclination, look warily to their attempts, & hold no strider league with the than stands with their owne necessities. If then you shall begin to plie the lustily before they can haue leisure to combine with other states, or make prouision for war, a matter so long neglected by their sloath, as it will appeare they haue quite forgotten their first alphabet; & as in popular estates fear breedeth infinit confusions, so may you make your profit of their ignorance. If this be doubted of, you can desire no plainer proofe, than their want of carriages, as of policie in letting slippe so many braue occasions as these late yeeres haue offred. It seemes that they presume out of their sloathfull humor to maintaine their dignitie by certaine quiet ordinances, and sober institutions made by their gowne men: & herein fortune hath bin more fauorable to them; but yet it may be said without offence or error, that commonweales so qualified, doe neither know nor vnderstand in what sort to vse their power to their best benefit.

This

A This weaknes being found, in setting first vpon their estate, I do assure my self, that with that sodaine alteration, and many other troubles and disorders that will ensue, you may bring some great enterprise to passe, before they be awaked from sleepe, or resolued among themselves what to spend, or whom to relie vpon, what Leaders to imploy, or haue reuiued their old discipline or manner of making warre so many yeeres neglected in their gouernement. Their courteous desires to cut off all cause of charge in time of peace, their ignorance in training men that may be fit to serue when need requires, their want of leaders in the bodie of their owne estate that may withstand the violence of any mightie potentate, that maketh head against their force, will alwayes giue aduantage to your policie, in taking the first start of them: you may boldly imagine that by this means you shall inforce them to their owne defence, whereas if you giue them leisure to beginne the warre, and to assault you first in the realme of Naples, they might doe great harme, in respect of their kind vñage towards them, and their ciuill gouernment which is yet fresh in memorie. If you find no likelihood that they will fall to their defence, inforce them what you may, and seeke to preuent their purposes by meanes of diuision in some good sort, for herein consisteth the greatest aduantage of your actions. I must now let you vnderstand that in seeking to assault them first, your greatest care must be by all means possible to thrust into the verie centre of the State, for hauing forced them to put garriſons into all the strong places which they hold, it is not possible they should bee able at the same time to keepe the field. In the meane time you cannot but find some great want in one or other of their forts, either of leaders, garriſons, prouisions, or payes; you may find out the struing humors that are set a worke by faction in general, or of persons discontented in particular. In any one place that your fortune shall be to take, vse your happy beginning as an extreme to further good, and leaue a president and encouragement to others, by your princely dealing with those, so as they may more easly be brought to yeeld vpon reasonable conditions and honourable offers made to Burgers, Leaders, soldiers &c. with other meanes which circumstances, time and place shall present to your discreet consideration. If you be once master of the field whatsoeuer is not strong will remaine at your deuotion, or they shall be inforced to come to field, where they can not long continue their garriſons being prouided: for hereupon a battell must ensue, which D in respect of their long discontinuance of armes, and want of knowledge & experience of the seruice of these times, will be greatly to their disaduantage, and disgrace, so as they may be diuerted first from the realme of Naples, which is one of their best hopes, when they may approach without opposition.

Be carefull also that no other prince in Italie grow too potent, although he seeme to depend wholly vpon your crowne; for in this case you must be no lesse careful to contain those which make shew to be your friends within reasonable bounds, than to keep downe your enemies; holding it for an infallible ground, that they which make profession to follow you, and are most forward in your seruice, would be the first (vpon the least disaduantage and declining of your fortune, and hope to better their owne) that would turne E into the other side. But as the many diuisions and factions in Italie doe make the labour hard, to keepe that which you now hold, as sometimes it happened betwixt the States of Greece and the Romans, you must euer presuppose this principle, that the Estates of Italie desire aboue all things to see a Duke settled at Milan, and a King at Naples; to this end tend all their practises, for that is a meanes to weaken your incroching power, and withall to free themselves from forreine seruitude: The reasons are, for that with petie princes they may treat at all times vpon euen hand, with you they promise faire in ialousie, and perseuere in dissimulation. Again, a Duke of Milan, or a King of Naples, which had no more estates than that alone to build on, would feare and hope with them, and euer tie himselfe to them in a firme league of friendship, against forreine forces for F his owne securitie, which is the strongest bond.

But with you they neither dare enter into league, lest thereby you should grow more strong, nor warre, lest with an ouer-match you should weigh downe their policie. Besides, a doore well kept is a defence for all that liue vnder one rooſe, and in one familie. The Venetians aboue all wish for this, because they might haue great choice in setting setting downe their plottes, and more helpe at their need. The Pope hath also bene as apt as others to combine and practise to this end: but your best remedie against this humour will be to take advantage of the divisions and factions which happen daily among themselves, and to maintaine by continuall action, your reputation in armes, holding good intelligence in euerie state, appointing able and sufficient ministers to attend the Pope: by sitting with a golden hooke where the streames are troubled. As for Italie you need not feare anie daunger, if you can devise to keepe them from combining craftily within themselves, and especially with the French King on that side the Alpes, which is not hard to doe, for him that standeth euer watchfully vpon his gard, and hath in his head discretion to see, and in his hands meanes to prevent their purposes. The safest course as I haue aduised you before, is to nippe off the first buddes of ambition before they ripen to your prejudice, or feed to the hazard of your gouernement.

These briefe notes (my deare sonne) I thought good to leaue with you, as certaine grounds and principles, whereunto you may resort for resolution of doubts as occasion shall be offered. I am not ignorant that many circumstances may change the rules, but yet the reason of them well obserued will direct you, in what sort to deale, howeuer fresh occasions may inforce you somewhat to digresse and varie from my former obseruations. Touching the manner in particular of fashioning your policie, both in time of peace and warre to the best vse, with extraordinarie plots for the performance of greater actions, rather sensibly conceiued in my head vpon likely grounds, than warranted by certaine prooffe during the time of my flourishing in the world, I referre you to the complete discourse which shall euer witness both my loue to you, and my trauell for your happinesse. For a conclusion of this point, I charge you by the interest which by nature I may claime, and by the durtie which by the lawe of God you owe me, that in all enterprises you set the rule of conscience before your eyes, and what stratagems and policies soeuer you vse to attaine vnto your desires, yet let the ground and end be iustifiable in his sight who weigheth all things, not by humane passion, but by his most holie ordinance.

Be kind in naturall affection to all the branches of your honourable house: Continue league and friendship with your ancient allies: Prevent the first beginning of your enemies attempts: Beware of sugred words, where reason maketh you to suspect ill deeds: Be sure of sound aduertisements from euerie state: Be iust at home, and bountifull abroad: so shall your end be suitable to your entrie, and both to that vnspined wish which your fathers loue affordeth you. I will neuer cease to pray for your good successe: in you I resteth to proceed in such a course as praise may found your purposes.

D. Philip the second of that name, and 23.

King of Castille &c.

Among other aduertisements which the emperour had giuen vnto the king D. Philip his sonne, he had exhorted him much to make a peace with the French, and to keepe it; Mary Queene of England did also affect it, being desirous to haue him by her to haue some issue: whereupon they entred into treatie, and there was a truce concluded for 5 yeeres, by the which it was agreed that euerie one should remaine in possession of that he held. By this truce which was both profitable and honourable for the French, Ozauio Farnese duke of Parma returned into fauour with king Philip. But soone after the Pope falling in quarrel with the king of Spaine, touching the Colonna whom he had excommunicated, and deprived of their goods, as rebels to the Church, hauing made his nephew John Caraffe duke of Paliano, & giuen vnto his son, but yet an infant, the castle of Cavi, belonging to Marc Anthonie Colonne, with the title of Marquesse; the D. of Albaviceroy of Naples, hauing commandement from his master to presse the restitution of the Colonna to their possessions, had protested that he would do it by force, who (hearing that the Caraffe did fortifie Paliano, ypon the confines of the realme of Naples) sent the erle of Sanvalentino to the Caraffe, exhorting them that they would not attempt a thing so preiudiciall to his Maiestie, and that they should doe all good offices to pacifie the Pope, and to take

A take away the occasions of these tumults, seeing that they might expect more from the King of Spaines bountie, by quietnesse, than from their vnclie, by such dangerous and not durable Innouations, which could not produce any thing but warre and ruine. The Earle complained also in the Duke of Albas behalfe, that his Holinesse had vsed all them sowerly that were friends to the Emperour, and to the King of Spaine, and that hee daily gaue new occasions to thinke, that his heart was estranged from them, for that to wrong the fauorites, friends, and dependants of the house of Austria, without respect of anie, was a signe of much hatred which was borne them; and small account that was made of them: besides arming and leuying new troupes daily, the which were sent vnto diuerse places of the frontire, and finally causing a fort to bee built vpon the confines of the realme of Naples, and employing men therein, that were suspected to the house of Austria, did shew plainly that hee had done them wrong, or meant to wrong them, and then defend it by force. But this was against the quiet of Christendome, seeking to ouerthrow the hope of a generall peace, which with great toyle was lately grounded vpon a truce: and to receiue into Rome, not only the enemies of his King, but open rebelles, was nothing else but to approuer their treacherie, and to haue an intent to vse their counsell or seruice to preiudice his Maiestie, seeing they were so familiar, in his Court. The which hee should beleue hee could not long endure, beeing of so generous a mind, and of so great power as hee needed not to feare anie man; and if hee had endured until that time, it was onely in respect of the holie Sea, desiring peace about all things, whereunto the Pope should bee more inclined than he, in regard of his dignitie and charge.

The Pope answered pertinently to euerie one of these points, shewing that it was not fit for anie man, much lesse for a Catholike King, or his ministers to seeke (vpon anie colour whatsoever) to hinder the Popes authoritie ouer his subiects, that he might take knowledge of their offences and punish them, for the respect hee should beare to anie Potentate: and that hee (although that the King of Naples were feudatarie to that Sea) tooke no care for that which was done in that kingdom, much lesse should hee with such vehemencie seeke an account in Rome of the Popes actions, who was a free and absolute Lord: But touching that which was spoken of armes and soldiers, it was neither in that citie nor anie where else, a preparation to warre, but for the safetie and defence of his person and State, seeing that hee had cause to feare secret treason, and that which they could not doe by poison, they would seeke to effect by the sword, and they that could not deprive him of his life, would with ignominie spoile him of his estate, hauing before his eyes the example of Clement the seuenth by his too great trust. And as hee could not altogether blame his Maiesties royall conceptions, so hee could not excuse the malice of some of his followers, who haue thought therein to please him, whom hee also blamed, for entertaining anie hard conceit in the Kings mind, causing him to suspect his Holinesse actions and his nephews, so as happily he had commaunded him to send some troupes vnto the frontiers of the territories of the Church, vnder Bernardin of Mendosa, and that they had made other demonstrations nothing conformable to the peace, which the Duke seemed to desire, according to the intent of the King his master. Touching enemies and rebelles which hee said hee had receiued into Rome, hee answered, that hee might well know, that that Citie had bene alwayes a common Countreie, wherewith the King should not be grieved: Besides, the Duke of Alua, who made all this noyse, should consider how much the Pope of Rome was reuerenced and respected by him, seeing that hee had receiued and fauoured Marc Anthonie Colonne, who had bene excommunicated by him, with all those that should receiue or assist him. And as for the Kings well taking of it, it was well knowne, and of what power hee was, seeing that hauing scarce taken in hand the gouernement of his Realme, hee would haue soueraine Princes respect his Maiesties fauorites, the which hee entertained in other mens estates: But notwithstanding hee did hope that God would fauour the iust cause, and that being forced to take some other resolution, hee trusted to find them that would helpe the oppressed.

But

1556

Truce broken betwixt France and Spaine.Cardinall Car-raffa's legate in France.Duke of Guise sent into Italie.John de Luna flies into France.Charles resigns the empire to his brother.

But after this they fell to open armes: the Pope apprehending the preparations which were made by the Spaniards in the realme of Naples, had recourse vnto the French King, and to the forces of Fraunce, the ancient refuge of Popes oppressed. This was an occasion to breake the truce, and to bring Fraunce and Spaine againe to armes. There had been a league made by the procurement of the cardinall of Lorraine (before the conclusion of the truce) betwixt the Pope, Henrie the French king, and the Duke Ferrara, whereof the Duke should be generall in Italie, in qualitie of the Kings lieutenant. Cardinall Carraffa the Popes Nuntio was sent into France for Legat, who brought a sword vnto the king, in signification of warre, at whose instance there were three thousand foot appoynted to bee sent to Rome, whereof part were speedily imbar- ked in those gallies which brought this Legate to Marseilles. The Pope hee stood vpon his gard, entertained capitaines, and gaue commissions to leue men, causing the places about Rome to be fortified. The duke of Alba seeing the French king ingaged in this quarrell, entred in hostile manner into the territories of the Church, where hee tooke many places, and brought his army nere to the gates of Rome, which made the Pope to importune the French King for succours. Afterwards hee tooke the towne of Ostia, and the castle; the which had wonderfully amazed the Romans, if Peter Straffy had not bene, who since his defeat, being no friend to the Spaniards, had liued in Rome, and had accompanied Cardinall Carraffa into Fraunce, and returned with him to Rome by the kings commaundement, who employed himselfe wholly for the *Carraffa*s who had all the authoritie, wherefore hee was verie pleasing vnto them. By his industrie and valour, Ostia with some other places were recovered from the Spaniards.

The king desirous to releue the Pope, sent Francis of Lorraine Duke of Guise into Italie, as the Popes souldier, with whom, and with the Duke of Ferrara hee had made certain conuentions, for the entertainment and safetie of the armie, consisting of twelue thousand foot, French, Suisses, and Grisons, and two thousand horse, with the which he passed the Alpes in the heart of winter.

About this time D. John de Luna was in Flaunders, who (as wee haue said) had bene called thither touching Fernand Gonzaque: hee seeing himselfe very severely handled by the Kings ministers in that businesse, seeking a strict accompt of him of the munition of the castle of Milan, being accused to haue employed it to his owne priuate vse, hee resolved to flee from Brussels, who coming into Fraunce, was graciously receiued by the Christian king, and an honourable pension given him for his maintenance. Hee wrote from thence to his sonne Diego, that hee should deliuer the castle of Milan (where he remained in his fathers place) to whomsoever his king should commit it, and that neither hee nor his brethren should euer swaue from his seruice. And so it was deliuered by way of prouision to Alonso Piesconi, by order from the catholike King, and afterwards to Alonso Figueroa, who was sent Castellain thither, fearing the danger.

The Emperour Charles heing the last yeare made a resignation of all his realmes and dominions, shewing a rare President of his fatherlie loue, and of a wife and temperat mind, hee resolved also to write vnto his brother touching the gouernement of the Empire, and leauing the gouernement of his states more free vnto his sonne, retire himselfe, and spend the remainder of his life in a free and quiet contemplation. Wherefore on the seventh day of September this yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and sixe he sent doctor Saler into Germany to his brother Ferdinand with a resignation of the gouernement of the empire with the Crowne, Scepter, and other Ornaments; pretending, that being vnable to vndergoe that burthen, by reason of his age, and the infirmities which did afflicke him extraordinarily, hee perswaded the Electors to confirme the said Ferdinand in his place, being yonger, stronger, and more apt to beare the burthen of such an empire, to whom there was giue by the providence of God, for a naturall enemy the Turk, who was mighty & alway watchful, the which was now most to be feared, for that he heard he was making a great preparation for war. He did write particularly to euery one of the electors touching that businesse, & a very familiar letter vnto his brother, recommending his son vnto him, that he would direct and assit him in all occasions, with his counsell & help. On the 14 day of the moneth he went from Gaand into Zeland, his ships attending him at Fleisingue

Lib. 28.

Fleisingue, but for that the wind was contrary, hee was forced to staie many daies at Zuyt- bourg a village betwixt Fleisingue and Middelbourg, which turning faire, hauing taken his leaue of his sonne, and giuen him his blessing, and imbraced all the Princes and Noblemen, hee tooke shipping with his two sisters Mary widow to Lewis King of Hongary, and Leonora first widow of Portugal, and then of France, who would needs accompany him in this voiage.

He came in a eleuen daies to the coast of Spaine, and landed at Laredo in Biscay, where before that he receiued any of those Noblemen that came to doe their duties to him, hee kneeled downe, and gaue God thanks, for that in the last yeeres of his life, hee had suffred him to come and die in that country, which had alwaies bene most deere vnto him, and by whose meanes he knew he was come to the hight of that honour and greatnesse: And then imbracing those Noblemen and Grandos of Spaine very louingly, hee past by Bourgos to Vailedolit, whereas his Nephew Don Carlo was, to whom he gaue many good instructions, putting him chiefly in mind of religion and Iustice, wherewith some daies, and leauing his sisters there, that he might haue no let to attend the life which hee had propounded, he retired himselfe to the Monastery of Saint Iust of the Order of Saint Ierosme de la Vera, nere to Placentia, a desert place, in the Prouince of Estreamadura. Here, with foure seruants onely to serue him in his necessity, hee past his life in continuall contemplation, giuing great almes and doing other good deeds of charity, for the which hee had receiued a hundred thousand ducats yeerly out of his great possessions. Pope Paul the fourth hearing of his resignation, was much troubled, thinking that the Emperour could not doe it, seeing it was necessary, that beeing desirous to leaue off that degree, wherunto hee had bene advanced by the Popes authority, hee should resigne it into the Popes hands, whose office it then was to write vnto the Electors to prouide one that were worthy of that dignity, who was to obtaine the ordinary confirmation from him, wherein Ferdinand afterwards found some difficulty.

Queene Leonora being in Castille (shee had a great desire to see the Infanta, D. Maria of Portugal her daughter, who remained at Lisbone, wherein there was some difficulty vpon the point of honour and conuenience, whether the mother should goe into Portugal, or the daughter into Castille, so as the Emperour was forced to write somewhat sharply vnto the king D. John. In the end the daughter came to see the mother in the city of Badajos, which was the last time of their meeting.

The king of Algier with the helpe of an army at sea of Turkes, of two and forty gallies, and many Moores at land, did much annoy the coast of Africke, and in the end came to O- ran thinking to take that towne from the Spaniards. Being incamped there the seventh day of August, and viewed it where they might plant their battery, they beganne to cast vp trenches about the wall, planting some peeces to batter the castle of Alchaizer, but it was very indircetly done, for they lay open both to the artillery of the fort, and to that of the port Remisene, so as very many of them were slaine. Whereupon they were forced to make new rampars, and to find out a better seat for their lodgings, the which were on e- uery side discovered, their army being great, for besides 12000. Turkes, there was an infinite number of Moores, both horse and foote. They staied there some daies before they resolved to batter it, for that they could not find a conuenient place, but that they should be wonderfully annoyed by the ordnance from the fort, which standing high discovered the country round about, and shot into their trenches. In the meane time the besieged sallied forth dayly to skirmish, and carried away the honour in a manner alwaies: and al- though there were not about two thousand souldiers in the whole garrison, which were diuided in Merfalcabir, the castle Alchaizer and the towne, yet the Earle of Alcaudete the Gouernor sent them continually forth to annoy the enemy. But the Moores resolving in the end to batter it, and come to an assault, on the fifteenth day of August they beganne to batter the castle in two places, where they themselves receiued the greatest losse; for be- sides many others, all their gunners were slaine, so vnskillfully they had planted their bat- terie, so as at night they withdrew it, knowing that all their endeavors were vaine. The next day the Turkes began to retire towards the sea with dishonor, making all possible speed to get into their gallies, which lay at Sorzet, and the Moores on horse-backe lauing them-

1556 Charles the fifth passeth into Spaine to a solitary life.Interview betwixt the mother and the daughter.Oran besieged and valiantly defended.Turkes and Moores flee from France.

1556

themselves by flight. The reason why they received no more losse by the Spaniards' <sup>G</sup> in their retreat, was for that they heard thereof late, when as most of them had recovered their galleys, or were fled away on horse-backe.

There was some slaughter made of the Moores that were footmen; but the greatest part of them were pardoned, for that being of the country; the Spaniards would incense them as little as might bee, notwithstanding that they were treacherous and of no faith. The Earle tooke some of their baggage which the enemies had left behind them for haile, with one peece of Ordnance, and if they had had three or foure hundred launces to follow then suddenly, few of the Turkes had escaped, for that they were all in a confusion, and most of them without armes. This sodaine retreat of the Turkes at the enterprise of O- <sup>H</sup> ran, eased the Catholike Kings army of much toyle, hauing bene many daies doubtful, whether they should goe and releue this towne, or carry the Spaniards into the Realme of Naples, to the Duke of Alua.

1557

After all the broiles in Italy, betwixt the Pope and the King of Spaine, and the taking and retaking of many townes, in the end both parties seemed to incline vnto a peace. The Pope being a man of a small discourses and ignorant of his owne affaires, fearing to be abandoned by his foraine forces, which hee could not entertaine but with great charges, which his means would hardly supply, suffering himselfe to bee gouerned by <sup>I</sup> men which deceived him, and applied all to their owne priuate posits, with supreme authority, men of no faith, and which had many practises; hee therefore yielded to their persuasions which did mediate a peace betwixt him and the King of Spaine, amongst which were the Duke of Florence and the Venetians, desirous to diuert this warre, which could bring nothing but spoiles and ruines. The Duke of Guise lying neere to Rome had newes of the battaile of Saint Quentin lost by the French; wherefore hee persuaded the Pope to take some course for himselfe for that hee should bee forced to returne with his army or the greatest part thereof into France, to succour that Realme, which he saw in apparent danger.

Pope yields to treat of a peace.

King of Spaine desirous of peace with the Pope.

King Philip did in like manner write vnto the Venetians, shewing how weak the Popes hopes were growne, yet he offered all honourable conditions of peace to his Holinesse, referring the composition to the Iudgement of their common-weale, if the Pope and Viceroy should disagree: Hee did also send commaundement to the Duke of Alba, that hee should procure a peace with all conditions; and so as his friends and seruants might not bee oppressed, hee should accept any accord from the Pope, with whom hee meant not to bee any more in disgrace, and that hee desired no greater fruites of the victory which hee had newly gotten, than to be at peace with his Holinesse. The Duke was then ready to inuest Paliano, but the Cardinall of Santafiora continuing to negotiate this peace, had often sent Alexander Placidi his Secretary vnto the Viceroy, to let him vnderstand, that the Pope at the intreaty of many Cardinalls, had yielded to a peace, and sent him these conditions.

That the Pope was well pleased to receiue Philip king of Spaine, and the Duke of Alba into fauour, pardoning all the iniuries they had done vnto the Church, so as the Duke with all his troupes did within tenne daies depart out of the territories of the Church leauing the townes and forts taken in that warre free vnto the Pope: and that hee in like manner would cause the Duke of Guise to depart for France within tenne daies. The Duke of Alba although he knew the king his Masters mind, and were himselfe desirous of peace, yet would he make vse of the occasion, and haue it with all advantages: And therefore hee answered the Cardinall, that those propositions were to be propounded to men that were vanquished, and not to victors: But if the Pope would haue peace with the king of Spaine, he should accuse his owne iniustice, for spoiling the Colonnes, and his error hauing imprisoned so many of his Maiesties vassalls and seruants; making warre against him, and calling in the French to preiudice his states, for the which hee should craue pardon: a proposition which shewed rather the pride of that Nation, than the mind of the Prince, to whom it was no small blemish.

The Caraffi seeing the present danger, & doubting the vast designs of the Spaniard in this great prosperity, according to the which they doe commonly guide their passions, either insolent

Duke of Alua
answer touching a peace.

1557

<sup>A</sup> insolent or dejected, they perswaded the Pope to retire into France, or to some other place of safetie, leauing garisons of Frenchmen in all the forts belonging to the Church, to kindle such a fire in Italie, as neither the Spaniards nor their partisans should euer bee able to quench. But the Pope who naturally did not loue strangers, and had received small seruice from the French, reiected it as a desperate Councell, yet being resolu'd rather to imbrace any partie than yielding to the Viceroy's propositions, to do a thing contrarie to his mind and dignity.

At such time as they treated of this accord, the Viceroy (the more to terrifie the Pope) began to aduance with his armie towards Rome, with an intent to giue an assault to the Citie, and then retire, yet it was giuen out that hee had a meaning to take it, but his designe was made frustrate by the vigilance of the Caraffi. The duke hauing relation from Palazzo and Moschera (two of his Captaines, whom he had sent in the night to view the citie) that giuing a sudden assault towards Port Maior, with the helpe of some peeces of artillerie, it might bee easily forced, hee removed with the armie, and staid at Colonna, where the sixe and twentieth day of August at night, hee caused his armie to march in this order. The light Horsemen were in the forward, hee made a great Squadron of all the Spanissh foot, which serued for the battell, and the Dutch had the rereward, and on their flanks they had other troupes of horse. And for that they were in some doubt of the French which were at Tiouli, they sent <sup>C</sup> some troupes of horse and foot on the right hand to stay the enemye, if they should haue any notice of their enterprise. Hee then sent about three hundred before with ladders, and other instruments to climbe vp, and to breake open gates if need were, that being brought by some neere way neere vnto Port Maior, they might giue a sudden assault, and being seconded by some horse which were neere them, they might enter the Citie, and keepe a port vntill that the rest of the armie arrived.

Duke of Alua
goes to assault
Rome.

The order was that they should present themselves vnto the wall about the seuenth house of the night, but there falling a small continuall raine, the waies were so broken, as being constrained to take a longer course, it was brake of day before they arrived, so as being discovered by some of the Countymen, they aduertised them of the citie, which made them retire speedily, leauing their ladders against the walles, and many cloakes wherewith they had couered themselves from the raine, yea, and some armes, but the slackenesse of the enemye in the pursute was the cause that there were not about fise and twentie or thirtie taken.

Cardinall Caraffi had intelligence by the Secretary Placidi, when he came from the viceroy, that the armie began to rise; whereupon hee doubted they would assault Rome, or Tiouli, and take the French vnprovided, so as hee gaue them warning ouer night, and hee himselfe (not making it knowne to the Romanes, in whom he had no great confidence) wacht all night with the duke, and was in armes, doubling the sentinels wher as they most doubted the enemye. Ascanio de la Corne, who commanded the horse that went to second the 300 foot, seeing the lights about the wall, and the gards in a readines, held the enterprise to be discovered. And to confirme this opinion, foure light horsemen went forth earlie to get some bootie, they thinking by reason of the darkenesse of the night, the number to be greater, and that they had laied an ambush, whereupon they retired.

The duke of Alba comming neere vnto Rome, and seeing his men had not done any thing, thought that they stood readie within to receiue them. And for that he vnderstood by certaine spies, that Stroff had led foure hundred Horse and twelue companies of Galfcons the euenig before out of Tiouli, it confirmed him in his beleefe, that they were entred into Rome, hauing notice of the Spaniards comming, wherupon hee caused the armie to retire to Colonna from whence it came: without doubt if hee had but attempted it, Rome had bene taken and sackt. The citie was so ill garded, as a lesse armie would haue forced it, for that the Romanes were enemies to the Caraffi, for the wrongs they thought they had receiued of them, and of the soldiers that were within the citie; of the which the Galfcons did not spare their goods <sup>not</sup>

Rome in danger to be sackt.

H h h h ij.

1557

nor honors, & the Germans, enemies to the Pope, spoiled the church & altars. The Pope considering of these things, & lamenting the miseries of the time, being forced to countenance and not to punish those wretches, who called themselves defenders in name, but in effect were destroyers of that miserable citie, beganne to bee fully resolved to peace, and the rather for that hee did visibly see the danger wherein hee was, being certified that the Citizens of Rome had resolved, that if the duke of Alba returned, they would send to capitulate with him, and open him the gates vpon honest conditions.

The duke of Guise, and Peter Strass entered into Rome after this tumult, who talking with the Pope, aduised him to accommodate himselfe vnto the time, as wise men doe commonly. They laied before him the vnfortunate losse of the French king, whereby there was no hope of any greater succours, and that hee should remaine without a Generall, for that hee was to returne speedily into Fraunce, which would bee no small prejudice vnto him, for that his Nephewes, who were to gouernethe warre, were of small experience, neither would they belecue them that vnderstood more in that art, but intreated them ill, keeping backe their entertainment, so as seeing his holiness without money, and without Capitaines, they did not thinke the warre could continue long: wherefore they counselled him to make the speediest and best accord he could with the king of Spaine. The Pope gaue an attentive care to the free speeches of these Noblemen, and resolved to make an end of the peoples miseries, wherefore he called the embassadour of Venice vnto him, intreating him to goe and informe that Senate of the estate of things, and to exhort them in his name to make some good accord with the imperials.

After manie treaties, in the end a Peace was concluded by the Cardinals of Santafiori and Vitelli; and afterwards by Caraffa and the duke of Alba, who met together at Cavi. And so by either of them hauing full authoritie from the Pope, and the king of Spaine, the following accord was published the 14 day of September.

1 That the Pope should receiue from the duke of Alba in the name of the king of Spaine, the submissions that were necessarie to obtaine pardon from his Holiness, but afterwards the Catholike king should send a man expresse to that end. And so his Holiness should receiue the king into fauour, as an obedient Sonne, admitting him to all the graces of the holy church, like vnto other Christian Princes.

2 That the Pope should renounce the league contracted with the French king, and remaine a Neuter, louing them both equally, as his Sonnes.

3 That his Maiestie should cause the townes and Cities demanteled, which had bene taken and held since the beginning of the warre, to bee restored, if they did in any sort belong vnto the Apostolike sea.

4 That the ordinance taken on either part in that warre should be restored.

5 That his Holiness and his Maiestie should forgie all offences that had bene done them, and remit all spirituall and temporall punishments, granting them a generall pardon, with restitution of their honors, dignities, faculties, and iurisdiccions, wherof they had bene deprived, in regard of that warre. From the which were excepted Marc Antonio Colonna, Afsanio de la Corgna, and other rebels, the Popes vassals, who should remaine in the same censure and disgrace, during the Popes pleasure.

6 That Paliano should be deliuered into the hands of John Bernardino Carbone, sonne to the Popes Cousin, but faithfull to both parties, deliuering the fort as it was at that time: and that the said Carbone should sweare fealtie to the pope and king of Spaine, and to obserue the articles concluded betwixt the Cardinal Caraffa, and the duke of Alba, hee hauing the gard of Paliano, with eight hundred foot, which should bee paid equally by the Pope and king.

Besides these there were (as some write) other secret articles concluded betwixt Caraffa and the duke of Alba, concerning Paliano and that duke.

During these broiles betwixt the Pope and the king of Spaine, the warre was as violent vpon the frontiers of Artois & Picardie: where the duke of Sauoy being general for the king of Spain, entred with an armie of 40000 men, he besieged S. Quentin, defeated

Peace betwixt
the Pope and the king of
spaine.

S. Quentin taken.

and tooke the Constable which came for to relieue it, and then tooke the towne: after which the duke of Guise was called home out of Italie.

The duke of Sauoy hauing taken Catelet, and some other places in Picardie, dissolved his armie: after which the French king hauing raised a great armie commanded by the duke of Guise, hee tooke Calis, Guines, and all the land of Oye, from the English in the heart of winter. Soone after the Marshall of Tertres went with an armie into Flanders, where hauing taken Bergues and Dunkerke, and besieged Grauelin, hee was charged by the earle of Egmont, his armie defeated, and hee himselfe taken. After which rout the French king leuiued new forces, and came and camped about Amiens: And king Philip on the other side being nothing inferior in forces, lodged neere vnto Dourlans. Whilst that these two mightie armies which lay so neere one vnto another, held all the world in expectation of some bloodie battell, God inspired the hearts of these two great Princes with a desire to quench this warre without effusion of blood, and to preferre an accord before a doubtful victorie: wherefore their Deputies being assembled in the Abbaie of Cercampe vpon the Marches of Artois, hauing propounded certaine Articles, a peace was more easily concluded at Castell Cambresis, vpon the newes of the death of Marie queene of England. The conditions were:

1 That king Philip being a widower, should marrie Elizabeth eldest daughter to king Henrie.

2 That Marguerite of Fraunce the kings Sister, should bee given in marriage to Emanuel Philibert duke of Sauoy, and that in consideration thereof, all his country, townes, Castles and iurisdiccions of Sauoy and Piedmont should bee restored, except the townes of Turin, Quier, Pignerol, Chiuas, and Villanoua of Ast, which should continue three yeares in the French kings hands, and that in the meane time the king of Spain should retaine Ast and Verceil.

3 That all the Townes and forts which had bene taken in these last warres, should bee restored on either part, whether they did belong to those kings, or to others which had followed their parties, and namely the Island of Corfica to the Genouois, Montferrat to the duke of Mantoua, and the towne and castle of Bouillon to the bishop of Leege.

4 That they of the house of Longueuille should bee put in possession of the countie of Saint Paul, and the king D. Philip of the countie of Charalois, the Soueraignie referred: but there was no mention made of the Siennois.

5 That the two kings should doe their best endeouours to entertaine the peace of Christendome, and should procure the continuance and ending of the generall council begun at Tren.

This yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and eight, queene Leonora sister to the Emperour Charles the fift, died in Februarie, at Talabernula three leagues from Badajos. Shee was first wife to Emanuel king of Portugall, and then to Francis the French king, she was honoured with a royall funerall pompe: And in September following, the emperour Charles ended all his toiles, and past to a better life in the monasterie of Saint Iust, where hee had remained two yeares: his bodie was left there to bee afterwards buried in the monasterie of Saint Laurence, which king Philip his sonne did since build with great charge and state, in remembrance of the victorie gotten against the French, and the taking of the Constable on Saint Laurence day, the tenth of August. Hee left an immortal fame of his valour, more than any of his predecessors had done in many hundred yeares before, for that in him all those vertues might be seene, which are to bee desired in one, that should gouerne his people iustly, and command armes and manage warre iudiciously: He was verie religious and pitifull to the poore, wherein he seemed rather prodigal than liberal: In his eating, drinking & apparel he was very temperate & modest, so as he might well be a president to any priuat man, as well as to great princes, in the practise of that vertue: He had a care of iustice, to haue it duly administered, although the continual wars wherein he was afflicted made him to endure many defects: Hee not only spake the language of euery nation on

Death of Queen Leonora.

21

Death of the Emperour
Charles the fift.

Praxis of the Emperour
Charles.

H h h h h j j.

1558

on where hee commaunded in Europe, but also those that were not vnder his gouernment, for hee spake the French and Sclauon tongues readily. In other things hee was not learned, but eloquent, shewing great grauitie in his speech. It seemed that his good fortune did sturue with vertue to fauour him: Hee was prompt in execution, and constant against any apparent daunger, little esteeming death. Hee was so accustomed to the toyles of warre, that vntill hee grew aged, it seemed no trouble vnto him. Hee liued eight and fiftie yeares fixe moneths and fixe and twentie daies, his funerals were celebrated with great pompe throughout all the cities of his realme, yea, throughout Christendome, euerie one seeming both in publicke in and in private, to be partakers of this generall losse.

In December after, king Philip his Sonne caused his funeral to bee made at Brussells with great state and pompe, where all his most glorious enterprises were represented. Spaine this yeare besides the losse of two such great Princes, was not a little annoyed by the Turkes army, which going from Prouence, landed some men in the Island of Minorca, beyond the port of Maone, and there, after some difficultie and losse, they tooke Citadella, where there were not aboute five hundred men to defend it, of whome there were aboute foure hundred slaine, the Turkes disdaining that they were forced to batter it, and to giue some assaults before they could take it. And so valour which is wont to bee admired and respected of the enemy, did now cause a contrarie effect in the hearts of these barbarous and cruell men, and hauing spoyled the towne and the whole island, they returned with many prisoners into Prouence.

Armie of Turke
in Minorca.

Death of D. John the third king of Portugal.

22 A little before the emperours death, D. John the third of that name king of Portugall, died at Lisbonne, to the great griefe of his subiects, by reason of the infancie wherein hee left D. Sebastian, the griefe of the Crowne. Hee was a stately and beautifull Prince, and of haucie enterprise, hee continued the Nauigation of the Indies, with great happinesse and reputation, and made the name of Christ to bee knowne to many barbarous nations. Hee made many leagues with the Potentates of the East and South to abate the Turkes power, yea with Tamas king of Persia, to whome hee gaue succours of men, artillerie, and all other munition for warre, teaching him and his people to warre after the discipline vsed in Europe, that they might annoy the Turkes: yet he was blamed, that to spare money, he had caused many forts in Africke to be rased which the kings his predecessors had won with great charge and losse of men. Notwithstanding, he left manie monuments and marks of his pietie, according to those times: for in fauor of him, the Pope made Miranda Portalegra & Leira, bishopricks, and the cite of Ebora an archbishoprick; he reformed many Abbayes, taking away the superfluous reuenues of the rich, and giuing them to the poore: Hee made an vniuersity at Coimbra, increased the cite of Lisbonne much, the which is the greatest and best peopled of all Spaine, and by the persuation of the Clergie receiued the Inquisition into Portugal, being vntill that time reiected by his Predecessors, by reason of the abuse: L Hee was a verie great fauourer of the Iesuites: and dyed in Iune, in the Palace of Ruiere, in the five and fiftieth yeare of his age: hee was interred at Belem.

1559
Castile.

King Philip being at Gand, hee sent William of Nassau Prince of Orange, and D. Fernando Aluarez of Toledo, duke of Alba (who had left Italie and his charge to the duke of Sesse being sent in his place) into Fraunce, to sweare and confirme the articles of the peace in his name: and the duke of Alba had an especial commission, to make the matrimoniall promise of the king of Spaine to Elizabeth of Fraunce, according to the accord, and to solemnize this act, as it is vsual for great Princes that are absent. This was celebrated at Paris in Iulie one thousand five hundred fiftie and nine, but the feasts and ioy of this marriage prouoed momentall for thark. Henry was hurt with the splinter of a lance, and died, as you may read at large in the Historie of France. Before his death he wold haue the mariage of his Sister Marguerit with the duke of Sauoy consummated, which was a great content to that poore prince dispossest of his state, who feared much that the kings death which was vndoubtfull

Marring of king Philip with Elizabeth of France.

1559

A full, would be a great crosse vnto him. King Philip (after the consummation of his marriage, by the duke of Alba) sent Ruy Gomez de Sylua vnto his queene, with a rich diamond, valued by some at eightie thousand crownes, by others, at an hundred and fiftie thousand, with order, that she should prepare her selfe to goe into Spaine the next yeare. And hee finding himselfe freed from troubles, and hauing disposed of the affaires of the Netherlands, appointed gouernours for euerie prouince, and ouer them Marguerite of Austria, his sister, duchesse of Parma, he tooke shipping at Fleissingue, in September, and arriued at Laredo in Biscaie, verie happily: for he was no sooner landed, but there did rise so violent a storme, and such contrarie winds to that nauigation, as, had hee bene at sea, he had bene in verie great danger, or, had he bene in Flanders, he could not haue parted in six monethes. They perswaded him, that his presence in Spaine was verie necesserie, for that by their acquaintance with the English and Germans, many of the Court, and other Spaniards which had followed the warres, seasoned with Luthers opinions, had spread them there: to root out the which the Iudges of the Inquisition sayd, that they were too weak, the king being absent.

King Philip returns into Spain

23 Being arriued, it was his chiefe care to haue a strict search made for them that had any ill conceit of the Romish religion, and to haue them rigorously punished: so as that yeare there were two hideous spectacles presented, one at Valladolid, and another at Seuille, of people of diuers conditions, sexes, and ages, condemned to bee burnt aliue; among which there were some of noble families. Some sayed, it was a secret plot betwixt the two kings of France and Spaine, at the conclusion of the peace, for hee of France had begun the like persecutions within his owne realme, and with his owne officers first. The Archbishop of Toledo, the chiefe Prelate in Spaine, was much suspected to decline from the Romish Church, wherefore he was put in prison, and his rents sequestred.

Persecutions in Spaine for religion.

This yeare the Roman Sea was voyd, by the death of Pope Paul the fourth, being fourelore and three yeares old; before his death being duely informed of the villanies of cardinall Caraffa and his brethren, being his nephewes, hee banished them out of Rome, and deputed them of all their dignities and offices. The cardinall lost his place of Legat at Bolonia, the duke of Paliano the command of the armes and of the gallies of the Church, and the marquesse of Montabello, the gard which hee had of the Popes person, and of the palace. This Pope was succeeded by John Ange de Medici, a Milanois, and was called Pius the fourth: at his first coming to the Sea he caused cardinall Caraffa to be put in prison, and strangled there, and the duke of Paliano, the earle of Alife, and other of his predecessors kinmen, to be beheaded, being convicted of many crimes. He did intimate the Councell of Trent, which had bene left off since the yeare 1552, but it began not vntill the yeare 1562.

Death of Pope
Paul the fourth

During the warres of Europe, Asia and Africke had not bene at peace; for that famous pyrat Dragut hauing gotten the island of Gerbe from Solyman that was lord there, of whom he caused to be hanged at Tripoli, giuing the place to another lord, for a tribute of six thousand crownes, and yet soone after hee depriued him: but those people, notable to endure his tyrannie, tooke armes against him, and sought to make a new lord. Tripoli had also bene taken eight yeares before by Dragut, from the knights of Saint John, who to reuenge that disgrace, sought to recover it this yeare. The people of Spaine desired nothing more, than to keepe vnder the Moores and pyrats of Africke, who being neere vnto them, may easily trouble their nauigation, and annoy the Southern coasts: Wherefore it was not difficult for John Valette, a French man, great Master of Malta, to persuaade the Catholike king, and the Councell of Spaine, to send an armie to the conquest of Tripoli, from whence Dragut and other pyrats did dayly annoy the Spaniards. Dragut was much hared, not onely of the Christians, but also of the Moores, ouer whom hee vsed most cruell tyrannie, seeking by treacherie, or by open force, to kill the chiefe Commanders, and to make himselfe lord of their States: Among which the king of Caruano was the chiefe, from whom hee had taken a great part of his estate: and for that he was of great force, hee was reuerenced among his people,

1559

Tripoli besieged by the Christians.

ple, almost like a Pope among the Christians; wherefore it seemed he might helpe G much in this enterprise, against this famous pyrat, if (as hee had made offer) he would shew himselfe fauourable. Valette being encouraged by his offers, hee began to treat with the duke of Medina Celi, then Viceroy of Sicile, and afterwards in the Court of Spaine, by the Commander Guimaraes, his embassadour. At the first there was some difficultie, the king being in warre against France, but a peace concluded, hee resolved to attempt the enterprise of Tripoli, sending Guimaraes with his resolution, and letters of Commission to them that should haue the execution thereof. Hee carried letters to prince Doria, That hee should with all speed make ready the armie, being now mid Iune; who being verie old, and vnable to beare armes, gaue the charge thereof to H John Andrew Doria, being his lieutenant, writing vnto him into Sicile. The duke of Sessa had commission in the State of Milan, to make ready two thousand Spaniards for that service: and Aluaro de Sando to go thither in person with the footmen that were vnder his charge within the realme, and with the two thousand Spaniards. The Viceroy of Naples had order to send two thousand Spaniards of the regiments of that realme; and the Viceroy of Sicile had the title of Generall in this action.

Guimaraes having performed all these Commissions, in the end hee came to Melsina, the seventeenth day of Iulie. Euerie man was carefull to execute his Commission, and the great Master, to whom the king had giuen the chiefe care to manage this enterprise with discretion, and to asist it both with his counsell and force, laboured by I all means to get the armie forth, that they might performe some worthe action before Autumne: But they had so many crosses, as the nauie could not possibly get out of the port of Sarragosse in Sicile, before the first day of December. There were leuiued for this enterprise by Sando in the State of Milan, besides those men aboue mentioned, two thousand five hundred Italians, all old souldiers, and three Companies of Germans, which had remained there since the last warre, commanded by Stephen Leopardi: and so all these souldiers were sent to Genoua to imbarke, where they had many difficulties, and the Spaniards mutined, so as Sando and Lorenzo Figueras had some difficultie to pacifie them with foure payes: then putting them into certaine ships, the first of October they went to Melsina. K

Of the two thousand Spaniards out of the realme of Naples, the Viceroy would giue but five hundred, hee fearing to leaue that coast without a good gard, for that the Turkes armie, being fourescore sayles, was then at Velona; breeding a doubt in the Christians, where this tempest would fall: But in effect it was by Solyman to keepe our men from the enterprise of Barbarie; for that the great Master having some monethes before sent two foists into Africke, to discouer, one of them was taken by Dragut, whereby he understood the Catholike kings preparations, and his designs: so as having but five hundred men in Tripoli, hee suddenly hyred to the number of two thousand Turkes and Moores; writing thereof to Constantinople, whereupon hee resolved to send forth this fleet. Moreover, there were leuiued within the realme twelue Companies of Italians. In Sicile also there were twelue Companies, among the which, as in those of Naples, there were many banished men, who were fierce and warlike, but verie mutinous. L

All these men, being about thirteene thousand, were commanded by valiant captaynes: John Andrew Gonzaga, sonne to Fernando, was Colonell of the Italian foot leuiued in the State of Milan, and Marshall of the campe to all the Italians that went in that action: Luigi Osorio was master of the campe to the Spaniards of Sicile: Bernard Adams was master of the ordnance, whereof they carried great store, both for field and batterie: Peter Velasques was Commissarie generall of the armie, and the Commander Charles Iesters, was Colonell of five hundred harquebousiers, sent by the great Master, beside foure hundred valiant knights in the galleies, of that Order. There were in Sicile of galleies, three from the Church, whereof the charge was giuen by the Colledge of cardinals (the Sea being voyd) vnto Flaminio of Anguillara, thirteenth of John Andrew Dorias, payed by the king, seven of the realme of Naples, gouerned

Numbers of Christian Armie going to Tripoli.

1559

A ned by Sancio Liens, tenné of Sicile, commaunded by Berlinghery Requesens, squire from the duke of Florence, vnder Nicholus Gentile, five of the Order of Malta, and one galliot, five of Anthony Dorias, commaunded by his sonne Scipione, two of Bandinello Sule. To these were added two galliots of the duke of Medina Celi, the Generall, one of Lewis Osorio, and one of Frederic Staues: so as they were in all foure and fiftie, besides eight and twentie great ships, of the which John Andrew Gonzaga was Generall; two galleons, one of Malta, the other of Cicala, with five and thirtie brigantines and fregates: so as they reckoned in all an hundred and nineteene yessels. They carried great store of munition for the warre, and victuals to feed 30000 men foure monethes.

B There was some difficultie to imbarke the Spaniards of Sicile, mutined, for that there were many monethes pay due vnto them; but Fernando de Sylus, marquisse of Fauara, being left lieutenant by the duke, satisfied them with two monethes pay. Going from Messina to Sarragosse, in October, they stayed there many daies, by reason of the contrarie winds. Their long stay there did much prejudice them, for it not only bred a sicknesse among them, whereof there died about two thousand, but also many fled away, especially of the Sicilians. The first of December the galleies parted from Sarragosse, with great hope of a prosperous voyage, the ships sayling towards Cap passero, being towards night, with an intent to goe to Secci di Palo; who hauing left the ships behind, and a contrarie wind blowing in the morning, they were forced to returne againe into C Sarragosse. The galleies fearing if the contrarie windes should grow great, it would breed them great danger in this long voyage, being much before the ships, they resolved to get to Malta. Here the galleies, with the Generall in them, and other men of account, were honourably entertained by the great Master, for some dayes, the winds being still contrarie to their intended voyage. It was then resolved, that two and twentie galleies should returne into Sicile, to bring the ships to Malta; most of which arrived after some difficultie: Five of them stayed vntill the first of Ianuarie, and three vnto the twelfth, among which was the galleon of Cicala, which running to Cap passero, was there spoiled by the Sicilian souldiers that were in her, who killing their commanders, fled away. The like happened vnto a ship which carried Sicilians also, of the which Vincenzo Castagnola was captaine, who was not slaine by them, but verie cruelly intreated. Some dayes before there arrived seven Companies of Spaniards, sent in three ships by the Viceroy of Naples, to fill vp his number of two thousand, according to the kings commaundement. There came in like manner a galleon with many refreshings from Sicile, and great store of munition.

They were haunted still with that infectious sicknesse in Malta, whereof many dyed, giuing in the beginning apparent signes of the vnfortunate successe of this armie. Thus the secret judgements of God doe often make mens counsels and resolutions vaine, the which in regard of the cause are held good, but are not approved by his diuine providence, it may be to confound the wisdom of men, but without doubt for our offences.

E In the yere 1560 Isabella, or Elizabeth queene of Spaine, was conducted into Spaine, to the king D. Philip her husband, being accompanied by Anthony of Bourbon, king of Nauarre, with other lords and ladies: she was receiued at Roncevaux by the cardinal D. Francis of Mendosa, bishop of Burgos, D. Inigo Lopez of Mendosa, duke of the Infantazgo, and many others, who conducted her to Guadalajara, where the marriage was celebrated. At that time D. Gabriel de la Cueva was Viceroy of Nauarre, in the place of D. Bertrand his father, deceased, who gaue the new queene a stately reception passing by Pampelone. The same yere the prince D. Charles, sonne to king Philip, was (sworne, and acknowledged to be true successor in the realmes of Castille, Nauarre, Arragon, &c. after the accustomed manner of Spaine.

F But to the returne to the warre of Barbarie. The Catholike kings nauie stayed many dayes at Malta, by reason of the contrarie windes; so as in the beginning of the yere the Generall (although he were perswaded by the great Master to stay vntill the weather were better settled) commaunded the armie to imbarke, and about the middest of Februarie he came to the island of Gerbe; where hauing discouered two ships of Alexandria,

1560 Queene of Spaine conducted into Spaine

1560

Alexandria, laden with marchandise, lying within the chanell, they tooke and spoyled them: but they vsed no diligence to take two vessels that went with oares, which lay more within, the which afterwards were no small hurt vnto them. Dragnet was there with seuen hundred Turkes and Moores, on horsebacke, and three thousand foot, being then in quarell with the Xec, or lord of the island, who also had good numbers of Arabians and Moores, and expecting aid from the Christians, was continually in armes against his enemies.

Christians army
at Gerbe.

Dragnet held that part of the island which was towards the chanell, having kept those two vessels readie to send vnto Constantinople, or to flee away, if necessity forced him, hauing no hope to escape on the other side, whereas the Xec lay with his forces, especially if all the Christians armie were landed, whereof a part went to land, to fetch fresh water, being led by Aluaro de Sandys; where skirmishing nine houres together, during their watering, they receiued no great losse, and slue many enemies: In the retreat Aluaro was shot in the flanke, yet could they not possibly take any one prisoner, to be informed of the state of things: which was afterwards thought to haue stayed the victorie, and to haue ruined their enterprize, when as, by the taking of the two galliots, Dragnet could not possibly haue escaped, after which the taking of Tripoli had bene easie, neither should hee haue had meanes to send to Constantinople, to aduertise them of the state of things in Barbarie, and to procure an armie. It was knowne afterwards, that there was great store of money and jewels, which Dragnet sent by Plucially the pyrat, vnto the Bassa of the port, to procure succours from the great Turke: so as if they had taken and burnt them, they had obtained a happie victorie; the which was not done, partly through the negligence of them that commaunded, and partly by the great diligence of the enemy, who would not haue the Christians know what past in the island, for that there was not any creature living found in the two ships, all being fled to land. In the morning before day the Christians parted with their armie, neither could they put any to land in a fregate, to discover the state of the island, the Moores were so careful to defend the shore.

Occasion of a victorie lost by the Christians.

Two dayes after there came eight gallies to Gerbe, the which had stayed at Malta for some prouision, where landing vnaduisedly to water, they were charged by the Turkes, who slue an hundred and fiftie good souldiers, and tooke some prisoners, among which was capitaine Pedro Vermudez: and of the chiefe of them that were slaine, were foure Spaniards, Adrian Garzia, Alphonso de Guzman, Pedro Vianega del Rio, and Francisco Mercato: which disorder did much trouble the Generall, being now at Secco di Palo with the whole armie; and they were all much discontented, to heare afterwards, that a fregate of the knights of Malta, passing neere vnto Gerbe, had bene told by two Renegadoes, that Dragnet was there, and that Plucially was gone with two galliots to Constantinople: And, which was worse, the armie was forced to stay some dayes at Secco di Palo, by reason of contrarie windes, being an hundred and fiftie miles from Tripoli, where drinking fresh water digged in those sands, but of a pestiferous qualitie, it brought a pestilent infirmities into the armie, whereof many dyed. In the end a South-east wind arising, it did hinder their course to Tripoli, and slaying there infinite numbers dyed, through the corruption of the ayre and water, this pestilent disease increasing daily, hauing wasted a great part of their munition, and broken the Admirals ship by the mariners negligence, hauing also lost two smaller ships laden with victuals, at Chercheny, they had not many men in the armie for this enterprize, expecting footmen from Naples and Sicile, and the Galeon of Cicala, two galliots, and some ships, which had bene kept backe by contrarie windes. Wherefore they resolved to returne, and to land at Gerbe, where they arrived the two and twentieth day of March, and on the seuen and twentieth Aluaro de Sandys, Marshall generall of the campe, landed with their men, and some field peeces, to lodge in good order neere vnto certaine wells of fresh water, two miles from the castile, towards the West. At their landing *Aluaro*s nephew died of a pestilent fever, carrying his name: a young man of great hope: he was much lamented by him, and the whole armie.

Christians slain
by the Turkes
in watering.

Christians army
land at Gerbe.

Ha.

1560

Lib. 28.

Having at night made three squadrons of all his men they lodged neere. Sandys not thinking it fit to goe vnto the wells, for that hee found by many coniectures that the Moores had receiued them as enemies, wherefore it would bee dangerous, if flooding late, they should bee charged by the enemy. At night the Xec sent two men with a sayned Embassage, intreating the Generall to goe to Tripoli, for that hee had bene receiued quietly by his subjects, who would take it ill if the Christians should remaine in that island; but in effect they came to discover the campe. They were entertained vntill the morning, and then an answer was giuen them, that they had landed at Gerbe finding the winds contrary to goe to Tripoli, but yet they had done it willingly to put the Xec in possession of the island, before they went to Tripoli, which they intended afterwards. They therefore desired to see him well settled, to buy refreshings with their money, take water, and as soone as the windes were faire, goe for Tripoli. In the morning hauing put all their men in battaile, they marched towards the wells, being sixe miles off, the souldiers hauing endured much that night for want of water, hauing not brought any out of the gallies, so as they marched with great thirst, Sandys being carefullest at their arriuall, disordering themselves hauing a great desire to drinke they should bee charged by the Moores, and receiue some great losse. They marched in three squadrons; in the forward went the great Commander, with the knights and souldiers of Malta, and with the Germanes and French, which were not in all about two thousand.

Andrew Gonzaga commanded the battaile, consisting of three thousand Italians, and in the reere ward were three thousand and sixe hundred Spaniards: And of either side they were couered with a wing of three hundred shot, leauing in the midst a conuenient space for the baggage. But if they came to a battaile, one of these wings was to ioyne with the forward, and the other with the battaile; hauing marched a while, they were staied at a certaine bogge, by a field peece: Sandys with the shot which were towards the shore, advanced to recouer the wells, which hee found had bene spoyled by the Moores, and filled with stones and sand, so as hee was forced to send for Pioners with tooles to cleanse them: neither did the Moores yet shew themselves, being an apparent signe

Order of the Christians army
at Gerbe.

that they had an intent to charge them in their lodging, so as they marched in good order, forbidding any man to disband vpon paine of death. Then they met with foure Moores of Authority sent from the Xec, with a designe to view the army, but with an excuse of a friuolous Embassage, where they were entertained with good words, whilst that the army advanced toward the wells, and then were dismist with a generous answer from the Generall: That seeing the Xec could not come vnto him, being staied by his people, that hee should rest satisfied, and that hee would soone bee with him in his castile, rejecting their proposition, that the Duke should advance with foure horses onely, as the Xec had done, that they might parle together. Yet for all this the Moores, who lay two miles off, couered with a little hill, did not moue, seeing the order of the Christians army to bee verie firme, wherefore they did forbear vntill they lodged, imagining that hauing endured much thirst that day and the night before, they would in their lodging fall into a confusion with a desire of drinke. Which did not follow by Aluaro de Sandys great care who caused them still to keepe their ranks: Notwithstanding that Colonel Spinola hauing too eagerly advanced to entertaine a great skirmish, was in great daunger with some Harguebuziers that were with him. But the Marshall foreseeing this danger, had sent capitaine George Ruiz with two hundred Harguebuziers of Sicile behind certaine walles to fauour their retreat. The Moores attempted also to breake the ranks of the Christians in other places, with great courage and readinesse, but with little losse that day, onely capitaine Ruiz being hurt in the shoulder with a lance, died within few daies after.

The skirmish ended two houres before night, and the Christians lodged, hauing caused the wells to be cleansed during the skirmish.

The day following they fortified their lodging against the enemy, and the gallies were sent for to furnish themselves with water; but three daies after they went forth in battaile, to goe and fight with the enemy, which did not succeed, for the Moores with their

Xec,

1560

Xec, did often intreat the Generall to receiue them for vanquished, offering to bee subjects to the King of Spaine. Having first taken hostages, Michel of Baraona a Colonel was sent with two companies of Spaniards to take possession of the castle, and the next day the Generall entred, with the chiefe of the army, the Moores shewing themselves very obsequious, bringing abundance of victualls vnto the campe. The Arabians Mahamidi were also paised with their Xec, who had faithfully kept the passage of the bridge, as they had bene appointed at Secco di Palo. They afterwards held a Councell, how they might keepe that Island with the kings deuotion, the which they held to bee verie necessarie, for by that meanes they should take a retreat from the Turkes and Moores which did robbe vpon those seas, and withall they should secure Sicile, Sardinia, Malta and other places, and to that end they should build a fort, making vse of the castle to keepe their victualls and munition, and for some wells: besides hauing their materials necre, with other commodities for the speedy doing it.

Fort built in the Island of Gerbe.

On the seauenteenth of March the army began to lodge about the castle, where they had appointed to build a fort, Antonio Conte being Ingener, assisted by Bernardo Aldano and Sancio de Lieu, within two daies after the worke beganne, it being diuided amongst the Nations after this manner. Being to make foure Bulwarkes, the charge of one was giuen to Andrew Gonzaga, and to the Italians, an otherto the great Commander, and to them of that order, the third to Andrew Doria, and them of the gallies, the Generall reseruing the fourth for himselfe, so as within few daies it was put in defence. But neither the ayre nor the water were healthfull for them that were not accustomed vnto it, so as many died daily, and more fell sicke, which was a lamentable spectacle. There was an hospitall provided, and the bishop of Majorca who was also gouernour, did what hee could to preferue the souldiers. They had newes that they prepared an army at Constantinople; and the great Master of Malta doubting some danger called home the great Commander with his Gallies and men, the which parted from Gerbe the eight of Aprill, leauing the charge of supplying that Bulwark to Pedro Vries, for that they made great hast to leaue it defensible, the Duke resoluving to imbarke, being verie carefull to furnish it, although that all things did not succed according to his desire. The king of Caruano came to visit him, and there past great kindnesse betwixt them, but the Xec would by no meanes meet him, yet hee came once halfe a mile out of the castle to treat with him, being accompanied with a great number of Moores. The Generall was earnest to haue store of victualls brought from the ships vnto the campe, but they that were interested seemed to haue small care of the publike good. There were two thousand foot Italians, Spaniards and Dutch appointed for the gard of this fort, with fifty horse vnder the Colonel Michel of Baraona. There was order giuen to haue the Xec take the oth, who should aduance the armes of Spaine. And then hee resoluved to part with the army in the beginning of May, but hee was staied vpon some controuersie growne betwixt the Christians and the Moores, vpon a light occasion; but it was wisely pacified, and some that had most offended punished.

The fame of the army increasing, and the solemnitie performed the fifth of May, a mile from the campe, in the presence of Monreal the Generals Secretary and some of his gentlemen, the Xec did swear vpon the Alcaron to bee faithfull to the king of Spaine, to pay euery yeere fixe thousand crownes, foure Estriges, foure Lanerets, foure Falcons, and one Camell, and in like manner the Moores, that were with him did swear vassalage and fealtie vnto him. Then order was giuen to imbarke the army, wherein they were verie slacke and negligent, vntill that there came a message from the Great Master to the Generall, assuring him that the Turkes gallies being foure score and fise had parted from Gozo on the eight day of that month at night, with an intent as hee did coniecture to relieue Tripoly, and then to seeke out the Christians army, hearing that it was vnsumished of souldiers, and out of order. Then euery man desired to bee at sea, so as the confusion was great, and their opinion diuers, but most concurred to go presently to sea.

The Generall went to John Andrew Doria being not well recovered of a great Infirmitie, to resolute of all things, leauing a charge with Aluaro to haue his men readie, so as returning at night he might not stay; Doria being resoluved to put to sea, and hauing giuen order

Xec swears a bedience and tribute to the King of Spaine.

1560

A order to the ships to follow him, he left a gallie called the Contesse, for the duke to imbarke in, being light, and well furnished with slaues, that all things being ordered, hee might goe and joyne with the armie. The Generall would not omit any thinge that night, being before the twelfth day, but hauing giuen good instructions to the gouernour of the fort, he spake with great efficacy to the souldiers which remained, assuring them, That the armeie at sea being in that accident in greater daunger than the fort, it was fit he should be where the perill was most apparent, entreating them after this manner vntill the day began to breake, when as he with Sandy came vnto the fregate which should carrie them to the gallie that was gouerned by the Commander Guimerano. But hee made a signe vnto him with his hand, that hee should retire to land, for that the Turkes armie began to appeare, with an intent to charge the Christians. After Doria resolutions to get out of those shelles, there arose a contrarie wind, which did hinder him: so as the Turkes Generall hauing cast anchor but fixteene miles from Gerbe, the night before, hauing sent Cara Mustafa gouernour of Mitelen and Musciuly to discouer, he vnderstood in what confusion the Christians were; being readie to depart, hee then resoluved to set vpon them at the breake of day: with which resolution hee came on with a prosperous wind, when as Scipion going forth with a squadron of gallies for the gard, hee was so suddenly surprisid by the Turkes, as hee had no time to aduertise the armie: so as euery man being amazed by this sudden accident, they had no other care: but how to flee, but it was done with that confusion which a sudden feare of an ineuitable daunger doth usually bring. John Andrew Doria distrusting his Admirall gallie, for that it was old and heauie, hee resoluved to draw neere to land, being forced to recover the fort in a barke, being a mile off: the gallie was presently abandoned, and lestin the slaues hands, who being at libertie, carried it to the enemy. It was a miserable spectacle to see that mightie armie scattered in an instant, some one way some another. There were seuen gallies which sought to saue themselves in the channell of Gerbe, where most of the men leaping into the water, although they were farre from land, sought to saue their liues by swimming; so as all the shore was full of men.

24 Armie of Christians miserably lost at Gerbe.

The Marshall Sandy ranne thither with a great troupe of shot and pikes, to defend them that came to land, for that the Moores, being treacherous and inconstant, had presently changed their minds, and slue and spoyle as many as came vnto their hands. The Generall to auoyd this other mischiefe, sent word vnto the Xec, by the king of Caruano, and the Infant of Tunis, That hee should forbid his Moores to annoy the Christians, putting him in mind of his faith formerly giuen. But they prepared to flee also, fearing the Turkes, pretending, that they went to gather together some Arabians Mahamidi, with the which they would returne, and saue the Christians, wishing them not to trust the Moores of the island, who were not well affected to them. That morning there were nineteene gallies fell into the enemies hands, with the Admirall, the rest saued themselves in diuers places, by flight, the which was attributed to the courage and good counsell of the Commander Anthony Maldonado. The great Master had called home his gallies to Malta, as hath bene sayed, to provide for the daungers of that island; but afterwards hee sent backe three, vnder the command of Maldonado, who in this confusion going to sea, was followed by many gallies, relying vpon the skill of this knight, the which succeeded happily. The duke and Sandy stayed vpon the shore, to defend those poore wretches which came from the gallies, from the Moores, giuing them clothes and armes, which were prepared for them that should defend the fort.

The same day they held a Councell vnder a tent, where were the Generals John Andrew Doria, D. Aluaro de Sandy, and the Commander Guimerano. Doria said, That it was necessarie for them to depart speedily, whilest that the enemy was busie in giuing chase to the gallies, which he meant to doe in a fregate, carrying them to Malta, or into Sicile, to gather together the disperfed gallies, and to arme others, to make head against the Turkes armie, if hee should seeke to annoy any place of the kings. Sandy did counsell the duke to goe to attend his chiefe charge of Sicile, the which was now in great danger, and if he did it not he should faile much of his duetie: but for his part, he would remaine in Gerbe, being thereunto bound both by the duetie of his charge, and the seruice he ought vnto his king, seeing there remained about three thousand, besides the appointed garrison, some of which escaped from the gallies, and some were neuer imbarcked, being sicke, and not fit for the warre, and yet they were to be respected as Christians; besides, there being many which had followed him in the action, it was not fit he should seeke his owne safetie, and abandon them.

These with other his reasons were allowed of, and it was resolved, they should depart that euening about Sunne set, in nine fregates, some other knights and officers following them: but a contrarie wind stayed them that night. But the next day there happened another disgrace: for the Generall meaning to keepe the Turkes from the shore, whilst they pursued the gallies that retired into the chanell, hee caused the artillerye of the fort to bee mounted, among which was a Culuerin, which being overcharged, brake, and flue some that were nere vnto the Generall. The losse was exceeding great in those gallies that were taken, not onely of the vessels, and of many souldiers that were in them, but also for that there were many men of account flaine, or taken prisoners: among which were Flaminio of Anguillara, Generall of the Popes gallies, Sancio de Lewis, Generall of them of Naples, Berlingheri of Requesens, of those of Sicile, the bishop of Majorca, Gaston de la Cerde, the Generall sonne, with others. But at the Turkes returne from the chase of the gallies, they prepared to fight with the ships which were full of souldiers, being sixe and twentie; all which they tooke without any difficultie. Some write, there were about 3000 men taken in the ships & gallies, and drowned, seeking to flie to land. The Viceroy of Sicile, and John Andrew Doria, escaped, and came to Malta, and from thence to Sicile, hauing first given order, that a fregate of aduice should be sent to them that were in the fort at Gerbe, of their safetie, and that the Commaunder Guimerano was sent into Spaine, to informe the king of this accident, and to intreat him to send D. Bernardin de Mendoza, Generall of the gallies of Spaine in Sicile, to ioyne with such as were escaped, and to make the bodie of an armie, whereby they might succour the besieged at Gerbe. They of the fort were verie joyfull of these newes; and Sandy, who was made Generall by the duke, confirmed them with many good reasons, that they should vndoubtedly expect it, omitting no paines to fortifie the place.

Pialy Bassa, who was Generall of the armie, resolving to take the fort, did write to Dragut (who a little before the Christians had come the second time to Gerbe, was gone with all his horsemen to Tripoli, to defend it) That he should send, or come with all the forces he had, to besiege Gerbe, sending him also prouision of victuals, and munition for that enterprise. The Bassa landed his souldiers, and began to fortifie his lodging nere vnto the wells where the Christians had camped. Sandy did not thinke it conuenient to make often sallies, hauing no great store of good men, and too many that were vnproufitable, which was his greatest trouble, hauing neither victuals nor water sufficient for a long siege. But he resolved to draw it in length, for many respects, hoping that they should be releued, it importing his Maiestie much, not onely for the losse of the fort, but also for many good souldiers, and captaines of qualitie, which were there exposed to apparent danger. The Bassa hauing all the garrison souldiers of Barbarie, with other necessaries, made his approaches nere vnto the fort, where they were daily in skirmish, about certaine wells, where the Christians kept a gard without the fort, but in the end they tooke them from the besieged. The Turkes prest them with their trenches, and prepared a great batterrie against the fort; but their greatest miserie was, that by the losse of their wells, and the great heat in those Southern countries, many began to die of thirst, hauing but little water which they had reserved in vessels; for the water which they drew out of the wells was so salt, as it did cause thirst, and not quench it. Sandy seeing how much it did import to be thus kept within the fort, and to be deprived of water, he resolved to make a great sallie, and to chase the enemy from their trenches; the which had bene successefull, if the

Turkes campe about the fort at Gerbe.

Wells left by the Christians at Gerbe.

A souldiers had kept the order prescribed them. There were forth sixe hundred Italians, and as many Spaniards, all harquebussiers, with an hundred Germans, pikes, who sailing forth by two ports, should come and ioyne together, cloy the ordnance, and kill all that should resist, expressly forbidding them to fall to the spoyle. Fifteene were others also flood readie to succour where need should require. At the break of day they went forth, killing many of the enemies, with which charge Dragut himselfe was burnt: they cloyed three peeces of ordnance, tooke some Ensignes, and were masters of the trenches: but forgetting the order was giuen them, some being too bold, aduanced so farre, as they could not be rescued by their companions, and some too greedie, fell to spoyle; B whereby they were in such disorder, as the Turkes embracing the occasion, turned head, and charged them, striking such a terrour into them, as they basely fled. There were many men of worth died fighting valiantly, among the which were the earle Gabieno Anguillara, capitaine Carlo d'Aro, and some others. The Turkes pursued them that fled euen vnto the fort, where the artillerye from the bulwarkes made a great slaughter of them. But the want of water, through the losse of the ships, was of such importance for the besieged, as without doubt it was the cause of all their miseries, and in the end of the losse of the fort. They were forced to make their bread with salt water, their victuals were verie salt, being prouision taken out of the ships, the season of the yeare in that climat was exceeding hot, their tayle great, and continuall, so as their thirst increased as their water C decreased. Those poore wretches, to stie the occasions of great thirst, eat liard, so as they grew so weake, as they could not endure the insupportable toyle of warre, but died without remedie. Many seeing that they must die of thirst, fled to the enemy, and although they knew well, that they went to a perpetuall slaueerie, yet they ranne when they had any opportunitie, to giue themselves vnto the enemy for drinke, and to no other end.

Thirst encreased of in the fort of Gerbe.

They had not much water remaining in their cesterne, and that which they digged within the fort was salt, like vnto the sea water: whereupon a Sicilian, called Sebastian du Polere, offered to draw a good quantitie daily by Alambick, and to make it fresh: Sandy promised him a great recompence for this inuention, and caused the Germans to make D eighteene Alambicks, hauing no more matter to worke with; but they could not draw about sixe and thirtie barrells a day out of their wells, which was a small prouision for so many thousands of thirstie persons. The salt water being distilled, was so sweet, as tempering it with the well water, it made a pleasant mixture: so mingling the water of the wells, the distilled water, and that of the cesterne, together, the Generall diuided it among the souldiers, giuing a double portion to them that carried armes. The diuision of this drinke was verie strange, whereof the gouernour of the fort had the chiefe care, being a matter of great importance, and therefore it was distributed in a place where there was a good gard, whereas the souldiers past in order, hauing a sponge hanging at a line, the which being put into a tub of water, he tooke it and sucked E as much as was allowed him.

Salt water made fresh by Alambick.

The Turkes continued their workes, and had aduanced their trenches euen vnto the fort, and the souldiers ran daily vnto them, yea they who had the charge not to suffer others to run away, were the first that went themselves, and some were so villanous, as they had plotted to set fire on the powder, and to blow vp all. Some affirme that there were fiftene hundred which had fled to the enemy, whereof there were many souldiers of known valour, and some nobly borne, but not nobly minded, selling bodie and soule to stie the want of drinke. The Turkes sought to win the fort by mines, batterrie, and assaults; and the besieged repulst them valiantly. In the end of Iune D. Aluaro de Sandy hauing viewed the prouisions carefully, and finding that they had not wood for sixe dayes, which was F most necessarie to distill their water, and that they had not sufficient of cesterne water left, to serue the souldiers three dayes, they being about a thousand, seeing matters reduced to that extremitie, he called the captaines and chiefe officers to counsell, hauing first appointed that the souldiers should haue double allowance both of meat and fresh water alone, with some litle wine which had bene reserved for them that were wounded.

Resolution of Aluaro de Sandoval for their last refuge.

He spake vnto them at night, letting them see to what estate they were brought, and repeating in what manner they had defended themselves with judgement and valour, against the violence of their enemies; and that seeing themselves now vanquished rather by hunger and thirst than by armes, he knew not a more honourable resolution, than to put that generous course in practise, which in most desperate cases hath giuen a glorious victory to braue and resolute souldiers. They therefore concluded that night to make a gallant sallie, and to charge the enemies, who least dreamt of it. In the morning, two houres before day, there went forth at the port towards the sea, six captaines with three hundred men, being chosen out of all the nations, and hee himselfe followed with the chiefe of all his men, leauing some behind to gard the fort: of those that he led hee commended some to remaine in the reeward, with certaine captaines, and to kill all them that should disband. He commanded the foreward to goe directly to the Bassa and Dragut's tents, he himselfe chusing to assaile the great tent, where there was a great corps de gard. With this order they sallied forth with great resolution, some marching towards the Generals tent, and some towards the other: They past three trenches valiantly, to come vnto the tents, and Sandy defeated the corps de gard, where making a great slaughter, he put all into confusion: but hee found himselfe suddenly abandoned by his men, meaning to aduance, not any one remaining with him but Marotto, the Sergeant Major, and captaine Persuccio of Nizza, of the which Marotto was soone after wounded and taken prisoner, and yet he fighting still with the enemies, being followed by Persuccio, who had offered to conduct him to the galleys, in the end hee freed himselfe, and recovered a gallie, whereas hee neither found victuals nor clothes, being all wet: wherefore he sent a messenger vnto the fort, to will John d'Alarcone, the Treasurer, to send him clothes, and some prouision for the souldiers of the galleys, with some oares, to the end they might conduct him, by the chanell, into the fort, exhorting all them that were yet remaining to defend it safely.

The newes of their Generals life was some comfort to the captaines and souldiers, but they began presently to despaire of all helpe, but by some accord with the enemy, hauing water but for two dayes drinke. There were many Christians dyed in this sallie, but most men of command, the rest being either fled vnto the enemy, or gotten vnto the fort. The Treasurer Alarcone went vnto Sandy with prouision, and yet they could not part that day, the galleys being battered continually by the Turkes artillerie. They within the fort were so full of confusion, as they knew not what to resolute, and although there were some captaines which did encourage them to attend the Generals returne, yet the feare of the greater part was such, as they forced the rest to yeeld, to another resolution; and they had already set vp a flag on Spinolas bulwarke, in token of a parley: whereunto the Turkes made answer with the like signe. Whereupon three captaines with an Ensigne went vnto the campe: but the Turkes seeing no flag of truce set vp in the galleys, as well as in the fort, Pisly commanded that they should assaile them both by land and sea. Sandy being surprised with this unexpected surie, he with captaine Clummet disposed the souldiers as well as they could for their defence, finding in them a great willingness and resolution: but seeing afterwards that they made no shew of hostilitie in the fort, and that the Moores, Turkes, and Christians seemed to bee vnited, they also sought to escape, so many flying away, as Sandy had not about thirte men remaining with him; at which time Dromax Ares, a renegado of Genoua, captaine of the Bassas Admirall, came vnto the galleys prow, who spake vnto Aluaro in Italian: My lord, you can no longer defend your selfe, fall not therefore into the hands of these base people, but yeeld your selfe, and chuse a better partie: I will not yeeld my selfe to thee: hot to any other, answered Sandy, but I will goe with thee, if thou wilt promise to bring me vnto the Bassa: The renegado promised him, and receiving him into a little boat, being ouer laden, it sunke, and they were wet. Being then conducted to the Bassas tent, hee receiued him with honour, and discoursed much with him touching his defence: but he refusing to accept of any offer vnworthie the name of a Christian knight, was conducted to Constantinople; and presented to the great Turke.

Sandy

D. Aluaro de Sandoval taken prisoner by the Turkes.

Sandy seeing the captaines which went forth to capitulate; he blamed them, foretelling them, that they should not haue any thing obserued; as it fell out: for hauing agreed, That all the officers should come forth freely, with five and twentie souldiers in a companie, they were most of them put to the sword, and the rest taken prisoners, onely they had libertie which went forth to capitulate. The fort was spoyled, but the gaine was small. The General Pisly hauing stayed there eight dayes with his fleet, he went and made a stately entrie at Tripoli; then returning home, he was forced by contrarie winds to stay in a port of Sicile neere to Sarragoffe: where some Turkes, going to water, they receiued much losse by the horsemen which garded the coast.

The next day Lewis Sahamedra went vnto the Bassa with a safeconduct, touching the ranfome of prisoners, lamenting much the miserie of those noblemen he found there, and wondering at the smiling countenance wherewith Sandy entertained him, who shewed himselfe like one that was neuer altered by the crosses or smiles of fortune. The Bassa gaue him good hope of ranfome; but the wind growing faire in the morning, he weighed anchor, and went on his voyage: Coming to Constantinople, he entred in great triumph, causing the prisoners to be carried to his house: In which Aluaro de Sandoval shewed againe his generous mind; for some shewing him a bathing house, a place appointed for many slaves, he refused to enter into it, letting the Bassa vnderstand, That it was no fit lodging for him: and the Turke (not without wonder at the greatnesse of his mind) commanded, that he should haue chambers appointed for him. They were all presented with great solemnitie before the great Turke, who stood behind a window to see them, they all refusing to accept any visiting conditions, that were offered them by the great men of the port. Sandy was carried to the tower of Mamero, whereas those prisoners which once enter, doe neuer, or seldom, come forth. Sancho de Lieus Berlingheri, and others, were sent to the tower of Pera.

After this great losse, new miseries pursued some of them that escaped: for D. Lewis Oforio, and the vicont of Cigale, being come into Sicile, hauing bought a Turkish gallie which had beene taken from Plucially the pyrat, a renegado of Calabria, it was taken from them by the Viceroy, in the port of Messina: Whereat these two captaines being much moued, they meant to passe into Spaine, to complaine vnto the king, going in two of their vessels; but they were set vpon by a gallie and two Turkish foists, and taken almost without any resistance. Cigale was led to Constantinople, with Scipio his sonne: the father dyed there, and the sonne denied Iesus Christ, from whom came that famous Cigale, who was a Bassa in our time. The Commaunder Guimerano hauing the reputation of a great mariner, was made Generall of the galleys of Sicile; but at his first going forth with seuen galleys, hee was incountried by Dragut, neere vnto the island of Lipari, hauing eleuen galleys well armed, who tooke him with his seuen galleys, and led him away. Among the prisoners was the bishop of Cattanea, of the house of Caraccioli.

In the king of Spaines countries of the Netherlands, they of the reformed religion increasing mightily, notwithstanding the rigorous Edicts which had beene made by the Emperour, the Councell of Spaine thought it fit to bring in the Inquisition to suppress them, appointing certaine Inquisitors of the Faith, who should haue a care that no forbidden bookes should bee read, nor kept in their houses, and that no man should dispute against the Romish religion. But the king hauing promised, That hee would not spure against the Romish religion. But the king hauing promised, That hee would not charge his subiects with such an intolerable yoke as the Inquisition was, and the Inquisitors finding that they could not by any means put it in practise, they sought to bring it in by a covert means, vnder colour of making new bishops in the country; to effect the which cardinall Granuelle sent doctor Somnius to Rome, as you may read more at large in the Historie of the Netherlands.

This yeare 1561 the king of Spaine made great instance at Rome, to haue libertie from the Pope, to dispose of some of the tenthes of the Clergie of Spaine, which amounting to a great summe yearly, he meant to apply to the good of Christendome, and especially of his realmes of Spaine, arming a great number of galleys more than had bin accustomed to defend those coasts, being continually annoyed with multitudes of pirats, who had their

IIIII iij

Fort at Geryé taken by the Turkes.

Pisly Bassa enters Constantinople in triumph.

1561

New bishops in the Netherlands

King of Spaine seeks to procure a great summe of the revenues of the clergy.

1561 their retreats in the ports of Barbarie: And as many of the noblemen of Spaine shewed themselves readie to contribute out of their owne reuenues, to so good and necessarie a worke, so the Pope did not refuse to gratifie the king, but stayed his resolution, for that he would not displease the Prelates of Spaine, who did not seeme verie willing to beare this burthen; and the Pope desired more at that time than any other (when as they sought to draw the Councell againe together) not to giue them any great distast.

1562

The warre beginning to grow hot in France, for matters of religion, the Protestants being in armes, after the massacre of Vassy, the French king craued aid from the Pope and king of Spaine, who were verie willing to giue him the best succours they could. The Pope, on the sudden, could not send him above two thousand foot, and two hundred harquebusers on horsebacke, vnder Fabritio Serbelloni, his nephew, Generall of his forces at Auignon: who finding himselfe too weake for them of the Religion that were in that country, demanded new succours, and had two companies of lances sent him: but the Catholike king offered to send tenne thousand foot, and 3000 horse, of the which the French accepted 3000 Spaniards, and 3000 Italians; but they came late, after the battell of Dreux.

King of Spaine
sends succours into France.

D. Carlo prince of Spaine grieuously sick.

The prince D. Carlo, sonne to the king of Spaine, appointed the sole heire of so many realmes, playing at Alcalá de Henares with some young youtnes, his play-fellows, hee fell vnfortunatly downe the staires in the palace, where they stood playing: in which fall hee was so hurt in the head, as the Physicians dispaired of his life. In this mournfull accident the king referred his fatherly affection to the will of God, writing into all his realmes, That they should with their devout prayers procure the princes long life, if it were for the glorie of his diuine Maiestie, and the good of his subiects. Some write, that hee was strangely cured by the bodie of Saint Diego, who dyed some hundred yeares before, a religious man of the Order of Saint Francis, the which the king caused to bee brought into the princes presence. This bodie was kept in a shrine of yron, which Henrie the fourth of that name, king of Castille, had caused to bee made, and layed in a chappell built in honour of him. This shrine being brought and opened in the kings presence, they found, with great admiration, that the bodie was nothing corrupted, nor a haire diminished, but breathing forth a sweet fauour: where causing the princes bodie, halfe dead, to be layed vpon it, he began presently to amend, and within few dayes after recovered his perfect health. But euery man hath free liberte to beleuee it, if he please.

This yeare, besides the kings priuat sorrow for the dangerous sickness of his sonne, hee had a publicke discontent for the losse of some gallies, nere vnto the port of Hetradura. D. Bernardin of Mendosa, some call him John, was Admirall of the fleet of Spaine, who was readie with two and thirtie gallies, well furnished, to make an attempt against the Moores; but they were surprised with a cruell storme, and in the end three were swallowed vp in the sea, of the which the Admirall was one, where Mendosa was; and the rest were driuen into the nere harbours verie much shaken: of the L three there was not any liuing creature saued, and of the rest there dyed verie many: so as some write, they lost two thousand persons, others five thousand. The which, with their former losse at Gerbe, was verie grievous to the house of Mendosa: for the same yeare Indice, brother to this Mendosa the Admirall, sailing from Genoua towards Spaine in a galley, it was so tost with contrarie winds, as the mariners not able to help themselves, they were swallowed vp; so as Mendosa's bodie could neuer be found, yet the bodie of the galley, and of the rest that were dead, were recovered.

Bernardin, or John de Men-dosa drowned with some galley.

1563

Councell of Trent.

The Prelats being assembled againe together this yeare 1563, they began to prosecute their sessions, and it ended in December, hauing continued almost eightene yeres, but with many interruptions, not without the protestations of many princes and Christian States, of some pretended nullities, as well in the manner of their proceeding, as in the substance of their decrees. But among all the questions, that of Precedence betwixt the kings of France and Spaine, was vied by their embassadors with great vehemencie; and in the end it was sent by the Fathers to Rome, to be decided by the Pope, and the Consistorie.

These

1563

A These two great Princes hauing both at the Countess and in Rome, where they attended a definitiue sentence, their partisans that were affected, and others which discouered without passion, many pertinent reasons were produced on both sides, both by word of mouth, and by writing: whereof for that it concerns this subiect, I will make a brieue repetition.

The Spaniards said, that take it how they would, were it for temporall or spiritual matters, Spaine was of greater dignitie than Fraunce, and that it was in a manner iudged by law, custome, and the opinions and authoritie of the most learned, that the kings of Spaine should haue the prerogative for their excellencie and nobilitie, and for the merits to mankind, and especially to the Church of Rome. Antiquitie (said they) in these matters imports much, whereof Spaine retains the vndoubted marks: for since the first peopling of the earth, the name of Spaine hath bene famous to the world, and preferred in that nation since the time of great Hercules Oron, or his next descendants which haue raigne there, and hath neuer bene extinguished, whereas the name of the French is new.

26
Controuerse betwixt the French and Spaniards for precedencie.

Markes of the antiquitie of Spaine.

The Spaniards by the consent of all men, are descended from Tubal one of Japhets children, which his posteritie hath called Iubal, of whom the mountaine Iubalda, called by Geographers Iubeda, retains the name: But the Celtes and Gaules to whom the French haue succeeded, or (to doe them more honour) with whom they are in a manner incorporated, haue their beginning from one Samotew, who according to Berosus was the younger Sonne of Tubal. The situation of Spaine as to her dignity, it holding the first place in the Geographicall maps: but if the greatnesse of the countrie giues power to kings, and that they are valued thereby, who knowes not but that Spaine is much greater than France, whereof the kings of Spaine doe yet hold a good part in Soueraigntie? It is, vnquestionable, that euer since there were kings of Spaine, their dominions haue bene larger then those of France: it is apparent in the raigne of the Spanish Gothes, who did not onely hold at one time Spaine bounded by the Spanish seas, and the Pyrene mountains, but also the country of Languedoc, vnto the riuer of Rhosne, and that which is now of the realme of France beyond Garonne, and moreover in Afrik a great part of the countrie: The greatnesse of the empire of the king of Spaine at this day is different, who holding the best part of Europe, with many places in Afrik vpon the Mediterranean sea haue discouered a fourth part of the world, vnknowne to the ancients, and thereby enriched the rest with temporall commodities, as it hath done that new world with spiritual blessings, causing those barbarous nations to bee instructed in the knowledge of God. To which new regions the monarchies of the ancients cannot bee compared in greatnesse, much lesse the empire of Fraunce at any season. And to increase their greatnesse, wee may adde vnto these reuenues the rights which they haue gotten to the empire of Constantinople, not only as successors to the earls of Flanders, but by contracts made with the Pakolagnes, expelled by the Turks, & in like maner to Ierusalem, which euery one holds to be, the chiefe

Tubal father to the Spaniards.

Situation of Spaine.

Greatnesse of the king of Spaine's dominions.

Right of the kings of Spaine.

E in dignitie among all the Christian realms. The gifts of nature are also verie considerable, where there is any question of the preeminence of realms and countries; wherein Spaine excels France without contradiction: for there is no Region in the world more temperate than Spaine, nor better indowed by nature, be it in fertillitie of the land, in bountie of the fruits, or in any commoditie it doth produce, and as for the men, they are a quie both of body and mind, industrious, warlike, and fit to command, as the world hath found by experience. Spaine hath bene alwaies knowne to be a nurserie of good souldiers, and the mother of great Capitaines, and wee need not doubt, but that Hanniball (who made the Romans to sweate and tremble) if hee had any magnanimitie and courage, hee retained it from the instruction and breeding he had in Spaine in his youth. Spaine hath in former times giuen vnto Rome a Traian, an Adrian, two Theodosius, all emperours, valiant and triumphant, with many holy and learned Popes, guiders of the church, among the which Damasus was great and admirable. As for the Nobilitie of the kings of Spaine which raigne at this day, it is incomparable, for they be successors to the kings of the Gothes, and allyed to them in blood, and as it were graft into the stockes of the famous family of the Balkes and Hamales. But to draw their Genealogie neerer and more personally,

Fertilitie of the land of Spaine.

Emperours and Popes, Spaniards.

Nobilitie of the kings of Spaine.

Authors

Authors agree that they descend from the Merouingiens and Carlouingiens, the founders of the estate of the French, whereby it followes that they haue right vnto the realme of France, so as they cannot be taxed of fraud when as they shall seeke to settle themselves there to aduance their monarchie. If you consider their prowess and victories, wee haue no need to go beyond our owne age: for the emperor Charles the first king of Spaine, hath alone wonne more famous victories, than all the other princes of Europe. The French are witnesses to their costs, and that mightie and ferefull Germane Nation, which hee subdued in lesse than tenne moneths, and brought all the Princes, Towns and states of the Germane empire vnder his obedience: he repulst the Ottomans forces both by Sea and land, and conquered the realme of Tunes in Afrik. But it is verie remarkable, that notwithstanding any warre which Spaine hath endured since it was freed from the Romane yoke, being invaded by the Gothes, Moores, Arabians, and other nations, yet the Spaniards haue alwaies preferred their libertie, and retained their manners, their language, and their religion, and haue drawne others vnto it, with whome humane changes haue made them to liue and conuerse. Seeing then by antiquitie, largenesse of dominions, power, victories, generous actions, and finally by all that may purchase greatnesse and temporall dignitie to nations and their kings, Spaine is to bee preferred before all; it followes, that the first place is due to the kings of Spaine before all other Christian kings, and by consequence before him of France. But for that the question of this precedence hath bene moued in a generall Councell and disputed before the Pope and the sacred Senate, it is no lesse requisite to set down the testimonies which Spaine and her kings haue of the spirituall fauour of God in his Chatholike Church, wherein they shall bee found to exceed in graces, and spirituall gifts, the kings of France, and all other kings, and their realmes, as also in deuotion and merits to the Popes, and to the Sea of Rome, the onely iudge of this controuerse. It is certaine that Iesus Christ hauing finished the worke of mans redemption, ascended into heauen, Spaine among all other Pagan nations was first aduertised of this great benefit; as also by signes and wonderfull prodigies, shee had the first feeling of his comming and birth: for the Spaniards had first of all this credit to see the Apostles personally among them, and to heare the Gospell preached by them, and to beleue, which is confirmed by many graue and faithfull authours, and by the ancient and vndoubted traditions of the churches of Spaine, saying that S. James had been sent by the Apostles to the Spaniards, had preached among them, and made many disciples, where returning to Ierusalem, had led some with them, who assisted at the third General Councell, (whereof mention is made in the fifteenth of the Acts of the Apostles) and had their voices there, this holy Apostle being president: who hauing bene put to death by Herod Agrippa, and his bodie cast vnto the dogs, it was gathered vp by the said disciples, and transported miraculously into Spaine: and by their peaching infinit families had bene conuerted, where afterwards many received the Crowne of martyrdom, whose memorie is famous in the church: the authoritie whereof commands euery man to beleue that the virgin Mary being liuing, appeared to Saint James in the Citie of Saragosse before hee parted from Spaine, exhorting him to cause that church to be built, which is there dedicated to her, which is the most ancient of the Countree, and it was not long before the Princes of the Apostles, S. Peter & S. Paul came into Spaine, where with an incredible zeale in a manner all the people were conuerted, vnto the Asturias; whereof Torquatus the Asturian, was one of the first to giue testimony of their constancie in the faith, for the which he was executed at Rome. The Prelates of Spaine, were at the first councels, especially at the first at Nice, whereas Cosmas that famous bishop of Cordoua signed the decrees thereof, before Nicolas bishop of Gaule: The church of Rome is beholding to this Ozium a Spaniard, for the donation made vnto it by the emperor Constantin, who had bene instructed by him in the catholike faith. After this sacred general councell, there were many others held in Spaine, of the which that of Aliberi in Granado is famous, whereas Helen the emperors mother was with her grand-child Constantin. But since there haue bin frequent Councels in that nation, namely in Toledo, during the Goths raige, where the kings did assist, & shewed themselves ready to execute their decrees. There is no contradiction, but the Spaine first inhabited in the Gospell.

Virgin Mary seen in Spaine.

Councels in Spaine.

A but the kings of Spaine were made Christians before them of France: the memorie of king Ricardo is and shall for euer be honourable, who chased Attilius out of Spain, & did persecute heretics, of which Catholike Princes the kings of Spaine which raigned at this day are true successors, for that they suffer as any one within their dominions to speake against the holie Catholike Apostolike and Romish church. To maintain the which without blemish vpon earth, there is nothing like all the Christian gouernment to the inquisition of Spaine, exceeding in holie seueritie and profitable rigour all the inquisitions of other kingdomes and estates. These the laws and constitutions of Popes are receiued, reuerenced and practised, the which are not in France, whereas the Canon law is abrogated, and whereas they haue often sent Popes and Councels, censuring their decrees, which are irreprehensible vnder color of certain pretended liberties of the French church, wherof their kings make themselves protectors to the preiudice of the sea of Rome. The first princes which opposed themselves against the spoiles of the Moores invading Spaine, abandoned by the defeat & death of king Roderike the last of the Gothes, haue been holy & wel beloued of God, wherof there are most autentik signs in many places. To D. Garcia Ximenes first king of Sobrarbre, the deliuerer of Spaine, was giuen fro heauen for his arms adored crosse vpo a green tree in a field at Arges. D. Enigo Arisla one of his successors, by the like fauor receiued a crosse arged in a field at Azure. Many miracles are reported to haue hapned at the Christenings of kings of Spaine. Some of the haue cured the kings euil, & many haue expelled diuels. In the citie of León, is kept a holy standard brought from heauen by S. Isidorus, one of the Patrons & protectors of Spaine, in the which there is painted a bishop on horseback, holding in one hand a crosse, & in the other a sword, vnder which the kings and catholike princes of Spaine fighting against the Moores, haue obtained many victories. By the constancy of the kings of Spaine, especially of them of Castille, who haue neuer varied in religion, since king Ricardo aboue mentioned, they haue had the honor to root the Moores out of Spaine, & to cleanse the countrie of those blaspheming Iewes. In acknowledgement of which graces, they haue alwaies freely giuen the first fruits of the conquests and glorious victories which they haue obtained against Infidels to Popes and churches, building more goodly abbeies, Cathedral churches, Monasteries and Colledges, than any countrie in the world, and giuing them large indowments, wherof that of Toledo is a strange president, for the archbishop hath about 300000 ducats of yearly rent, besides that which concerns the church & chapter, & the rich dignities & Prebends, the reuenues of which archbishopricke exceed the ordinarie of many kings. In Spaine, the Ieronimitans haue had their beginning, with the order of la merced, of the redemption of captiues, & many other orders of holy knights, which haue been a terror to the Moores and Infidels. But aboue all, the Iesuits are a worthie brood of Spaine, courageous defenders, & aduancers of the Catholike Apostolike and Romish religion cherished by the kings of Spaine, in fauor of the holy Sea, and continually entertained by them, & sent into all the parts of the world, to make war with their spiritual armes, whilst that they did valiantly, with their materiall armes fight against infidels, & root out hereticks: for which good offices, they do rightly carry the name of Catholike, the which is much more excellent than that of most Christiania which the French kings vse, for sectaries, & they that are straid from the church dare boldly call themselves Christians, but not Catholikes; the which were absurd for that this appellation is not proper but to those that are of the true familie of Iesus Christ, euery distinguished by this name of Catholike, receiuing no other superlatiue note; and therefore of greater dignity, the which hath been confirmed in the house of Castille & Leon, since the king D. Alfonso the first, who raigned in the yere of our Lord 737 for a make of their piety & merits. By the which they are both by law and priuiledge from the Pope worthily advanced to the first sears among Christian kings, and therefore to be preferred before them of France, in all assemblies, both spirituall and temporall.

Against these reasons the French and their partisans maintained, that the French king should haue the precedence, not only for that they had been long in possession, but also by right, hauing wel deserved it, and for many reasons answering those which the Spaniards had objected. The embassadors of France complained much that the fathers of the Councell had done wrong vnto their king, in admitting of this action, although they had surceased, and

Ricardo a Catholike king

Inquisition of Spaine.

Kings of Spaine Saints, come from heauen.

Church of Toledo.

Iesuits first bred in Spaine

Name of Catholike.

Preiudice done to the Kings of France by the Councells.

1563

Testimonies of the preemi-nences of the kings of France and would not decide it, the which they should have rejected, having also allowed them of Spaine to sit alone out of France, by way of provision, until that the Pope and the Consistorie of Rome had determined calling thereby in question the precedence of the kings of France, over all other Christian kings, the which had bene for many yeares praesided & confirmed by the judgement of Popes, and the testimony of the most famous Lawyers, and ancient writers. For, Saint Gregory, the Pope saith, that the king of France doth as much exceed all other kings as a Royaltie doth a private man. Pope Stephen the third saith, that the French nation shines above all others. Besides doth maintaine, that the kings of France carrie the crowne of liberty & glory above all other kings. That they are as the day star in the midst of a cloud coming from the South, which cannot be darkened. That the banners of France march first, over the which no other king can pretend any advantage of honor. Boniface of Vitalianis, an Italian, Auditor de Roma, said as a Greek author, & many others have left in writing, that who named a king simply, it was meant by him of France. Besides, the ranks of Christian kings is seen in the Registers of the court of Rome; and in those which they call provincials in all the Cathedral churches, in which the king of France precedes, & they of England & Spain are set after. That it was worthy after these holie & learned judgements, to bring it again in question; & they held it for an insupportable injury to the kings of France, who in effect are not subject to the Popes judgement, nor to any other jurisdiction in this matter, nor in anything that concerns the rights, preeminences & prerogatives of their crown, which they were to maintain by the means which God had given them: whereupon they made a sharpe invective in open Council against the Pope, by reason of some former opinions he had declared at Rome: yea they did tax him bitterly, for that he did challenge unto himself all power about the Council, suffering nothing to be determined but what had bin allowed by him at Rome: That he shewed himselfe too vnthankful & ynjust to France and to her kings, who had alwaies bin benefactors to the holy Sea, seeking to put them from their lawfull rank, and cruel to all Christian people, in that he rejected the iust demands of all Catholike princes which was, a necessarie reformation of the manners of the Clergie, & of that which was corrupted in the discipline of the Church, & especially of the abuses of the court of Rome. That instead of bread of health, he gave Scorpions, sowing discord betwixt the kings of France and Spaine, under colour of these importune precedencies, tending to cause a pernicious warre in Christendome: wherefore they said, that reserving the reverence that was due to the holy Sea of Rome, wherein France and her king meant to continue, they could not acknowledge Pius 4 for a common Father, nor true Pope, but for an unlawfull vsurper of that dignitie; they protested nullity of the acts and decrees of the Councell, which were but repetitions of that which Pius had set down, declaring that they had comendement from the king their master to retire, with all the Prelates of France, least by their presence they should seeme to allow of his attempts against the dignities of the kings of France, the priuiledges of their crowne, and the liberties of the French Church.

People animcorruptible Indge.

The Parisians of the French nation both at Rome and at Trent discoursed at large both by word & writing: seeking to satisfie the curious multitudo (which it may be is the most incorruptible iudge in such courtousies.) And for that the Spaniards wold bring their nation from Tubal, one of the neere descendents of Noah, they to pay them with the like money, laied for a foundation of the antiquitie of the French Nation, that the Gaules and the French were one nation, and one people, issued from Gomer, grand-child to Noah, and that this nation of the Gaules did extend from the river Tanais, unto the Western & Atlantik Ocean, in which circuit at this day is contained Spain, France, Germany, Polonia, Russia, with the Gottike & British Ilands; and these people were generally called Commerians & Gaules, a name taken from their progenitor, Gomer, who was also surnamed Gal, which signifies escaped from the waters, that is to say, the Deluge. But since to distinguish their troups & members, as they dispersed themselves, they took other names, as of Galates, Albins Theutons, Germans, Cimmericians, Cimbres, Cicabians french &c. drawn fro their aduethes or the situatio of the regions where they lodged, or fro the princes & captaines which did lead the: yet the name of Gaules hath bin alwaies retained by them which haue held the country on this side, or on the west part of the river of Rhin, for a perpetual marke of their antiquity,

People com-banded under the Gaules.

Lib. 28.

1563

A antiquitie, taken as is said, from the deluge, that all the foresaid people were in old time of the same maners, that is to say, free, open, warlike and conquerous; courteous to their friends; fierce to their enemies, vying for a long time one language, taken at the diuision of Babel, which was the Teutonick, more pure at that time than it hath bene since, by reason of the mixture of nations: And thereupon the Gaules which dwelt on this side, and the Germanes or Teutons, which remained on that side the Rhin called Brethren: That the inhabitants of Spaine at this day could not attain to this antiquitie, although they say they are descended from Tubal the brother of Gomer, for Gomer Gal was the eldest of Iaphets children, as they are set downe in the holy Scripture, and Tubal was the fifth, who made another branch, the which came but late into Spaine, having taken another way. That one Iberius issuing from him, had given the name to Iberia Asiatika, which at this day is the Countrie of the Georgians, from whence out of doubt the Iberians Spaniards are come, but long after the Deluge: And that on the other side some wandering troups came into Spaine under the conduct of one Sepherad, whose descent the Rabins bring also from Gomer; of whom there is no other record, but that having crost Africke, which was held by the posteritie of Cain, hee had entred by the strait into Spaine; and that hee had called that continent by his name Sepheride; turned since into Spereide, and in the end into Hesperide.

Iberians Spaniards.

C Moreouer (said they) that the names of these two stemmes or fathers of nations are verie considerable in this question of antiquitie and nobilitie, being most certaine, that in all the names of these first men, there was something mysteriall and propheticall, which gaue a note vnto posteritie. But the word Gomer signifies a man perfect and finished, and Tubal signifies seed, which begins to spring. There is an honourable mention made of Gomer, and his descendants in all authors, as giuen to religion and sciences: And if wee shall beleeeue Berossus, as wee haue him at this day, and drawe the Gaules from one Samotheus brother to Gomer, hee commends him to haue bene the wisest man of his time: whereas there is no worthy mention of Tubal, to ground nobilitie on. When as the Scripture speaks of the children of Tubal, it puts them in the ranks of D mercers, pedlers, & horse couriers, frequenting the Tyrians faires & markets. The Spaniards themselves say that Tubal and his people were first seated in Iberia Asiatika, from whence they without doubt came, which haue peopled the greatest part of Spaine, who were therefore called by the Greekes and Latins Iberians, which is the true and most ancient name which we find of that region of Europe, which wee call Spaine, which name was brought from Asia. Before this transmigration of the Spaniards or Iberians out of Asia into Europe, the Gaules, who were also called Celtes, had run beyond the Pyrenees, and being as it were in possession of Spaine, did this honour to the Iberians that were new come, to giue them passage through Gaule, and a dwelling beyond the mountains: and although that afterwards growing insolent against their benefactors, there grew contention and warre betwixt them, yet they were reconciled, and thence comes the name of Celtiberians, a people famous in the war, with whom the Romanes had to do in Spaine; the which were long subiect to Princes and Captaines, Gaules and Celtes, whereof the name of Brigus one of their ancient kings (which word is of the ancient Gaule) makes mention: and the names of Celiques and Callaiques or Galliques haue bene for many ages preferred among the people of Spain, whereas now the Countries of Portugal, and Galicia are, for assured testimonies that the Celtes and Gaules had been seated in Spain before that euer the Iberians Asiatikes had set footing there. As for the name of France or French, which their nation carries now, they were agreed that it was new, but with all they maintained that it was most honourable, for Franc signifies fierce and valiant, free from all seruitude, active, noble, and an honest man; and for that they had giuen it to the nation of the Gaules, not conquered by them, but rather freed from the tyrannie of the Romanes, and of the barbarous nations which did spoile it, it did nothing derogate from the antiquitie and nobilitie thereof, nor to the fraternitie which they haue alwaies had with the Gaules, seeing that both these names are still in vse, and common to the Nation, that of Gaule and Gaulois being much vsed in solemne acts both spirituall and ciuill.

Name of Spaine
come out of Asia

Name of France or French.

It

It is certaine that Gaules is as it were the generall name, and French a particular, so as the Spaniards in the search of Antiquities cannot find any other, but that the French being somewhat dispersed from the bodie of the Gaules, by the violence of the Romanes, who prest them; and to whom they would not yield but by extremity, were in the end vntoed againe vnder one Crowne; whereas by their vertue they erected a realme in Gaule, of the French familie of the Merovingiens: And they may read in Histories that the Romanes possiding Gaule, found alwaies them of that nation, dwelling vpon the banks of Rhin and Meuse; whereas now bee the Prouinces of Cleues, Auliers, Gueldres, Holland, Zeland, Friseland, and the neighbour Countries, knowne to all Authors by the name of Sicambrians, who were hard to manage, alwaies contending for their libertie, vntill they had freed themselves from the yoke and tyrannie of the Romanes, which Sicambrians of the Rhin did afterwards take the name of Frances or French; and haue imparted it to others: So as wee may by good proofes conclude, that when as in the time of the emperour Valentinian, the Sicambrians French erected a realme in Gaule, that they were no new people, but of the same nation, whereof a number became more eminent than the rest, not for any desire to rule ouer them, but in hatred of the Romanes tyranny, and to repulse the Burgongnians, Gothes, and other barbarous Nations, which spoiled the Countrey, and held their brethren in seruitude.

Having freed them, and ioyning all in one bodie, they erected this French monarchy, which hath exceeded all others in dignitie and valour, adding to the name of Gaule that of Fraunce, in honour and remembrance of their deliuerers, who held the Scepter and Soueraignty as due vnto them; but the Belges, Celtes, French, Acquitanes, and finally all the Gaules made the bodie of the estate, vnder one common bond of ciuill libertie, one honouring another by mutuall courtesies, for as the Gaules had reuerenced the French armes which had freed them from seruitude and oppression, so the French for their part, had receiued with honour the ciuilitie, lawes, and religion of the Gaules, & made an equalitie of free right betwixt them.

Spaine a prey to the barbarians.

The Spaniards haue no memorie to brag on, for as Pharamond made warre in the lower part of Gaule Beligike, Spaine was then a prey, and torne in peeces by diuers cruell and barbarous nations, hauing neither feare nor courage to resist them. The Gothes beganne to shew themselves on this side the Alpes, and to frame a royall estate in Gaule, making their seat at Toloufa, but they held it not long, for the French sent them soone beyond the Pyrennees, to contend with the Vandales, Alanes, & Sueues, who had already wholly subdued Spaine, and hauing diuided it among them, fell to iarre about their portions, at the coming of this Gothic nation, who had no conformitie nor acquaintance with the Spaniards, as the Sicambrians had with the Gaules, but was a meer stranger & an enemy, seeking nothing but spoile. The Spaniards hauing bene conquered by the Gothes from the Romanes, and the aboue named nations, they fell out of one seruitude into another, which continued about one hundred and twenty yeares; and their condition was very miserable from Valeria the Arrian king vnto Ricardo the Christian: for all that time was a meere conquest full of desolations and ruines, without any forme of good gouernment, whilst that the raigne of the French Gaules was felid in pietie and iustice, and did prosper in armes, subduing the Burgongnians, forcing the remainder of the Gothes which were on this side the Pyrence mountains, to goe to their companions in Spaine, and rooting out the rest of the Romanes in Gaule. Ricardo and some other kings following him held some better order in their gouernments, and made lawes grounded vpon naturall equitie & iustice, the which are at this day in price: There past some raigns in this nation, in the which the princes being made Christians, did willingly take counsell in spirituall things, of the Clergie in national counsells which were often held, and namely at Toledo.

Abuse of Councils in Spaine.

In like manner the Clergie did reuerence the royall authority, and did freely receiue fit orders for their estate in temporal things: & we must confesse that whilst this harmony lasted, the Spaniards & their affairs did prosper: but when their Councils were conuerted into assemblies of the states (where also the Clergie would euer haue most authoritie) when as instead of treating of the doctrine of Iesus Christ, and the due dispensation

A of his heavenly blessings among Christians; studying to refigure errors with knowledge and charitie, and to reclaim the manners and affections of men, to the rule of true iustice. By holie Constitutions they did handle with contention the preheminiences of Prelats in their diocesses and iurisdiccions, disposed of the estate of Kings houses, of the honours and offices thereof, and of the gard to their persons, reconciled quarrelles among great men, and dealt in other such worldly affaires, all vnder the authoritie of Councils, whereby all was corrupted, euery man forgetting his ranke, in the end they found proud and obdurate Kings in that State, who in disdain of the impertinencie and exesse of such pastors (and for their cause of religion it selfe) abandoned themselves to all vice and impietie, so as God to punish them gaue way to the Moors and Arabians, who entred into Spaine, and made such a spoile, as both Clergie and Laie men, King and Subiects, Noblemen and Clownes, finally all degrees smarted many yeeres. That from these lamentable calamities the defenders of the Spaniards preheminance and their kings, seeke I know not by what Art to draw glorie, saying with ostentation, that their nation hath alwayes preferred among the Gothes and Sarazins which haue ruled ouer them) their Language, Religion, and Libertie: wherein they shew themselves verie vaine; for as for their libertie, the Histories shew the contrarie, neither had they kept their religion pure: And as for their language, they of the French partie said, that the Spaniards had wringed it to no purpose, yea if they would consider it well, they should find, that it gaue them no grace, but did rather blemish them. If they will say, that in

Moors the scourge of Gods iustice.

Vanities of the Spaniards.

C Spaine they neither speake the Gothike, Arabic, nor African tongues, they must also adde that they speake not Spanish there. The French doe freely confesse that the true Languages of the Gaules and French are not much vsed now in Fraunce. Doe wee not know that either of them spake the Roman tongue in those daies? for hauing bene long subiect to the Empire of Rome, they were forced to learne the tongue, and to vse it by an expresse Lawe, as all other people did, which were subdued by this proud Nation.

This Roman tongue was retained both by the Spaniards and French to this day, yet mingled and corrupted by other tongues: but there is one notable difference, which giues the advantages to the French, which is, that although they haue some words and termes remaining of the Roman tongue, yet haue they very few that are meely strange, D but are of the old Sicambrian, German and Teuton tongues, which is the common language of the French, and of all the ancient Gaules, whereas that which the Spaniards vse at this day, consists of the Roman, Gothike, Arabic, Moorish, and African tongues, a perpetuall note (vnlesse they change it) that they haue serued the Gothes, Moors, Arabians, and Africans, the which is yet fresh: And therefore it appeares that the Gaules being deliuered from the Roman yoke, by the French their Country men, hauing made one body, and one people, haue since preferred their language better and more generously than the Spaniards: and (which doth more import) increasing still in power, dignitie and good gouernment, they haue alwayes maintained their estate and libertie, keeping any other nations from supplanting them either in al or in part, were hee Christian or E Infidell, and therein they doe much exceed the Spaniards, who haue suffered themselves to be controlled by the Infidell Moors about 800 yeeres.

Argument taken from the situation of Spaine vaine.

And whereas they thinke to extoll Spaine by reason of her situation, about all the regions of Europe, for that say they, it represents the head in the Geographical Maps: they answered, that it was a fruituolous induction, grounded vpon the speculation of children and idle persons. That in truth Spaine makes a chiefe part of Europe, but that proues not that it is the best part. If in the description of Authors it be set before France, that giues it no preheminance: for by this reason Ireland should be preferred before Italie and Spaine it selfe, for that Ptolomie and other Cosmographers after him set it first in F their geographical descriptions.

And for that there was no contradiction but to the greatest Princes greatest honours are due, they were agreed vpon this point: But the French said, that the honourable greatnesse which consists in dignitie must not be measured by the greatnesse of his dominions, nor the multitude of his subiects, as the Spaniards would doe. That seeing they did confesse that the Realme of Ierusalem, which did neuer equall the fourth part of

Kkkkk

Spaine,

1563

Dignitie and greatness of Spaine wherein it consists.

The Spaniards
Empire is a charge to it selfe.

Spaine hurtfull to all Christen domes.

French alwaies beggall to the Spaniards.

Spaine, should be preferred before all Christian realmes if it were standing, they shew plainly that this greatnesse which giues preheminance, doth not consist in quantitie of ground, but by pietie and iustice, by the valor & vertue of kings, and of their subiects, & by their bounty, they and their estates increase in reputation: In all which it is very apparent that France hath the better. But discoursing of this greatnesse which consists in quantitie, they said that the number of realmes which they reckon within the continent of Spaine, is a vanitie and euident signe of the weakenes of that nation and of their shame; witnessing that Spaine hath bene dismembred into many parts, which hath not hapned in France, since it was a realme, in the which they might haue made a dozen better realmes than those of Arragon, Granado, Gallicia, and the Castilles, being reduced to their ancient limits, the other forcine estates, where they commaund, are no profitable accessaries to Spaine, as Sicilie, Naples, Sardynia, the Netherlands, no nor the Indies: These members lie too farre off, and doe more trouble than aduance their kings affaires. Let the Spaniards then heape together all the realmes, duchies and counties which are of the iurisdiction of Spaine in Europe, and let them adde thereunto Peru, and new Spaine, and for an increase let them bring their pretended rights to the Empire of Constantinople, and to the realme of Ierusalem, France will alwayes ballance all this euen as a small bullet of gold, and will equall in weight a greater masse of other metall. This greatnesse, said they, of that Spanish Empire, is too new to be esteemed, and too yong to presume to goe before France; the which is venerable for his lustie age, and hath maintained her Crowne about 1200 yeeres, with so great honor, as it were folle to repeat the attempts of her feudataries and vassals, the which shee hath happily calmed and quenched. This Spanish pride, glorious but of late, is too delicate to stand of it selfe, the which time will discover. This arrogant presumption is like vnto the pomegranate, which being growne in few nights, aduanced it selfe before the Pine tree which had indured many a sharpe winter, but it withered away with the first wind, the Pine standing firme and immouable.

But as for the commodities which the Spaniards say that the greatnesse of their kings Empire brings to the rest of Christendome, they answered, that it was quite contrarie, & that there was no nation in Christendome but complained of the wrongs & injuries they receiued from Spaine, neither was there any one pleased with any good was brought thence, vpon which tearmes France stood. The commodities, said they, which people receiue one from another, proceed either from meere liberalitie, or by way of commerce and traffike, or else casually, and as it were by reflection of that which a nation doth for it selfe, which notwithstanding redounds to the profit of their neighbors. They know not in France, what the Spanish liberalitie is proceeding from charitie. The commerce and traffike which these two nations haue together, doe without doubt incommode France, and cause a dearth of victuals and other commodities, besides it doth daily withdraw the labouring people & Artisans (which are said to be the riches of a country, being incited with the Indian gold) which hath course in Spaine. And it were difficult to find a president of any deed or enterprise of the Spaniards, which hath turned to the profit or ease of the French. But what benefits and good offices haue not the Spaniards receiued of the French nation? since the time of the Gothes raigne in Spaine, these people being alwayes in the pawes of some tyrant, the French were forced to goe and deliuer them. Vpon this occasion King Dagobert passed the Pyrennees, chased Suintilla, a disordered and cruell man, from the royall throne, and setled Sisebut a good prince. Lewis 8, and his son S. Lewis, so the end they might not diuert the weakne of the Spaniards, and the affront which (said they) was done vnto them by D. Berenguela, wife to D. Alphonso 9 king of Leon, when as shee ceased vpon the realme of Castille, the inheritance of her eldest siller D. Blaunch mother of S. Lewis, causing her son D. Ferdinand to be inuelted, the French being busied in greater affaires. They will say, they haue made warre against the Sarazins, the vniuers of Spaine, when they threatened to invade France, and the other regions of Europe; That they haue staied them with their owne forces, and in the end expelled them: It is their custome to bragge, but they cannot giue the lie to so many wortheie Authors of all nations, and to their owne Annales which they the contrarie. The French are not so malicious licitious to deny that the Spaniards haue not caried themselves valiantly in many encounters against the Moores, holding their country and houses, but to say that they alone had subdued them, that were not fit. Let them for euer thanke the French, who haue giuen them the means: Let them acknowledge, that to attaine vnto their deliuerie, the French made the way, and brought the ladder, mounting with them, yea before them: where vnto they had neuer attained without the French. Did not Charles Martel prince and gouernor of the French defeat the barbarous Africans, when as being masters of all Spaine, they passed the Pyrennees, presuming to deuoure France? Every man knowes that in two memorable victories, which he obtained against them, the one in Touraine, the other in Languedoc, he slew about 400000, by which routs they were so weakened, as the pietie Kings of Spaine, who had begonne to lay the weake foundations of the realmes of Ouiedo, Leon, Arragon, and Nauarre, in the mountains, had some leisure to fortifie themselves. The same Charles Martel, did not he keepe the country of Cartellogne with the forces of France, whereof he made a bulwarke against the Sarazins of Saragosse, Valencia, & those that were lodged in the neere countrie of Nauarre? They would gladly deface the memorie of so many painfull voyages and worthy exploits done for them by the French during the raignes of Charlemaine and his sonne Lewis, who did so long keep the Moores on this side the river of Ebro, that the Asturians and Castillians might on their side aduance against the Barbarians, for that it may be they would blush at the report of these things whereof we cannot speake but to their great dishonour. They should remember, & can not dissemble it, that D. Alphonso 2 of that name king of Leon and Ouiedo, surnamed the Chast, for that (although he were married) he would not haue any children, seeming to haue a desire to recompence Charles the great for so many good offices which hee had receiued, inuited him to come into Spaine, vpon a voluntary promise, that he would cause him to be acknowledged by his subiects, for the lawfull successor of his estates: then hauing lightly changed his opinion by the persuation of his courtiers, hee did forget both Gods honor and his owne, making a league without any scruple with the Moores: whom hee did arme against the French, being vpon the way, for that said the Spaniards they would not subiect themselves to a stranger. This was the cause that the French armie receiued a notable rout in their retreat. The French being incensed at this bad vsage, began to neglect the affaires of Spaine for a time, which gaue meanes to the Moores to increase their power, and to settle themselves for many yeeres, God letting them know by this seuer and long punishment, how much he was displeased with their treacherie & ingratitude, the which shewed a manifest contempt of religion: Notwithstanding the French did not forbear to succour the Spaniards many times at their great neede. Read the Annales of Spaine, you shall find, that King D. Alphonso the first of that name in Castille, and the 6 of Leon (it is he which took Toledo from the Moores, and vniited it to Castille) was virtuously assisted by great troupes of French, led by the Earles Raymond of Burgundie, Henry of Bezancon, and Raymond of Tolouza, who purchased him the surname of Brave, by reason of many goodlie victories, obtained against the Moores attributed to E this king, although that most were done by the French, and their commanders, to whom he was not vnthankfull. For in requitall of their vertues, he married all three to his owne daughters. Raymond of Bourgundie left vnto his sonne D. Alphonso Raymond the Royall keeper of Castille, by the right of his wife D. Yrraca: and Henrie of Bezancon was the stennie of the royall house of Portugal. The same Spanish Histories make mention, that at the siege of Saragosse, in the yeere of our Lord 1118, being held by the Moores, D. Alphonso the seuenth, who called himselfe Emperour of Spaine, for that he held all the Christian Realmes in that country, had in his armie the earles William of Poitiers, Rotron of Perche, with them of Cominges and Bigorre, the vicount of Lauedan, the bishop of Lescar, with many other French noblemen and knights, by whose valour the citie was taken, & made the chiefe of Arragon, and many routs giuen vnto the Infidels. It was not by the sole forces of the Spaniards, although they were all vniited, that the famous battell of Muradal was won: it were too great ingratitude, or senseless malice, not to acknowledge it, the which their owne Writers doe witness, that in the army of king D. Alphonso the fourth of that name in Castille, there were about 100000 strangers, & most French:

Kkkkk j

and Treacherie and ingratitude of the Spaniards

to the French.

Generositie of the French
to the Spaniards.

and in like maner at the battell of Salado; at the siege of Algezires, and such like actions, it is most certaine that the Kings of Fraunce, and they of Nauarre, who then came from the French, neither spared men, nor treasure, no nor their persons, witnesse Philip of Eu- reux king of Nauarre, who died at Seuille or Xeres. They did confesse that the Spaniards predeceffours had fought valiantly against the Moores, according to their means, but it was for themselves, and their owne private commodities, and to return into their houses, the which did not much concerne the profit of other christian people. Whereas the French without any private designe, moued with the only zeale of religion at the simple persuasion of Popes, and at such time as they did assist the Spaniards, haue enterprised most holy and difficult warres, against all the forces of the East, drawing vpon them the warrelike nations of the Turks, Arabians, Chaldeans, Egyptians, and others of Mahumets sect, from whom they took the city of Ierusalem, all Palestina, and Syria towards the sea, erecting a realme there, which they held and defended valiantly, to the good of all Christendome, wherein the Spaniards cannot say that they gaue any aide; and yet they intitle themselves Kings of Ierusalem, and aspire to the Empire of Constantinople, which elates haue cost Fraunce so much blood, so as they haue no reason to quit their rights, being grounded vpon a donation and inuestiture of the Empire of Constantinople, made by Pope Leo the tenth to King Francis the first, and to his successors, when the Potentates had enteruew at Bolonia.

Interests of the French for the publick good of Christendome

Experience doth teach vs daily, to what vse the forces and treasure of the Kings of Spaine are employed, and of what import they be to the state of Christendome. The nauigation of the west Indies, and the possession of those great and vast deserts seeme verie honourable and fruitfull vnto them, and they make great ostentation of the gold, silver, and pearle that comes from thence. These things, which are not worthie to be put in the ranke of things to be wished for by vertuous men, seeme to giue content, and to bring some ease to this common life, the which we passed more sincerely, and it may bee more commodiously before the discouerie of these countries. In one respect they are verie auailable for the Spaniards and their kings; for they are as it were sinkes and common sewers, to draine away and confine all their banished men, bad husbands, bankrupts, infamous persons, and finally all men that are hurtfull to their other subiects, for with such men the west Indies are for the most part peopled. Moreover, it is certaine, and it doth plainly appeere to those that consider things rightly, that all other regions and states of Europe, yea and Spaine it selfe are hurt in many respects: for since the plentie of Indian gold, all things are more deere and impaired. By this metall which passeth currently with the armes of Spaine, Inuention and Industrie are made dull and sleepe, and thereby Truth and Honesty are corrupted. By this Indian gold, the Kings of Spaine, who were wont to entertaine friendship with other Potentates their neighbours, are now growne full of contentions. They entertaine many souldiers, and make continuall leuies, being neuer without quarrells, so as they and their subiects are in continuall troubles; as it happens alwayes to those, who to assist others, loose their owne quiet and rest. By this gold the Kings of Spaine presumed to haue away made to a monarchie in Europe, and haue engaged themselves in vnecessary warres vpon diuers pretexts, which haue kept backe the Christians forces, whilst that the Turke got Hungarie, and made other lamentable breaches into Christendome; and by this holie or cursed gold, Charles the first Emperour or King of Spaine, made warre against the Germans, vnder colour of religion, though the true cause was to force them to suffer the Empire to be hereditarie in his house. Hee vanquished them, but not without the aide of other Germans, corrupted with his gold, hee triumphed ouer all the princes, estates, and towmes of the Empire, and thought hee had attained to the height of happinesse; but behold Henrie the second the French king, staies him sodaynly, with the valour of his Armes, accompanied with iustice, and maketh him desist; hearing that the French army approached neere unto the Rhine: the Germans received this good tyme at that time of the French their friends, neighbours, and brethren, to recouer their libertie and the dignitie of the Empire. A worthie and fresh example, to shew that Fraunce precedes Spaine in qualities which giue splendor and dignitie to Kings: that is, in valour accompanied with iustice, and in a charitable

Dissemin. titles by the discovery of the west Indies.

Germany freed by its friends
the French.

A protectio of the oppressed: & that true riches consist in sufficiencie, which is alwayes found in France. But who could forbear to smile, to heare the scorching aire, & the drie & barren ground of Spaine preferred before the milde and temperate climate of Fraunce, whereas the Spaniards seek reliefe in all their necessities, as euery man knowes: what good comparison can be made of the men and fruits which Spaine produceth with them of France? whereas so many religious, active and ready wits are bred, such goodlie and nimble bodies, so courteous and pleasing in behavior, of such inuincible courages in all great and difficult enterprises? whereas so many great captaines were borne, who planted colonies throughout all the world: a nation which hath made the Turke to tremble, hearing only the name of Franc or French, which hath furnished so many Popes & soueraigne pastors to the Church, and so perfect, as the Spaniards cannot compare with them, be it in regard of their vertue or number: which hath produced so many great emperors, fathers of nations, & amplifiers of the Christian religion, sons to so many noble kings, & of so great antiquitie, as no others can attaine vnto it. Let the kings of Spaine glorie of the families of the Balthers and Hamules reigning among the Gothes, fatal nations, which haue brought nothing but miseries and ruines into Europe, where in the end they themselves haue bin ruined and extinct, but that the Spaniards would now make them liue againe amongst them: But that they are descended by issue male, fro the Merovingians or Carolingians as some of their feed chroniclers suggest, & they themselves vant, ther is not any but they that speak it, & their profes are very obscure & vain, and subiect to many inuented fables.

C The princes of the familie of Austria, from whence the kings of Spaine at this day are defended, are issued (as the French said) from the earles of Habsbourg, the which Earldome was a verie small thing in that part of Germany, which is now called Ergow, amongst the Suisses in the yeere 1272. This place of Habsbourg, whereof they intitled themselves earles, is now a ruinous castle, & hath often changed master. As some report, it was one Rapst or Ratboth which layd the first foundations, as also of the Abbey of Murre, where they find some charters, from the which they haue drawne their genealogie since this Rapst vnto Raoul or Rodolphus the first of that name amongst those Earles, who was chosen emperor of the Romans, at such time as there was a great schisme among the Germans; & they found that this house had bin first brought into credit by a bishop of Strausbourg, brother or neere kinsman to the said Rapst. They also shewed by the testimony of some writers, that this Rodolphus Earle of Habsbourg was so poore, as he was forced for a time to serue as steward to Ottocaire the titularie king of Bohemia, and that afterwards ayming at the commodities of the Church, he did insinuate himselfe into the fauor of an archbishop of Mentz, whom he did accompany in a voyage which he made to Rome, and was so gracious with him, as at their return, finding the princes of Germany strangely diuided into factions, for the imperiall dignitie which had bin void about 25 yeeres, this archbishop caused Rodolphus to be chosen K. of Romans; by his credit which was great, and by means of the princes contentions, who would not yield one vnto another, & by the same fauour he was easily confirmed by pope Gregory 10, who was then at Lion, at a generall Councell. Rodolphus hauing attained to this dignitie, employed himselfe happily to pacifie the quarrells of Germany: and as he was politike, he neglected no occasion to aduance his owne affaires, manning his good fortune in such sort, as he caused the duchies of Austria, Sueuia, Sciria, and Carinthia to fall into his house, with the realme of Bohemia for a season, and the Landgrauiat of Alsacia, with other lands and fees of the Empire, the which fell void during the said troubles, most of the which haue remained to his posteritie. So by these vnexpected euents, and contrary to all mens expectations this house of Habsbourg grew famous, as God doth sometimes raise the poore, and make of a Sheepeheard a King, when he please. There was some light (saied they) vnto that time of the house and familie of Austria, issued without contradiction from the estates of Habsbourg, but whereas Writers seeke to draw their auncetors from the Princes of Austracia, of the French race of Merone; It is a meer vanitie & rashnes for the, to wander through the desarts of these turbulent times, where there is no path, nor way to lead them to the knowledge of such auenturist beginnings. For the ground whereof, they suppose one Stegbert, (who it may be neuer was) fro whom they would draw the families of the Erles of Habsbourg,

Beginning of the Kings of Spaine issued from the house of Austria.

bourg and others: and they say that he was sonne to Theodebert king of Austrasia, he that was dispossest of his estate, and flaine at the instigation of Queene Brunhild, by Theoderic king of Burgondie, the being grandmother to these 2 princes. That Theodebert and all his sonnes being flaine, except Sigebert, who hauing escaped the massacre, was sent into high Burgondie, beyond Mount Iura, where he begat sonnes and daughters, and that his issue was dispersed into diuers families of Germanie: but the French maintained that this pretended Sigebert was fained and fabulous, as doth appeare by the best French writers, who say that Brunhild her selfe slue all the sonnes of Theodebert, casting her selfe a little one, being in his swathing cloths, against the stone, whose name was Metrouce, Theoderic hir other grandchild being also poisoned by her, & the punished by Clotaire king of France; hauing also rooted out the vnlawfull race of Theoderic, he vniited the realmes of Austrasia & Burgondie to his crowne: afterwards hee gaue Austrasia with the title of a realme to his son Dagobert, who coming to that of France, inuelted his sonne Sigebert, who dying king of Austrasia, left one onely sonne called Dagobert in the garde of Grimoald Maior of his palace, who sent his Pupil into Scotland, where hee caused him to bee made a monke, and soone after died, and then hee caused his owne sonne Hildebert to be crowned king. But the French to reuenge this disloyaltie, brought an armie against him, slew Hildebert, and carried the father to Paris, where hee died in prison. Since which Austrasia and Burgundy were gouerned by Maiors of the Palace or Viceroyes, vnto Pepin, who was crowned King of Fraunce, by reason of the idlenesse of Childeric the last king of the race of the Merouingians, not by fraud nor violent vsurpation, and much lesse through the fauour, approbation, or counsell of any Pope, as some say, but by the election & consent of the princes and estates of France, and therefore with a more iust title (if there be any comparison) than that by the which the kings of Spaine doe now hold the realme of Nauarre: for it is a fundamentall right which neuer dies among the French, to haue libertie to choose their kings (provided alwayes that they goe not out of the masculine line of the blood royall) in case of some great incapacie, or for some other important accident, which concerns the publique good, and preferuation of that crowne & state: which nation among other good humours cannot endure a strangers command, nor of their owne princes, when they seeke hatefull alliances elsewhere, and that contemning the honors and sweetnes of their owne country, they affect the manners and fashions of strangers: whereof Charles the first duke of Lorraine made trial after the decease of king Lewis the 5 his nephew, before whom Hugh Capet was preferred, being also a prince of the blood, but not so neere: whom the French reiected, for that he was wholie giuen to the fashions of the Germans, which are much more tollerable to the French than those of the Spaniards, who seek at this day to pretend a right vnder fained genealogies, to quarrell for the crowne of France, if opportunitie serue: whereupon they did conclude, that if their ancessors could not indure a prince of France Germanized, they should hardly euer accommodate themselves with princes of the German race, but Spaniolized, yea transformed into meere Spaniards, both by nature and education, if they should prouoe directly that the house of Austria come from the Earles of Habsbourg, were descended from the Merouingians; and that pretended Sigebert. They added moreover, that if the historians of the house of Austria could prouoe, that their fained Sigebert had beene in the world, and could trace out his posteritie directly to Philip King of Spaine now reigning, yet could they not make it appeare, that either he or Theodebert his father were capable of the crowne of France, by reason of the vncertainty of their blood, for that queen Brunhild reported that Theodebert was a supposed childe, and that hee was not brother to Theoderic, nor son to king Childeric of the blood of France. Moreover, they demanded of these curious searchers of the rights of the house of Austria, where these princes descending from the pretender Sigebert were hidden, whenas the scepter of the French was transferred into the familie of Charles Martell to Pepin, and then to Hugh Capet: why did they not shew themselves then, or at the least make some solemne protestation to preserue their pretensions & rights to the crown of France, if they thought they had any. For they might haue done it safely, especially since that they of Habsbourg came vnto the empire and were growne mighty: but it is strange that neuer any prince of that race opened his mouth,

A mouth, nor imploied any Chronicler to colour this imaginarie title, no not the emperor Charles 5, who wanted no ambition, seeking to lay hold of it by force only, and the right of conquest. D. Philip his son is the first of his family that talks of this antiq Merouingian nobilitie, & hath begun to cause instructions to be drawne to entertain his greedie desire to deuour France, employing also with the like designe the alliances made by them of his race with the blood of France, by mariages, thinking thereby to maintain in the house of Spain some hereditary pretensions to the realm of France, if he had no other support. The which in good termes of Law is called, to flaunder or to caull, which is when one contends for that which is notorious: for euery man knows that the realm of France is no inheritance, but a succession of the males, by reason of the blood, and that it respects not the women, being contrary to the inueterate custome of the French. Thus the French and their partisans restrained the Antiquity & the Nobilitie of the kings of Spaine, & brought them to the house of Habsbourg in Germanie, saying notwithstanding that they of Habsbourg and Austria haue great reason to commend the alliances contracted by mariages with the house of France: for if they haue drawne any lustre from the Germanie empire in Reichshofen the first, and other Emperours of their familie, they haue made it perfect by the mariages which some of them haue contracted with the Princesses of the blood of Fraunce: witnesseth the Emperour Maximilian, who hauing married the heire of Burgondie, had so great lands and possessions by her, besides the companie of a noble ladie, as he made a waite thereby for Philip his son, and his descendants to attaine vnto their greatnes.

C But committing now to the chiefe points, which should be decided in this question propounded in a generall Councell, which are, the pietie and religion of people & their princes; and their duties and merits to the church of God, and to his ministers. The Spaniards (said they of the French partie) tell wonders and miracles vpon the relation of their Writers, and their Spanish traditions: That if God hath giuen preeminence in these things to their nation, it ought to be allowed and confirmed among men, yea in ecclesiasticall assemblies. They bragge that they first saw and heard the chiefe Apostles in their country, and that they had beleueed the Gospel before all other Gentiles. Hereof they giue no better prooffe than the French might doe, if they should say that these great lights S. James, S. Peter, and S. Paul going into Spaine had passed through Gaule, going by land rather than by sea, desiring to profit more, as it is likely, according to their duties and commissions, and that in passing they had preached and made Churches. That by this probable reason the Gaules had beene instructed before the Spaniards, and had seene the Apostles first. As for the Apostles disciples, it is most certaine that Gaule did see the first, & the most renowned, according to good Authors, the which was Crescentius disciple to S. Paul: and if we shal beleue traditions, Lazarus, who was raised from death by our Sauour, came & preached at Marseille, Nathaniel in Berry, & Denis Arcopagita at Paris. There haue bin counells in Gaule since the time of pope Victor, about 180 yres after our sauior I. Iesus Christ, whereas that great doctor Irenaeus, gouernor then of the church of Lion, did preside. And there is an Epistle yet extant written before that time by the Martires of Uellence vpon Rhofne, & from the of Lion, to comfort them of Galacia & Phrigia in Asia, during the persecutions of the Emperour Commodus. As for the Councell Elibertin (that is Eliberris) that neither the time nor the place where it was held are not verie well quoted by them that haue written, and it is probable that it was not in Spaine, but rather at the foote of the Pyrenean mountaines, vpon the strait of Gaule, where there was also an other good towne of the same name, reduced to a village in the time of Constantine the Great: the which was called in regard of the portion which hee had giuen to Constantine his eldest sonne, in the which Gaule and Spaine was comprehended, to which two great prouinces this place confining was commodious: but admit (said they) it had bin held in Spaine, it would no more aduance the Spaniards cause, thā the counells of Arles that of the French, assembled in a manner at the same time, to compound the controuersies of the Bishops of Afixe, by the authority imperial of Constantine the great, in whose empire & long before, Gaule was full of goodly churches, at Arles, Vienna, Lion, Autun, Treues, Angers, Poitiers, in Berry, Auvergne & elsewhere, which were furnished with learned & catholike Pastors, famous by the writings of the learned that were neere that age, the which are come counells in Gaule.

1563

Kings christned in France before them in Spaine.

Heresies in Spaine.

Marriages profane of the kings of Spaine.

Churches of Spaine governed by French Prelates.

Riches of the clergie of Fraunce

vnto vs, and that Synodes were as frequent then and some ages after in Gaule, and more then in Spaine, but they were all nationall, or called vpon some priuate subiects, where if they beleue that the kings, Gothes, comming into Spaine did assist, we may beleue that the kings of France haue done the like in their country. But to maintaine as the Spaniards doe, that the kings of the Gothes raigning in Spaine, were Christians and Catholikes before them of France, there is no ground, vnlesse they will say, that the Arrians were Catholikes and Christians: with which vice all the Gothish kings in Spaine were infected vnto Ricaredo, who was conuerted by the catholike Doctours, among which was Nigith of Narbona, and hee abiured Arrian heresie, at the third Councell of Toledo in the yeere 589, a whole age after the conuersion of Clouis king of Fraunce to the true Christian faith; in the which the kings of France, and the French in general haue alwayes persisted, vnlesse they will impute to the whole nation the priuate blemishes of some, which will be found trifies in regard of those which haue bene raised in Spaine, for the which it hath bin often troubled, as by the heresie of Basildes & Martiall mentioned in S. Cyprians epistles, wherof the one was bishop of Legio Gemina, & the other of Emerita, & that of Prisilian a Spaniard, which was condemned at the councell of Burdeaux, and him selfe with other his confederats executed at Mentz: and in like manner by that of Felix: the which shewing that heresies haue been lesse countenanced in Gaule than in Spaine.

But leauing these old things, seeing that prioritie of time doth not carrie it, being said, That in the kingdome of heauen the first are many times found last; it is requisite to know, how both Spaine and France haue governed themselves for matter of beleefe and godlike works during these later raignes. It were not fitting for the French to contend of the holines of the kings of Spaine, who did first after the inuasion of the Moores; nor to dispute if their Armes came from heauen, whether S. Iudas standard be true or a fiction, nor in like manner the graces and gifts which they maintaine to haue been in some of their princes, to cure diseases, and to cast out diuelles. For by the same grounds they beleue that Charlemaigne & Lewis 9. kings of France, are Saints, and their feasts are celebrated by the Church, that the flowers de Luce of gold, with the holic oyle are gifts from heauen, and that it is most apparent the Kings of Fraunce cure the Kings Euill, which things the French would not haue any man call in question. Wherefore let them be allowed of eyther part without preiudice to their rank: but (said the French) the Spaniards should shew themselves hollow hearted, if they should deny that they had not been often retained in the true doctrine, and instructed in the exercises of Christian religion by the Prelats, and Doctours which Fraunce hath sent them from time to time, whilst that the nobilitie of Spaine, and their Kings also, defiled themselves with the too familiar conuersion of the Moores, when they were not in armes, alying themselves vnto them by marriages, as D. Alphonso 5 of Leon did, who without scruple gaue his sister D. Theresa in mariage to Abdala the Moore king of Toledo: and another Alphonso 6, of that name at Leon, and 3 of Castille married Caida a Moore. They will not make any doubt, that by the diligence of D. Bernard Archb. of Toledo a French man borne, and other clergy men of the famenation which did assist him, the exercises of the Romish seruices was brought into that Church, instead of the Musarabic, which they had vsed in Spaine vnto the yeare 1086. Wherefore the exercise was called Gallican. And they must confesse, that for want of worthy men to gouerne the churches of Spaine, the said D. Bernard was constrained to furnish his bishopricks of Braga, Ozmia, Siguenza, S. Iames, Segouia, Palenza, Valencia, Zamorra & others, with Prelats which he had brought from France, in his returne from Rome. And that another Bernard of Agen succeeded him in the archbishopricke of Toledo: all learned and holic pastors, and so reputed in their owne Annals.

The kings of Spaine haue built store of monasteries and churches, & do entertain many orders of religions, wherof the heads be in Spaine, & haue giuen the first fruits of their victories to popes as to Christs vicars. The French contradicted it not, seeing by the effect that the prelats & clergy men of Spain are very rich: but wil they say that they are poore that the prelats which he find by a true computation, that of twelue parts of the lands in Fraunce, whereas they finde by a true computation, that of twelue parts of the lands they hold seuen, and receiue the reuenues, besides the tithes, the deuotion of good men, and other casualties? And as for the heads of religious orders, it is well knowne that the

1564

A chiefe and most auncient are in Fraunce much honoured, and that the kings of Fraunce, and other princes of that nation, haue not onely giuen the first fruits of their victories to Popes, but they haue giuen them whole realmes.

Whereas the Spaniards brag that by the discouerie of the west Indies, they haue increased the number of Christians, and gotten a new world vnto the church: The French confesse, that doublelesse this desire in the beginning was royall, and that the respect wee owe vnto princes, and Christian charitie doth bind euery man to beleue, that such was the intention of the catholike kings D. Ferdinand and D. Isabella, wheras they first gaue meane to Christopher Columbus to vndertake this voyage: but they maintained that there were neuer Commissions worse executed, nor more naitiously diuerted than those by the Spaniards which haue bene sent since to the Indies, and that in all their gouernement there is not any shew of good zeale nor of true religion. If they will say, there are many religious men of all Orders, and especially Iesuists, well entertained, they replied, there were many reapers, seeking harvest to feed them, reaping where they had not sown: That so many religious men went not thither daily to instruct the Indians, but to gather the fat of the earth. That it was well knowne there were few naturall Indians left at the west Indies, and that the Spaniards, as well souldiers, as farmers, and officers of the mines, had slaine and murdered them by millions, and did seeke to root out the race of them, vsing them like brute beasts, and causing them to burst vnder the burthen of an insupportable labor, in searching into the bowells of the earth to find gold, & into the depths of the sea to draw forth pearles. It is not the way to increase the number of Christians, and to get a new world vnto the Church, to captiuate so many poore soules so tyrannously, and to take away their liues without reason, against all humanitie, by such cruell, vile and miserable seruices. That these things were not spoken at random, nor inuented; for the cruelties vsed vpon these poore Indians, had bene verified by good informations made by the commandement of the Emperor Charles the first, vpon the complaints which had bene made by certaine good religious men, who were eie witnesses of those infolencies, but yet there followed no great reformation: Finally, that great number which liue there in religious habits, vnder a colour of deuotion, be at lesse enough, hauing no cure of soules, wherewith Spaine and other countries of that iurisdiction on this side the seas, are overcharged, and cannot well entertaine them without the west Indies; and that is the chiefe mark of religion which they can shew in regard of those Indies. For it is neither pietie nor charitie which drawes them thither, it is couetousnesse and an insatiable greedines of gold, which entertaines this nauigation; and without doubt this traffike will cease, the memorie of those places, and the name of Iesus Christ will be forgotten, if others than the Spaniards do not raise it, as soone as their mines be dried vp, as they are in some places, and therefore abandoned.

As for the Inquisition which is an other great trophie of the Spaniards reputation with the Church and Christendome, for that (say they) it keeps both great and small in obedience: whereunto the French answered, that it is hateful to the best Catholikes, & to all men of honour in Spaine, by the report of those which haue frequented that country; for that it is iniurious vnto them, and by extreme rigour doth seme to note them with infamie, making the world beleue, that they are not Christians, but by a seruile constraint. Besides, the abuses which are daily committed, to fill the treasure, & to enrich the Inquisitors, and their ministers & spies, by fines and confiscations, procured vpon sained & supposed crimes, make it vnprofitable in it chiefe duty, which is to maintaine the puritie of doctrine, & holines of maners; and therefore this Inquisition practised after the manner of Spaine, is abominable to euery honest man. That many haue held this bridle necessary in former ages in Spaine, where there was a great medley of nations, & of diuers religions, which made many to beleue what they thought good of the diuinitie, yea vnto our fathers times: in the which (as it is related in the historie of the wars which were in Italie during the raigne of D. Ferdinand the first, and of the emperor Charles his graundchilde) many of the Spaniards which were slaine in any encounters or battelles, being stripped, were found circumcised: but it may bee the nation being now somewhat seled and resolu'd in the religion of Iesus Christ, it seemed high time to moderate this

sharpe

Excess of the Spaniards at the Indies.

Inquisition of Spaine inuention and abuse.

1563

sharpe rigour of the Inquisition of Spaine, and that it should be practised with more charity and modestie, if it had no other end, but the glorie of God, and the health of mens soules. That in France the vie is more free and sincere, to edifie mens soules, and not to ruine them, and that the French had no need of such spurres; for there was no nation that did more willingly obey the Sea of Rome. The kings of Fraunce haue always shewed themselves most deuout; they reuerence the Popes and their authoritie: the holie Decrees and Constitutions of lawfull Councils, are in great recommendation with them, reseruing the dignitie of their estate and crowne, which bindes them to be protectors of their clergie, & of the immunities & liberties of the French church. It is an article of their duty, office, & roial charge. These are old rights without dispute, wherat the sea of Rome was neuer offended, but when as it hath bin held by some, who forgetting all fatherly duty towards France, would adhere too much to the passions of their enemies: yet notwithstanding the kings of France haue bin alwayes ready defenders of the church of Rome, & benefactors and deliuerers of Popes, and their sole and safest refuge in all afflictions. And therefore they do rightly carry the surname of Most Christian, since the time of king Charles, yea of the eldest son of the catholike church, the which can not be disputed but by inconsiderate rashnes, nor suppress but by ignorance or malice. That the Spaniards did not defend his Holines predecessors from the insolencies of the six gouernors, lieutenants to the emperors of Constantinople in Italie: nor from the violences of the Kings of Lombardy. It is not by any benefit of the kings of Spaine, that they are lords of the citie of Rome, & that they enioy so great a country, and so many faire townes. That they are not the forces of Spaine which haue chased the Sarazins out of Sicile and Calabria. That the goodlie realms of Naples & Sicile are not come vnto the church by the bounty of the kings of Spaine: but the French made them these rich presents, and haue maintained the in it. That it was a princeesse of the blood of France, which gaue vnto the popes that which they hold in Prouence: That Spaniards hands are more accustomed to ransom Popes & cardinals, and to spoile, burne & destroy the patrimony of S. Peter. Finally, the church of Rome must acknowledge all her bountie vpon earth to come from the French nation, and from their kings, & ground vpon these new & vndoubted titles, the rights & possessions of other lands and seignories, & not colour them with a donation from Constantine, nor fro the fauour of such a mediator as Osius bishop of Cordoua might be, the which haue no ground but vpon Spanishe reports which are not autentike. By these benefits, by the continuall obedience, & by the ready succors so often tried, the dignity and preheminance of the crowne of France should be maintained at Rome, in the Council, & in all places, so much the more iustly & necessarily, for that by long acquaintance, it hath bin made as it were essentiall & substantiall with the Popes dignitie, so as for the support thereof, they haue no need but of the crown of France, to resist the attempts of her bad children, which are frequent & dangerous. Moreouer, if they should presume to put the kings of Fraunce from their ranke, it could not be done but very difficultly, & by a forgetfull & very hatefull ingratitude, which doth not befit the holie Sea, & could not in their opinions fall into the Popes thought, who did then preside. Concluding, that for the best and most wholesome expedient for Christendome, he should containe himselfe in his pastoral office, which is, iudgement of causes concerning the faith, religion & the discipline of the church, & to abstain (specially during the general assembly) to enter into knowledge of a controuersie, which is merely temporal, in the which soueraine princes do not willingly acknowledge any other Iudge but their owne swords, & so leauing euery one in his possession, to admonish the king of Spaine, to giue peace vnto the Church, and not to trouble the Council, nor the publike peace.

Office of Popes wherein it consists.

Question of precedence vn-sided at Rome.

Thus did the French maintaine the precedence of their king, with their naturall freedom and vehemence against the pretensions of the Spaniards & their partisans: but the Pope to whom this controuersie was sent, would not take vpon him to iudge it, but left it vndecided, as it is at this day, which made the impatient spirits of the Spaniards to pursue this question, & to maintaine their pretended rights of priority, by writing, wherof there are great volumes printed, with priuledge from their kings, which the French do not reouble themselves to answer.

The

A The year following 1564 the Acts of the Councill were confirmed by the Pope at Rome, in the open Consistorie of Cardinales; yet against the aduice of some fathers, who held this confirmation to be needlesse, and all Christian princes were commended to cause the Decrees thereof to be published and obserued. At these last Sessions of the Councill, D. Claudio Ferdinand of Quignones Earle of Luna, was embassador for the king of Spaine, to whom by reason of this difference there was a place appointed apart, out of ranke, by prouision and without preiudice.

This year D. John de Benauides marshall of Nauarre died, and at the same time there died also D. Francis of Nauarre, Bishop of Valentia, who was brother to D. Pedro of Nauarre, the last marshall of the bloud royall descended from D. Ligonell. The interest to this Realme remained in Queene Joane of Albrer, widow to Anthony of Bourbon, by whom she had two children, Henry and Katherine: In the meane time there were Viceroyes or Lieutenants for the King of Spaine to gouerne it, and about that time D. Gabriell de la Cueva left the gouernement of Nauarre, to the Licentiat D. Michel Ruiz of Otalora, Regent or President of the Iustice in that Countrey, and passed into Italy to gouerne the estate of Milan, but D. Alphonso of Cordoua and Velasco Earle of Alcaudete, who had bene gouernor of Oran, and had defended against the Turkes which held Alger and the Moores, was sent thither for viceroy, where at the end of 3 months he died, yet hee caused an assemblie of the estates to be held at Tudela, where it was concluded to make an Vniuersitie in that towne, that the Nauarrois might haue meanes to studie, and not goe out of the Country. After the Earles death D. Ioseph of Gueuara came to gouerne the Realme of Nauarre. And in the year 1565 D. Lewis last earle of Lerin of the house of Beaumont, and Constable of Nauarre died, leauing one onely daughter and heire called D. Brianda de Beaumont, who was married to D. Diego de Toledo sonne to D. Ferdinand Aluarez de Toledo duke of Alba; who in her right was Earle of Lerin, and Constable of Nauarre. D. Ieronima of Nauarre; widow to the marshall of Benauides, being married againe to D. Martin of Cordoua and Velasco, brother to the Earle of Alcaudete, she brought him the title of Marquess of Corres, and the estate of Marshall of Nauarre.

Nauarre;

Vniuersitie at Tudela in Na-
uarre.

The Pope hauing delayed, during the Council, to satisfie the kings of Spaines demand, touching a subuention from his Clergie toward the maintenance of his war, the king sent Lewis d. Auila great Commander of Alcantara to Rome, to sollicite the dispatch of this supplie from the Clergie, towards his preparation, which was graunted to be 40 thousand ducats yearly for five yeares onely, giuing him hope, that if they might see any good effects, they would continue to assist him. And the king hearing in what estate they stood for matters of religion in Fraunce and Flanders, fearing some alteration also in the state of Milan, he caused this embassadour to demand leaue of his Holines, that he might with more seueritie restraine the curiosity of his subjects, & their liberty in matters of faith, the which he might do, bringing the Inquisition into those prouinces, according to the custome of Spaine. And for that he had seen what an alteration it had caused some yeeres before in the realme of Naples, and that being a remedy of great violence it could be easily applied, he sought to accept it first in the state of Milan, for that he doubted that as the Netherlands being so much altered, would make some great resistance, so in like he did hope, that when they should see it plac'd in the duchie with good effect, they would be moued by their example. The Pope not onely seemed difficult to yeelde vnto this demand, but the whole college of Cardinales protested that it was a verie dangerous thing, not onely for fear of some insurrection in the beginning, but also that in procelle of time the ministers of the office might conuert their extraordinary authoritie to their owne profit, so as not onely a bad conscience, but great wealth might bring anie man in danger both of life and honour. Notwithstanding at the kings great instance the Pope did gratifie his Maiestie, and presently the duke of Sesse gaue them of Milan to vnderstand how desirous the King and the Pope their countrymen were, to see that important busines of the faith firmly settled in that duchie. But the gouernor was not willingly heard by them, who seemed resolute not to subiect themselves to such a seruitude, saying that they would send embassadors both to the Pope & King, whereupon the duke of Sesse promised to write and dissuade his Maiestie, as he did.

Clergie of Spain
help the King with money.

Inquisition of Spain attempted at Milan.

About

About the end of this yeare there came two sonnes of Maximilian King of Romans into Italie, Rodolphus and Ernestus being much desired by their vnckle in Spaine, that they might spend some yeares in that realme, and know the great men of his court, but about all to be bred vp with prince Charles, who did trouble his father, for that hauing much wit, hee could hardly be gouerned: some saying, that this froward disposition, grew by reason of the hurt hee had in his head. These two Princes being called by the Catholike King, and sent willingly by the father for diuers respects, arriued in Decenber (being accompanied by manie German Barons, and by the Cardinall of Augusta) in the state of Milan, being feasted in many places.

The King of Spaine hauing bene disquieted, for some alteration which had bene growing among the Moores, who since the taking of the realme of Granada, had liues dispersed in those countries, and were suspected to haue intelligence with the Moores of Afrike and with the Turkes, and that they practised some notable rebellion: wherefore it was thought fit to disarme them, and to forbid them to haue any, vpon grieuous penalties, yea they that were become Christians of that race, shewing themselves not to be found in the Faith, retaining much of their first breeding. About the same time news came vnto the King, that Dragut had bene seene at Sea with some thirtie gallies and galleots, in the which hee had many souldiers with twentie peeces of batterie, whilst on the other side the King of Alger went by land with tenne thousand foot Moores, and some Turkes, and Renegados to besiege Oran, the which they brought to extremitie for want of victuals, so as they could not haue held out many dayes when as the kings fleet arriued to succour them. The King hearing in what extremitie the besieged were, wrote first into Italie, and into all parts of his dominions, where there were any gallies, that being presently furnished with victuals, men, and munition, they should come to Barcelona, where he meant to make his fleet vnder the command of John Andrew Doria, and then send it to succour Oran. Doria and the kings other ministers went from place to place to gather them together, the viceroy of Naples sent 25 gallies to Barcelona, vnder the conduct of Sancho de Leyna: Doria staying somewhat long, the King feared hee could not come in time to succour the besieged, and therefore hee gaue the charge vnto D. Francisco Inigo de Mendoza, (others write that it was D. John de Cordona.) Doria arriuing, was much discontented, who hauing satisfied the King with good reasons, went as a priuate man in this action, giuing the command of his gallies to his brother Paganio. There met in the port of Barcelona 34 gallies, and some of Spaine, that were repaired since the last shipwracke, so as in all they were about 40 which bent their course towards Afrike, whereat the Turkes and Moores were so amazed, as they presently vpon sight of them, set saile, and the armie at land fled to their houses, abandoning their artillerie and baggage very basely, so as in an instant they were freed from that great danger. Some write, that before the army arriued, they fed only vpon horses and asses, so as they must either haue starued, or yeeld vp a very important place. The Admirall pursued them in their flight, and took 25 galleots and 3 great Morisco ships, forcing the rest to cast their ordnance ouer-board, that they might be the lighter to sie; yet they threatned to return the next yeare with forces from the great Turke.

The catholike King had made great preparation of shipping to defend the coasts of his owne kingdomes from the inuasions and spoiles of Pirates, who hauing a retreat at Pregon de Velez, might easily set vpon the shippes which passed from the strait of Gibraltar into diuers other parts. This rocke stands almost in the middelt of the gulph of Velez de la Gomera, which was sometimes called Bedis or Bilis. And for that in former times Spaine was much annoyed thereby, for that from this rocke which is very high, and diuided by a small distance from the land, they discovered the shippes a farre off at Sea, comming from Spaine, so as the Pirates, who had their galleots and frigots ready below, went forth with aduantage to meet them, sought with them, and spoiled them, King Ferdinand resolved to fortifie that place, to retraineth those theues which retired into the port of Velez, whither he sent an army, where they built two castles vpon that rocke, putting into them sufficient men and ordnance to gard them: The which the King of Fez seeking afterwards to recouer from the Spaniards, they were repulsd with great losse, and

Oran besieged
and well defended.

Pregon de Velez
now situated.

A and it was kept for the Spaniards, vntill that in the yeare one thousand five hundred and twentie, it was betrayed by a Spanish Souldier, who brought in the Moores to be reuenged of his Captaine that had taken away his wife.

King Philip to recouer this place, being verie prejudicall to their nauigation, caused a fleet to be made readie of about one hundred and 30 saile, among the which there were about forty ships of burthen, Galleots, and lesser vessels, with one great Galeon of Portugal: There were eightie and seuen gallies, that is, two and twenty of Spaine, eleven of Naples, ten of Sicilie, eight of Portugal, twelue of Doria, eight of Florée, three of Sauoy, sixe of Malta, and four of Marco Centurioni. There was in them about ten thousand Italians, Spaniards and Dutch, among the which were many Noblemen and Gentlemen voluntaries; the chiefe, besides the General D. Garcia de Toledo, were Francisco Baredo, who commanded the ships of Portugal, Sancho de Leyna those of Naples, the Lord of Plombin the duke of Florence galleys, John Andrew Doria his owne, Mar Antonio Colonna, Chiappin Vitelli commander of the foot of Tuscaine, Hanibal Altemps with his Germans, Fernando de Sylua and others.

They came not to the port of Malaga, which was appointed for the Rendez-vous, vntill the end of August, and then the army parted, meeting with the aides of Portugal: being all vnited together, they arriued neere vnto the port of Velez, where they had some trower to vnship their ordnance and men: for the rest they had no great difficultie, for the Moores and Turkes fainted, when as they saw the artillerie (planted in two batteries) began to annoy them, the which would soone haue ruined that fort being but small, & therefore they studied rather how to fly than to defend themselves. So, in the night the greatest part of them escaped in barks there remained about 25 who yeilded. The Moores came down in great troupes of Horse, and did skirmish with the Christians. The generall Toledo hauing taken this place, furnished it with all things necessarie, & left a garrison in of 800 Spaniards. After which they consulted if they should vndertake any thing else, this conquest seeming but smal in respect of the great charge; & they propounded that of Bugia, but considering that the season of the yere was far spent, being in the middelt of September, & that their men had endured much at sea, especially the galley-slaves of Tuscaine, being vnacquainted with those seas, & the Germans who were much wasted, so as they held it not fit to engage themselves in an action which would require time, whereupon they returned with their galleys to winter, and D. Garcia de Toledo went to be Viceroy of Sicilie.

King Philip remembering that the emperor Charles his father had sent Ferdinand Magelanes in the yere 1519, to discover the Moluques and other Ilands thereabouts, some of which were more plainly discovered in the yere 1542, he gaue order this yeare to D. Lope de Velasco viceroy of Mexico, to make ready a great fleet, with the which entering into the South sea, and sayling towards the west, he should discover those places better, whereof they had yet but a generall knowledge, which they held were inhabited by good sensible men. But for that the preparation was long, and the charge great, they parted not till towards Christmase. The fleet being commanded by Velasco sailed towards the Moluques, he had with him Michel of Legaspo, who by order from the king should be gouernour of the first place he should discover & hold worthe to leaue a garrison and to plant a Colony there. They therefore found out Tendaia or Tendain, Punel, Bohol and Pauligen, all which foure in honor of the king were called Philippine: they also set footing in the Iland of Luzon, which is bigger than all the rest, being more towards the North, where the city of Maniglia is built, by the which the whole Iland is also called. It was not difficult for the Spaniards to become master of those places, for that they of China hauing abandoned the gouernement which they had enioyed, there was not any Lord, but they that had most power, did tyrannize ouer the weaker. They found the Countie fertile, and abounding in many things necessarie for the vse of man; but it was a verie commodious dwelling for the great traffike of gold, silke, and other rich Merchandize, which they had with them of China, wherefore they planted diuers Colonies in a short space, finding the inhabitants inclined to ciuilitie, especially in the Iland of Luzon, and the citie of Maniglia, Michel Lopes of Legaspo, remained Gouernour of those places, where hee dyed twelue yeares after, with the title of Adelantado.

Armie sent against Pregon de Velez.

Ilands of Philip now discovered

Malta besieged by the Turks.

Description of Malta.

John de la Valette great master of Malta

Turks army at Malta.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 28.

The king of Spain being aduertised of the great preparations the Turke made at Constantinople, to send a great fleet to Sea, gaue order for the fortifying of those places which were most in danger. But Solyman intent was to attempt Malta, & it did behoue king Philip to defend & preserve it, for the interest of his neer estates of Naples & Sicile, this land lying verie commodiously to annoy them, if the Turks should take it and keep it as he might easily do, by the care and diligence of the kings of Algier & of Tripoly, mightie Pirates, & his tributaries, who are alwaies in armes, & ready to furnish it vpon any sudden occasion; besides his own means which are great: whereof hee might make there a good staple, or store-houise for his warres against Europe.

The Iland of Malta is a great and spacious rock, about 60 miles in compass, lying betwixt Sicile & Africk, from the which it is about 50 leagues or 300 miles distant, & from Sicile 60 miles, or 15 leagues, accompting 4 miles for a good league: towards the North, it looks to Cap Passaro in Sicile, and on the South to the towne of Tripoly in Barbarie. This rock is couered some six foot thick with earth and no more: it doth yeild excellent fruits, feede some cattell, brings hony & cotton which is the inhabitants wealth; it hath many ports & landings, which are reasonably safe for their ordinary trade, but not to receiue any great fleets. The names of the chiefe are Marfamuffet, Marfa Scala, Marfa Sirocco, Cala S. George, & Cala of S. Paul: Marfa in the Moors tog signifies a port, Cala is a shore or strand. The citie is almost in the midst of the Iland, carrying the name thereof, being inhabited by them of the countrie, but the aboad of the knights who are Lords thereof, is about the port of Marcamuffet towards Sicile, whereas the sea makes many final gulphs leauing tongues of earth or rock betwixt both, where they are lodged and well fortified. Vpon one of these points which made a passage to one of the gulphes, was built a fort called S. Herme, which kept that entrie, & defended the Maltois galleies which lodge within the gulph: right against it on the other side towards Sicile is the castel S. Ange, the which was strong & wel furnished, commanding towards the Sea: vnder it was the Borough (where the knights were lodged, and there make their assemblies) wel walled and flanked, to the which is joyned an other Castell called S. Michael. John de la Valette was at that time great master of the order, French by nation, a man of great courage & wisdom, who being well aduertised of the furious tempest that threatned him, made all prouisions necessarie in such a danger: he sent for all the knights of his order to come to Malta, he had recourse to all Christian Princes for aid; he caused the Borough and other places of the Iland to be viewed and fortified; he bought armes, munition, victuals & al other things which hee held necessarie to defend a great seage. Wherein the Princes of Italy did assist him liberally, and the Viceroyes of Naples and Sicile, had commandement from the king of Spaine to aide him: especially D. Garcia de Toledo of Sicile had charge to keepe the galleies of Sicile and Naples in a readines, with whome should ioyne the galleies of Spaine, the Popes, the duke of Florences, those of Genoua, and the duke of Sauoy, and make a sufficient power to hinder that seage.

The reason which made the Turks to vnder take this enterprife with so great preparation, was a surprisfe attempted by the great Master of Malta vpon the town of Maloic in Morea, which the ancients called Epidaurum Limeria, but it succeeded not.

The 28 of May, in the yere 1565 this great armie of enemies came to the Iland of Malta, about the port of Marfa Sirocco, being in number 145 galleies, 8 Maones, which are vessels which do both saile and row, hauing 5 men to euerie oare, but they are not so big as the galleasses, many foists & galleots, with a number of ships and vessels to carrie artillerie, horses, victuals, powder & al prouision for war, with which Draguts forces should ioyne and the galleies of Algier, of Vluccialy, and of all the Pyrats in the Mediterranean sea, vpon the coasts of Africk, Asia, the Ilands of the Archipelagus, and other places; all which were sent for to come & serue there vnder the great Turks banner, vpon great penalties for the that should faile. Piety Bassa had the chief command at sea, it is he who chased the Christiāns from the Iland of Gerbe; and Mustapha Bassa was generall at land. At the arriual of this armie the great master had with him 500 knights of his order, men of resolution and experience, & 8000 soldiers, as wel of the Iland, as others leuiued in Italie, and some companies of Spaniards & French: whom he distributed into the citie, the castel of S. Ange, the forts

The generall Historie of Spaine.

1115

1565

Lib. 28.

A of S. Herme, & S. Michel, the Borough & other places. D. Garcia being doubtful whether the Turk would set vpon Goulette by Tunis, sent a supply of 700 old soldiers, Spaniards, thither, besides the ordinarie garrison that was entertained. At the Turks landing, which was somewhat difficult, for that the ports were final, & the banks of the Ilands steep, they were incourted by some knights & soldiers, who slue many, but they retired soon, for their number was but smal; hauing in this skirmish lost Nicholas Delbene, and two other valiant knights. But the Turks landed at this first time 30000 fighting men, some lanifaries, some Spachi, who serue comonly on horseback, but at that time they had bin imbarcked as footmen, hauing with the great store of ordnance for batterie, among which there were Basilisks, whose bullets weied about 120 pound. At their landing they disarmed al their galleies, except some 60 which they kept for their gards, and came & lodged before the fort of S. Herme, by the aduice of Piety, who desired to take the port of Marfamuffet, the which was covered with this fort, that he might lodge his galleies which lay disperfed in diuers parts of the Iland, for want of commodious ports, and therefore expofed to many dangers. The camp being lodged & fortified with a rampar, & a fort of earth which they suddenly cast vp, S. Herme and the other places were diligently viewed, the which cost many Turks and Christians their liues: In the end there was a batterie plated against S. Herme, the which pleased furiously, & was often changed & renewed and many assaults giuen & valiantly defended. The commander Brouille was within the place, but he was changed by reason of valage, & Monferra an Arragonois substituted in his place: Brouille had behaued himself valiantly, yet the Turks had won a Ruelin which was without the fort, where they fortified, & filling the ditch which was betwixt both, they gaue rash and desperat assaults, not making any spare of their men. They cast the yards of their galleies vpon the breaches to serue the Assaults for bridges, they had deuised to couer their shot when they went to an assault, and they planted many ladders, but all was in vain for a time, for the defendants overthrow or burnt their engines, & repulst them with great slaughter; so as seeing how difficult it was to take this fort, they were doubtfull whether they should leaue this place, and discharge their rage vpon the rest, into the which all the victuals, cattell and other commodities of the Iland were drawn, especially into the citie, which was not farre from the fort of S. Herme, where the inhabitants had fortified themselves with some troupes of horse & foot, which had bin giuen them for their gard, commanded by the knight Mesquile a Portugal, who made many sallies & attempts to diuert the Turks, who for their part repulst them roughly into their town: for there was not a hamlet nor house there abouts, where they had not planted a gard to stop their courses. Hauing spent many daies about the fort of S. Herme, Dragut arriues with a great troupe of Turks, in 12 galleies & 3 galleses, the which did much incourage the beseegers, for he was in great credit among them. He did not allow of their beginning to make war by the siege of this strong place, the conquest whereof would be long, & difficult, wishing they had first attempted the citie, where there was more hope & more spoile, but it was now too late said the Bassaes, wherefore the batterie against Saint Herme was renewed, & diuers new assaults giuen, the which were more obstinately obtained than before, with the losse of 4500 turks, & Dragut himself was mortally wounded in the head with a stone which was driuen by a great shot, whereof he died soon after; which made the Turks retire. There was also come vnto the camp Aluc Ali, whom we call Vluccialy, a negado of Calabria, who afterwards was made king of Tripoly in the place of Dragut, a great soldier. During these attempts in the Iland of Malta, the great master foreseeing that in time he might be vauquished by the Turks force, which increased daily by new supplies, & contrariwise their men decreased by their continuall assaults and skirmishes, so as in the end their number would grow verie smal, he sent often to Messina, where they made slow preparatiō to relieue the, to acquaint D. Garcia with their estate, & in what danger they were to lose S. Herme, & afterwards the whole Iland, beseeching him to make haste, but he neither answered his request, nor the necessity which prest the, for D. Garcia besides that he was tedious & graue after the manner of Spaine, he esteemed himself too weak to make any attempt that might auail the besieged, saying that he must gather forces together consisting of many peeces, according to the time & will of the that did contribute, the which was true, wherefore the Turk hath a great aduantage ouer vs, hauing

L 1111 ij

Death of Dragut.

having alwaies a great number of vessels armed belonging to himself, having no need to beg or borrow them of any other, as we do, with great charge & losse of time, the which is verie prejudiciall in warre; whereas the Turke hath the assignations of his treasure certayne, which may not be diverted: and in this war of Malta, he had an extraordinarie advantage, Rofa Sultana his best beloved, being dead a little before, she had left a great masse of treasure to be especially imployed in war against the Christians, for to helpe her soule. D. Garcia besides his naturall slowness was grown into a conceit, that it was good to suffer the Turke to waste & consume themselves in the Island of Malta, about those places which he held to be strong and well furnished, and that hee should come time enough to assaile them, when they were weakened with hunger, which did already presse them, and with other discōmodities which follow long sieges. This was to make war by discōurse, but in the mean time he held his arms a crosse, which is against the rules. With much pressing & importunitie, he did hazard some gallies to put certain knights and souldiers, which came late, into the borogh of Malta, the which attempting often, some entred, and others were many times forced to return from whence they came. He also sent to sea to cut off the victuals that went to the Turks army. The two commanders were not very fery for Draguts death, whom they hated deadly: wherefore to have the honor to have taken the fort of S. Hermie without him, they doubled their battery with 32 Canons, with the which they so ruined the fort as the defendants lay open, & then presently they gaue a generall assault both by land and Sea, the which was so cruell and bloudie, as they were forced to yeeld. Thus the fort of S. Hermie was won by the Turkes, the which had cost the liues of 10000 of their men, & 20000 canon shot, in diuers batteries and assaults. All that were found lying in it, were put to the sword, & among others, 30 valiant knights, who had bin referred by the Janissaries to draw a ransom from them, but others coming in murdered them cruelly: they found 24 canons & culuerins within the place, with some remainder of munition, which they imployed against the other fort. This losse was greuous to the great Master, & to all those that were with him, their number being much decreased; for they had lost about 1500 of their best men, & among them many knights. Wherefore the rest being grown mercilesse, hearing what cruelties the Turkes had shewed to them of S. Hermie, they resolved not to take any more to mercy, & so it was ordained by the great master, who had resolved to dy with all his company; but to sel their liues dearly vnto the enemy, despairing in a manner of all succours from Italie. But these desperate men were somewhat reuiued by the vnexpected coming of Hen. Parisot the great masters nephew, who brought him about 500 good soldiers, with some knights; they had bin 14 daies at sea, before they could find an opportunity to recover the Island, the which they did in the end on the 29 of Iune, landing at a place called Pietra Negra, from whence they slipt without discouerie into the citie of Malta, and were from thence conducted with a conuoy to the Borrough, & receiued there with great contentment & ioy. Some of this new supply were put into S. Michels fort, which they thought would be presently attempted. The losse of S. Hermie being vnderstood in Sicilie, many made offer to D. Garcia to hazard themselves to lead succours to Malta, through the Turks guards, the which could hardly be effected by sea; for hauing taken S. Hermie they were masters of the entrie which went vnto the Bourg, vnder castel S. Ange. John Andrew Doria was confident, that with ten gallies he would land as many men as he could carry in some part of the Island, & lead them himselfe into the Bourg: which D. Garcia would not suffer, for that hauing not any newes of the gallies of Spaine, (which was his best excuse in his dilations) he would not hazard those he had, which were for the safetie of Sicilie, & the realm of Naples. The Turkes hauing clenfed the ruins of the fort which they had won, they lodged 300 Janissaries in it, & then they planted 60 canons in six feuerall batteries at la Grotte, Corazain, Mandraffe, at Sancta Maria du Secours, at Sancta Marguerita, & elsewhere, making so wonderful a thunder, as they were heard into Sicilie beyond Messina, assailing the Bourg, and fort of S. Michael both together, by sea and land, but it pleased God so to strengthen the beseegeed, as they had alwaies the better against the Turkes since the taking of Saint Hermie, who in the end did not fight but with an obstinate despair, battering the houses of the Bourg, more than to make a breach to enter: their powder began also to waste, for at their coming to this seege, they had lost a great

S. Hermie taken by the Turkes.

Batteries made by the Turkes at Malta.

A great ship at Sea, in the which were sixe thousand barrels of powder, with six hundred Janissaries, and they had sent into the Leuant to haue new, with other things which they wanted. In the meane time Hassan king of Alger, son to Barberousse, came vnto the sea with seuen great gallies, many foists and other vessels, carrying many Turkes and other good souldiers, for whose welcome Mattia seeking to doe some extraordinarie exploit against the fort of Saint Michael towards the sea, and against the Bourg by land, was repulsed, and lost about fide and twenty hundred Turkes; some were drowned with their barkes, and some were slaine with the canon and the sword: at which charge there dyed also about two hundred Christians, and many were hurt: yet the Turkes faired not for all this, but increased their batterie against the fort and Bourg, ruining the flanks & courtines, and leauing the beseegeed almost naked to the shot of the canon, from whence notwithstanding they could not take any thing, although they did assaile them fiercelly by all meanes and deuices, casting bridges made of their maine yards, ouer their ditchs, & vpon their ruines, as they had done at Saint Hermie, with many other inuentions, all which were ouerthrowen by the Christians, who couered themselves as well as they could, but they could not prevent the death of many of them: among others Hermie de la Vallette Parisot, the great masters nephew was slaine: but there happened an accident which did much fauour the beseegeed, the noise of the canon was so great, as they of the citie being some seuen miles off, heard it as easily as if it had bene neerer them, which made them resolute to sallie forth with all the men they had able to carrie armes, both horse and foot, and came and charged a garde of two thousand Turkes, which was set towards the Sea, the which cast forth so great a cry, as their companions which fought at the breaches being amazed, fearing that some great succours were arriued and came to compassse them in, retired in disorder, leauing about fifteen hundred of their men dead vpon the place, and they of the citie had meanes to retire themselves before they were discouered. In the end newes came of the so much desired and so long expected succours, for D. Garcia being aduertized that thirtie and seuen gallies were parted from Spaine, with souldiers, to come and ioine with him in Sicilie: hee resolved not to stay their coming, making his accompt that if they found him gone, they would stay in his place and assure Sicilie and Naples at all euents. Hee commaunded that all the Ships laden with souldiers which attended in diuers ports of Italie, should come to Messina, which was the Rendez-vous for the whole army, which being met, the question was how they should lead these succours, wherein there appered many difficulties to men that were not aduenturous like vnto D. Garcia and his Spanish Counsell. Hee had gathered together some twelue thousand good souldiers, and fifteene hundred voluntaries of the nobilitie of Italie, who were desirous to shew themselves and to winne honor, but they wanted gallie slaues and mariners for such a number of vessels, whereof the Turkes had double the number: so as there was no meanes to assaile the enemies fleet at sea; and to land men in any part of the Island, to make the bodie of an armie, and to giue battell vnto the Turkes, they feared also in this Councell to doe it vnseasonably, not knowing what forces the Bassaes had yet remaining, hauing vnderstood that, as well at their first landing, as afterwards by those that came from Barbarie, and the Pyrats which had ioined with them, they had had vnder their ensignes about fortie thousand men of Mahumets sect. They feared also they shold want victuals in a small, barren & ruinous Island, and to carrie with them, there was also danger how to conuey it safely: and they fell into the difficultie to be forced to fight, hauing a conuoy, with disadvantage, against a greater number of enemies.

Being in these dangerous speculations, in the necessities of warre, which require speed and hazard, there was a Spaniard called Andrew Salazar presented himselfe, hee was an old politike capitaine, and could speake the Turkish language, who offered to goe as a spie into the enemies Campe at Malta, and to bring them certaine newes. Whereupon hee was sent with two gallies of Malta, which were then at Messina, who landed him in so commodious a place, as hee got into the Citie without any encounter, where hauing remained some time, he went disguised into the Turkes campe, & there lived among them some daies where he discouered the estate & necessities thereof, & then returned.

L 111111ij.

returned

returned in safetie to D. Garcia, to whome hee reported this: there was a great amazement among the Turkes by reason of those succours, that the Souldiers were tyred with those troublesome sieges, and that there were many sickemen; that their numbers were not so great but tenne thousand fresh men might winne an honourable victorie, and that they kept guard onely by night; for the Basses fearing these succours, they caused euerie night two great Squadrons of galleies to goe about the Island, the which going from the port of Marcausset, one on the right hand, & the other on the left, they met on the backside thereof towards the west, and passing on made the round and came to the same port, where they remained, all the day after and stirred not. Upon this report the fleet went forth, with an intent to land their men in the Island, and having recovered the citie, to march in battell against the Turkes. John Andrew Dorias was sent before to giue aduice vnto the great master, but having contrarie windes the fleet was forced to put to Sea, and was driven to the Island of Fauignana, about two hundred miles from Malta, and then it returned, toucht at Sicile, sailed towards Goze, and in the end came to the about mentioned place of Pietra Negra, whereas the men were landed, and in their landing they layed vpon euerie souldiers backe a bag of biscuit, weighing about fiftie or four pounds, besides their armes, with sufficient fire and powder, and so they marcht in three battalions, two of Spaniards vnder D. Aluaro de Sandy, and one of Italians, vnder Chiappin Vitelli, and all vnder the Marshall generall of the field, Alsanio de la Corne, towards the Citie of Malta, where after two refings, they arrived, the Maltois going forth to meet them with horses, and cattell to ease them of the burthens which they did beare.

Succours came to the Island of Malta.

This done, D. Garcia returned into Sicile, and passing in view of the enemye, hee caused euerie one of his galleies to discharge three peeces, to busie the Turkes, that they should not goe to encounter the succours, or to diuert them from giuing an assault to Saint Michaels fort, if they continued: wherein doubtlesse hee erred, for if he had gone away and not given them this aduertisement, they had not made any halt to imbarke, and had undoubtedly bene surprised, with great advantage to the Christians, and the gain of the artilerie and baggage, the which they shipt presently vpon the discharge of D. Garcia canon. They had a will to retire, but it should haue bene after a general assault, being resolved to giue it the same day they had this aduertisement, or the next. The Basses were in a maner resolved to fight with the succours, not thinking them to be so strong, but having sent fife hundred of their men forth to skirmish with them, they were almost all slaine, and the rest of the armie fled to their galleies which they had drawne out of Marcausset, and other places, and ioyned together towards Cale of Saint Paule with such disorder, as many were drowned being prest by the Christians.

They retired towards the Leuant: where some said, that D. Garcia lost a goodly opportunitie, for having furnished his Gallies with new Souldiers, & being come to Siracusa, he saw this Turkish armie retire close together, & neuer followed them. His excuse was that he had not souldiers enough to fight with them, and therefore hee returned to Malta for his Spaniards, where having manned fiftie of his best galleies, hee directed his course after the Turkes armie, hoping it would diuide it selfe, and that hee might get some bootie, but he returned empty handed to Messina; sending shipping to transport the Italians and the rest of the Spaniards, which he had left at Malta, into their Countries, but some of them were cast away in a tempest. Thus Malta was deliuered in time, for they that defended it were reduced to extremities by a great disorder which seemed to bee in the Councell of Spaine, so as the blame ought not to be attributed solely to D. Garcia de Toledo, if it had bin taken, for if he shewed himselfe slack, and of a small courage to succour the besieged, and if hee were not faithfull in the dispensation of the treasure, as some would accuse him, the irresolution of king Philipp Councell, and the malice and crosses of his enemies in Court, did bring Sicile, Naples, and all Italie in danger of ruine if the Turkes had deprived him of this assured rampar. But God fortified the great Master, his knights and souldiers, and all the people of the Island, arming them with patience, courage, and constancie, for by humane reason they had bin all lost. They that did adventure to come out of Sicile, & to enter into the Bourg, haue their share in the honor, neither are they that brought the succours to be excluded. The constancie of the great master, the resolution of Parisot his nephew, the Retreat of the Turkes from Malta.

A the vndaunted courage of Romegas, the brauerie of Barragan, a Nauarrois, Monferrat, Aliranda, and others which defended the breaches, the willingness of John Andrew Dorias to succour them, if they would haue suffered him, the resolution and good conduct of Alsanio de la Corne, of D. Aluaro de Sandy, of Chiappin Vitelli, and other captaines of the succours, and their souldiers, are remarkable in this warre: the which continued foure monethes, from the middelt of May to the middelt of September, whereas three hundred and thirteene knights lost their liues honourably, 3600 souldiers, and about foure thousand canon shot, and lost at the least thirtie thousand men. The great Master after the retreat of the remainder of their armie, gaue God thanks for this deliuerie, and in like manner the Princes and Estates which had assisted him; but he was not without great apprehension of the returne of the Barbarians, fearing hee should not be able to resist them, by this former experience: so as it was often propounded to abandon the island, and not seeke obstinately to repaire and keepe those lamentable ruines: for except the castle of Saint Ange, and the old citie, all the rest was reduced to powder. But in these difficulties their generous resolutions were comforted, encouraged, and assisted, as well by the Pope, the duke of Florence, and other Princes and States of Italie, as by the king of Spaine, who among other provisions appointed three thousand Pioners, which hee caused to bee leuiued in Sicile and Naples, to repaire the ruined forres, and also to begin the new citie which was already projected, and had bene traced out vpon that peece of ground, at the point whereof had bene the fort of Saint Herme, and which diuides the port of Marcausset from that of the galleies of the religion. This new towne was called Valette, to be a memorie to posteritie of the vertue and valour of that great knight John de la Valette, who liued not long after his worthy exploits in the defence of this siege: to whom there succeeded Peter de Monte, who was Admirall of the Order, and had behaued himselfe valiantly.

The gouernours of Prouinces, with the Nobilitie of the Netherlands, subiects to the king of Spaine, seeing the generall discontent of all men, tending to a lamentable confusion, they besought the duchesse of Parma, their Gouvernesse, to prevent these inconveniences, which grew from the crueltie of the Edicts and rigorous persecutions, from the new bishopps, and feare of the Spanish Inquisition: Whereupon they resolved to send one into Spain, with ample instructions, to acquaint the king with all those inconveniences, and the apparent daunger. The earle of Egmont had that charge, hee went into Spaine, he told the king, That mildnesse was the best meanes to prevent this mischief, and was sent backe with hope and promises conformable to his returne, but the effect proved contrarie, and great content to the Netherlands at his returne, but the effect proved contrarie, and their hope was turned into despaire: For this year 1565, in December, the king signified his pleasure to the Gouvernesse, by his letters, what hee would haue obserued in the Low Countries, touching matters of religion. He commaunded, That all Edicts made by the Emperour his father, or himselfe, touching matters of religion, should bee duly executed: That the Inquisitors should be fauoured in their charges, for the good of religion; it being his pleasure that the Inquisition should be put in practise: And lastly, That he should assist the bishopps to haue the Councell of Trent settled: all which was contrarie to that which he had promised to the earle of Egmont, and to the expectation of the poore Netherlands. And for that the Inquisition was the cause of so great troubles, and the shedding of much innocent blood, I haue thought it fitting the subiect of our historie, to relate it somewhat particularly, as it is now practised in Spaine, and its beginning.

D. Ferdinand and D. Isabella, kings of Castille and Arragon, hauing wholly subdued the Moores and Sarafins of Spaine, and being assured of them, they suffered them to liue quietly vnder their obedience, paying a certaine tribute, liuing but a roying life for them that were of a free condition, but yet tollerable, seeing they were not questioned with for their religion. But as all things in this world are inconstant, and subiect to change, king Ferdinand was perswaded to chuse some men that might look into the superstitions and infidelities of these Moores, least in the end the Iewish and Mahometane religion

Valette a new towne built in the Island of Malta.

Earle of Egmont sent into Spaine.

Beginning and progress of the Inquisition.

ligion should suppress the Catholike: whereupon hee employed himselfe with great zeale to religion. Wherein he was so happie, as, in testimonie of his pietie, he was honoured by the Pope, as well for himselfe, as for his succellors, kings of Spaine, with the title of Catholike, which Gregorie the third had in the yeare 1230 giuen vnto Alphonso king of Castille. Whereupon many of the Moores, Saracins, Africaines, and Iewes, were either forced to confesse Christ, or to abandon the countrey: so as many thousands retired themselves into Africke, and other places. But they that desired rather to liue in Spaine with their wiues and children, did either willingly, or by constraint, quit their religion, and were baptised. But the Spaniards finding afterwards of what force the opinion of a diuinitie grauen in the hearts of men is, be it good or bad, true or false, and how hardly it is rooted out, they being bred vp in it from father to sonne, they did forbid the Iewes the exercise of their religion; and as they could not sincerely forget, nor leaue the said exercise, the Spaniard had recourse to persecutions (but with some forme of justice) to root them out: But king Ferdinands meaning was, to draw them to religion by instruction and doctrine, which should conuict them in their errors. And as the Order of Saint Dominike was then newly instituted, and they were called Iacobins, being then in credit for their pietie, sinceritie, learning, and zeale, before all other Monkes, Preachers, and Doctors, the charge of matters concerning conscience and religion, was committed to them. And although there were some forme of Inquisition before, yet was it confirmed by these Iacobins, who seeing that they could not conuert the Iewes neither by prayers, perswasions, nor preaching, they tooke the materiall sword in hand, to force them to the Christian religion; holding, That any thing which is practised (especially religion) although it be by force and constraint, turnes to a custome, which growing ancient by succession of time, is allowed by them that did not feele the first constraint and rigour. This sword which the Iacobins vsed then, and continues to this day in Spaine, was the cause that they said the Inquisition began in the time of D. Ferdinand king of Arragon, for that this manner of reclaiming them was more rigorous than the first, against the heretikes, whom they called Marans. Thus the Iacobins were the authors of the Inquisition, which the king allowed, and Pope Sextus confirmed. The king had reason to doe it, to root out the cursed doctrine of the Mahometans and Iewes, who committed great impieties in Spaine.

These Iacobins for the institution of the said Inquisition, were called defenders of the Christian religion. Their first Commissions extended but to Iewes and Mahometists, but since they extended their authoritie ouer all in generall, calling themselves Inquisitors of hereticks, to persecute all them that did not punctually obserue the orders of the Church of Rome. Whereby in the end they did purchase such hatred, as king Ferdinand was forced to set learned Clergie men in their places, who before had beene fauourers of this Inquisition. But least the Iacobins should take this deprivation ill, the king gaue them authoritie to be present at the deliberations and iudgements of the Inquisitors of the Faith: so as the examination of such as they call heretikes, is at this day taken by them. And although the said Inquisition were not so rigorously executed in those dayes, as it is now, yet in some parts of Spaine the Spaniards themselves would not receiue it, for the Estates of Arragon opposed themselves against it (yet reuerently) first by words and admonitions; but when he sought to force them, they fell to armes, and would by no means receiue it, the Estates considering that it would be prejudiciall to the liberties and priuiledges of the realme: so as they did not receiue it without great force and effusion of blood of either side, as appeared by the death of M. Epile, who being sent with commission from the king to settle it, was murdered in the Cathedrall church of Sarraçosse, the chiefe citie of the realme of Arragon.

Experience hath taught vs what men these Inquisitors bee, who by their wickednesse peruert all; against whom no lawes, priuiledges, statutes, nor customes of the countrey can preuaile; proceeding in all things against the accused according to their passions, be it right or wrong, by all cruell executions vnworthie of Christians, obseruing no ordinarie course of justice, but presuming to deale both with ciuile and criminall causes; citing sometimes before them men of grauitie and authoritie, noblemen and gentlemen, for trifles

A trifles enst for children. When any one is accused, they send a Sergeant (whom they call a Familiar) to cite him to appeare personally before the holy office of the Inquisition; whereunto he must of necessity obey. If he denies that wherewith he is charged, they suffer him to goe to his house, but one of their fliecs followes him, who obserues his countenance: if he finds by word or shew, that he hath any bad impressions, they declare it to the Inquisitors, who make a new Proces. When as the accused appearing at the day appointed confesseth freely, or by intricate examinations (to make him forget his first answers) they draw any thing from him, the accuser, or flie, is hidden behind the hangings, to heare if he confessed the truth. If he be a towne dweller, they send him home to his house, if he be a stranger, they send him to prison. Then they write vnto the curat or bishop of the diocesse where the accused is resident, to the end (say they) they should not rashly lay hands vpon the sheep of a strange pastor, sending him word, that they haue one of his flocke in their prisons.

He that hath a dwelling house in the towne, being sent for againe, and committed to prison, they demand of him the keyes of his coffers and closet, to deliuer them to a publicke Notarie, who must take an inuentarie of all his mouables, writings, jewels, or what else is in his house: which inuentarie is deliuered into the hands of some rich neighbour, who keepes it vntill the end of the Proces, all the said goods being forfeited to the king, if the accused be condemned: for their custome is (although the sentence be not capital) to make a prey of his goods, declaring the accused to bee vnworthie to enjoy any of them. The accused being once in prison, the keeper searcheth him if he haue no knife, papers, or any other thing, stripping him to his verie shirt. Eight daies after the Inquisitors will the Gaoler to aduise the prisoner to demand audience: whereupon the poore man intreats him to aske it for him, the which, after much pressing, he promisseth, and in the end, after some delays, doth it. Being come into the Auditorie, he intreats them to dispatch his Proces: then they admonish him to discharge his conscience, and to acknowledge his faults, promising him all sauaour and mercie, so as he will conuert. If hee confesseth, he is not freed therefore, and if he doth not confesse, they send him backe to prison, and tell him that they will dispatch his Proces. It is in vaine for him to demand audience againe, neither will they tell him whereof he is accused, but he must diuine it, seeking to conuict him by his owne confession. Then they bring him againe before the Inquisitors, who tell him sharply, That if you will not otherwise discharge your conscience, you shal be deliuered into the Attorneys generals hands, who will intreat you after another maner, by torture. But when the craftie admonitions of the Inquisitors cannot shake his constancie, then they haue recourse to another practise. They cause a crosse and a booke which they call the Messall, to be brought, whereon they will haue the accused to sweare: if he refuseth, he is conuicted, if he sweares, they inquire first of his countrey, kinsmen, profession, companions, and other such like things, from the which they draw great arguments: but they that are well aduised will answer nothing, if they haue not first seene the informations whereof they are accused. In the end they giue it him in writing, to defend himselfe by his Aduocate, who undertakes his cause, after that his Proces is in question, according to the custome (the which is only to get money from the poore prisoner) on the third day after the Inquisitors send for the prisoner with his Aduocate; then they commaund him to speake the truth, seeing in that Auditorie they require nothing else: If he doth not confesse, then they send him backe to prison. In the end they acquaint him with the depositions, but doe not name the witnesses. But if any man will charge him with any thing, the prisoner, if he be well aduised, will inquire of the qualitie of the person which hath beene heard against him: When as the prisoner can diuine of his accuser, and doth remember with whom he hath discoursed of religion, they grant a confrontation with him. They that are best aduised demand a copie of the conclusion, to make answer thereunto by writing: but if there be two witnesses, they iudge to death, or otherwise: one witness alone is sufficient to put him to the racke.

The kings Attourney is his aduerser partie, and the witnesses be his accusers. Two or three dayes after the prisoner hath beene called before the Iudges, his Aduocate comes and declares vnto him the chiefe points whereof he is accused, and doth propound vnto him the

Iacobins first Inquisitors.

Iacobins loose the stile of Inquisitors.

Inquisition resisted by the Arragons.

Inquisitors
what they be.

Page 5 Manner of the Inquisition proceeding.

Saint Sebastian, la Renterie, Ocarfon, Yrum, and Vranfu, they came vnto the riuer which diuides France from Spaine, where there were boats prepared; into the which the queene mother came to receiue her, and led her vnto king Charles, who attended her on the other banke, at the end of the bridge. After their imbracings and complements, they went all towards Bayone, with a great traine of lords and ladies of both realmes. The queene mother and her three children marcht in one ranke, she holding the right hand, she queene of Spaine next her, the French king joyning to his sister, and the duke of Anjou on the left hand. She stayed at Bayone seuentene dayes, and at her returne the queene mother did accompanie her vnto the riuer, and the duke of Anjou vnto Segure. The cause of this enteruiew was knowne by many effects which followed: with whom the duke of Alba was H sent, with full authoritie from his master. This princeesse of France hath left vnto king Philip her husband two daughters, D. Isabella, and D. Catharina. The Spanish histories say, that she was brought in bed of her eldest daughter on the twelfth of August 1566, in the royall palace of Segouia, who was named D. Isabella Clara Eugenia; and was baptised by the bishop of Rossano, the Popes Nuntio, by reason of a contention growne betwixt the Archbishop of S. James, and the bishop of Segouia; the Archbishop saying, That hee ought to Christen the kings child, being chiefe chaplaine of the kings house, and that all that concerned the Spiritualltie in the kings palace, belonged to his charge, the bishop on the other side maintained, That this act belonged vnto him, for that it was done in his diocesse.

D. Garcia de Toledo in disgrace.

31 There were great complaints made in the Court of Castille, against D. Garcia de Toledo, Viceroy of Sicile, where he had many enemies which taxed him of arrogancie, malicious negligence, and neglect of all good occasions, yea he was accused to haue retained three hundred thousand crownes, which were sent him for the war of Malta, and the last prouision thereof, and that he had suffered the remainder of the Turkish armie to escape, who fled in disorder (said his ill willers) whom he might easily haue defeated. He sought to purge himselfe of these imputations by his friends, and sent Alphonso Ruiz, Secretarie of State for that realme, expressly out of Sicile; but his disgrace increasing, he was forced to come in person. He was there discharged by the king, and sent home to his house, being deprived of all his offices and estates. D. John de Austria was made Generall at sea, and the marquisse of Pescara Viceroy of Sicile. K

THE

A

THE 29 BOOKE OF THE Historie of Spaine.

B

The Contents.

- 1 Troubles in the Low Countries.
- 2 Tumult made in Spaine by the Moores of Granada.
- 3 Seio taken by the Turke.
- 4 Duke of Alba sent Gouverneur into the Low Countries.
- 5 Sentence of condemnation against the Netherlanders.
- 6 Imprisonment and death of the prince of Spaine, and of the queene.
- 7 Charles Archduke of Austria sent from the Emperor Maximilian into Spaine.
- 8 Causes which moved the Moores of Granada to rebell.
- 9 Mariage of the king of Spaine with his neeces the Emperours daughter.
- 10 Rights of the Seignourie of Venice to the realme of Cyprus.
- 11 League concluded betwixt the Pope, the king of Spaine, and the commonweale of Venice.
- 12 Famagusta yielded to the Turke.
- 13 Battell betwixt the Christians and Turkes at Lepanto.
- 14 Duke of Medina Celi sent to succed the duke of Alba in the Low Countries.
- 15 Enterprise of Tunia made by D. John of Austria.
- 16 Tunia and Goulette recovered againe by the Turkes.
- 17 D. Sebastian king of Portugal goes into Affrike.

Towards the end of the last yere Pope Pius the fourth died, in whose place was chosen Friar Michael Gilsleri, of the Order of S. Dominicke, cardinall Alexandrino, and he was called Pius the fifth. He had bene bred vp in diuers charges of the Inquisition, and therefore he sought to aduanceit being come to this dignitie. The people of Rome knowing him to be of a sowre and seuer disposition, were somewhat troubled at his election: which being reported vnto him, We hope in God, said he, so to behaue our selfe, as they will bee more grieved to heare of our death, than they are now at our creation. But the king of Spaine rejoyced much at this election, commending the authours thereof. He did obserue him with great reuerence, commanding all his ministers with whom the Pope was to treat, not to oppose themselves against his Holinesss just demands. And this yere Bartholmew Caranza, Archbishop of Toledo, being called in question by the Inquisition of Spaine, for misbelieve, requiring to be judged at Rome, as his Holinesss should determine, he being not well satisfied with his Spanish iudges, the king wold not refuse him to the lord of Camojano, who was sent vnto him to that end, notwithstanding that it was against the priuiledges of the Inquisition in that realme: wherein the cardinall Sanxisso being sent the yere before by the Pope, to judge the cause, could not preuaile, the Spaniards seeking to maintaine their iurisdiction, and to determine it absolutely. Norwithstanding the Archbishops person was granted to Camojano, who was caried prisoner to Rome, with his Proces which had bene begun there.

1566 Election of Pope Pius 5.

Archbishop of Toledo demands in question by the Inquisition.

1566

Caraffas process renewed.

Pope Pius the fifth having beene made cardinall by Paul the fourth, a Caraffe, in requital of this favour, being advanced to the Papacie, he caused the proces of cardinall Caraffa, and others of that house, which had been executed by his predecessors commandement, to be renewed, restoring the familie of the Caraffas to their honor and fame.

The Pope persisting in his accustomed rigour against them that did seeme to decline from the obedience of the Church of Rome, did not faile, after his assumption, to admonish all Christian princes to observe the decrees of the Council of Trent, and did quicken the diligence of Inquisitors in all places: But he had no need to reiterate his commandements in that point in Spain, where they had for a long time vsed hard persecution against them whom they called Lutherans, whom king Philip was prest to root out in other places of his obedience, especially in the Low Countries, and to publish this Council, which was ended so fauourably for him, as it was rather called the king of Spaines Council than a generall.

*Causes of ha-tered by twixt
the Spaniards
and Flemings.*

Troubles in the Low Countries.

*Advice given by the Emperour
Charles to his sonne.*

Resolution in Spain touching the government of the Low Countries.

Charles prince of Spaine vnipleasing to his father.

Between the Spaniards and the nobilitie of the Netherlands, yea betwixt these nations there reigned an inueterat hatred, since the Infancie of Charles their king; which grew as well by the diuersitie of manners, as by occasions which sprang from charges in Court, being alwayes accompanied with enuie, and many times with attempts of courtiers one against another, abusing the fauour of their princes: For the Flemings had been in great credit with the Emperour, and had made their profit of the commodities of Spaine, yea against the lawes of the country, during his raigne: And at this time in the Court of king Philip his sonne, the Spaniards had the advantage, and were in most credit. From this spring grew the priuar dislikes betwixt the duke of Alba, and other noblemen of Spaine, and the earle of Egmont, prince of Orange, and other great men who had the chiefe governments and charges in those hereditarie countries of king Philip. Of whom they thought they might well be reuenged (as reuenge is sweet and pleasant to men of that sort) by reason of the publication of the Council of Trent, and the obseruation thereof, and of the Edicts which they called Placards, which the Emperour had made in regard of religion, containing many articles of extreame rigour, in imitation of the Inquisition of Spaine, whereof notwithstanding at the instance of the Estates of the Countrey, he did moderate much of the rigour, and, giuing ouer the government, he did admonish D. Philip his sonne, to intreat his subiects liuing vnder diuers climates, according to their naturall humors; letting him vnderstand, that it might be aueritic was necessarie for Spaniards, but that the Netherlands must be gouerned with a certaine familiaritie and mildnesse. Against this good and wholesome aduice king Philip had other counsell as soone as he came into Spaine, being animated as well by them of his Council that were about him, as by Antonie Perrenot, cardinall of Arras, who concurred with the king and them in that point, to settle a soueraigne absolute power ouer that nation, and to take their priuiledges from them: whereof they had made some trial by the creation of new bishops, without the consent of the Estates. Wherein he found great opposition, as we haue formerly shewed, and as you may read at large in the Netherland Historie, to the which this subiect doth more properly belong.

Most of the provinces of the Netherlands being in combustion, it was bruted, That the king of Spaine would goe in person thither, carrying peace and mildnesse with him: but the chiefe of them that fauoured religion, were soone aduertised of a contrarie resolution taken in the kings Council, which was, That the king would not come among them, but that the duke of Alba should be sent with a great armie, to enter the countrey in hostile manner, as you shall heare in the following yeare. King Philip was doubtfull indeed, whether he should goe in person into the Netherlands, but he knew not well to whom to leaue the gouernement of Spaine, in his absence, being due to D. Charles his sonne, whom he trusted not: for whether it were for want of vnderstanding, as the brute was, or that he had too much, as hee presumed, his father had conceived a bad opinion of him, which some of his Counsellours did feed, for that it seemed vnto them, that this young prince, both in his words and actions, did come them, or at the least did not esteeme them as they desired. About all, the Inquisitors were no friends vnto him, as you shall heare.

2 Whilest

1566

*Tumult made in Spaine by the Moors of Gra-
nade.*

Whilest they consulted in the king of Spaines Council, how to punish the Netherlands, the Moores of Granado were called in question, being pursued by the Clergie, and accused of many crimes, especially of secrete impietie, as retaining in their hearts the precepts of the law of Mahomet, & hauing their exercises secretly in their houses, although that publicly they aduowed themselves to be Christians, went to Masse, and to other offices and ceremonies in the parishs where they dwelt. Their spleene was chiefly against the inhabitants of the Albaizin, which is a quarter within the citie of Granado, being then peopled with a great number of families of that nation, who were rich and well accommodated; being people which imploied their time in the trade of marchandise, in making of silkes, and in many gainfull trades: and among them there were some knights, professing nobilitie and armes. Moreover, in other towins, and in the countrey and mountaines of Granado, and thereabouts, there were about an hundred thousand families of Moores of diuers conditions, some rich, but most labourers and shepheards, liuing vnder the protection of lords which enjoyed the castles, fees, and feignories, to whom they paid rents & duties, as subiects, descending from them that remained in the countrey since the realme of Granado had beene conquered by the kings D. Ferdinand and D. Isabella, who had promised in capitulating with the last king of the Moores, That they and their successors might remaine there with all assurance and libertie, and not be forced in their religion, obseruing the lawes in generall, and paying the rights and tributes to the king, like to his other subiects, yet the same kings breaking their promise by the persiuation of some Prelats, they would force them to be baptised, and receive instruction in religion, by reason whereof they fell againe to warre against them that dwelt in Alpuzarra, a mountaine countrey, rough, and of hard access, joyning vnto the sea, the which after many hard encounters, with diuers euents on either side, was ended by another composition: by the which it was concluded, That they that would be Christians should remaine in the countrey, and the rest should passe into Barbarie, whom they should furnish with shipping for their passage. They that remained were called Madejares, and they that passed were tearmed Moores Andaluzes, by the inhabitants of the provinces depending vpon the realmes of Fez and Marroc, whither they retired themselves. Notwithstanding, howsoeuer the Moores which remained in Spaine behaued themselves, they were still regarded, and held to be vile and abiect persons by the Spaniards, who called them, in reuenge, New Christians, and in stead of making them receive the religion of Iesus Christ gently, they tormented them both in word and deed; which the magistrat could not remedie, or, it may be, would not: for the Clergie, who are exempt from answer before any ciuile magistrat, and haue their iustice apart, being wonderfully fauoured in Spaine, were they that committed the greatest insolencies against them: yea these poore wretches were continually troubled to giue an account vnto the Inquisitors of their actions, and to vse all meanes possible to obtaine some rest of them that were ordinarily in the countrey: But their superiours, and the Prelats which were of the Council at Court, gaue them no rest; so as since the time of D. Ioune the Emperours mother, queene proprietarie of Castille, Arragon, &c. and the Emperours raigne, there had many seuerer Edicts beene made against them, and strange restrains in their conuersations and manner of liuing, whereof notwithstanding they had suspended the execution, at their humble suit, and protestation of their innocencies, purging themselves reasonably well of all the imputations wherewith they were by them charged.

At this time in the kings Court and Council, all the old accusations against the Moores were reuiued, and to set an order to the content of the Inquisition, and the Prelats which were pursued there, had beene Commissioners deputed, which were D. Diego d'Espinosa, Commissioners of the Council, who was afterwards made a cardinall, D. Fernando Aluarez de Toledo, duke of Alba, D. Antonie de Toledo, Prior of the Order of S. Iohn, D. Bernard Morer, Toledo, duke of Alba, D. Antonie de Toledo, Prior of the Order of S. Iohn, D. Pedro de Defa, of the Borea, Vicechancellor of Arragon, the bishop of Origuella, D. Pedro of Defa, of the Council of the generall Inquisition, the Licenciat Mechaca, and Doctor Pelafco, Auditors, or Councillors. These hauing met, made an Edict containing many articles, wherof the chiefe were: That all Moores, new Christians, were commanded to leaue their

M m m m m ij

Ara-

Arabike or Moorish tongue, and to vse the Spanishe; and therefore they should send their children to schooles which should be erected for the vulgar Spanishe tongue, and to the masters which should be appointed to teach them. That they should keep no books written in the Arabike tongue in their houses. That they with their wives & children should be bound to assit at seruice in their parish churches, on Sundayes and other festiual dayes celebrated by the Church. That on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, they should keepe their doores open in the day time, and to a certaine houre of the night, and suffer them to enter to see what they did. That they should keepe no other armes but their swords, and if any were suffered through fauour to haue any, they should be markt by the gouernours. That all Moores, men and women, of what age and condition soeuer, should leaue their Moorish habits and attire, which they had been accustomed to vse, and attire themselves like other Spaniards. That they should leaue off the vse of bathes after their manner, and their Moorish daunces, which were vndeceit, lasciuious, and scandalous to Christians. That the Moores residing in the Albaizin should not flie into the villages and jurisdictions of other lords: for thereby the decrees of justice were made void. There were other articles contained in this Edict, confirming the former old ordinances made against them, or newly inuented, with rigorous penalties vpon euerie one. This Edict being signed by the king, and put into forme, D. Pedro de Deza was dispatcht to be President of the Chancellerie of Granado, being injoynd to cause it to be executed from point to point, according to the forme and tenor thereof, without delay or fauour, not respecting the admonitions of any whatsoeuer. All the Commissioners were of this opinion, except the duke of Alba, who aduised them to proceed in the execution thereof article after article, after some pause, and not all at one instant. And soone after the duke parted to goe into Flanders, to gouerne there according to the seuer and injurious instructions which he carried with him, and those which he procured to be sent vnto him.

Scio taken by the Turke.

3 During these troubles in the West, the great Turke Solymán seized vpon the island of Scio. The Bassa Mehemet, vpon a priuāt grudge hee had against the inhabitants of that island, thinking that by their helpe a slaue of his was fled, and had carried away a good summe of gold, hee perswaded Solymán to make it subiect, making his owne priuāt respect an apparent reason; saying, That many slaues fled daily away by their fauour and aid; and besides, they were spies to obserue what was done at the port, and in those seas, giuing aduice to Christian princes, and especially to the king of Spaine, the chiefe of that nation being Genouois, and confederats with the said king. Moreover, he pretended, That they ought two yeres tribute, of ten thousand ducats a yere, the which had happened by the fraud of their Agent, who kept in Constantinople. The Turke was not verie well provided that yere at sea, for his losse had bene verie great before Malta, whereas hee had not onely lost many men of commaund, and especially that famous pyrat Dragut, but also the best of his forces: And his gallies were so weakened, as he could hardly draw fourescore gallies with some galliots together: Yet for that hee would with the shew of a great fleet diuide his enemies forces, he yielded to Mehemet's persuasions, commaunding him to annoy the Christians where they might most conueniently, after the taking of Scio. This island lyes in the Archipelagus: it is almost an hundred miles in circuit: about two hundred yeares since it was taken by the Genouois, and giuen to the Infinians their citizens, for their charges, who afterwards had the inuestiture from the Paleologus, paying a certaine rent, which was increased to tenne thousand ducats, by Mahomet the second, king of the Turkes. Thus they had liued at libertie vnto this time, without any annoyance, being gouerned in forme of a commonweale, the gentlemen hauing the chiefe command. Pisly, who was Generall of the fleet, directed his course thither, where he arrived on Easter day in the morning, and landed vnder a shew of friendship. Then with a praeface he drew the gouernor of the towne aboard the Admirall, with 12 men which were euerie yere chosen to be moderators of publike businesse: These being slaid by him, the publike palace and the fort were presently seized on by the Turkes, who carried away all the chiefe men, and appointed another forme of gouernment for them that did remaine, depending vpon the Turkes Empire. Pisly leauing that island, sailed towards the Adriatike sea, which put the Venetians into a great jealousy.

King

A The king of Spaine vnderstanding that there was no feare of Malta for that yere, hauing a great fleet & an armie readie, commaunded they should attempt Alger. Wherefore they began to send certaine ships laden with fouldiers, artillerie, and munition, towards Malaga, whilest that Garcia de Toledo prepared the gallies, to passe with all their power. It happened notwithstanding, that those ships were taken by certaine galliots of Alger, which kept those seas. This losse was of such importance, as it disappointed the resolution for Alger.

4 It had bene resolved the yere before in the Councell of Spaine, that the duke of Alba should haue an armie into the Low Countries. This Spring he was dispatcht away with an ample cōmission, or rather with an vnlimited authoritie, the which was pleasing vnto him, for the hatred he bare vnto the Netherlanders. As for his armie, there was commaundement giuen to the dukes of Alcala and Terranova (the one being Viceroy of Naples, and the other of Sicile) to send into the duchie of Milan the old regiments of Spaniards which they had in those realmes, and in Sardinia: and commaundement was also giuen to Gabriel de la Cuena, duke of Albuquerque, gouernour of Milan, That hee should not onely haue the regiment of Lombardie in a readinesse, but also the light horsemen, increasing their companies from fiftie to an hundred; and that Lopes Zapata, and Sancho d'Anila, should raise two more, besides two of harquebusers on horsebacke, Spaniards, leuied by Pedro Montagna, and Gonsaluo Montero. The king had also giuen order in Germanie, that Alberico, earle of Lodron, should raise a regiment of 12 companies of foot, and 300 in euerie cōpanie, according to the custome of that nation, & in the county of Bourgondie there should be leuied 300 lances, and 100 harquebusers on horsebacke. Francisco d'Ibarra was victualer generall, and D. Garcia de Toledo had charge to transport in his gallies the said Spanishe footmen, vnto the ports of Genoua, that they might beradie in Lombardie at the duke of Albas arriuall. This order being taken in Spaine for the voyage of Flanders, and new fouldiers (whom they call Befognes) being sent into Sicile and Naples, to supplie their places that should goe in that action, in the beginning of May the duke of Alba embarked at Carthagena, in the gallies of John Andrew Doris, and of the duke of Florence: he carried with him seuenteen companies of Spanishe foot, and fill up the garrisons of Lombardie, from whence he drew the old fouldiers, making also choise of foure companies of these new fouldiers, to lead with him into the Low Countries. He arriued late at Genoua, hauing bene troubled with a feuer vpon the way. He mustered his army betwixt Alexandria and Asti, where he found 8800 Spanishe foot, and 1200 horse, Italians, Spaniards, and Albanefes: and the foot were thus diuided; of the regiment of Naples 2230 in 19 companies, vnder Alphonso Vlosa their colonell; in the regiment of Sardinia (in the which the foure companies of Befognes were put) were 1720 men in ten companies, commaunded by Gonsaluo de Bracamont: the regiment of Sicile was of 1620 fouldiers, in ten companies, vnder Julian Romero; and that of Lombardie, being but 1200 foot, in ten companies, was commanded by Sancho de Londogno. There were seuen companies of horse, Spaniards, wherof fife were lances, and two harquebusers, three of Italians, and two of Albanefes, all light horsemen. Besides these troupes, and their captaynes, he led with him many men of knowne valour, to imploy them in this seruice, and to aduance them to charges as they should fall: among which were his base sonne called also Fernando Aluarez, who was a knight of Saint John, and Prior of a rich commanderie, also Fernando Aluarez, who was a knight of Saint John, and Prior of a rich commanderie, also Chiappin Vitelli, marquisse of Cetona, Gabriel Serbelloni, a knight also of Saint John, Sancho d'Anila, Girolamo de Salinas, John of Epuccia, and Andrew de Salezar, one of which foure was Castellain of Pauia, the other of Portecole; the third of Piombino, and the last of Palermo. And besides these, hee led with him Paciotto de Primbis, an excellent Enginer; hauing gotten him from the duke of Sauoy, whom hee then serued. Hee made his sonne Fernando Generall of the horse, Vitelli was Marshall of the field, and Serbelloni (besides the charge of the Artillerie) was made Counsellour at Warre. How hee entred into the countrey, and what his proceedings were, that Historie how hee related at large. After which they hauing certaine informations sent them in to Spaine, from the duke of Alba, and the aduice of the holy Inquisition taken therein, all the lay people of the said countries, both noblemen, gentlemen, townes and

M m m m m iij

com

Laſſe received by the priats of Alger.

Duke of Alba sent into Flanders.

Armie led by the duke of Alba into the Low countries.

1567

comminalties were by the kings sentence condemned as heretikes, or fauourers of heretikes, or in some other sort guiltie of high treason in the highest degree, without exception of estate, qualitie, condition, age, or sex; except some which were particularly named in the information, which made the inhabitants to flic into diuers other countries.

This yere, in May, there was great ioy and feasts in Spaine, and in all the kings dominions, for the birth of his second daughter, who was baptised, and called Katherine.

1568

But whilest the warre grew hot in the Low Countries, there happened a tragical accident in the royall house of Spaine. We haue before made mention how that D. Charles was in disgrace with the king his father: the cause (as the Spaniards say) was, for that he was viciously giuen, and that he spake ill of the present government: that he had a meaning to attempt against the kings person, and to raigne in his place, hating him, for that he had often reprehended him, and threatened him, for his disordered courtes: or, if that succeeded not, that he would flic away, and flic secretly, with some of his confederats, into Italie, or somewhere else, and trie, by confusion and tumult, to deprive the king of his Estates. That he carried himselfe arrogantly, and incompatible to them that had the chiefe offices in Court, and that he disdaind all those that were appointed to attend on him, yea hee would outrage and strike them. The Inquisitors expected no good from this prince, neither did the kings Councill, of the which those that were then most hated of him, were D. Ruiz Gomes de Sylua, a Portugal, the earle of Feria, and D. Antonie de Toledo. The king was aduertised by them of many particularities concerning the princes carriage, and entertained in dislike of him. By their counsell the king resolued to come from the Elcuriall to Madrid, where the prince was, and to surpris him in his chamber in the night, they attending on him, and to take him in his bed. They came, and found the chamber doore so well barred, as they were forced to breake it open. The prince hearing the noise, leapt out of his bed, and seeing the king his father, hee was much troubled, beginning to crie out, What is the reason that you will kill me? The king willed him that he would pacifie himselfe, and that he should goe againe to his bed, telling him, that what he did was for his good. They staid on his sword, and some say that hee had a pistoll charged and bent: He complained, that they meant to bind him, as if he had beene made. His chamber and clothes were searched, and they left no instrument of yron, wherewith he might hurt himselfe: all his papers and writings were carried away, among the which there were found many copies of letters written to some princes, full of complaints of hard vsage which hee receiued from the king, whom he accused of crueltye and bad gouernement in his affaires, and it seemed hee did inuite them to assist him, by compassion, making great promises vnto them. His whole designe was also discovered by certaine remembrances which were found, being resolued to escape away in the gallies, which should passe into Italie, whereby they might easily see whom he loued, and whom he hated in Court, whom he trusted, and whom he would imploy in his enterprises. Hee had beene seene some daies before, to discourse long and verie earnestly with D. Iohn of Austria, Generall at sea; and it was thought, that hauing acquainted him with his desires, hee reuealed them vnto the king, which made him resolue to put him in gard. The earle of Feria, and D. Ruiz Gomes, had that charge, who watcht him carefully in their turnes; and hee was serued by two gentlemen, who carried no armes, and vpon the passages to his chamber there were guards, who would not suffer any other to goe vnto him. This continued some dayes: but the king who obserued all that hee spake, caused him afterwards to be put into a strong tower, giuing the whole charge and care of him to D. Ruiz Gomes: it was the same prison whereras king Francis had beene kept. There hee attempted many times to kill himselfe, as they said, and being preuented, hee forbore to eat any thing eight dayes together. The king aduertised all the noblemen, townes, and comminalties of Spaine, of this imprisonment, that they should not take it ill, letting them vnderstand, that it was for the good and quiet of them all, forbidding them all exprefly, not to speake nor mediate for the prince. He imparted as much to the embassadours, and did write vnto their masters.

Obiectio against the prince of
Spaine.

Enemies to the prince of Spaine

6 Imprisonment of the prince of Spaine.

Designes of the prince discouered.

The emperour Maximilian being aduertised of this fact, imputed the cause to D. Iohn, and

A and was offended with him: for he meant to make the prince D. Charles his Son in law, & (if this accident had not happened) to haue consummated the marriage within few daies, as the fathers had concluded: & he was so much discontented, as hee would haue called home the Princes Rodolphus and earnest his Sonnes, who were bred up in the Court of Spaine, but the king D. Philip would not suffer them to depart, but fought to pacifie the Emperour with reasons, either true or probable. But in the end he perswaded him that the cause was most vrgent and iust to assure himselfe of his Sonnes person, whom hee should loue and spare if it might be, hauing at that time no more Sonnes. Whatsoeuer was the true cause of the Sonnes detention by the father, being not well manifested from Spaine, the prince D. Charles the presumptiue heire of so many realmes, dyed in Iulies, some say he was poisoned, other s write that he was strangled by foure slaues: He was buried in the Monasterie of S. Dom inike, the royall at Madrid, whereas the king D. Pedro the cruel had bene interred. Peter Mathew in his French Historie, writing of the life and death of king Philip the second, he sets downe a formall proceeding of the father against his Sonne in this action: the which for that this subiect is so rare and memorable, I haue thought good also to insert.

Death of the
Prince of Spaine

Mathew upon the death of Prince Charles

After the Princes restraint, as wee haue said the king (saith hee) propounded to his Councel of conscience, what punishment a kings son deserued, that had made leagues against his estates, and conspired against his fathers life, and whether hee might be called in question? His Councell laied two remedies before him, both iust and possible, the one of grace, and the other of Iustice and punishment, shewing him the difference betwixt the mercie of a father, and the sinceritie of a king, saying, that if by his clemencie he did pardon them which loued him not, hee must of force pardon that creature which should be most deare vnto him. They desired him to imitate the emperour Charlemaigne, who imputed the first conspiracie of his Sonne Pepin against him, to the follies of youth, & for the second hee confined him into a Monasterie, protesting that he was a father not a king, nor a iudge against his Sonne. The king answered that by the law of nature hee loued his Son better than himselfe, but by the law of God the good and safetie of his subiects was to be preferred. Moreouer hee demanded, if knowing the miseries which the impunitie of his Sonnes offences would breed, whether hee might with a safe conscience pardon him, and not be guiltie of these miseries. Whereat his Diuines shrunke in their shoulders, and with teares in their eyes said, that the safetie and health of his subiects ought to be dearer vnto him than his sonnes, and that hee ought to pardon offences; but such crimes should bee supprest as abhominable monstres. Hereupon the king committed his Sonne to the censure of the Inquisitors, commending them not to respect his authoritie, no more than the meanest within his kingdome; and to regard the qualitie of his Sonne, as if he were borne a king, making no distinction thereof with the partie accused, vntill they found that the exccesse of his offence would no more admit of this consideration, remembering that they carried in their soules a liuelie image of the king, which had iudged Angels, and should without distinction iudge kings and the Sonnes of kings like vnto other men, referring al vnto their consciences, and discharging his owne.

The Inquisitors, for that he was charged to haue practised with Castillon Admirall of France, the prince of Orange, and other enemies of the Romish Religion, declared him an heretike, and for that hee had conspired against his fathers life, they condemned him to die. The king was his accuser, and the Inquisitors his iudges, but the sentence was signed by the king, which done, they presented many kinds of death in picture vnto the prince, to make choise of the easiest. In the end he demanded if there were no pitie in his father; to pardon him, no fauour in his Councell for a Prince of Spaine, nor any wisdom to excuse the follies of his youth: when as they told him that his death was determined & could not be reuoked, and that all the fauour was in the choise of the easiest death, hee said that they might put him to what death they pleased: that there was no choise of any death, seeing that they could not giue him that which Cesar held to be the best. These words deliuered with passion, were followed with a thousand imprecations against his fortune, against the inhumanity of his father, and the crueltye of the Inquisition; repeating these words often: O miserable Sonne, of a more miserable father.

He

He had some daies given him to prepare himselfe for death. One morning foure slaves entred into his chamber, who awaking him, put him in mind of his last houre, and gaue him some time to prepare himselfe vnto God: He start vp suddenly and fled to the bed post; but two of them held his armes, and the third his feet, and the fourth strangled him with a cord of silk. Many hold that he died of letting blod, his feet being put in warm water. But Campana in the life of Philip 2 writes, that being in prison he fel verie sick, by reason of his disordred diet, and drinking too much cold water, wherewith his stomack grew so weake as he could not digest any meat, which the Physicians could not helpe: so as hee died (as he affirms) of this sickness, verie religiously and penitently to the great griefe of the king & the whol state: & moreover he writes, that the king being much perplexed for this great losse, retired himself into his chamber with two seruants, & wold not giue any audience, & then for many daies into the monasterie of S. Jerome, a mile without the town, sequestering himself of al affairs, writing only to princes & potentates, & causing his secretaries to write vnto all his realms & Rates of the death of his deare & only son. Thus writers discoures diuersly of the death of this Prince: the which I leaue to the iudicious Reader to beleue what he shall thinke most probable.

Death of the queen of Spain.

Within foure months after the death of the Prince D. Carlo, the Queene D. Isabella his mother in law died also, being brought in bed of her third child before her time, the Physicians hauing ignorantly caused her to take too much Phisick, sening some other infirmities: this was the brute of the court of Spain. But in France they had reason to think that the life of this princefse was shortened like vnto that of D. Charles, by some notable malice, & by the same instruments. For they to whom D. Isabella did belong in blood, had been verie careful to auer the causes & manner of her death, but not so resolute to call it in question, as Cloutier sons were to reuenge the iniurie done vnto their Sister in Spaine, where she also had bene married.

Turkett.

As for the Prince, it was verie comon in Spain, that the great hatred the king bare him, grew rather from the suggestions and reports of others, than from his own misdeeds, for by nature he was neither given to any odious vices, neither was he off to harsh and sower a disposition as commonly great men of that countrey be. It is true, that D. Charles kept his grauitie to courtiers, that he shewed himself verie ambitious, & too desirous to manage affaires, and to be imploied; and was giuen to some kindes of pleasures. Such as would excuse him, said, that it was seemly and besitting his ranke to be graue, being the son of a great king, sworn prince and acknowledged for succesor to such rich and great estates, and also that it is the first lesson & most recommended instruction of fathers in Spaine, to their children, to shew themselves graue in their words & actions, & that it was a comendable thing especially in the that were of great houses. If he were ambitious & desirous of honor, they were affections incident to princes, & were so necessarie in them that were to gouerne people, as if any had not these motions in them, they were the lesse esteemed, both in Spain and elsewhere. If he desired to know & learne by practise how estates should be gouerned, and justice duly administered, that it is a thing wherein kings children should be bred from their youth, & practised therein all their liues, and that it is the nature of all men well bred, feeling the seeds of vertue in their minds, to aduance it by their actions; wherein all men know that vertue doth consist. And yet all these things commendable in other men, were blamed in Prince Charles, by them who (it may be) would not haue their misdeemors discovered by the Infant of the house. As for worldlie pleasures, they be, said they, appetites which doe commonly accompany yong noble men, especially being bred vp in the idleness of court; vices which are tollerable in many of mean condition, & therefore were lesse strange in great men: but, said they, there was no better means to diuert this prince from delights which are superfluous and hurtfull, than to imploy him betimes in the government affaires; what greater bond, said they, had the king his father to his subiects, than to fashion his onely Sonne, (hee that should raigaine after) to command wel, & to make him knowe both by reason and experience what the duetie of a king is; both to God and men, that they be not as dum Idols among their Councillers, hauing not iudgement to discern the good from the bad. The thing wherein the Prince was most to be blamed, was an inconsiderate rashnesse to attaine vnto his intentions, and

Disposition of the prince D.
Charles.

Ambition a vice of great men.

Vices common to yong Noble-
men.

A could not obserue time, nor fit occasions to make his pursuit. The which they thought proceeded onely from the heat of youth, which might easily haue been corrected by conuersing with men of state, if hee had bene accompanied by some men of tried wife, and willing to moderate these fumes which did rise through the heat of youth. And they complained that the meanes that might haue made D. Charles a vertuous Prince, were hindered by the practises of the kings bad Councillers; who also for his part had shewed himselfe too credulous, & in the end blind in that action, by some secret iudgement of God. These were the ordinarie reasons of temperate spirits, who thought affaires of state might well be managed, and not stray from pietie nor humanity. Adding, that admit the Prince D. Charles had bin found inflexible to all proofes of reason, so as hee had been held incapable to raigine, yet should they not haue taken away his life. That there were Monasteries in Spaine, whether they might haue sequestred him, and sought by the conuersation of some good religious men, to draw him to a contempt of worldlie greatnesse which periseth, and to the contemplation of heavenly things, and the life to come: whereof both Spaine, and other Countries could furnish the like examples.

But the Councell of Spaine consisting of Clergie men and secular, did not like of these old maxims in matters of consequence, and especially they that had more particular knowledge of that which past in the kings house, did greatly apprehend what this triumphant crowne would come vnto, if king Philip dying, it should fall into the hands of such a man as D. Charles his Sonne was, whom they held to bee vnable to vndergoe so great a burthen; and there was great probability that this prince had both his bodie & his spirits, weakened since his fall at Alcala of Hcnares, whether hee was gone to pay a vow after a long quarren ague, by which fall his braine was somewhat crazed, so as his iudgement did sometimes faile him, nor being able to containe himself with the respect which he ought vnto the king, and to them that had the honour to be of his Councell.

Moreover, whether it were by accident, or by some defect of nature, the facultie of generation was in a manys quencht in him, so as he was held vnable for women: the which did also import the state. All these things gaue a great apprehension to the chiefe of the kings Councell, being guided by worldlie wisdom, the which could not suggest a better expedient than to be rid of him, and to find out some fit meanes to effect it. It is certaine that the beginning of the kings hatred to his sonne, was throgh jealousy of State, taking an occasion for that the Prince seemed verie desirous to goe from Court, and to bee imploied in forein expeditions, at the least to accompany them that were sent with charges, to the end, said he, that hee might learne. Whereupon they presently made D. Charles a monster of ambition, who would presently seaze vpon the Prouinces, and take away the kings crown & life to raigine: & yet on the other side they taxed him that he was dull and wanted iudgement, contradicting themselves, for such actions are not attempted by fooles and madmen: the which the king should haue duely considered; but not doing it, he did blemish his house with the most fatal misfortune that could happen vnto it, for he did so readily receiue these suspitions, and did so graue them in his heart, as he detested his Son, & he neuer saw him, but he sent him away with sower visage and threats: and that which did most trouble the Prince, some of the Councillors and misgops of court, presumed (in imitation of the father) to contemne him. He gaue them a great aduantage ouer him, for that when as the Marques of Berghen & the Lord of Montigny came to court, being sent fro the estates of the Low-countries, to present their petition vnto the king touching the breach of their priuiledges by the Cardinall of Granuelle, hee became a solicitor for the, being moued as he said with the zeale of iustice, and hatred of ciuill wars, which hee foresaw and detested, blaming them openly which perswaded the king and his Councell thereunto, saying that they were practises of insatiable and cruel yalures, who would gorge themselves with the losse of the kings subiects.

F By these free speeches vsed often when as they treated of the warre of Flanders, and against the Moores of Granado, whereas religion was made the pretext, at the pursuit & by authority of the Inquisition, D. Charles made himselfe odious to them that were the moouers, giuing them great meanes to confirme the king in the opinion wherewith they had sinned him, that he sought all meanes to trouble the state, & to make himselfe pleasing Considerations of the Councell

of Spaine.

D. Charles
Prince of Spaine
unable for women.

Zeale inconsiderate of the prince
D. Charles.

*Inquisitors
sharp persecutors of Prince Charles.*

ing vnto the Nederlanders, that he might haue a refuge there, and by that means begin to make a breach in the Crowne of Spain; adding with all to season their imputations, that he was a fauourer of Heretikes, so as hee was sharply and disdainfully reprehended, and namely by the Inquisitors, the which did wonderfully incense him: so as beeing vanquished with impatience, and griefe, he presumed one day to enter boldly into the priuy Councell chamber, with admiration of all them that were there, but especially of the king, who did preside, for he feared to see or heare some impertinencie from his Sonne in that place where he neuer had access, nor was not then called. Hee demanded of him with a seuerer countenance, what hee had to say, and what had moued him to come thither. It is said he, my Lord, to beseech you to giue me leaue to aske you one thing, and that it will please you to satisfie me before the lords that are here present.

Virtuous admiration of a Son in a father.

The king who feared to heare some importune curiositie, sought to dismiss him instantly, telling him that hee had other places to heare him, and that hee should retire for that time. But the prince insisted, saying that it was onely to know if he tooke him for his Sonne, and lawfull successeur: what demands of a Sonne are yours; said the king; yea you are my sonne, and depart in the name of God. Seeing then, replied the Prince, that I am your sonne, and that by nature I shall one day succeed you in the government of your realmes, I beseech you take it not in ill part, if in this honourable assemblie, I let you vnderstand that I haue not yet found that you haue thought of my future condition: for you bred me vp as a stranger, giuing me neither cause nor means to be instructed in matters of gouernment, or iustice, importing the good of your subjects, hauing not yet libertie, being of this age, to come where it is treated, nor to conuerse with such men as you employ, who rather seeke to estrange me; which giues me iust cause to complaine vnto you, and to beseech you my Lord to consider thereon, and to excuse mee: and then hee departed. Hee was then full two and twentie yeares old.

This action ministred matter of discourse to them of the Councell, whereas there was no good concluded for Prince Charles, for that the opinions of his enemies, which were the greatest number, swaied it, and the king continued in his conceit that his Sonne was a frantick young man, without iudgement, and that hee had an intent to invade some Countrey, to put all into Combustion, for which cause hee defined to be employed.

Speech of the Prince to the Duke of Alba.

The Prince not content to haue made this bad triall of his fathers inclination towards him, hee continued his course, hearing that the duke of Alba had bene appointed to goe to bee gouernour of the Low-Countries: for hauing sent for him, hee told him that hee desired nothing more than to goe from Court, intreating him instantly to assist him in so honourable and reasonable a desire, and to get leaue from the king that hee might goe with him, whome hee did reuerence as a great Commander in the warre, and one of the greatest statemen in the world, in whose Schole he should thinke himselfe happy to take instruction.

The Duke vsing many complements, seemed also to desire it, saying that he could not receiue a greater honour than to commaund vnder him in that troublesome charge, where hee might assure himselfe of his humble seruice and assistance, yet hee gaue him some admonitions, knowing well how the king stood affected towards him: wherewith hee was discontented. This being auoided (for the Duke of Alba, what shew sooner hee made, had no will to be troubled with such a Scholer) hee adrest himselfe a while after, to increase his miseries, to D. John of Austria his vnckle, who it may bee had more ambition in his head than he, to whose designs which were great, those of the Prince D. Charles must needs bee preiudiciall, yet hee discouered himselfe freely vnto him, being General at Sea, saying, that hee would steale away, and passe with the Gallies into Italie, perswading D. John to assist him, but hee decieued him; for hee presently aduertised the king, which made him to cause him to bee watcht, and his actions to bee obserued.

*D. John de Austria
contrarie to Prince Charles.*

But behold, the Queene was engaged in these miseries: The prince in all his afflictions had often recourse vnto his mother in law, who being mild and courteous, did willingly

A lingly heare his complaints, did pittie him, comfort him, and sought by all meanes to reuue his hopes, perswading him to vanquish his passions, and to yeeld vnto the rigour and choler of the king his father, and to let time moderate them with patience, the which past not from the Queene without some free inuectiues, after the French manner, against them that were enemies to her and to the Prince, threatening one day to be reuenged on them that were authors of her crosses, and namely against D. Ray Gomes, and a Confessor of the kings, who posselt him about all others, and were the chiefe practisers of these Tragedies. The which was reported vnto them, for they had spies euen in the Queenes Cabinet, by whom they were aduertised, and the king by them, of all the speeches which past betwixt the prince and her. They fearing that by the force of coningall loue, shee should put some consideration into the kings heart, by the which hee might bee moued to examine this businesse with iudgement, and that discouering their bad offices, hee should take reuenge, they resolu'd to presse the princes ruine, and to draw the Queene into the same hatred, that the king had conceiued against the prince his Sonne.

Practises of the court of Spaine.

These men wrought so by their practised and coloured reports as they drew that heart alreadie vlcered into a deadlie calouse of his wife, slandering her with loosefinesse, adding that crime to the impression which they had giuen him, that the fauoured the princes designs, tending to open rebellion against God & the king. Moreover to omit no imposture which might serue to transport this king beyond the bounds of humanitie and reason, they let him vnderstand, that by the reports of Phisitions and women attendants, vnto his Confessor, who made relation, and to whose words he gaue great credit, there appeared on the bodie of this Princesse certaine markes and spots, which shewed an impuritie and corruption of the blood, which might infect the kings person, if hee did accompany with her, and so disperse it selfe into all the royall familie, which was to be auoided.

*Inquisitors
chiefe of the council of
Spaine.*

All which passions together, were of such force with the king, as he beleued the Inquisitors (without whose aduice there is nothing of importance done in Spaine) and others which were of that Councell, perswading him that it was lawfull & expedient to make away the prince his son, and the Queene his wife, and the child shee went with, which they held to be a son, but it proved a daughter, whereof they caused her to be deliuered with drinke. This Historie was thus reported to queene Catherine, dowager of France, mother to D. Isabella, by such as she had imploied to vnderstand the truth thereof, & by some which had serued the prince D. Charles when he was committed to prison, who retrying themselves into France, she would heare.

The suspition the king had of the loyaltie of queene Isabell his wife, was not for the prince his Son, as many haue beleued: for he was (as wee haue said) insufficient for women. And although he would be idle in speech, and that there were found among his papers some notes of his owne hand touching that subiect, yet small pleasures were the least of his desires, and as for the Queene there was nothing more modest in Spain, by the report of Spaniards themselves, who haue written bookes. But it hath bene verified by credible informations, that her ill-willers which sought her ruin, made vse of the notable malice of a French gentlewoman, one of those which was suffered to stay with her, when as soone after her coming into the countrey, they did order her household, and limit her traine. They say that this vnworthie woman (for that the Queene had giuen away a place which was void to one of her companions, hauing promised it vnto her) to be reuenged of her Mistres, had giuen it out, that she had been indiscreetly and scandalously familiar with the Marquesse of Poza, who according to the custome of Spaine, termed himselfe seruant in shew to her that had bene preferred before her.

Treacherie, a diuelli caloung

This coming to the kings eares, was easily beleued, for hee was alreadie in some doubt, hee beeing informed by some wayward spirits, that this Marquesse who was of the house of Rojas, being a gallant knight, did talke more familiarly vnto the queen than any other, & entertained her with pleasant discourses, whereat shee did laugh after the manner of France, more freely than it seemed fit for their Spanish grauitie: This wound being now again toucht, the king sought an occasion to haue this Marquesse apprehended, commanding him to keepe his house being in Madrid, where going one night

Death of the Marquesse of
Poza.

night forth to visit his mother, and an vnkle of his that was a bishop, retyring verielate home in a night-gowne and slippers, being accompanied by two pages which carried torches before him, he was set vpon by men vnknown, and slaine vpon the place. There were diuers opinions concerning this murder, but most thought it was done by the kings secret commaundement, although hee seemed to bee much offended: For there being a great sum of money promised by proclamation to them that should discover the authours and doers of this murder, there were many biset vp in the Portugall tongue, declaring that it was the king himself which had caused the Marquesse of Poza to be slaine: challenging him, by way of mockerie, to pay the money which hee had promised, but they had not rest to their names.

Hereupon there was great search made, and some Innocents taken, and so cruelly tortured as they died: being onely suspected for that they were Portugals. The Queene soone after the death of the Prince D. Charles, began to find herselfe ill, with accidents and apparent signes of poison, whereof notwithstanding shee did in no sort doubt, but tooke light remedies, as one that was with child, by the order of such as had bin accustomed to giue her phisicke. The businesse proceeding slowly contrarie to that which they expected, the king hauing one night discoursed long with her touching her infirmities, hee told her plainly that she must take some strong purgation, and that his Physicians (who by his commaundement did looke vnto her) had told him that they despaired of her life, if she tooke no other phisicke than that she vsed. But as she tooke no delight to change her vsuall maner, nor to be phisicked by any other than her owne, trusting aboute all others in an Apothecarie of hers borne at Blois, she excused her selfe vpon her being with childe, saying that shee thought it was a Sonne, for that shee found herselfe otherwise disposed then she had beene, and that they must consider well thereon. But being much pressed by the king, shee said vnto him that shee would doe what hee pleased, not thinking that what they intended was so readie.

But earely the next day in the morning they brought her a drinke, a bole and tablets, all of one composition as they said, but so varied in form, so the end she might take that which was least distastfull vnto her. Shee tooke the poison, not distrusting any thing vntill she felt her selfe oppressed with great pangs, which made her be deliuered of a daughter, that was some five moneths olde, after which shee had vomitings and strange voidings which quencht all the force and vigour that remained in her. Being neere her end, the king came to visit her in a mourning weed, seeming to be much afflicted; whome she comforted, and among other words, shee said vnto him, That shee reioyced that she was going to a quiet kingdome, not subiect to alteration, as worldlie states be, that shee did not craue pardon of him, knowing in her conscience that shee had neuer willingly offended him. She recommended her wiating women and some French officers, whome shee had not meanes to recompence for the seruices they had done her, and in the end of October, on Saint Francis eue the dyed, Christian like, She was lamented of all Spaine, where they did beleuee that this Princesse was a Saint, she was assisted in her sicknesse for matters of conscience by the Cardinall of Espinosa, Inquisitor generall, D. Bernard of Frefueda bishop of Cuenca, the kings Confessor, Frier Dominicke de Chaus, another of the kings Confessors, who had also bene to the prince D. Charles, and others: She was interred in the Monasterie of las Descalzas built at Madrid by the Infanta D. Joane, Mother to D. Sebastian king of Portugall. The Gentlewoman which had slaudered her, and was the cause of her misfortune, was married in the Countrie, and died there: the lady of honour serued her daughter D. Isabella Clara Eugenia: the rest were sent backe into France, from whome they vnderstood these particularities.

A notable example of the practises of Princes Courts, of the vanitie and instabilitie of worldlie greatnesse, and of the miseries wherein kings plunge themselves by suspitions and bad impressions lightly received, and especially how they stray dangerously from the dutie which they owe to God and nature, when they enterlace religion with their human policies to countenance their actions. Whilst the duke of Alua seeks to afflict the towns of the low countries by strange & intollerable impositions, exacting the tenth penny

Speech of the Queen D. Isabella bellying to the king.

Quarrell betwixt the duke of Alba and the English.

Englishmen and their goods arrested in the Lowe Countries and Spaine.

Queen of England requesteth to heare the duke of Albas
Embassadors.

Charles Archduke of Austria sent into Spaine

Treatise of
marriage.

A penie of all marchandise that was sold, and the twentieth penie of euery mans estate. He began to quarrell with the Queene of England, pretending that shee had staied a great summe of money, which was sent by sea out of Spaine into the Lowe Countries, the which (said the Duke) did belong vnto the King of Spaine his master, whom she should intreat with all brotherly loue. Whereunto the Queene answered, that shee was duely informed, the said money did belong to certaine Merchants of Genoua, and hauing then occasion to vse it, shee would staie it for a time, and pay them reasonable interest. Despes Embassadour in England for the Catholike King, made great instance for this money, but he could get no other answer. Whereupon the Duke of Alba did presently arrest all the English merchants, with their shippes and goods that were at Antwerp, or within his gouernment. Whereupon all commerce was broken betwixt the king of Spaines subiects, and the English, who left the trade to Antwerp, and carried their goods to Hamborough. The Queene of England published a declaration of her proceeding in this businesse, complaining that the Duke of Alba had dealt vnjustly with her and her subiects; but all this could not procure any restitution for the English Merchants, who had letters of reprisall granted them against king Philips subiects, to recouer the losses which they had sustained by these arrests, both in Spaine and the Lowe Countries. The English Merchants became men of warre, and so many went to sea, some with a desire of gaine, and others with hope to recouer what they had lost, as not a shippe could passe betwixt Spaine and the Lowe Countries, to the ruine of many poore men: whereof great complaints came to the Court of Spaine. The Duke of Alba seeing what a breach he had made betwixt those two States, to the preiudice of his masters subiects, seeking to repaire the error which he had committed, he sent Christopher d'Assonville, a Counsellor of Estate, to the Queene of England to reconcile this quarrell, but shee refused to heare him, vnlesse he came from the king his master, and had letters of credit, signed with his owne hand: but coming from the Duke of Alba, her Maiestie sent him to treat with her Councill; which hee hauing no warrant to doe, returned without audience. Yet shee let him vnderstand, that although shee found her selfe much wronged, shee would not take Armes vnlesse the Duke of Alba began. The like shee wrote to the king of Spaine, complaining of the Duke of Albas presumption. Soone after, the Duke sent Chiapin Fiesli Marquis of Cetone, with some others, to demand the money, and to free all arrests of either side, but they effected not any thing: whereupon the Duke sold all the English mens goods that were vnder arrest. These were the seeds of warre betwixt the two Princes, which continued vnto their deaths, to the ruine of many of their subiects, especially Spaniards and Portugals.

The Princes of Germanie hearing what cruelties and spoiles the duke of Alba and his Spaniards committed in the Lowe Countries, they prest the Emperour Maximilian to deale in those matters, betwixt the king and his subiects there; yea to take knowledge thereof as Emperour: saying, that without doubt the Prouinces which are beyond the riuier of Elcaut, towards the East, were of the Imperiall Iurisdiction; as those that are on this side were of the soueraigntie of France. But the Emperour did not thinke it fit to vse his Imperiall authority, but prayers and intercessions. Whereupon he sent the Archduke Charles his brother into Spaine, vpon colour to aske the king of Spaines aduice for the marriage of his two daughters: and withall hee had giuen him ample instructions to treat with him touching the affaires of his Netherlands, and to intreat him by all faire meanes, to grant a generall pardon to his people there, and to call home the duke of Alba and his Spaniards, assuring him that in so doing, he should be obeyed: but if he did persist in that cruell persecution, they would be releued both with men and money from Germanie, the which he could not prevent.

The Archduke came to Genoua, where he imbarke in the duke of Sauoys gallies, and was receiued by the king of Spaine with great honour: his embassage was very pleasing touching that which concerned the mariages of his two neeces, for he found the king disposed to marrie the elder, the which had bin appointed for the vnfortunate Prince D. Charles his sonne. And as for the second, which the Emperour desired to match with the king of Portugall, who was yet very yong, hee had a promise from king Philip to imploy himselfe himselfe to haue the French king marrie her, although he had already demanded the other; and they were entered into treatie, by the means of the Cardinales of Guise and Espinosa. But as for the affaires of the Netherlands, the Archduke could not obtaine any thing in fauor of them that were banished, nor of the poore provinces afflicted. For making relation vnto him of the speeches held by the Princes Electors to the Emperour, and that they pretended he had a right of protection ouer those people, and that hee should make himselfe iudge of their quarrels, as depending of the Empire, it did much incense the king, who answered, that the Germanes were much deceived in their conceptions in that regard, and that he had sufficient right and power to shew that he was a soveraign Prince, and did not acknowledge any other superior on earth. He knew well that the duke of Alba had vsed some excessse, but he was wont to say, that he had rather loose all those Provinces, with others, than to haue rebellious subiects, especially in matters which concerned religion.

Nnnnn

1568

Thus the Archduke was dissuaded, having received a present of 100000 crownes, to helpe him to furnish his frontier places against the Turke, with many Jewels of price. And he had commission when hee came into Germanie, to doe the ceremonies of their contracting, in his name, with his future Spouse. Returning by Italie he did visit his sisters and neeces, the duchesses of Ferrara, Florence, and Mantoua, and then he came vnto the Emperour, to giue him an account of his negotiation with king Philip, whom hee had left engaged in a warre against the Moores of Granado, almost as difficult as that of the Netherlands.

We haue formerly made mention of the discontentes of the Moorish nation, dwelling in the mountaines, plaines, and valleys, and in some of the good townes in the countries of Granado and Murcia; which was by reason of the contempt they were in with the natural Spaniards, whom they call old Christians: among whom they liued in continual vexation, especially by the Clergie, and officers of the Inquisition, and also by them of the Iustice, which was not equally distributed vnto them. But that whereof they most complained, was the kings Edict, whereof we haue made mention, tending to alter their manners, their apprell, and their language: whereof the President D. Pedro de Defa was appointed to see the execution, with the assistance of the Gouernour Domingo Lope de Mendoza marquisse of Mondejar, and the aduice of the Auditors & Counsellors of the Chancery in the Parliament of Granado, and of the Archbishop if need were, wherein they found no small difficultie.

To begin therefore by gentleness, the President gaue charge to Alphonso de Horosco, Chanon of S. Sauior, which is a Collegiall Church in the quarter of Albayzin of the citie of Granado, being in a manner wholly inhabited by Moores, to persuaide them to receiue the Edict, yea to demand it themselves: but hauing imparted some copies vnto them, they rejected it, sending vnto the President and Gouernour, George de Basca Proctor general of that nation, and Francis Nagues Aluley a knight, one of the most ancient among them, to intreat them to deferre the publication of the Edict, vntill they had acquainted the king with their reasons, and the inconueniences that might growe by the execution thereof. But notwithstanding all their sayings and allegations, the Edict was proclaimed the first of Ianuarie, 1567; and to shew the diligence of officers, all the baths and hot-houses of the citie were instantly forbidden, and most of them beaten downe: yet they vsed some moderation, for that during the yeare 1567 there were not any penalties leuied of them that did infringe it. In the meane time they sent their deputies to Court, where by the means of some noble men, they procured audience of the Council, and there were some of opinion, that if they would haue the Edict stand in force, the execution should be suspended, as it became in the time of the Emperour Charles, and of his mother. The Cardinall of Espinosa was of another opinion, and brought all the rest to concurre with him; which was, that the Edict should bee speedily executed in all points, and the penalties exacted vpon them that should not obey. There was among the new Christians, some that were delcended of the blood of the ancient kings of the Moores, the which were honoured in Spaine, & well respected in Court; among which, D. Alphonso of Granado Venegas laboured by good perswasions to hinder this rash execution, Moore.

Causes of the rebellion of the Moors of Granado.

Causes of the rebellion of the Cardinall of Espinosa.

1568

A caution, but he was willed to desist, for such was the kings pleasure. So as all the Moores of the citie, townes and mountaines of Alpujarra, of the boroughs and villages towards the Sea, were brought to despair, apprehending this strange alteration, euen in their language & habites, which persuaied them that they were thereby reduced into seruitude, and confusion of their houses and families: for this nation is verie curious to keep remembrances and registers of their families as by a tradition of their ancestors, after the manner of the Arabians and Iewes. And then beganne to appeare the distrust they had of them, all the Moores hauing bene commanded by proclamation to keepe themselves within their dwellings and parishes, and for all them that were come out of the villages into the Albayzin to depart: the which was grievous vnto them, for that the inhabitants of that place being most Marchants and Artisans, they had need of many labourers and workemen for their ordinarie works, which they did vsually draw out of the Countrey, and of their owne nation. They saw that the marquisse of Mondejar had leuied 300 souldiers for the safetie (said he) of the towne, and to haue better assurance of the Moores residing there; if any one of them did owe any thing, he was presently subiect to arrest, and in like manner they that were cautions for any other, and by this means the prisons were full: The officers of iustice vnder colour of seeking for such as hauing no means to pay, were retired into the villages and mountains, they entered into the houses where they said they were hidden, & committed many insolencies, yea they fought out old aduersities, for the which the Moores had compounded with their parties, and drew them into new suites. Finally, as soone as they heard that this Edict was resolu'd in court, this nation was so basely respected by all the old Christians, both clergie and others, as euery man presumed to vex & oppress them, esteeming them no better than brut beasts; wherefore seeing themselves reduced to that miserable estate worse than if they had bin common slaues, & yet fearing worse, they concurred all in one mind to revolt. Those of the Albayzin who had more to loose, incited the rest to begin, & they expected means from them of the Albayzin, and counsel how they should behaue themselves, for they were men of vnderstanding, ciuill, and better experienced in the world, than the inhabitants of the mountaines, whereas the force lay, but they needed counsel: yea there did ordinarily couerle among them thieues, banished men, and such as were condemned by iustice, who desired nothing more than to see some disorderd sedition. There was a bold audacious Moore dwelling in the Albayzin, his name was Farrax Aben Farrax, a dier by his trade, yet he said he was descended from the Abenxaraces sometimes famous knights among the Granadians. This man was as a trumpet to stirre vp the rest, he went & came to the mountaines, townes & villages where the Moores dwelt, & carried them aduice and aduertisements, how they should gouerne themselves in a generall reuolt, which was intended the 1. of Ianuarie 1568, the same day that the citie of Granado had bin yeelded vp to the kings D. Ferdinand and D. Isabella, but being impatient to attend, he called before the time a troupe of souldiers disguised after the Turkish manner, & made them to enter into the Albayzin by certain places where the walls were low & full of holes, on Christmas eue at night, when making a great noise, he awaked them, shewing an ensigne displayed, intreating them to come with their armes into the street, for the time (said he) is come that we must shew our selues men of courage, for that there were a good number of Turks arrived in Alpujarra, which were come to liue with them out of Barbarie. This alarme did trouble all the other quarters of the town, for that they were in ieaalousie touching the execution of the Edict: for otherwise they had not bin moued, being no strange thing to heare a noise in the Albayzin, the Moores being accustomed to make all their sports with tumults. Notwithstanding all this, Farrax could not draw any one out of his house, they thinking he had beene drunke, but they cried to him out of their windows, that he should go sleep, and that they had nothing to do with his follies. This troupe of thieues had walked vp and downe all the night, and no man durst goe & view them. In the end Farrax led them to the place from whence they came, and they were not followed: the next day it was said they were thieues that were come to spoile. There were some informations taken, and there was an order made that there should be gardes throughout the citie, whereunto the Moores should contribute. The suspicion increasing, and some insolencies being done to them of this nation, they came vnto the Presi-

*Farrax Aben
Farrax first mo-tine of sedition.*

N a n n n j j

dent,

1568

dent, beseeching him not to suffer them to be outraged, protesting that they neuer had will nor thought to rebell, that there was no reason to intangle them with other mens crimes, with whom they had no intelligence, and for caution of the innocencie of the Inhabitants of the Albayzin they offered, if it pleased him, that 200 of the chiefe amongst them would yeeld themselves prisoners: the which being at the first refused, was afterwards accepted, when they had somewhat discouered that they were all conspired together, and that they had intelligence with the Turkes of Alger, by a packet which was surprised: where there was found a book and letters which discouered much of their practices.

Superstitious among the Moors.

Among these people there were certaine fantastike and frantike spirites, which perfected certain prophecies among the people, which they said were old, by the which they had a deliuerer promised them, who should deliuer them from the oppressions of the Christians, the which indeed were great and intollerable, to men whom they made belleeue were free, and that they enioyed the Lawes equally with others. This nation thus tired, superstitious by nature, and nothing instructed in the Christian religion, had a suddaine desire in this persecution to call backe Mahomet, and to abhorre the name of Iesu Christ, wherupon they fell into open rebellion against the King and his magistrates, and the first murders which they committed vpon the Christians, were certaine Clerks yong preachers, which came from Vlcir in the Alpuxarra, to Granado, to passe the holidays there, as they had vsually done euerie yeere, and passing by the villages, they made good cheere, vnder colour that they did belong to the Iustice. Of the which they dispatched some, and then they did set vpon a troupe of 50 souldiers of the garrison of Adra, who went also to Granado with the like insolenencies, whom they slue in a manner all. The Marquesse of Mondejar, who was gone to Court to aduertise the King of the estate of the affaires, returned with commaundment to suppress the rebellion by armes, and the goeternours, lords, knights, townes and comminalties thereabouts had charge to assid him. Wherefore hauing taken aduice of the magistrates of the royall Audience and others of the citie, and especially of the archbishop, hee prepared himselfe to set vpon them that were alreadie risen in confusion, and without order; but there being among them the abouenamed Farrax, one Dant, and Ferdinand of Cordoue, and De Valor, a knight of the Moores, who said that hee was of the royall race of Aben Humeia, descending from the prophet Mahomet, they assembled at Brenar in the Alpuxarra, to make election of a head, where after much contention, they did choose this Ferdinand, to whom hauing giuen the title of a King, he called himselfe Mulky Mahomet Aben Humeia. Farrax, who would gladly haue bene, and had in a manner promised it himselfe, could not attaine vnto it, but was content to be Alguazil maior, which is the second dignitie, like to that of Constable. This Aben Humeia was verie wel known in the city of Granado for his vanitie and other vices, which decreased not in this great aduancement. If we consider wel (by the report of such as had seene this war) the number of them that had rebelled, the expectation that infinite others would rebell, being of the same mind, if they had well managed the meanes which they had gathered together, as of Churches and Christians houses which they spoiled, the neerenesse of the kings of Fez and Marroc, and of the Turkes of Alger, together with the bad agreement which was betwixt the gouernours and the royall Iustice of Granado, and the neighbour prouinces, who contended without all reason, touching their manner of proceeding against these mutines, euerie one seeking to make vse of his office, and to fil his purse with so many goodly confiscations, & rich prizes which fell daily. Without doubt there was matters in this warre sufficient to haue ouerthrowne the Crowne of Spaine, if it had bene managed by men of more discretion and iudgement than Aben Humeia, and Farrax Aben Farrax.

Murders done by the Moors.

Aben Humeia made king of the Moors rebels.

It is not to be imagined what insolenencies they committed in the first furie of their raigne. They slew all Christians males aboue ten yerres old that they could get, especially clergie me, with all Iudges & officers of iustice, the womē & children they made slaues, they spoiled churches & fired them with most of the houses, yea their own: so as they made the boroughs & good villages inhabitable, & in a short time grew sauage, liuing among woods and rocks, where they made their retreat, being almost inaccessible, drawing their wiues and

1568

A and children after them, and abandoning them vpon any difficultie or let, without any feeling of loue or charitie. He might tearme himselfe happie among the Spaniards, who beeing surprized in his house by Aben Humeias men, did meet with some Moore of his acquaintance: and truly there were some, though very few, who moued with compassion, did hazard their lues to saue Christians, from whom they had receiued some pleasure, the which is not strange among reasonable creatures, seeing it is often seene among brut beasts. Farrax Aben Farrax hauing had charge to gather together the gold, silver, and mooueable goods which had bene abandoned to the spoyle, to make a stocke for the warre, and to buie armes in Barbarie (whereof they had great want) he committed for many insolenencies and thefts, as afterwards he was not employed in any businesse, neither durst he shew himselfe before king Aben Humeia, who hauing past like a violent stream, or rather a lightning by Locrin, Lanjaron, Orgiba, Pugneyra, Ferreya, Iubiles, Vxicar, and other places of the valley of Sierra Neuada, hee was confirmed king at Andarax, whereas he made Aben Zigu Alcaide or Captaine, and Michel de Roxas his father in law his Treasurer generall, and Hernando Caguer one of his Lieutenants or Marshals: it is hee who saued most of the Christians from laughter, and spared their goods in this warre. This tumultuarie king seeing himselfe followed, hee threatened the citie of Almerie, hee made Salobregna to wauer, with other maritime places, whither the mountaines and the valleys stretch, and in like manner all that coast which is vpon the declining of Sierra Vermeja, vnto Gibraltar and Maruela, so as in lesse than fiftene daies this mischeiferan C about fixtie leagues, and the law of Mahomet was openly profest among them. Then the Moors dwelling in the Albayzin at Granado were in extreme danger, there beeing a great garrison, and souldiers comming thither daily from all parts: and (that which moued the Granadins to choler and compassion) many men and women came naked thither, hauing escaped the cruell hands of the Moors, for in all places both champaigne and mountaines, the old and new Christians had their dwellings mingled, but the Moors were more in number, and stronger. The Moors about Salobregna contained themselves long, for that their feat was not strong, as within the mountaines, neither did they reuolt, but through the violence that was done them by the kings souldiers, and by his Lieutenants, who were most insolent and disobedient to their Commanders in all this D warre.

Salobregna and Motril are vpon the sea, where there growes much good wine, the riches of the inhabitants. In the citie of Almerie neere vnto them were aboue fixe hundred families of the Moors, who did not stirre, and were presented by the Gouernour: notwithstanding that, one Marc Ramir a Moore, with some other indiscreet men thereabouts sought to murder him. The Lords of villages, who had no houses of strength, did wisely to retire themselves, for wherfoeuer they were the weaker, they were set vpon and slaine: as it happened to D. John Zapate, who sought to make it good in the Church of Guejares de Fondon, where he was forced and burnt with 150. men.

The Marquesse of Mondejar, and he of Velez, raised either of them an armie, by order E from the Councell, and invaded the Moors, one by Granado, and the other by Basa, the Marquesse of Zenete bending towards the sea to Almerie. These two Commanders neuer ioyned during all this warre, although they came neere together vpon the declining of the mountaines that were betwixt them, which were in a manner plaine towards the West, for they were of very different humors; D. Lewis Fajardo marquesse of Velez was proud, ambitious, impatient of all superiouritie, and bloodie: and hee of Mondejar was milde and courteous, seeking rather to persuaide, than to force the rebels: the marquesse of Velez was suddaine in his exploits, he of Mondejar was staied, and did not aduance without great deliberation, and therefore he was taxed to be slowe, and to regard his owne priuate interest, for that he was Lord of many places in those mountaines, and other parts of the countrie, which were vnpopled by this warre, to the preiudice of his rights and reuenues. The first lodging his campe made beeing gone to field, was at Alendin, and from thence to Padul, which is the first borough of the valley of Locrin, hauing with him the nobility and the troupes of Granado and Andalusia: he of Velez, that of Murcia, Basa, and the neighbour places. In the absence of the marquesse of Mondejar the Earle of Teudilla his sonne commaunded in Granado for martiall matters, being lodged in the Alhambra, the Castle and royall Palace there. At Dureal a league from Padul Laurence d'Anila was lodged with the bands of seuen. Townes of the iurisdiction of Granado, and Gonsal d'Alcantara with a company of horse, making as it were the forward. They were charged in the night by a multitude of Moores, whereof Michel de Granado de Xaba was the chief, thinking to disorder them, but the souldiers made it good, and repulsed their enemies, of whom there were two hundred slaine, whereat Aben Humeia was in such a rage for this bad successe, as hee had a desire to cut off Xabas head. These two marquestes were not sole Commanders of the warre in that Countrey, for euerie Gouvernour or Capitaine of a place would make enterprises of his owne head, imparting nothing vnto them, nor attending their commaundements, for euerie man aimed at spoile. D. Garcia de Villaroel gouernour of Almerie went to field to surprize a troupe of Moores, which were assembled at Benahaduz, and threatned to besiege Almerie, whom he dispersed, and slue many of them, among other Braben Casis their capitaine. Therewas with D. Garcia, D. Alphonso Habis de Vanequa a Moore, of the bloud of the auncient kings of Granado, who had bene solicited by the rebells to be their King, the which hee refused, and persisted faithfully in the seruice of King Philip.

Dispositions of the marquesse of Mondejar, he of Velez, Generall against the Moors.

The marqueste of Mondejar passing on into Alpuxarra, tooke the pace of Tablado by force, a place of importance for the passage, being betwixt two mountaines, where hee built a bridge ouer a very deepe valley, the which being broken, or kept, they cannot go from the one to the other, but must fetch a compasse of foure great leagues. The gard of this bridge was committed to Pedro d'Arroio with certaine companies, and then the armie marched towards Orgiba, the which was abandoned by the Moores being amazed. Many women and children were freed, and they that had defended the Tower of that place seuentene dayes, where the Moores had giuen diuerse assaults, and reduced them to great want of victuals. There was the like deliuey of prisoners with the gaine of some booty made at Poqueira, where Aben Humeia had lodged with a great number of Moores, but they durst not stay. There they had newes that the garrison which they had left at Tablado had bene surprised and cut in peeces with their Capitaine, who was found yet panting amongst the dead, two daies after, whenas the marqueste recovered this passage againe, without the which they cannot come nor goe from the campe to Granado. D. Alphonso de Reynoso was left there to keepe a more carefull gard, and had expresse commandement to staie the souldiers which retired with their bootie without leaue: The greatest disorder which hindered this warre, was the disobedience of the new leuied souldiers to their Commanders, who longed still to be at home when they had gotten any spoile: and it was a hard matter to stay them, for they had no pay. The Moores in like manner were without discipline, being ignorant of warre, and nothing apt to armes, yea most of them were vnarmed, labourers, shepheards, and Artisans, who could cast stones, and handle slings well; their captaines were not much more skilfull in their charges and duties, but being once acquainted with the Turkes they recovered Crossbowes, and harquebuses, and did learne to vse them. Their greatest feare in Spaine was, that they should haue intelligence, with the Turkes of Alger, and the Moores of Barbarie their neighbours, the which they could not prevent. The marqueste of Mondejar pursuing Aben Humeia, hee brought his armie to Pitres de Ferreira, whereas Ferdinand Caguer made offer of an accord, and continued it vpon all occasions; for hee was the least desperate among all the Capraines of the Moores. At this place of Pitres, the Moores fought and slew many of the marquestes men, but they presently left the place, and retired to lubiles, whereas Aben Humeia committed great cruelties, euen vpon the Moores of that place, who did not sodainly satisfie his desire. There was an old castle which they had rampired, with an intent to make it a fort, and their store-houise for the warre, and had carried most of their spoiles thither, the which notwithstanding they could not defend: for although the greatest part of their forces were there, yet they had not the hearts to fight, and being to dislodge, they were readie, being pursued, to kill a great number of Christians, prisoners, of all ages, women and children, whose husbands and fathers they had slaine before, but some that had more humanitie hindred it, their retreat was to Vercheul.

Alphonso Habis de Vanequa a faithful Moore

Defeat and death of Pedro d'Arroio of the Moores.

A cheul. This miserable troupe of women and children came and presented themselves before the Marqueste, hideous, leane, bare, and halfe naked, praising God with teares for his comming and their deliuerance. The Moores which kept the castle fledde also; where they found three hundred men, and a thousand and fise hundred women, who were in like manner set at libertie: but it was vnhappy for many, yea for most of those poore women; for the campe being lodged; hauing placed most of those women in a Church, and such as could not enter being laid before it for that night, it happened that a disordered souldier comming about midnight among them, sought to take away a maiden to abuse her, who being staied and de'ended by the other women, one of them drew the souldiers sword and hurt him: this villaine leauing his hold, began to crie out to ames, saying, that there were Moores disguised and armed among those women which had hurt him in that manner, whereupon they came running in disorder, and without any further inquirie, discharged their peeces vpon these poore creatures, so as in a manner all they that were before the Church, were either slaine or sore hurt, those within it were preferred by the shutting of the doores: in the meane time the captaines came, and caused the massacre to cease. The truth of this fact being knowne, the marqueste was very much grieved, and caused many of these murdering souldiers to bee hanged; and then he sent the rest of the women and children with a conuoy to Granado, where they received them, and gaue them great almes. This pittifull spectacle increased their hatred against the Moores dwelling in the Albayzin, whom they distrusted much, for they were held to be ten thousand men able to beare armes; and therefore the Earle of Teudilla, to be better assured, lodged souldiers in their houses: whereof thinking to complain, they were sharply reprehended; so as they repented that they had not reuolted when as Farrax did sollicite them.

Whilest that the Marqueste of Mondejar employed himselfe vertuously, to chase the Moores and their king, who were in the mountaines and strong places of Alpuxarra, hee of Velez with such men as he had, gathered together in the territories of Valencia, Murcia, Baza, Lorca, and other neere places, entred into the realme of Granado, by Tauneras, hauing fise thousand foot and three hundred good horse, and came and charged a troupe of Moores, who had fortified themselves at Guecija, vnder a diuellish capitaine called Gorri: who, in viewe of the marqueste campe, caused many Christian men to be beheaded, whom he had kept prisoners, to expose them as a spectacle to them that should come first to assaile him, and then he disloded without fighting.

The Christian armie marching towards Filix to besiege it, they were preuented by D. Garcia de Villaroel gouernour of Almerie, who would haue the honour to free this place, presuming that the Moores which held it, would abandon it as soone as they should see him approach, thinking it to be the marqueste his foreward: but he was deceived, for hee found them ready to make head against him, being many; wherefore he retired with all speed to the marqueste his campe, to whom hee made his excuse, and gaue him to vnderstand, that among these Moores, there were Turkes come out of Barbarie to succour them: and then he gaue him a conuoy to returne vnto Almerie, from whence he might not long bee absent. The marqueste passing on, found the Moores which were come forth in battell, to encounter them which came to discouer them, and being come to fight, they found they were not those whom they fought, and knowing that it was the marqueste of Velez, who was a resolute man, and was called among them, Tiblis Arrazel Hadit, that is to say, a deuill with an iron head, their courage was somewhat quailed, yet they did fight, and did rallie themselves thrice together, but in the end they were forced to quit the place, and retire to the mountaines, hauing lost about seauen hundred men, and among them some women, which had fought desperately, three captaines, Fulcy, Tezi, and the sonne of Porto Carrero de Xergal, where two of his sisters, maidens, died also. On the marqueste de Velez side, there were both slaine and hurt, but they did not publish the number.

The sort of Filix by this retreat was wonne, where they found much good stuffe, gold, siluer, silkes, pearle, victualles, and a great number of women and children Moores;

Excess of a disordered souldier.

Moores of the Albayzin in great numbers.

Exploits of the Marqueste of Velez.

Intemity at Filix.

Moore, whom they had abandoned, wherewith the souldiers being enrich, they disbanded by troups to carrie their booties to their houses; wherefore the Marquesse was forced to retire to fortifie his armie. They of Guadix defeated a troupe of Moores at the same time at Deyre, most of which had come out of the Marquise of Zenete: they flue 400 men, and tooke about 1000 women & children, with great spoiles. The chief of this enterprise was Pedro Arias d'Avila, and they said it was one of the best exploits of all this warre.

King Aben Humeya being pursued by the marquesse of Mondejar, and was then at Vixar, a place situated in the middelt of Alpuxarra, the which he had fortified as an assured retreat, and had about him 6000 men; yet at the approach of the marquesse, this man who was neither valiant nor of any commaund, retired with his troups to Palerno. Fernand el Casquer continued still his practise of peace, so as he had conference with Jerome d'Apont and John Sanchez: And D. Alphonso de Granado Fenega, wrought so vpon the marquesse word and promise, as he drew Aben Humeya to a parle with him, but at the noise of some shot inconsiderately discharged, hee was so am'zed, and fell into such distrust, as he fled away, neither was it possible to bring him backe againe; and in this perturbation he slew his father in law Muibel de Roxas, and caused some other chiefe Moores to be slaine, saying that they would haue betrayed him: he put away his wife, and sware that he would not leaue one of the familie of Roxas aliue, the which did purchase him many enemies, and he blemished his reputation more, when he abandoned the fort of Palerno, and all that hee had, retiring into the most desert places of the mountaines. The marquesse being come to Palerno, he took the mother and sisters of the base king, with many other women of qualitie Moores, and set free a great number of Christians that were captiues, & from thence hee led his armie towards Andarax. That of the marquesse of Velez being somewhat repaired, was then at Olhane, nere vnto the other, where there were many Moores gathered together, whom hee did fight withall, and disperst: and it was thought that the two armies should haue ioyned, and that the marquesse of Velez should haue bene sole commaunder, whereunto hee did aspire, and the souldiers desired it, but either of them went his course. The marquesse of Mondejar returned to Vixar. One of the goodliest booties of this warre, fell into the hands of D. Garcia de Villaroel, and of D. Francisco de Cordoba, being ioyned with the forces of Almerie, and others whom they led against the Moores, who had fortified at Inox, in rocks that were almost inaccessible: for hauing dislodged them they found to the value of about 500000 crownes: but the diuision of this prey bred great dissention among them.

Profit was the matter they chiefly aynted at that went to this warre, except the Marquesse of Mondejar, who tended to peace, and to saue the Moores that were reuolted, soliciting them rather to acknowledge their faults, and to shew themselves wortheie of pardon, than to ruine them by armes, and therefore hee was not pleasing to the souldiers. Hauing led his armie to Guajares of the iurisdiction of Salobregna, whither many Moores had retired themselves, and fortified among the rocks and precipices (which were they that first receiued the Turks and Moores that came to succour them out of Barbary) hee sent to discouer them, but to their losse that went, being in a manner all slaine; those of Almerie and qualitie were Lewis Ponce de Leon, Augustin Fenegas, Gonsaluo de Ornunga, the visitor Ronquillo and John de Villaroel: being charged, the next day they made great resistance, but at night they retired, leaving their old men in that lodging, with many women and children, whom the marquesse (being incensed with the losse he had the day before) caused to be slaine in his presence, contrary to his manner. The rocks, woods, & caues (being vnfurnished of all prouision for victualles) were no fit places to entertaine great numbers of Moores, who had such great troups of women, children & slaues with them, as if they had bin prest by arms, hunger & cold, with other necessities, would haue forced them often to haue changed their lodgings; & they that came out of Barbary might easily foresee, that the end of their reuolt must needs be death or captiuitie: seeing they had no means to prouide better retreats to keepe their goods, wiues, & children, nor any good fort nere vnto the sea, with victuals and artillery to maintaine a siege at all euents, and in the meane time to refresh themselves there, & to retire such as were wounded, & to repaire themselves

Aben Humeya
kills his father in law and other Moores.

bootie taken from the Moores

Defeat of Christians.

Cruelty of the marquesse of Mondejar.

A thesclues after any losse: war is maintained by this means, & when there is question of any accord, it is concluded with better condicions. These defects being knowne, was the cause that the succours which they had fro Africk, being al volitaries, were weak & came slowly: & they that came once to see it, were soon distastd, & being once returned came no more, & dissuaded others. Finally, there appeared no other end in this nation, of their reuolt, but to powre forth their malice in reuenging themselves most cruelly vpon the Christians which they met, for the wrongs and injuries which they had receiued, killing, burning, and murthering without iudgement or foresight of that which might happen, and then they died content, without either loue, or natural affection to their wiues and small children, whom they made to trot after them like beasts, and vpon the least crosse they did abandon them without griefe. This warre had continued three moneths, when as king Philip by some good inspiration considering the desolation of the countrie, and the innocencie of many small infants which could not distinguish the right hand from the left, he made a declaration, that his meaning was not that men children vnder tenne yeares old, and women vnder eleuen should be reputed slaues, commanding them to receiue all Moores that would submit themselves to his mercie, and forbidding them to offer any violence to those that had contained themselves in peace. By these means many being forced by hunger and other discommodities, submitted themselves; who being inioyned to deliuer vp their armes, they brought old crosse-bowes, halpe pikes, and such like weapons, broken, and of no vse: and when they demanded where there other armes were, which they vsed in encounters, they said that the strangers, and such as would not submit themselves had taken them away. Notwithstanding these good orders set downe by the king, the souldiers being insolent and couctous, did them infinit mischeifs, carrying many away, especially women: not onely out of villages, but of those which they found in the citie, euen in view of the magistrates, the which all men of honour blamed and detested, yea many strangers which frequented in the citie of Granado, for the commerce, said, that it would be a hard matter for Spaniards to make the Moores good Christians, seeing they shewed in their adions, that they were not to themselves, and that there was more inhumanitie in their behauiours, than in the most barbarous Pirats of Africke.

D Aben Humeya hauing taken some breath, resolved to continue the warre, sending to intreat Pluceryaly to giue him some succours. In the meane time, hee and Fernand Casquer came sometimes in the night to solace themselves with them that were reduced, and who had safegards to remaine in their houses; whereof the marquesse being aduertised, he meant to haue them watch and taken: but they had some notice thereof, and stood vpon their guards. They did foresee that the Spring being come, the warre would bee more difficult, both for that the Moore should find themselves lesse incommodated in their holes and savage retreats, as also for that the sea would be more nautigable, and easie to passe the Moores and Turkes out of Barbarie, which prepared to come to their succours; wherefore the marquesse of Mondejar sent D. Alphonso de Granado Fenegas to Court, to acquaint the king with the estate of those affaires, and to tell him what prouisions he thought necessarie to end those warres; and that if it pleased his Maiestie to come vnto Granado; it may be it would be of more force than any other thing, and that howsoeuer, hee must cause the sea to be kept, and the passage to bee stoppt. The king thinking that his presence was not so necessarie, was counselled to send D. John of Austria his brother thither, the respect of whom would make the Commanders agree better. The which being concluded, commaundement was given to D. Lewis de Requesens great Commaunder of Castille, who was then Embassador at Rome for king Philip, being also Lieutenant at sea vnder D. John, that hee should come with the galleys into Spaine, and bring with him the regiment of old souldiers which were at Naples; that being ioyned with D. Sancho de Luna, hee might stoppe the passage of the Turkes and Moores which came out of Barbarie.

As soone as it was knowne at Granado, and in the countrie where the warre was, that D. John of Austria was appointed lieutenant for the king there, all the captains of towns & castles, & those that were in the armies, with their souldiers, fought to make worke for D.

Moore's vnasurall.

Pardon for the Moores' proclaimed.

Insolence of the king's souldiers.

John

1568

Disobedience and insurrections of Christian souldiers.Defeat of Christians.

John, committing all excess, by spoiling, ransacking, and murdering: for they thought that D. John would have better discipline observed in the armies. D. Aluar Flores, and Antonie d. Aila of Madrid, vnder colour of going to surpris Aben Humeya at Valor, whither they said he should come in the night to a certaine marriage, they spoiled all the places where they pass, notwithstanding that the Moores which inhabited them had safeguards, and made them the best chere they could. Being come to Valor, they found not Aben Humeya, but they did ransome all the Moores of that place, notwithstanding that they had submitted themselves to the kings obedience, carrying away their wives and children as slaves, in contempt of the Kings Proclamation. In their returne they were charged and defeated, and the prisoners rescued. There were lost about a thousand souldiers with their captaines, whereof the Moores sent to make great excuses to the marquisse of Mondejar, offering to yeeld vp the armes which they had taken: the marquisse answered them, that they had done well, and that they should doe so to all them that should offer them violence, against his Maiesties protection and safeguard. Diego Casca a choericke captaine, being incited that they of Turon had slaine eleven of his souldiers which had gone forth to steale, led his companie thither to disarme them, and to be revenged: searching in a dake caue of a house, where there were certaine Moores hidden, he was slaine; whereupon his souldiers spoiled and set fire of the borough, slue a hundred and twentie Moores, and carried away the women. A Curat of Tortijos being grieued to see the Moores of the mountaine of Filabres live in peace, for they had not requited, helde certaine leud persons with him, who surprizing them on a suddaine, spoiled them: others did the like at Bayarca, and at Picna, whereas they slue three of the marqueses guards, being sent thither to prelerue them: but as they retired, carrying away many women and children, and much cattell, the Moores which had elcaped, and had giuen the alarme to their neighbours, cross them in their waies and slue them all.

At Granado harred did to transport some of the Iustice, as they suffered the prisoners in the gaole to be armed, to kill the Moores of the Albayzin, who had put themselves into prison, as hostages in the beginning of the troubles, as wee haue said, to whom they carried swords and other weapons secretly in the night, and bruted it abroad that Aben Humeya had intelligence, with the Moores of the Albayzin, to surpris the citie: and afterwards in the night they cried to armes, for that towards Sierra Neuada, they had seen a fire, to answer a signe which had bene giuen out of some house of the Albayzin: whether it were true or not, the people ranne to the prisons, where finding the Christian prisoners armed, and in fight with the Moores, who had no armes, ioyning with them they slue a hundred and tenne, which were of the chiefe and richest Moores of the citie: yet they durst not set vpon the Albayzin, for that in euery house there were souldiers lodged, which were not of that partie. It was said, that some of them that were murdered, were found circumeiled, which made the Atturney generall demand confiscation of their goods, whereby their wives and children were deprived. It was thought for certaine that this excess had bene committed by the instigation of the superiours. A good part of the Alpuxarres was in a manner pacified, but the captaines of the garisons which were there, and in other neighbour places, as at Almerie, Salobregna, and such like forts, governing themselves, as hath bene said, committed such cruelties and thefts indifferently vpon the one and the other, attending the coming of D. John of Austria, as they that had laid aside armes, and submitted themselves, revolted againe, and ioyned with Aben Humeya, who became so strong and glorious, as hee bragd that he would not onely defend the mountaines, but also besiege the citie of Granado.

D. John d. Austria made his entrie the sixt of April, 1569, being accompanied by the marquisse of Mondejar, by D. John de Carmaial, D. Tello Gonsal d. Aguilar, Gonsalo Chacon, the Earle of Miranda, with many other noble men and knights: the marquisse of Velez would not bee there. Before his lodging there presented themselves about foure hundred women, widows, and many poore orphans, Christians, which had bene in the Moores hands, crying and lamenting in most miserable manner, and demanding iustice and reuenge for their fathers and husbands which had bene murdered, so as they could hardly make them retire; but it was done of purpose. The Moores dwelling in the

1569
D. John de Austria comes to Granada.

1568

Counsellors about D. John of Austria.

Advice of the Marquisse of Mondejar.

Advice of the President Desja.

Defeat of Christians.

Captaines and Counsellors to the Moorish king.

A in the Albayzin deputed some vnto him, to make their innocency knowne, and yet they were ill intreated; but especially, they made great complaint of the massacre committed of their kinsmen in the prisons, as it were in the kings bosome, into the which they had willingly put themselves. D. John heard them, and made shew that this act displeased him, comforting and assuring them. He had a Councell appointed him, whereof were the Duke of Sessa, the marquisse of Mondejar, D. Lewis de Quijada President of the Councell of the Indies, D. Pedro de Desja President of the royall Audiencie of Granado, and the Archbishop of Granado, in cases of conscience: all these resolved how they should proceed in this warre. The marquisse of Mondejar persisting in his opinion, said, that they must drawe the Moores to the Christian religion by instruction and good examples, and to the Kings obedience in doing them iustice, and that they should end the warre by some good accord: hee held it fit they should drawe them out of the mountaines, and places of strength, and giue them dwellings in the champane countrie; or if they left them in their ancient habitations, they should place good garisons there at their charge. The President Desja said, that first of all they should cleanse the citie of Granado of the Moorish nation, and to lend them with their families to dwell farther off; to the end they should not aide the rebels, as they had done secretly, with armes, counsell, and other things, and that they should take exemplarie punishment of some that had slaine Christians, and spoiled Churches, and begin first with the inhabitants of Albu-nuela, a place from whence the Moores were releued, with victuals and other commodities. Most were of opinion, that they should continue the warres, and that occasions would giue them necessaerie and fit aduice. There were three regiments leuied vnder Antonio Moreno, Hernand de Oranna, and Francis de Mendoza of Alcalá de Henares. There was order taken also for the government of the townes and forts, by new Election, or confirmation of those that were in charge, all being commanded to containe their souldiers, and to obey the ordinances vpon great paines. The marquisse of Velez, who was not come to D. John, sent him a note what he had done in his diuision, and what hee thought remained to be done: hee had staied with his armie at Terques, and had a designe to march toward Andarax, but D. John sent a Post to stay him. He had begunne a fort at Rauaha, the which was ouerthrowne by the Moores, who slue

D. him, a hundred and threescore souldiers, and tooke an Ensigne, whereas D. John was very much discontented. Aben Humeya was aduertised of all the consultations and resolutions which were taken at Granado, by them of the Albayzin, and accordingly made provision for the warre, and for those places which hee had an intent to defend. Hee also made three regiments vnder Hanon de Cucujar, Fuete de Lantera, and Zerza de Cular, Captaines Moores. Hee made his store-house for the warre at Origiba, hee appointed a market at Vixar of Albereta, whither they did bring victuals and marchandise, and marchants came from Tetuan in the realme of Fez, to sell armes and other commodities. He made Rio d. Almanfora Gouvernour of that Quarter which ioyned vpon the Marquisate of Zenete, and Ierome Malech of the frontier of Quadix and Bafa. At Poqueira and Ferreira Diego Lopes Aben Aboq, vpon the frontier of Origiba Michel de Oranado Xaba, on the iurisdiction of Luxar and Marchena Sierra de Filabres Gidoi, and of the frontier of Almerie Aben Mcguennui was gouernour, in the valley of Locrin, and the frontier of Almunexar, Salobregna and Motril, he placed Gironcillo and Rendal for gouernours: to all which hee gaue Letters Patents signed by himselfe, and with a royall seale. There were of his priuie Councell, Don Ferdinand el Caguer, Dalay Moxarras, Calderon of Vixar, and Hernand Habagui: Farrax Aben Farrax was in disgrace, and came no more in the Kings Presence, who had threatned to haue him hanged as a theife.

F Besides these provisions, Aben Humeya did hope to bee fortified by the Xeriffe Abdalla king of Maroc and Fez, and by Fluchaly gouernour of Algier, whom he did sollicite and intreat, making them great promises, and assuring him that hee should bee succoured by the great Turkes armie, which charge Fluchaly had taken vpon him. Hee beganne the warre against Don John by the taking of Peca, whither hee ledde siue thousand men, but hee could not take the Castle: and there were

1569

Shipwracke of the great Commanders fleet.Defeat of Moors.Armie of Aben
Humeia defeated.Pegnon of Fregi- liana taken by the great commander.

were many light skirmishes made on either side. The great Commander who had charged to bring the galleies, and the regiment of Naples into Spaine, had drawne together 24 galleies, in the port of Genoua, with some other vessels, & went to sea in a doubtful time, contrary to the aduice of the Mariners; for that (said he) they had need of him in Spaine: but he was no sooner at sea, but hee was ouertaken with so furious a tempest, as some of his vessels perished with their burdens, and the rest were so dispersed, some into Sardyria, some into Sicilie, and some else-where, as all that preparation prooued vnprofitable. The great Commander was by chance cast vpon the Island of Maiorca, and so he past from Palamos into Cattelogne, so as the passage was open for some daies out of Barbarie into Spaine.

The mountaine of Bentonis is in the countrie of Veles Malaga, vpon the sea towards the South, a countrie fertill in wines, which they transport into England, and Flanders, by which traffike the inhabitants were rich: most of which had their beginning from Moores, and they did reckon 22. Burroughs well peopled and inhabited: the which had no tribute, vnill that vpon certaine reports the officers of Iustice began to vex them, saying, that they were aduertised they had commerce and intelligence with Aben Humeia: Canilles of Azeztunis is in this countrie, a strong place and of importance, belonging vnto the Marquesse of Comare, and there is a certaine Rocke, called Fregiliana the old, whither a good number of Moores were retired, and had there fortified themselves: whom Aurelio de Caxo de Veles would go and assaile, but he was repulst with the losse of most of his men.

The Marquesse of Velez beeing at Verja in the country of Almerie with a good strong armie, Aben Humeia who had ten thousand men, and among them some Turkes, came and charged him couragiously, and forced the first gards and lodging of his campe, putting all into disorder: the which was repaired by the diligence of souldiers well disciplined, who recovered their places of armes, and repulst this violence of the Moores valiantly, killing about a thousand and five hundred as they retired in disorder. There were among the Turkes of Aben Humeia armie, many which carried garlands of flowers vpon their heads, saying, that they were sent thither to reuenge Mahomets Martyrs.

The Marquesse had about twelve thousand fighting men, and being lodged at Adra, he had commandement to enter into Alpujarra, where hee came to fight with the Moores at Vxicar, and then he charged Aben Humeia at Valot, who was not much weaker in number then he, yet he was put to rout; but the Marquesse was presently forced to retire: for the mischiefe was, that as loone as the souldiers had taken any spoyle, they stole away to carrie it to their houses. Through this disorder there remained not three thousand men in his campe. D. Antonie de Luna sackt Albuuella, according to the aduice of the President D. Pedro de Deza, where he made a great spoyle of goods, and tooke about a thousand and five hundred prisoners. According to the auncient custome, the kings of Spaine should haue the fift of all the spoyles, but they made him bad reckonings. The commander of Castille came in the end to the road of Velez Malaga, with such Spanish foot as he could bring out of Italie, and did presently inuest Pegnon de Fregiliana: there were some good Captaines with him, D. Pedro and D. Martin de Padilla, D. John de Cardenas brother to the Earle of Miranda, D. Pedro de Zuniga, with others. The Moores which were lodged there, in a manner without armes, defended themselves notwithstanding couragiously, and at the first assault slue Pedro de Sandoval, and foure hundred souldiers, and wounded double the number: but the Spaniards continuing their assaults with great obstinacie, in the end they forced it, and of foure thousand Moores that were within the place, there were neere two thousand slaine, the rest escaped, casting themselves desperately downe the rockes, and many women with them, leaping downe the precipices like goates, hauing their infants tied at their backs. There were women slaine in these combats which made head against the assaillants as couragiously as if they had bene old souldiers. There was also found within the fort three thousand foules, old men, women, and children, with much cattel, and great store of bootie.

The riuer of Almanfora is also a good and fertill countrie, but the Moores which dwelt there had not rebelled, vnill that they were forced by the insolvency of the souldiers,

who

with sought nothing else but to make them disobedient, by some opposition of defence, against their insolencies and villaines.

This riuer takes its beginning from a fountain called Fuen Caliente; and falls into the Sea a league from Vera: Veles Rubio and Veles Blanco are in this Countrie, which is great, and hath many habitations bordering vpon Baza, on the North side, it hath the Sea vpon the South, full of old Castles and strong by situation. There entered into this Countrie in Iune foure thousand Moores, of the rebels, to counteruance them that would reuolt, and to root out the rest. First they came to Porcenia, where they found not any Christians of the inhabitants, for being aduertised by a certaine Priest, they were fled away.

Jerome Malache and Hipin of Gucliar assailed the Castle of Seron, which did belong to the Marquesse of Villena; this place, that of Oria, and las Cuevas had held good, all the rest being reuolted. Seron being beseged, D. Antonie Henriquez, brother to the Lord of that place, attempted to relieve it with five hundred foot, and sixtie horse, but hee was chased away, lost two hundred men vpon the place, and layed in rout. In this charge the Moores got great store of armes, whereof they had good need. Diego de Aluarez, who was Captaine of the place went forth to seeke succours, but he was taken, the which being knowne to the beseged, they yielded to the Moores, who slue one hundred and sixtie men that were within it, and made eightie women slaves. D. John de Austria furnished Velez and Oria, and gaue the charge to D. John de Hita. And for that they were out of doubt, that the Moores which inhabited in the Albayzin, and other parts of the cite, gaue intelligence to them that made warre in the Alpujarres and other places, they put them out of the Towne the three and twentieth of Iune. All were gathered together in the royall Hospitall, which is a great building, made by Querio Huellos of Castille without the cite, and there a Register was taken of their houses & goods, which they left to their great grief, for they were very well lodged, being men of means; and they were dispersed into Andalusia: the which bred a great confusion in their affaires. Aben Humeia came neere vnto Almerie threatening to bessege it, he made many skirmishes about it, & towards Sabobregna; but he had not one peece of Ordnance. Hee wrote vnto D. John de Austria, intreating him to send him his father & his brother who were prisoners in Granada, and in a manner threatening him, but he did not much regard it.

To hasten the Turkes succours, without the which no enterprise could succeed well; hee sent Ferdinand Habaqui to Alger, whereas Vincially made a proclamation, that all men that would might goe freely to this warre, and many presenting themselves, hee staied them to carrie them to Tunis. Yet hee pardoned all malefactors and banished men: and of this sort of people Habaqui ledde foure hundred Marquezuers with him, vnder the command of a Turke called Hossein; and of a brother of his, who imbarked in eight foists laden with munition and armes. Hossein who was an aduancing souldier, cunning, and politike, visited the riuers of Almanfora, and of Almodar, Sierra Filabres, and all the Alpujarres; hee found meanes also to enter into the Cite of Granada, hee was at Guadix and at Baza without discourie, and then returned into Barbarie, laden with presents: for hee promised to goe to Constantinople, to make report vnto his Lord what hee had seene of the oppressions and miseries of the Moores in Spaine. Aben Humeia had a designe vpon the towne of Vera; being commodious for the Turkes descent, but it was releued by them of Baza; He ouerranne the Countrie, burnt Cuevas, and spoiled the gardens of the Marquesse of Velez Lord of that place, hauing about ten thousand men in his traine. But while the doth these exploits with more presumption and vanitie to his own then hurt to the enemy, seeking his pleasures without respect of person, letting them know that his will was a Lawe, certaine Captaines were offended therewith, whereof hee that was most incensed was Diego Aluarez, whose cousin Aben Humeia held by force for his Concubine, both hee and the rest calling to minde the manie cruelties which hee had committed, namely the murder of Michel Bazar, his father in law, of Raphae Ardos, and other Moores of name: whereupon they conspired to kill him and 1569 Insolency of the Spaniards

O o o o o

makes the Moors reuolt.Saw taken by the Moores.Moors put out of Granada.Turkes comes to succour the Moors in Spaine.

1569 and to doe it with more colour; they published certain letters which hee had written to D. Alfonso de Granada, and other negotiators of a peace, the which they had kept and opened, accusing him that hee would abandon the Moores, and betray them. They did also counterfeit a letter in his name, directed to Aben Aboo, commanding him to kill the Captaine of the Turkes, that were come out of Barbarie to his succours. Upon certaine counteifair reasons they shewed this letter unto the Turkes, whereat Aben Aboo was amazed, who thought verily that hee had written them, whereat the whole company being incensed, they went to Andarax (where hee was with his Cohobine, who was acquainted with this plot :) there they tooke him, and strangled him, publishing it in an assemblée of the Captaines: the causes of this execution, the which they disguised in such sort, as it was allowed by them, choosin in his place Diego Lopez Aben Aboo: to raigne over them, a truell man, but hee had more iudgement and gouernment than the other, so as D. John de Austria had more cause to thinke seriously of the affaires of the war.

Death of King
Aben Humais.Aben Aboo chosen king of the Moorish.

Hee gaue the charge of the Riuer of Almerie, Bolodui, Almanfora, Sierra de Bafa, and Filabres, and of the Marquisate of Zenete to Almeide and to Xoabi; and Sierra Neuada, the land of Velez, the Alpuxarres; and the Valley of Montejo of Granado, to Haciend de Guejar. Hee sent presents to Vincialy, and to the Mosti of Constantinople, to keepe him in grace with the great Turke, and to bee a meanes for some succours: he made a regiment of foure thousand men for his gard, whereof a thousand should be alwaies in gard. At his election hee found tenne thousand men in the armie, and among them six hundred Turkes.

The Marquesse of Mondejar at that time left the affaires of Granado, & went to Valencia, where he was appointed viceroy, in which charge he continued not long, but past to Naples to gouern there with like dignitie. The duke of Seffe was chief of the army which the marquesse was wont to lead, who releued the Garrison of Origba, which Aben Aboo the new king besieged; and kept the pace of Lanzaron, where there was a great skirmish, the which continued long, through the Turkes valour, in the which there were many slaine of either part. Origba was abandoned by the commandement of D. John, who sent the Captaine of that place with his men to Morrill.

In the Dukes armie, there were many Noble men of name, as Pagan Doris, brother to John Andrew, D. Gabriel, and Lewis de Cordona, D. Lewis de Cardone, and others, which armie was appointed to clesse the Alpuxarra. In the other part whereas the marquesse of Velez made warre, D. John would command in person, hauing Malch and Xoabi to make head against him. In these Christian armie there were certaine courageous Monkes marching in the head of the troupes, who held a Crucifex in one hand and a naked sword in the other.

Galere taken by the Moors.

Moors defeated.

The Moores attempted Galere, a strong place of situation, belonging to Enrique, a league from Guejar, and tooke it. They went to besiege Oria, but they of Locca their neighbours (who were alwaies good souldiers) came thither, three foure hundred Moores, raised the sege, and carried away five Ensignes. Malch march with the bodie of his armie by the riuer of Almanfora, D. John led his by that of Xenit: this Riuer runnes by Puillor, and enters into an other called Aguasblancas, which together passing by the village of Cene, runne towards Granado; and betwixt these two riuers is the Mountaine of Guejar, one of the descents of Sierra Neuada, in the which there kept about foure thousand Moores vnder the Captaines Xoabi, Chocancillo, Macoxi, and Maxinar, who ranne euen to the gates of Granado: D. John made them dislodge and retire farther into the mountaines of Sierra Neuada.

Farrax Aben
Farrax, his miserable estate.

Farrax Aben Farrax was among the Moores that were at Guejar, in poore and miserable estate, of whose aduentures it is fit to make some little mention. Being in disgrace with king Aben Humais, and put from all affaires, his miserie had brought him to that despair, as hee was ready to yeeld himselfe to the Marquesse of Mondejar, who without doubt had put him to an exemplarie death: being in suspence, and hauing changed his minde, hee thoughte it better to yeeld himselfe vnto the Inquisition, thinking that making his accustomed submissions, he should haue his life saved at the least. There was a Moore

1569

Moore with him which had bene his companion in the art of dying; to whom hauing imparted this his designe, exhorting him to doe the like (for hee was no lesse culpable than he) he liked well of it, and was content to go before to treat with them of the Inquisition for them both. Farrax hauing instructed him, being to depart that night, and therefore they were retired into a valley couered with wood to keepe their businesse more secret, after that he had discoursed long, & reiterated his instructions to this Moor, he fel a sleep in the wood, the other seeing him fast, thought that he should make his peace better if hee slue him, and being resolu'd, hee tooke a great stone wherewith he gaue him so many blowes vpon the head, face, and bodie, as hee left him for dead, and then he went as it is to bee coniectured to Granado.

Farrax being thus pittifully handled, remained two daies neither dead nor aliue in that Vallie, whereas two Moores passing by, found him, whilest hee yet breathed, and not knowing what hee was, but onely finding that hee was a Moore, they laied him for pittie sake vpon one of their horses, and carried him to Guejar, where hee was lookt vnto and cured; but hee remained so disfigured as his visage had force any shape of a mans, and in this estate hee followed the troupes, liuing of almes, being known of few men. This was the reward of the chiefe authour of the Moores rebellion.

Returning to Aben Aboo: he had a intent to gather the Oliues vpon the riuer of Boldui, hauing sent a number of Moorish women thither, with a gard of eight hundred fouldiers; but they were no good gardians, for being charged by the Marquesse of Velez, they fled with the losse of two hundred of their men, slain vpon the place, and all their women were taken. Guejar was also relieued by the Marquesse, who slue about fiftie hundred of the Moors. Winter brought many difcommodities both to the one and the other, yet the Marquesse of Velez held Galeres alwaies inuested; but seeing in the Spring that D. John would come and besiege it himselfe, he retired: for he was so ambitious as he would haue the honor of euerie thing that was done where he was. The body of D. Johns armie which was intred against the fort of Galere, was made at Guejar, D. John being at Bafa, which is 7 leagues off, where he prouided for all things necessarie. Galere was but a borough without any wall, but seated among rocks which couered it, being enuioured with deep precipices, the which the Moors by traucerses and barracades had made in a maner impenetrable, and in these deep bottomes the riuer ran, whereas they of the Borough were forced to fetch their water; and to the end they might goe thither without danger, the Moores had made a way like a wall, and by this meanes they did water safely. There were three thousand Moores and Turkes to defend this fort. The church without the borough had a high Tower, which serued them both for a watch and a Citadell. D. John brought his armie thither, and hauing made there batteries, he presently took this church by one of them. But when he came to the Borough, there was great difficultie to batter it, by reason of the rocks which did couer it. It was so well defended, as the Spaniards were many times out of hope to take it: but obstinacy staid them, and made them to continue their assaults furiously, so as in the end they took it by force, being fauoured by three mines, which plaid happily to the great losse of the besieged, who abandoned the place, & sought to escape by the rocks and precipices; there were 2400 Moores and Turkes slaine, and a great booty taken of gold, siluer, and other mouables, with great store of come. There were many women Moores found there, but for that the Souldiers lingered after them, D. John caused them all to be slaine in his presence. There were 4500 Christian women and Children set at libertie, as well those of the Borough, as others which they had brought from Oria, Castileije & other places thereabouts: This victorie was dearly bought, for D. John of Austria lost many men, but the number is not specified; but of captaines and men of mark, there were slaine at sundry assaults, Martin de Lorite, John de Magueda, Baltazar de Aranda, Alfonso Beltran; Charles and Frederike of Antillon, D. John d' Castillo, D. Anthony d' Gouzman, Abarca and others. Of wounded were Pedro d' Padilla, Pagan Doris, the Marquesse of Fauara, D. Lewis Henriquez, D. Lewis d' Auila, D. Pedro de Sotomator, D. Diego Vazquez de Atugna, Bernardin of Quixada, with many Lieutenants and Ensignes. This place being wonne, D. John sent to view Seron, but hee lost about five hundred men. D. Lope de Figueroa master of the Campe, was charged in another

Defeat of
Moors.

Galere besieged and taken.

Women Moors massacred.Spaniards of accomplishing at Galere by the Moors.

O o o o i j. place

place by fixe thousand Moores, led by Habaqui and Malech, who got armes to arme aboute G a thousand men. Lewis de Quixada was wounded there, whereof hee dyed soone after: D. John had a shot on his Caske: but it was of good prooffe.

1570

The duke of Sesse's armie entered the Alpuxarres, in March one thousand five hundred and seuentie, by Padal, to goe vnto Orgiba. The Moores chiefe strength was at Andarax with their king Aben Aboo, who had set good gards at Lanjaron, and in the West quarter were Rendal and Macox, two Captaines, with foure thousand Moors. The duke had diuers skirmishes about Lanjaron, which the Moores held, but in the end they abandoned it. After which hee led his army to Albacete of Orgiba. In these encounters there was a Turkish Harquebuse taken, the Canon whereof was ten spannes long, carrying a bullet which H weighed an ounce and an halfe.

The Moores which were in the Castle of Velez of Benandalla seeing themselves inuested by the Dukes armie, they corrupted some Souldiers of his campe, who suffered them to escape with their women and what else they could carrie away. But being in a place of safetie, they returned vnto the passages betwixt Velez and the campe, where they spoiled and slue many passengers, and so recompensed themselves largely of their losses. The fort of Lontegi was also taken from them, but some troups going from Aben Aboos campe, charged a conuoy which came to the dukes campe, and carried away many beasts with their burthens, and had made spoile of all, if they had not been relieved in time.

Conuoy defeated by the Moores.

The two armies coasted one another for a time amidst these mountaines, skirmishing vnto Campuxan, the Moores bending towards Sabiles, and the duke to Portillo and Vixiar. The duke had in his Campe about eight thousand men, Aben Aboo had twelue thousand. The duke to discharge his armie of many vnprofitable mouths, as souldiers that were hurt, whome hee sent to Guadix to be cured, with some women and children, whome hee had rescued from the Moores, and a good number of Moores prisoners, sent away the Marquesse of Faura, with a thousand foot, and one hundred horse to gard them, and to bring backe certaine horses, and mules laden with victuals to the campe: but the Marquesse fell into an ambush which K Pisani and Martel de Zenete Captaines among the Moores had laied for him, where hee lost all his baggage, and eight hundred of his souldiers, the which fell out vnappily, for the dukes armie was in some extremitie for want of victuals, and therefore sought to passe to Adra, being alwaies coasted by the Moores, who began to growe souldiers vnder this new king. D. John of Austria had better successe: for he fought with Habaqui, who was come with seuen thousand Moores to raise him from Seron, and defeated him. At that time Ierome Malech one of their best captaines died of sickness. Throgh the fauor of this victorie D. John took Seron and Tyole; he chased the Moores from Porchena, and then marcht towards Andarax, to seeke out the Moors king with their armie: beuixt these two armies there were many skirmishes with diuers euent.

Christians defeated by the Moores.

Moores defeated by D. John.

In the meane time king Philip came vnto Cordoua, being very desirous to haue this warre ended in one sort or other: for hee was aduertised that the Turke had great designs vpon Italie, and for this cause had broken the peace with the Venetians, the king being solicited by them and other Potentates in Italie, and by continuall letters from the Pope to ioyne in league with them. Wherefore being forced to send his gallies, hee must of necessity send his Brother D. John, whome hee was desirous to advance. The Moores who were also aduertised of these things, and therefore out of hope to be relieved by the Turke, who had other enterprises in his braine, desired, no lesse than the king, to enter into some treatie of peace. The Gallies and Foistes of Barbarie came no more to succour them: three galeots which had discharged, come armes, & Arabian books, Alcarons and other, in the road of Dalias, had bin discovered and taken by the inhabitants of the countrie: seuen other galeots or foists being come to the same coast with souldiers, which Hafsa a Turke brought out of Barbarie, they returned vpon a false brute of peace, which had bene spread abroad, both the Moores and the Christians being desirous of rest. Besides, enuy, disloyalty, and other vices reigning among the Moors caused a diuision among the some of the captains hauing bin sent into Afrike,

A Afrike, said there, and would no more returne; many of the common people did the like king Aben Aboo, and others which held good, were solicited and tempted by promises, that they should receiue all: fauour and good vltage from King Philip, and they were well pleased also to keepe their pillage, so as they yielded to enter into treatie, but there was no cessation of armes. Habaqui and some other knights of the Moores were at Fond of Andarax, where hauing conferred with king Philip's deputies they made an accord vpon these articles.

That Habaqui in the name of Diego Lopez Aben Aboo, and others of whome hee had power, should kneele to D. John's feet, and demand pardon of king Philip. That they should yeeld vp their armes and Engines. That they should be receiued into grace, and all that was past forgotten. That they should not be wronged by word nor deede, nor molested by the Institution: That they that were reduced should bee sent withall securitie, with their goods, wives and children, to such places as should be assigned them to lue in, for they must leaue the Alpuxarres. According vnto this accord a submission was made by Habaqui to D. John at Padules, and the Ensignes being deliuered D. Alfonso de Obando Princes went to Aben Aboo, to giue him better assurance, passing by Alcolea where hee found Xabibi: they went together to Cadiaz, where hee was well entertained by Aben Aboo and Habaqui, and hauing had much conference vpon the assistance which D. Alfonso had charge to promise them, such as they C should demand, they proceeded so farre in their accord, as most of the Turkes that were in the army were dismist, and sent home well satisfied.

Treaty of peace with the Moores.

But after D. Alfonso's departure, many of these Moores considering better of the importance of this reduction, began to distrust, passing into Barbarie and returned not, and for that they had left Aben Aboos in mind to retract, they did sollicite the Turkes and Moores of Afrike, nor to forbear to succour them of Spaine, whereunto they found many Lords among the Moores very willing, So as in a short time there came many vessels to that Coast, bringing souldiers, armes and munition from Barbarie. The which confirmed Aben Aboos, and others in the resolution they had neuer to put themselves into the hands of the king of Spaine, nor of his Lieutenants, D beginning to hate and enue the Turke that had dealt in this treatie, and especially Hernand Habaqui.

Moores after the second revolt.

This confusion among the heads did so amaze the common people of the Moores, as they came in great troups to yeeld themselves to the kings mercie, and to his Gouernours and Captaines, who had commandement to receiue them, and not to suffer any outrage to bee done vnto them. Others that could escape did more willingly passe the Sea, for they did not submit themselves but through hunger, and by an opinion they had conceived that they could not prosper vnder their heads, nor bee freed from their miseries by them, seeing they were continually in discord. The armies were still on foot during these Ambiguities, yet somewhat neglected and weak, for they still expected when they should bee dismist.

The Duke of Sesse brought his armie before the Castle of Fer, which was a store-house of Turkes to succour them, and took it: D. Sancho de Leua did also take certaine foists. The Captaines of places ranne wheresoeuer they heard there were any Moores in armes, which made many to hasten their reduction. Many souldiers being disbanded did not forbear the Moores that had submitted, but did spoile them and make their wives and children captiues, to keepe them, or sell them, for slaves; to prevent the which, they used all diligence to draw them from their ancient habitations to lue farther off in places assigned them according to the accord; and certaine diuisions which had bene made. The more to incite the Moores to submit themselves, the President D. Pedro de Deza wrote a letter of exhortation to the nation of the Moores, in the Arabian tongue, as if it had bene some Morabite or Hermite of the law of Mahomet, who perswaded them toarken to a peace, and to free themselves of so many miseries, causing many copies thereof to be made; the which being disperfed among that nation, did hasten the reduction of many. Habaqui seeing that Aben Aboo wet back, & that the party was much diminished, being diuided among themselves, went to D. John, & told him with great assurance that if he would giue him

Oooooij.

fiue

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 29.

five hundred shot, hee would bring Aben Aboo bound vnto him: D. John would not G give him any men, but hee caried eight hundred Crowmes to bee deliuered him, to leaue them where hee should thinke good, and to performe what hee had promised.

Habagui being resolute to imploy himselfe for the performance of the accord, came to Vercheul where his wife and children were, to haue them prepare themselves, for hee meant to take them from thence, and to carrie them to Guadix: passing by lessen, hee saw certaine Moores walking idly vpon the place, of whome hee demanded proudly why they staid to goe vnto those places which were assigned them, by the treatie of peace. To whome they answered, that they attended the commandement of Aben Aboo. And I tell you (replied hee) that if Aben Aboo be so tedious and vnwilling, I will lead him to D. John of Austria bound at my horse taile. These words were told to Aben Aboo, by some one of these Moores, whereat being much incensed, hee sent one hundred and fiftie Turkes, which hee had referred for his gard, and two companies of Moores, in whome hee trusted, to goe and take him at Vercheul. Habagui hearing a noyse in the night, got out of his lodging, and beganne to flee away, who without doubt had escaped, had not his white Turban discouered him a farr off, which was the cause that they pursued and rooke him.

Being brought before Aben Aboo, hee reproacht him with his presumption and proud threats against him that was his king, telling him that hee knew well hee was a Traitor, and that hee fought to make his peace apart with the Christians and bring all the rest of Moores to the slaughter, or slaue: whereupon hee caused him to bee presently led into a secret place, and there to bee strangled by his household Seruants, and then hee caused his bodie to bee bound vp in a fagot of reedes and to bee cast into a precipice, where it remained many daies, and no man knew what became of him.

Being rid of this man, hee sent into all places where the Moores were not reduced, to aduertise them that they should not submit, putting them in hope by counterfeited newes of succours by the Turkish armie, and other such meanes, yet hee did not leaue to write to D. Alonso of Granado, and to D. Fernand of Barrades, the Mediators, that hee continued still in the same minde; but the effects shewed the contrarie, for a brother of his called Galipe hauing bene defeated, as hee went towards Ronde and Bentomis with two hundred Souldiers to maintaine the Moores of that quarter in rebellion, they vnderstood all his practises, how hee did sollicite the Turkes and Moores of Affrike: That hee made an accompt to haue twelue thousand men; that hee made prouision of come; that hee had put eight hundred men into Pîtres, and that hee fortified himselfe and prepared for warre. Finally to see them from all doubt, being prest by letters from Hernand de Berredes, and by mouth by Hernand Valles de Palacios, who was sent expressly vnto him, to make declaration if hee would ratifie the Capitulations; hee answered plainly, and after a proud and disdainfull manner, that they were deceived who thought hee would put himselfe into the power of king Philip, or trust to his promises: for the Moores of those times had sufficient proofes, besides those which their predecessours had left, in what manner the kings of Castille were accustomed to keepe their faith. This being reported, the king commanded they should continue the warre with all violence, and not pardon any Moore that was armed, but persueue them that were quiet. The duke of Arcos had the charge to presse them of Ronde and of Sierra Vermeille. The great Commander was to enter againe into the Alpuxarres, whereas many defended themselves. But in the end the Moores finding that their head was destitute of means and Counsell, most of them submitted themselves, and Aben Aboo found himselfe so abandoned, as he had no care but how to saue himselfe in Barbary being resolute neuer to trieking Philips clemency, flying from caue to caue, & from rock to rock betwix Vercheul & Treuelles, which are the roughest parts of those mountaines, hauing scarce 400 men which followed him: being notwithstanding like a troublesome thorn, whereof the king desired much to be free. Where as it pleaseth god to take away all difficulties, wherewith men are troubled

Soldiers of a Moore.

Habagui strangled.

Warre vnto the Moores.

Lib. 29.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A troubled, he suddenly raiseth occasions, and can giue vnexpected ends to great affaires, many times by meane instruments. There was a Goldsmith at Granado, called Barrero, a pleasant man, and well knowne to the Moores and Christians dwelling in the Alpuxarres, where, before the warre, hee was wont to goe and sell rings of gold and silver, and other toys of his trade, and tooke in exchange from them silke, pearles, and other things. Barrero returning to his wonted traffique, vpon the reduction of some burroughes in those mountaines, hee came to Cadiaz and to Vercheul, at such time as the capitaine of the garison, called Galas Rotulo de Villa-Real, hauing taken certaine Moores, theues of Aben Aboo's traine, was readie to haue them shot: One of them knowing Barrero, came and saluted him, and reported his misfortune vnto him, intreating him to bee a meane for his deliuerie. The Goldsmith knew this Moore, and demanded newes of Aben Aboo, who were about him, and his chiefe counsellors: The prisoner told him what he knew, and that his most familiar friends were a Secretarie of his, called Bernardin Aben Amer, and a capitaine whom they called Seniz of Vercheul, but he gaue most credit to Aben Amer. Barrero, who in former time had bene verie familiar with Aben Amer, thought it fit to write vnto him touching the reduction of his master, asking the Moore if hee could find meane to carrie a letter and not be discovered, and hee would cause him to bee set at libertie. The Moore did promise and sweare it: Wherefore Barrero hauing acquainted capitaine Rotulo with his enterprize, hee intreated him to keepe this prisoner vntill his returne from Granado, whither hee would goe and aske leaue to confesse with the Secretarie of Aben Aboo, whom hee had knowne long, hoping to draw him to persuaade his master to yeeld. The great Commander gaue him leaue to write and confesse, and being returned to Vercheul, hee dispatcht this Moore with a persuauiue letter to Aben Amer. This messenger could not so passe the rockes and caues of Vercheul, but hee fell into the hands of Seniz men, who led him to their master. Being examined whence he came, and whither he went, hee answered, That he had escaped the hands of the capitaine of the garison of Vercheul and Cadiaz, who held him prisoner. Seniz not beleueing him, threatened to racke him: wherewith being terrified, hee sayd, That in truth hee was a prisoner, and that D to saue his life hee had taken vpon him to carrie a letter to Bernardin Aben Amer, but hee knew not what it contained, and so hee gaue it him. Seniz hauing read it, was verie well pleased, saying vnto the Moore, That it was happie for him hee had fallen into his hands; for if hee had gone to Aben Amer, hee would haue hanged him as soone as he had giuen him this letter: That hee meant to send him backe to him that had written it, willing him to bee faithfull, for hee should bee well rewarded. This poore Moore being glad, promised to doe any thing that hee should command him.

Seniz and Francis Barrero met at a certaine place appointed, and concluded betwixt them, That Barrero should returne to Granado, and bring a generall pardon in good forme, to all those that had bene in armes since the treatie made with Habagui, in the which Aben Aboo should bee expressly named. These letters were dispatcht with all fauour, wherein nothing was omitted. Barrero hauing brought them, and deliuered them to Seniz, it happened that Aben Aboo was aduertised of this conference, where-with hee was much discontented, and came in the night with a small traine to the caue where Seniz retired himselfe, leauing his people a little way off, in a passage vnder the rocke, keeping two Moores onely with him, whom hee made to stay at the entrie of that naturall caue, which was in the top of the mountaine of Huzun, a boue Vercheul and Mecine of Bombaron. Hee demanded verie disdainfully of Seniz, Who had giuen him leaue to treat with the enemy? You, answered Seniz, and it is in consequence of former conferences, the which, I tell you, wee must continue and end; and therefore let vs not loose the opportunitie to recouer king Philips fauour, and let vs not through bad counsell seeke our owne ruines: putting instantly into his hand these letters of pardon, the which Aben Aboo reiected, crying out, That it was nothing but villanie and treason, offering to goe forth to call his men. One of them which hee had left at the entrie of the caue would haue come in, but he was put Travellers of a Goldsmith in and the warre with the Moore.

1570

Aben Aboo
king of the Moors slain.

put backe; and throwne downe a Precipice, the other fled; and hee himselfe was stayed to reason with him; but he was in such a rage, as hee would not heare any thing: so as Senie, seeing his obstinacie, refused to kill him; and lifting up a long harquebuse which hee had in his hand, hee gaue him such a blow on the head, as he overthrew him, and then he and his men flabd him with their daggers. They which attended him, being aduertised by the Moore which had fled, That they had slaine his companion; and that he thought they had done as much vnto the king, retired. This done, Senie sent to aduertise Francis Barrero thereof, and that hee should send a moyle to carrie the kings bodie to Vercheul; the which was done, and Senie invited to come with all affurance to the garrison, where hee was entertained; and much made of by Leonard Rosala, brother to capitaine Galas, then absent; and then he and Barrero went vnto the citie, whither they caused the bodie to be carried, where they had a joyfull entrie made them.

Troubles of the Moors specified.

The head of Aben Aboo was put in a cage of yron, and set ouer the citie gate which lookes towards the Alpuxarres: The bodie being quartered, was hung vpon the high wayes. After which there was not any Moore found to make head; all layed aside armes, and submitted themselues to the kings mercie, according to the generall pardon which was granted to Francis Barrero. But they were all drawne out of the mountains, and the townes of Granado, and thereabout, and sent into plaine countries, and more accessible, to inhabit; as the Emperour Trism did with the auncient Spaniards, who were accustomed to rebell often; vpon the assurance of their townes and castles buile vpon the edge of the mountains, the which he caused to be rased, and commanded by an Edict, that they should not build any more but in the plaines.

Thus ended the warre of the Moores of Granado, in November 1570; hauing continued neere two yeares, verie dangerous and difficult; being rashly caused by the ill vñage of them that they call old Christians in Spaine, by the importune pursuits of the Clergie and Inquisition, and by the bad administration of iustice; and infolencie of the ministers there of; and no lesse inconsiderately entertained by the impietie of the Moores, and augmented by their obstinacie and ignorance, which suggested wicked and monstrous conceptions. The charge and losse was great, for there was about five millions of crownes of the kings treasure spent in this warre. The interest of priuate men, and the spoyle and vñpeopling of the countrie, was inestimable, in the which about thirtie thousand Christians lost their liues. As for the Moores that were slaine of all ages and sexes, the number cannot be said; for a great realme might haue bene peopled therewith. If they had bene intreated with more mildnesse and humanitie, without doubt they might easily haue kept them in obedience, and by little and little might haue made them leaue that which was vnpleasing or scandalous in their manner of liuing; and as for religion, they should bee instructed with more care and charitie, causing that injurious conceipt which is ordinarie in Spaine and other places, of them that are newly come to the knowledge of Iesus Christ, to cease, being vnpleasing vnto God.

9
Marriage of king Philip with his niece.

King Philip being somewhat freed from cares by the end of this warre with the Moores of Granado, hee would haue his marriage consummated with Anne of Austria, his neece, daughter to his sister and to the Emperour Maximilian, for the which he obtained a dispensation from the Pope, according to the vñe of that holy Church. She past through the Low Countries, and was received by the duke of Alba at Nymegen with great honour, who conducted her to Brussels, and so to Flessingue, where she embarked in October, and within eight dayes arrived happily in Biscaye, being accompanied by the Archdukes Albert and Wenceslaw, her brethren, being verie young. Shee was receiued there by the cardinal of Seuille, whom the king had sent thither to doe that office. The king entertained her at Segouia, with that state that was befitting the greatnesse; then passing on to Madrid, whereas the widow Queene of Portugall met them, they were married with great solemnitie.

The king of Spaine (as wee haue said) was solicited to enter into league with the Pope

1570

Lib. 29.

A Pope, and the Venetians, against whom Selym the great Turke, picking a quarrell, had declared warre. And for that the danger of this warre required aid, the Pope sent a Nuntio into Spaine, which was Lewis Torres, clerke of the chamber, with speciall order from him to draw the king into this league, but about all, to craue the assistance of his gallies for that present yeare, that being ioyned with them of Venice, they might goe and make head against that mightie fleet which the Turke had sent to sea. The king knowing how much it did import himselfe and the whole state of Christendome, being moued with many speciall considerations, hee graunted his gallies, which were then readie in Italie. Wherefore he sent a speciall commission to John Andrew Doria, That according to the Popes pleasure he should go, as head of those gallies, to Messina; but he gaue him no direction, that hee should goe from thence to Corfu, to ioine with the Venetian armie, and with the Popes gallies, which were commaunded by Mars Anthony Colonna, and that hee should leaue the commaund of all vnto Colonna, being lent by the king vnto his Holinesse: the which being not well specified, was a great prejudice to the armie that yeare. But the businesse of the league being treated of in the Kings Councell, with great deliberation, was not so easily concluded, notwithstanding that Torres, and Leonardo Donata, a Senator of great worth, sent from the State of Venice into Spaine, did sollicite it verie earnestly; but the importance of the businesse, the ordinarie disagreement which is found in all Councils consisting of men of diuers complexions, and the naturall slownesse of that nation, made those embassadours to spend many monethes in vaine, and did somewhat coole the ardent desire the king had to satisfie the Pope and that Commonweale, as hee did afterwards shew by the effects.

But to come to the cause of this warre. The Turke had sent a Chaus to the Venetians, that they should, without delay, deliuer vnto him the island of Cyprus, which did belong vnto him, as hauing succeeded to the rights of the Emperours of Constantinople, the kings of Ierusalem, and of the auncient kings of Syria and Egypt, the which (said hee) they had gotten away. The which hauing refused, hee denounced war against them, wherein they had great difficulties, being surprised, for that it was before the succours came which they had begged from the king of Spaine, the Pope, and other princes, who performed not their promises but verie late, after the losse of Nicosia, and all they had in that island; euerie one selling the succours which hee had promised in balancing the interest they had to oppose against the Turke, and seeking to contribute with some aduantage for his owne particular. But the next yeare there was a league made, as you shall heare, by the which D. John of Austria, the kings brother, was chosen to be Generall of the confederate armie against the Turke.

The enterprife which the Turke made vpon Cyprus, and the battell at sea, which happened vpon this occasion, is memorable, and merits a particular relation in this historie of Spaine, for that the power and meanes of king Philip did much auaile, and D. John of Austria, his brother, had the honour to be Generall of the armie at sea, and won a famous victorie.

The island of Cyprus was in truth a remainder of the Empire of Constantinople, and of the realme of Ierusalem, erected by the French in their holy warres, and came by the gift of Richard king of England, who had conquered it from the Emperours of Constantinople, or rather by purchase or exchange, to the famous house of Lusignan in France, who enioyed it some generations. Among the kings of this familie, there was one Peter the first of that name, who was valiant, and went into diuers parts of the world; but for some tyrannies, and by the conspiracie of his vnchast wife, who was of the house of Aragon, he was slaine by his subiects: to whom Peter the second succeeded; in whose time there grew great contention, with notable murders, betwixt the Consuls of the Venetian and Genouois, nations trafficking in Cyprus; and the Consul of the Genouois was by his commandement cast out of the windowes of his palace, in fauour of the Venetian: wherefore the Genouois being then strong at sea, sent a great armie to Cyprus, sackt the island, and seised vpon Famagosta: falling to an accord, the Genouois carried James the kings vnkle with his wife, away in hostage. Peter being dead, James was deliuered, and raigned in Cyprus, and vpon some rights, caused himselfe to be crowned, and called sends his to assist the Venetians.Warre denouced by the Turagainst the Venetians.Cyprus an island and a realme.

King of Sicilie

1570

of the victorie gotten at Nicols, and the honour of the great Turke with his new victorie at sea; but they were soone after aduertised by two freygates, that the Christian armie being come to Castellazo, and hearing of the successe of Nicols, were returned to Candie. Whereupon their fleet also returned, to give better order for their affaires, both for the wintering of their men at land; and for the security of the fleet in Constantinople, Prady blessing to enter triumphantly into that cite with their styles gotten in Cyprus, where he arrived the sixteenth day of December.

King of Tunis expelled by the Moors.

In this time, the king of Alger had fallen into warre with the king of Tunis, who (as we have said) was feudatary to the king of Spaine; and being come to fight, Prady was victor, and the other dying away, with great difficultie, recovered Goulette, with his wife and sonnes; and the enemies being favoured by this occasion, and by the asconstancie of the Moors, made himselfe lord, without any toyle, of the cite of Tunis, and of Bizcaia, the which did afterwards draw the king of Spaine into a new warre, to restore him to his realme, flying to his Maistie for aid, as his father had done to the Royperour Charles the first.

1571

League concluded between the Pope, the king of Spaine, and the Venetians.

The king of Spaine desired to satisfy the Popes desire, and to avoyd tediousnesse in the conclusion of the league, had referred the treatie thereof to Rome, giving the charge in his name to Antonie Perrenot, cardinall Granvelle; and to Francis of Toledo, cardinall Pacheco, joyning with them Johnde Zamiga his embassadour at Rome. In the end, after many difficulties, the league was concluded the twentieth day of May, in these articles: That the king of Spaine should furnish an hundred galleies, the Venetians should arme as many, and the Pope (under whom marche the other princes and potentates of Italie) should enter for their part. That they should entertaine fiftie thousand foot, and foure thousand and five hundred horse; and with this power they should goe and assaile the Turke in his owne country, but especially in the island of Cyprus. That towards the charge of this armie and the equipage, the king of Spaine should contribute a moitie, the Venetians a third part, and the Pope a first; and if the Pope should not be able to furnish it, whatsoever should be wanting the king should beare three fift parts, and the commonweale of Venice two: and that D. Iohn d'Autria should be General of the whole armie.

Cardinall Alexander sent Legat into Spaine.

After the conclusion hereof the Pope sent cardinall Alexandrino his Legat, into Spaine, to treat with the king as well touching the execution of the league, and some other private businesse, as to goe into Portugal, to procure aid from that king. The king of Spaine received him with great honour, and treated with him touching the execution of the league, seeming to be resolved to bend all his forces against the Turke: and therefore he commaunded D. Iohn to stay in Italie, after that yeares auagation, to be more readie with the armie in the Spring, and that his ministers at Rome should resolve in every occasion concerning the league, as they should thinke best, without expecting any new order from Spaine. From thence he past into Portugal, to treat in like manner with the king D. Sebastian concerning the league. This young prince was bred up in generous thoughts to purchase much glorie by making warre against infidels, and therein to exceed his predecessors, having in himselfe a naturall disposition to warre, an able bodie, and practised in those painfull exercises which belong unto warre, having bene alwaies laid before him, by the Iesuites which instructed him, That all his enterprises should be for the sole benefit of Christendome, they had made his mind as religious as his owne nature, and the exhortations of his noblemen had made him warlike; so as hee did not thinke or reason of any thing but of warre. And for that the example of his predecessors did represent unto him in his deepe the honourable victories and glorious conquests they had made in Africke and the East Indies, herein like manner directed all his thoughts to that end.

Disposition of Sebastian king of Portugal.

The Legat Alexandrino finding him in this disposition, did easily draw him to enter into this league against the Turke: who not onely promised to send his galleies well appointed, to the Christians armie, but he would also annoy Salem with another great naue at Suez, and other places held by the Turkes in the red sea; and in the gulph of Persia: and more.

Moreover, the Pope desiring to breake the marriage betwixt Marguerite of Valois, and the king of Nauarre, he gave commission unto the Cardinall to moue this marriage vnto the king of Portugal, the which would haue bene somewhat difficult, if the king had not bene much deuoted to the Pope, who at his intreacie layed aside a strange resolution; which was, that he would not heare speake of a wife, because he would not be held effeminate, to the great griefe of his grandmother, his vncke, and the wife of his Nobilitie, who desired to see some issue of him, and the succession of the realme assured. In the end he was content to take this French ladie, neither desired he any other dowrie, but a generous resolution in king Charles to enter in the league. Matters beeing thus settled in Spaine, the Cardinall, according to his commission, past thorough France, for the league and marriage, but he found no meanes to effect either: whereupon he returned into Italy.

King of Portugal content to take Marguerite of Valois to wife.

Don Iohn of Austria being much pleased with this honorable charge, came from Spaine to Genoua, where he stayed not long, but arrived on the ninth of August at Naples, bringing with him from the Court, the great Commander of Castile, with the title of his Lieutenant, and chiefe Counsellor, Fernando Cariglia, Earle of Pliego, his chiefe Steward, D. Francisco d'Ibarra, D. Pedro Velasco, D. Michell Moncada, Gil d'Andrada, Carlo Spinelli, who had followed him as an adventurer against the Moors, with many others. With these there ioyned the Dukes of Parma and Vrbino, Don Antonio Carrafa, duke of Mondragon, the Marquis of Carrara, D. Pompee of Lanoy, Vincenzio Carrafa, Prior of Hongary, the Earle of Sarno, the Marquis of Auila, Paul Iourdain Vrsin, the Earle of S. Fleur, Afciano de la Corne, and Paul Sforza, Beeing in Naples, Cardinall Grannell, the Viceroy, who in that action had the authoritie of Legat, deliuered vnto D. Iohn the Standard, as General of the Church, the which the Pope had blest, who solicited his departure towards Messina by many embassages, where the whole fleet should ioyne, and whether Marc Antonio Colonna was gone long before with twelue galleies, of Florence, armed by the Pope, and three of the Order of S. Iohn.

Noblemen with Don Iohn in the army.

But to returne to the siege of Famagosta, Mustapha sought by all meanes possible to get the counterscarpe, the which was valiantly defended by Marc Antonio Bragadino, and Alfonso Baglioni, the one having charge of the gouernement, the other of the garrison, but in the end the Turkes wonne it. About the midst of May, they planted five batteries, and had made ten forts. They had in the beginning aduertised the Seigneurie of Venice in what state they stood, who sent them a supply of seauenteene hundred men, with victuals and munition by Marc Antonio Quirini, who past valiantly through the Turkes gards, and returned: these succors were commanded by Lewis Martinengo. The Turkes continued their batteries with great obstinacie, and had giuen foure assaults, where the besegged repulst them valiantly, but with great losse of either side: the besegged having held out till the 20 of Iuly, beeing now prest with great hunger and want, the number of their souldiers beeing diminished to eight hundred, and those much tyred; most of the Grecians beeing dead, either with fighting, or with the continuall toyle. Beeing terrified with so great miseries, and out of hope of any more succors, some of the chiefe of the citie besought Bragadino, that he would incline to some accord, seeing he had made so good proofe of their faith and constancie in that seeger: No man would euer hold them unworthie of commendation, if (after they had endured so many assaults, and suffered so much penurie, with want of munition, after the losse of so many souldiers and citizens, and finally, beeing without all hope of succors, they had provided at the least, for the liues of their children which remayned, and for the honour of poore miserable women: that he would not in recompence of their deuotion, which they had alwaies shewed to the common-weale of Venice, be the cause of the totall ruine of their citie, and suffer their wifes and children, who had spent so much blood, and offered their bodies to death for their seruice, to become a shamefull prey to their Turkish lust, there remaining no hope of health, but by the meanes of some accord: That it was a thing wortheie of a wife Nobleman (as he was) to chooe the least of evils: And last of all to remember, that it was held a brutish crueltie, and no valour, to runne headlong to a certaine death, where there is no hope of life.

Speech to Bragadino at Famagosta.

Ppppp

Braga

1571

12 Famagosta yel-ded to the Turks.

Brigadino knew that their request was just, and that their extremities were great: yet forcing his owne nature, and desiring to preserve the realme, which depended wholly vpon the losse of that place, he did not thinke it possible that the Senat would neglect so weightie a businesse, and not send the succours which had bene promised. Wherefore hee would not yeeld to their demand, but fed them with good words, putting them in hope of present succours, dispatching a fregat presently into Candie, to aduertise the Seigniorie of their extremities.

In the end of Iulie the Turks gaue an assault which continued five houres: but the besieged seeing there was no meanes to endure another, hauing but seuen barrels of powder left, they began to treat of an accord, and hauing made a truce the first of August, the next day they gaue hostages of either side. The conditions were:

That the citie should be yeilded to the Turks, the persons, armes, and goods of souldiers and citizens being safe, who might remaine there, and liue in the laws of Christi, and not be wronged in their honours nor substance.

That such as would depart might haue free passage into Candie, and three yeares respite, and that the souldiers should be garded by the Turkish gallies, that no outrage should be done them, and that they might carrie with them five peeces of ordnance, and three of their best horses.

That they should not make any Mosques of their churches, nor charge the citizens with any carriages or tenthes.

Muslafa signed these conditions, and the souldiers began to imbarke in the gallies and other vessels which the Turks had sent into the port, and on the fifth day at night Brigadino hauing sent the keys to Muslafa by cont Neslor Martinengo, he went himselfe in person with Astor Baglioni, Iohn Antonio Quirini, Andrew Brigadino, cont Lewis Martinengo, with other Commandours of great worth. Muslafa receiued them, in shew, with great honour, and causing them to sit downe, hee discoursed with them of diuers things, at last he said, That the Christians which had imbarked to goe from Famagosta, the night before they meant to passe into Candie, and to other places belonging to the Venetians, had cruelly and treacherously slaine all the Turkish slaues which they had, and that three had escaped with great difficultie out of the citie, to aduertise the Bassa thereof: And therefore he had given order, that the Turks should not goe out of the haue with their vessels, before they had good caution for their securitie, that they should not be slaine, or made slaues in Candie, or any other place. Whereunto Brigadino answered, That it was not in the accord to giue any hostages, and therefore he meant not to doe it, denying absolutely that there were any Turkes slaine, as he had said. Muslafa was much altered with this answer, and made a signe with his hand, that he should come neere him; then he caused his interpreter to speake certaine words vnto him in his eare, which were not heard, nor yet Brigadino answer: but he seemed more furious than a Tigre, and striking Marc Antonio vpon the head, he and all the rest were presently taken, being all vnarmed: for it is a custome among the Turkes, that no stranger comes vnto them with his armes. Then causing them to be led out of the tent, he caused Astor Baglioni, Andrew Brigadino, Iohn Antonio Quirini, Lewis Martinengo, and the knight del Haste, to be cut in peeces in his presence, one after another, Marc Antonio being reserved for a more horrible death. Cont Hercoles Martinengo being there in hostage, was sau'd by one of the Bassaes Eunuches, who tooke him for his slaue. The souldiers which were in the campe, to the number of three hundred, were all slaine, and those that were imbarked were made slaues.

Men of worth treacherously put to death by Muslafa.Death of Marc Antonio Bragadino.

Two dayes after Muslafa entred into Famagosta, and hauing caused Brigadino eares to be cut off, when hee was taken prisoner, hee made him to bee set vpon the maine yard of the Admirals gallie of Rhodes, to bee a spectacle to the Christians that were there in captiuitie. In the end hee caused him to bee set vpon the pillorie in the market place, and there to bee slayed aliue by a lew; this lord shewing still a noble resolution, and full of Christian pietie, neither did hee, during all his torments and disgraces which they did vnto him, shew any signe of feare or basenesse, still reproaching that traitor with the breach of his faith euen vnto his

3571

A his death. Then hee caused him to be quartered, and one of them to bee set vpon either batterie: his skinn was stuf with straw, and hung at the yard of one of his gallies, being first a miserable spectacle to all the coast of Soria, and then to Selim in Constantinople. Thus after threecore and fiftene dayes batterie, and many assaults, the Turkes hauing spent an hundred and fiftie thousand shot of great ordnance; Famagosta was taken.

D. Iohn of Austria came the foure and twentieth of August to Messina, being receiued by the two other Generals, Colonna and Veniero, with great honour; where, all the forces of the league not being yet arriued, he called the two Generals, with some others of greatest iudgement in martiall affaires, to counsell, to resolve what they had to doe: but for that their opinions were diuers, it was ordered, that they should set them downe in writing, with their reasons; but the resolution was deferred vntill the arriual of the rest of the gallies. On the first of September Iohn Andrew Doria arriued with twelue gallies, hauing imbarke Germanes and Lombards at Spetie, after whom came the marquisse of S. Crux with thirtie gallies from Naples, and the next day Quirini and Candile with threecore from Candie: soone after there came some ships from Naples laden with men and munition, and some gallies from Palermo, conducted by Cardona; but some other vessels could not come so soone, being left to imbarke three thousand Italian foot, and 2000 Spaniards that were at Orranto. There were at Messina the eight of September twelue gallies of the Popes, 81 of the king of Spaines, with twentie ships of burthen (some say twentie five) one hundred and eight gallies of the Seigniorie of Venice, six galleses, and two ships; three gallies of Malta, and three of the Order of S. Lazaro: so as there were in the whole fleet two hundred and seuen gallies, six gallnasses, and two and twentie ships, besides foists and other smaller vessels, and in them at the least twentie thousand fighting men, with victuals and munition sufficient. Those that had chiefe charge in this armie, besides the Generals, were these, Ascanio de la Corna was Campe-master general for the king of Spaine, the earle of S. Fiora was General of the Italians, the Colonels were cont Paulo Sforza, the earle of Samo, and Gasper Toraldi; the Colonels of the Dutch were the earle of Lodron, and Vinciguerra of Arco: And of the fleet, D. Iohn Andrew Doria was General of his owne gallies, which the king paid, D. Aluaro de Bassan, marquisse of S. Crux, gouerned them of Naples with the like title, D. Iohn of Cardona them of Sicile, and D. Cesare d'Awalo the ships: Gabrio Serbelloni was General of the ordnance. The names of the rest of the Commandours I omit to auoid tediousnesse.

D. Iohn d'Au-stria comes to Messina.Number of Christians fleet at Messina.

The Pope sent Iohn Paulo Odescaleo to Messina, to hasten their departure, and to enrich them with many indulgences, being to fight against the enemies of the holy Church. Then after a solemne procession they went againe to counsell. There were many things propounded, whercon they discoursed long with great iudgement; but in the end the exhortations of Colonna, and of the Venetian commanders, made D. Iohn resolve, who had a desire to do something worthe of himselfe, and the expectation which was of that great fleet, to goe and fight with the enimie. Wherefore they parted from Messina the 16 of September: at night they came to S. Iohns ditch, where he gaue order how they should saile, staying there the next day for certaine vessels which had staied behind for some necessities, & also for D. Giles d'Andrada, whom D. Iohn had sent some daies before to learne some newes of the enimie; by whom he vnderstood, that they were gone towards Volona: but to be duely informed of his course, the same knight was presently sent backe againe. The Venetians were verie desirous to aduance, fearing that the dangerous time for sailing drawing neere, there would some storme arise, and make all their attempts fruitlesse for that yeare. After some foule weather and contrarie winds, they came to Cape S. Maria, hauing first met with a fregat, who brought them newes of the great need they of Famagosta had of present succours, and withall he did certifie them of the state of Candie, and that the Turks armie was gone towards the gulph of Lepanto. Being come to Corfu on the 25 of the moneth, they were troubled to see many of their gallies behind, besides those that the marquisse of S. Crux had caried to Orranto for 3000 Italian foot, & the regiment of Spaniards in Naples. They wanted also their ships, who were sent before with Resolution of the Christians armie

P p p p p j j

foul.

souldiers, and other necessaries, parting from Messina a day before the rest of the armie, G but beeing hindered by foule weather, they could not come in time to the battell: within two dayes the galleasses and some galleys arrived, the which had bene separated from the armie by storme, or by some other accident. And for that some were not of opinion to fight with the enemy, Veniero feared some accident, which might disturbe all, and make Don John to alter his resolution, and therefore pressing their departure, he had caused great store of come to be put into the galleasses, to be sent to the succour of Famagosta, having not heard any thing of the losse thereof. It was bruted, that Caracossa was gone with 18 galleies to Valona, to fetch Biscuit: whereupon Colonna and Veniero persuaded Don John, not to lose so goodly an opportunitee, for going to encounter his enemies diuided, wherefoer he hapned, he should obtaine a certaine victorie. Don John was not auerfe to that resolution, but he desired to be better certified than with rumors, and vncertaine reports; and therefore it was resolved, that Canale should go before with two good galleies, to learne some certaintie of the enemies Fleet. But he was stayed vpon the arrivall of foure galleies, which by contrarie winds had bene separated from there, they assured the Generalls, that there was not any vessell of the Turkes at Valona: for that having past thereby, they had not seene any. Whereupon some thought, it was but an artificiall invention of such, as desired they should fight with the enemy. D. John beeing at Gomenizze, a great port of Epirus, they were advertised by Giles d'Andrada, that he had heard for certaine at Zante, that the Turkish Fleet was entred into the gulph of Le-panto, as a place of safetie, that they might supply their wants, and to resolute what they had to do, sending their sicke and vnprofitable people to Corone, for that Caracossa hearing of the coming of the Christians into those seas, was gone to advertise the General Ally. There Doria having commandement from the Confederates, tooke muster of all the vessells, observing every thing carefully, for that their opinions were diuers touching their fighting with the enemy.

Commander of Castile dissuades them from fighting with the Turke

The great Commander of Castile, who was of great authoritie with the General, gaue aduise, that they should not hazard a battell without some great advantage, where- of the hazard and danger was very great, not onely for the losse of so great an armie, but K for the great ruines which would ensue: for that Sicile, the coasts of Calabria and Apu- lia, yea of all Italy and Spaine, would, in this case, be made destitute of all gard and de- fence: so as they did not see what assured hope of gaine might ballance the reasonable feare of so great a losse; protesting, that what he sayd, was no more for the priuat interest of his King, than of the other Confederates, and especially of the Venetians, who as nea- rest to the enemy, might thinke to tast the first fruites of this dangerous counsell. It is sometimes to be held a great victorie, to hinder a mightie enemy, from doing any thing of importance, as they should do, in curbing the pride, that yea of the Turkish armie, growne bold by so many victories, having many galleies, and so well furnished, as it was to be presumed, both of souldiers and slaues, being in its owne country, where they had great Garrisons continually in pay, and had of late reduced so many Christians into ser- L uitude in the Venetians countries.

He added, that by the example of all famous Captaines, both ancient and mo- deme, from whom they are accustomed to draw secure instructions in militarie actions, there was no course held wiser for them, that had the weaker power, and are in danger of the greater losse, than in delaying an enemy, to attend some advantage to op- presse him, and trying him, to make his attempts vaine.

The condition of things were not equall, neither should they hazard so much vpon a most doubtfull fortune, onely with a designe to fight with the Turkes forces at sea, seeing the gaine would be small which they could promise themselves, by that hoped-for victorie; beeing as easie for the enemy to returne the next Spring very strong to sea, although he were vanquished, as it would be hard for the Confederates to repayre so great losses, if God, for the sins of Christendome, should suffer them to be overcome. Wherefore, I beseech you, my most noble Lord, set before your eyes the inestimable losse which may happen to Christendome, by the ruine of this ar- mie, if in nothing else, but of so many noble Captaines, and valiant souldiers, which

A which we may boldly say without blushing, is the flower of all the martiall men of Chri- stendome, of whose counsell and valour, I may truly say, depends the health of the best part of Europe; and so by consequence by the losse of them, the means to resist the Turkes power now would faile vs, and all hope to vanquish him hereafter. I will not forget to of- fer to your consideration, how dangerous it is for the winds and sea, the time of the yea- being so far spent, and that to go and spend any time in seeking of the enemy in this dan- gerous season of Autumne, were to tempt fortune doubly. There may be infinit exam- ples produced, but the remembrance of the last yea is so fresh, as wee need not to seeke farther: and you must vnderstand, that he which in time recouers a safe port with his ship- ping, makes it knowne what counsell is most profitable, if an vnfortunat chance happen. B But who can judge, if going so farre into the enemies countrey, to fight with him, being much weakened either by our losses in fighting, or by foule weather, whether we can with safetie recouer our owne ports: without doubt, in this case few would be faued, being knowne by experience (a dangerous doctrine of rash men) what bad counsell it is, to fol- low a mightie enemy, and to fight with him in the midst of his owne strength.

Both the Venetian Generalls opposed themselves against the opinion of the great Commander, so did Afcanio della Cornia, S. Fiora, and Serbelloni, but especially the General Colonna, who sought to insinuate with apparent reasons, and with the Popes authoritie, whose expresse commandement was, to find out the Turkes armie, and to fight with it. He C said, That he could in no sort yeeld to the opinion of Requesens, being a new proposition, and contrarie to the articles of the league, where it was chiefly propounded to make an offensive warre, and he taught them how they should still stand vpon their defence; which was nothing else, but to confirme the enemy in the opinion which he had conceiued of the small valour of the Christians, whereby he was growne more insolent. The confederat princes, said he, haue had a speciall care in their conuentions, to doe any thing that might daunt the pride of this enemy of Christendome, and that he should sensibly feele the va- lour of Christians. He will neuer feare any such power, if we, measuring all forces by the compasse of humane discourses, dare not promise vnto our selues any thing from the help of heauen: and yet let vs remember that we are the souldiers of Christ, that we fight for D Christ, and that being vnited vnder his banner, we need not feare that he will euer aban- don vs, if we shew not our selues distrustfull. But I will not lay the foundation of all our hopes vpon the miraculous helps of heauen, whereby I should seeme to confesse, that hu- mane force were not able to encounter, yea to vanquish this enemy. I should seeme to want judgement, to counsell a battell without constraint, and with apparent disadvan- tage, and to tempt the pleasure of God with the dangerous euent of a battell. Our armie then, in my opinion, is not so weake, nor the enemy so vigorous, that matters should be brought to that despaire, seeing that we haue here about 200 good galleies, better ap- pointed (according to the opinion of men of judgement) than the Turkes, the which would equall their advantage of number, if the same be true, that the Turkes haue three E hundred vessells. For gathering these vessells from diuers parts, they haue, to make an im- ber, assembled euerie small barke of pyrats, fitter to steale, & run away, than to fight. Wee must thinke that our souldiers do exceed the Turks in valour, who often with many thou- sands could not resist hundreds of our, and now, it may be, are not inferiour vnto them in number; if we shall wel examine the qualitie of their vessells and ours: and therein also we will vse your authority, who maintain, that we haue the flower of all the souldiers of Chri- stendome. And to what end then serues this multitude of galleies, these numbers of no- blemen and souldiers, and so much treasure wasted, onely to goe neere the enemy? nay, not to approach neere him, but to terrifie him with the fame of our forces, and seeing that he doth not flee, we to retire our selues into safetie. But if that be not to be thought on, yet F to keep him from proceeding any farther in Cyprus, nor to annoy any more those misera- ble coasts, those vnfortunat illands which be subject to the fire & sword of their barbarous cruelty. But we are to attempt more, to reuenge so many injuries received from them, so as the religious arms of Christians being as it were awaked from a long sleep, may be im- ploied in those actions which shalbe held worthe of their ancient glorie. And contrari- wise, what greater imputation can there bee vnto the name of Christians, than after two 1171 " such preparations within few monethes, not to dare to looke the enemy in the face? C

 " What hope will there then remaine to deliuer the realme of Cypres? What will the " world say of vs? Oh let there neuer any thought of such feare come into our hearts:
 " let vs not shew our selues so weake: let vs not so little esteeme the forts which are held " by the Catholike king, and the Commonweale of Venice: that in case any vnfor-
 " tune successe should befall our fleet, they should be a prey vnto the enemy. Princes " were wont to repose all their safetie in armies by land, or in fleets by sea; but since that " they haue found meanes to secure their countries with ports and frontire places well for" tified, they haue not much esteemed the losse of a battell at land or at sea, touching the " conquest of anothers dominions, for that the defence within walls is so long, as that H
 " prince which was a looser may repaire his forces, and come againe to fight with his ad-
 " uersaries. We haue now in hand the example of the realme of Cypres, the which al" though it be farre from their lords forces, yet two forts, and those not very well furnished,
 " haue made resistance aboue a yere, and there is yet hope to preferre it, sending some final " succours. And shall we feare, that so many strong places vpon this gulph, and vpon the " coast of Naples and Sicilie, shall be in an instant deuoured by the Turkish armie, if any " sinister fortune should befall our fleet, which God forbid. But if we (my Lord Com" maunder) shall runne into such apparent daunger, being at sea in these tempestuous " times of August, why will wee secure our enemies from the like daunger, when as they
 " after that imagined victorie, will saile ouer (being farre from their ports) the Mediterra- I " nean and Tirrene seas, in that dangerous season? And if you shall say vnto me, That " in the Spring they will attempt some conquest of importance, I will answer, That our " forts, and the countrey which lyes most subiect to daunger, shall be the better fortified.
 " And for prooffe hereof, this mightie Turkish fleet, although it hath not bene a " ny way hindered this yere by our galleys, they haue receiued great losses, comming neere vnto
 " yea in Candie, and in these seas, they haue receiued great losses, comming neere vnto
 " fortified places. But let it suffice to haue hitherto discoursed, to shew that the daunger " is not so great, nor so apparent, in case we should loose a battell. Let vs now come to " the consideration of the importance, and necessitie we haue to giue battell, and then of K
 " the certaine hope of the conquest, if we be victors. It is impossible to bridle and tame
 " the insolencie of the Turke whilst that hee is lord at sea, the which hee will alwayes
 " hold himselfe to bee, when as our nauie shall not dare to affront him with sufficient " forces, and that it is all one to flie the enemies sight, and to feare to receiue some harme:
 " but that feare doth not onely leaue him the possession of the sea free, and doth increase " his boldnesse with his force, but doth quite discourage the subiects, and giues them occa" sion to attempt things verie prejudiciall to the commonweale. Let vs then goe and seeke
 " this armie, to daunt the pride of the Turks, and to giue courage to the Christians: hauing " found it, let vs fight with it, hauing a firme confidence both in the helpe of heauen, and in " our owne forces, that we shall vanquish them. Let vs perswade our selues, that the repa- L
 " ration of the Christian name, and the honour of our princes, cannot be otherwise maintai" ned; for that being knowne that they haue two yeres together prepared for great a fleet, " with their incredible charge, and giuen it out, That they would fight with the Turkes, if " we should retire with such apparent signes of feare, I doe not see how we can auoid a ge" nerall imputation, either of want of government, or of extraordinarie cowardise. It is re" quisite then by all the reasons of warre, that for the importance of this action, and to auoyd
 " shame and dishonour, we should trie a battell, for that the losse thereof cannot be so prei-
 " udiciall as the Commaunders faith, and by a victorie we are to expect a great conquest, if
 " we will presently embrace the occasion, & reape the honorable fruits of so great an aduen-
 " ture. For it is apparent, that all the Turkes dominion is gouerned by most cruell tyrannie, M
 " & that his subiects (whether you will make an attempt vpon Albania, Morea, or Soria, yea
 " and in Thrace it selfe) as soone as they shal heare that his forces (who oppresseth them vn-
 " der the heauie yoke of barbarous seruitude) are ouerthrowne at sea, will attempt some inno-
 " uation, if they shal but see the Christians ensignes: so as the Turks seeing the enemy not " only round about them, but euen in their houses, they will find themselves in a verie hard " condition, & what remedy shal they find to escape, but they must endure themselves to be " trium-

A triumphed ouer by many Noble victories? It is not any vaine hope grounded vpon
 " desire, that makes mee to speake thus, seeing it is certaine that the Christians
 " in those Countries which I haue mentioned are more in number than the Turkes,
 " and although they bee vnarmed, yet are they not without courage, so as being armed by
 " vs, they will doe great seruice in any thing that shall bee attempted.
 " Besides, those coasts hauing not of many yeres seene a Christian Nauie, and not suf" ficiently fortified for such dangers, what resistance can they make against our victo" rious armie? If these great hopes should make vs resolute otherwise than the Commaun-
 " der hath propounded, should we not doe it the rather, for that it is the chiefe intent of " your king and my Lord to free Christendome from the oppression of the Barbarians, &
 " then to assure the Spanish Seas from the continuall spoiles, of Pyrats, Turkes, and Af" ricans? But his Maiestie shall neuer attaine to either of them, if their forces at Sea
 " be not first subdued: neither can they bee subdued, if wee doe not hazard a battell:
 " wee haue no hope to bee stronger at Sea the next yere than this, but rather to " decrease both in number and courage, hauing wisely performed so little, if wee shall " resolute as you aduise vs: what then remains to bee done, but that being forced wee " proceed with an assured hope, not of one, but of many worthy victories, and finding " out the enemy, fight with him, like the souldiers of Christ? So may it please his diuine
 " bountie, to abate their arrogancie, and to confound this their mightie fleet, the which I " assure my selfe cannot bee soone repaired, if there bee the flower of the Turkes
 " forces, as well of Captaines, as of priuate men, as wee suppose. But if our Prin" ces, as hee pretends, loosing the battell, should with all losse the best of their for" ces: why shall not wee with the same argument augment our hopes, our en-
 " mies being so much afflicted, for that our Princes exceed them much in men of " command; and for Sea-causes, I dare affirme that the State of Venice hath more valiant " Captaines than the Turke. Let vs not for Gods sake so much distrust our owne forces,
 " as our hearts should bee surprisid with amazement, and that deprivd of all genero-
 " sitie, yea, of pietie and Religion, wee should hold the enemy in that degree, and so
 " basely esteeme of our selues, and of the dignitie of the confederate princes, hauing in " D manner no faith, that the supreme power which hath giuen them these forces, will also
 " preferue and increase them; with their ruine that are his cruell enemies, for the pro" pagation of which faith we haue put on these armes, the which being guided by his " victorious hand, must needs yeeld glorious trophies, both in life and death, if wee will " not defraud our selues of this certaine hope.

D. John was in the flower of his age, and retaining that generous and warlike minde
 " of his father, hee inclined to his Councell, who with so many reasons propounded,
 " so honourable a party, and worthie of such a prince, notwithstanding that the com" mand had bene giuen him by his brother as a Schoolemaster or guide: and with " this resolution hee caused the Nauy to bee diligently viewed and furnished, and gaue
 " E order how they should goe forth in battell. But, there fell out an accident which had al" most ouerthrowne the whole action, and deprivd them of immortal glorie. Some of the " kings Souldiers being placed in a Venetian Galley, they fell to quarrell with others that " were in the same galley, so as there were some hurt & slain. Veniero the general sent some " officers with his admirall to bring the offenders vnto him, but they being distempered
 " receiued the admirall with iniuries, wherewith Veniero being much incensed, hee caused " the offenders to be apprehended, & would haue two of the with their captain Anticastro hãg-
 " ed at the main yard. After which Paulo Sforza their Colonel, going to speake with Veniero,
 " he would not hear him, threatening him that if he did not depart, he would turn his ordinace
 " vpon him & sink his boat. D. John was wonderfully discontented with the general Venieros
 " F actiõ, holding himself much wrõged; for that he had not referred the iudgement to him,
 " as it was fit, but had chased away Colonell Sforza, whom hee had sent, with threats and " disgrace. The whole armie was suddenly in a mutinie, the Spaniards seemed to prepare " themselves to reuenge, and the Venetians stood vpon their guard. But Colonna with great
 " dexteritie (although hee held himselfe wronged therein by Veniero) fought to preuent
 " this growing mischief. Barberigo laboured in like manner, who with great eloquence
 " and Veniero incen-

 " sed against the " Spanish Souldi-
 " ers.

D. John discon-
 " tented with the " General Venie-
 " ros.

1569 and iudgement, so pacified Colonna first, and then D. John as they were content to G preferre the generall good of Christendome, before their owne priuate respects; yet they would not that Veniero should treat any more with them concerning any businesse, neither as a publicke person, nor as a priuate, but that Barbarigo should supplie his place vntill they had further order from Venice. The third of October they went forth in the same order that they should fight, and bent their countes towards Cephalonia, where they had newes that did much trouble them, for that by a fregate dispatcht from Candie, they had letters brought them from Marino Canalli, wherein was related the losse of the Realme of Cypres, by letters intercepted in a Galeot the which were sent after the taking of Famagosta from the generall Mustafa to Aly, H whereof they presently sent aduice to Venice. Comming to Val d' Alexandria, which was the ancient Samos, they returned againe to Councell, where hearing for certaine that the Turkes were in the gulphe of Lepanto, they refolued after much disputation, to goe to the mouth of it, and not meeting first with the Turkes, to set vpon two forts called Dardanelli, to force the enemye to fight, or with the losse of their gallies to runne to land: with this resolution they parted the sixt of October, and came to the Ilands called Curzulares, where earlye in the morning they had view of the Turkish armie, which came out of the mouth of the gulfe in good order. The generall Aly had beene informed by Caracoffa, who had gone to discouer the Christians, with what intent they failed that way, in what order, and how many vessels they were: so as opening at that instant the great Turkes letter, which by his order should be red as soone as the enemies fleet approacht, they saw it was his mind they should fight, and ruin the Christians forces. The Commander s of the Turkish Nauy being very resolute to incounter the Christians, and to shut them vp in the chanell of Cephalonia, being small, where as Caracoffa had viewed them, had newly fortified their army with renne thousand Iani-faries Spahies, & voluntaries, which Mehemet Bei had broght, with great store of victuals & munition, and 100 Sangiacs & Alobei, which are men of fittle, a degree vnder a Sâgiac. But the Christians parted from Cephalonia, and Val d' Alexandria, towards the Curzolares, where the sea is verie streit, & full of shells, & rocks, which the Turks took for an aduantage.

 Thus both armies were refolued to fight, & were put in baret in form of a Croisfant. In the right wing of the Christians armie were fiftie and three gallies, whereof John Andrew Do- K ria had charge, hauing before him two Venetian galleasses, and at his backe the admirall galley of Saucy, in the which was the duke of Vrbino. On the left wing were the like nûber of gallies & galleasses, commanded by Augustin Barbarigo Proueditor general for the Venetians, being assisted by the admirall galley of Genoua, in the which was the prince of Parma. Betwixt these two wings was the bodie of the battell, consisting of 70 gallies and two galleasses, and in the midst of center thereof, the three generalls with their royall gallies, D. John in the midst, Sebastian Veniero general for the Venetians on the left had, and Marc Antonio Colonna general of the Popes gallies on the right: behind the, as it were in the reereward, where D. Aluaro Bassan Marquesse of Saint Cruz with thirty gallies: and in the front of them was D. John of Cardona with eight gallies as a forlorne hope. On the other side Aly opposed against John Andrew Doria 96 gallies commanded by Pluccialy, against the Proueditor Barbarigo, he set 55 gallies vnder the charge of Mehemet Bei and Si- rocco, and Aly himselfe with Portau Bassan (who was general of the land forces) were in the midst against D. John with 96 gallies, and the rest of the gallies were appointed in the reere to succour them, with many foistes and brigandins, to passe from place to place with the Generalls commandemens. D. John went in person to view the armie, being accompanied by Lewis de Cardona and John Soto: hee was in white armour, hauing in his hand a Crucifix, going from place to place in a most swift fregat animating the souldiers, and telling them, that they had not him for their Captaine and leader, but that great God alone, whose humane shape, being dead vpon the crosse, to saue the whole world, they saw in his hands. Hee put them in minde that they did fight for the great God of victories, to whom all humane powers yeeld obedience: that hee was their Generall and their guide, and the gouernour of euerie mans actions, promising to euerie man that day an honourable and glorious victorie, whereof nothing could deprue

Order of the Christian armie.Order of the Turkes armie.D. Johns speech to the armie.

1571

Lib. 29.

A deprive them, vnlesse they trusted to obtaine it. His words were short, but deliue-red with such efficacy, as it made all them that heard him weepe for ioy, who with a preface of their future successe, began to crie victorie, wherewith hee was much contented; and so hauing saluted the Generall Veniero verie courteously, reioycing to see that reuerent old man of seuentie and fise yeares old, in an action where hee must fight as well as command, hee retired to his galley: and then hee set vp the standard of the league, which was a Crucifix in a red field, in signe of battell. Whereupon Aly did presently discharge a canon, and D. John answered him in like manner. John Andrew Doria did an act of iudgement, stretching forth his right wing into the sea, & gi-uing meanes to the rest to doe the like, to the end they should not be compassed in by the Turkes gallies, who were in all places more in number, the which did auail them much.
Barbarigo, Anthony Canale, Marc Anthony Quirin, and others which did assist him, kept as neere the land as they could, so as they could not be charged in flanke but only in front, the which Sirocco and Aly a renegado of Genoua sought to doe; and when they were put to rout (which began among the enemies which Barbarigo had in front) hee kept them that they could not escape, and made a wonderfull spoile of them.

The battell of Lepanto.

The fight grew hot, and the Canon of either side plaied furidly, wherein the Christians were somewhat fauoured by the wind, the which in the beginning being in their faces, changed instantly as the battell begonne, and carried the smoake into their enemies eies. In the beginning the two Generalls Gallies, of D. John and Aly Bassa affronted one another, about the which the combat was very hot. In D. Johns gallies there were foure hundred Harquebuziers and Musketiers, vnder D. Lope de Figueroa their Commander; in the prow were D. Michel de Moncada, D. Bernardin de Cardines, and Salazar, Captaine of the Citadell of Palermo; in the midst were D. Fran- cisco Zapate and Lewis Carrillo; and in the poupe D. John, with the great Commaunder of Castille, the Earle of Plego, D. Lewis de Cordona, Roderigo de Benauides, D.
John de Guzman, D. Philip de Heredia, Ruy Dias de Mendoza, and others. In Aly Bassa galley were foure hundred Ianifaries, shot, and some Archers tryed men, who fought verie valiantly against D. Johns Spaniards, who entred twice into the Turkes Admirall, and were valiantly repulst by them, Aly being succoured by diuers others gallies which were about him; but such was the resolution of the Christians, as they became masters thereof, Marc Antonio Colonna arriuing, in whose galley was the Commander Romeias, who wanted neither iudgement nor courage. Aly Bassa was slaine, and in a maner all that were in his galley; his head was cut from his bodie, and presented vnto D. John, who caused it to be set vpon the end of a pike for a spectacle to encourage the Christians to pursue the victorie, and to daunt the Turkes, who began then to faint. John Andrew Doria was also Victor on his part, but some said that hee might haue done better if hee had list, for hee suffered Pluccialy to escape. In these actions there is no man troubled but such as are in them, the rest speake at pleasure. The most furious combat was in the left wing of the armie, whereas the Proueditor Barbarigo commaunded, who left scarce any one of the enemies gallies, but was broken, sunk, or taken. This wise and valiant Captaine was shot into the eye with an arrow, whereof hee dyed. Portau Bassa fled away in a boat fleeing Aly slaine and the battell lost. Caracoffa Gouvernour of Valona a famous Pyrat, was slaine by Honorat Gaietan, Captaine of one of the Popes Gallies. The valour of Martin de Padille was great; who with his onely galley took three of the enemies. It was an horrible spectacle to see the Sea dyed with bloud, full of dead Carakasses and peeces of gallies.
 Many fought to runne themselves on ground, but they were prevented by the Venetian gallies: many Turkes cast themselves into the Sea, thinking to saue their liues by swimming, but they fainted and perished before they got to land. It was the greatest victorie that had beene at Sea in many ages. The battell continued eighteene houres, wherein they spent some part of the night: there died about fise and twen-tie thousand Turkes, and almost all the Commanders: others write that there were fiftene thousand Turkes slaine, and seuen thousand Christian; and some write thir-teene thousand. There were taken and carried away one hundred and seuentene gallies,

Aly Bassa slaine

Victory of the Christians.Number of the dead.

gallies, and thirteenth Gallies, and many were funke, the number whereof was vnknowne; there were some thirte and nine gallies, gallies, and foits which escaped and came to Lepanto, which reliques Plucially had charge to conduct to Constantinople, yet they were so ill handled, as hee was faine to leaue fixe of them behind. They tooke one hundred and seuentene Canons, and two hundred fiftie and eight small peeces of Ordnance: some number three thousand eight hundred fortie and fixe prisoners, and some 5000, among which were the two Sons of Aly Bassa, Sirroc gouernor of Negropont was taken, but he was so wounded, as he died sooneafter: his wife, who was exceeding faire, was also taken prisoner. There were 15000 Christian slaues set at libertie. The Christians, besides priuat men, lost 14 Captaines of gallies, and sixty knightes of Malta, and aboute eight thousand that were hurt of men of name, there were slaine Angustin Barbarigo the Prouiditor, with fifteene other gentlemen of Venice: D. Bernardin de Cardine a Spaniard, Horatio and Viginio Vrsini, with diuers others: and of wounded D. Iohn himselfe, the Generall Veniero, Paul Iouardin Vrsini, the earle of Santa Fiora, Troilo Sannelli, and Thomas de Medicis. They found in Alys galley two and twentie thousand peeces of gold called Soldanini, and in that of Caracoffa forty thousand. The whole prey was diuided at Port Caligiero, some write at Corfu, to euerie one of the confederates according to the rate: the king of Spaine had of fix parts three, the state of Venice two, and the Pope one; and all the captaines and fouldiers were commended and rewarded for their good seruice. After which D. Iohn, Marc Antonio Colonna, and D. Iohn Andrew Doria, retired to Messina, whereas they found that the Marquesse of Pescara the Viceroy was newly dead, hauing frequented women too much. Marc Antonio Colonna went to Rome, & the great Commander of Castille with him, to treat with the Pope rouching the next yeres seruice for the league, and to goe to his gouernment of the duchie of Milan, which the king had giuen him after the death of the duke of Albuquerque. This victorie was wonne the tenth of October 1571 without any further pursuit, for the opinions of the commanders depending of sundrie masters were diuers, and also for that the season of the yeare was too farre spent.

The duke of Alba being incensed against the Queen of England, for that she had stained his money, and as hee thought fauoured the Rebels of the Netherlands vnder hand, he studied how to crosse her, and to cause some troubles in her Countie, and to giue the better forme to that which had been begun by his praesides, hee sent Chiapin Vitella vnder colour to treat with her of the composition of reprisals, and restitution of that which had been taken from king Philips subiects, but hee gaue him secret instructions against that state, if hee might conueniently effect them. There was no meane to come to any accompt for the spoiles which were taken by the English from any of the king of Spaines subiects or adherents, for that they were either waisted by priuar men, or else the truth could not be verified. Wherefore Vitelli was sent backe with good words, and could doe nothing in that respect. And as for the enterprises whereof hee had charge to conferre with certaine Noble men discontented with the present gouernment, hee could not worke any thing; for during his aboad in England, hee was carefully obserued, yet the Pope had his Spies and Negotiators in the countie, and did sollicite king Philip to helpe to deprime the queen both of her crowne and life, and that the Roman Catholikes, and such as vnder that pretext desired innouations, might be the Masters. To effect this, they had need both of men and money, but especially of a stranger to bee their leader, such a one as the duke of Alba, whom they held to be fitter than any other. The king whither through importunitie or willingly, being full of other affaires yielded, and it happened that Chiapin Vitelli after his retume from England, coming into Spaine to craue leaue of the king, for that he was called into Italie, by some princes, vnto whom hee was bound, was stayed, and sent backe into Flanders with instructions to the duke of Alba, to entertaine the praesides of the malecontents of England: but this froward and disdainfull man, being incensed for that they had refused him the gouernment of the Netherlands for D. Frederic his sonne, and that the duke of Medina Celi was in fent to succeed him, hee contented and ouer-threw all that praeside, where without doubt he might haue done much harme.

News

A Newes being come to Fleisging that the duke of Medina Celi, was arrived neere unto Ostend with forty vessels, they sent forth twelve Ships of warre, who tooke diuers of them, and the duke was forced with twelue more to fly to land in a cocke boat. Hee thought at his coming thither that all troubles had beene pacified: but seeing that there was more confusion than euer, and greater ruines than hee could repair, he excused himselfe for not accepting the gouernment, and demanded leaue to returne; the which was some dishonour to the duke of Alba.

This year the king of Spaine being ielous of the French king, least hee should aid his subiects of the Netherlands was verie irrefolute in giuing aid vnto the league, his Ministers in Italie propounding new enterprises in Afrike, as well for the hope which the king of Tunis gaue them, as to free the coast of Spaine from that nest of Pyrats. The which did much distast the Pope, hee beeing verie desirous to see some better fruits of their victorie, and that the league might continue inuiolably, with like conditions that it was made. Whereupon the kings Ministers were forced to discouer vnto his Holinesse the feare they had of the French, least they should countenance his subiects in the Low Countries: but the Pope being assured of the contrarie by the French king, hee grew discontented against the Spaniards, as if they had inuented it, to reape all the benefit they could of that warre, transporting it into Afrike, notwithstanding the ielousie increased; and although they made prouision of all sides, to send forth a mighty armie, yet they proceeded coldly and found many delaies.

found many delays.
 Pope Pius being newly dead, although the Pope did shew himself very desirous to maintain the league, and did solicit it earnestly, yet it required much time; and the Spaniards being discontented that they could not draw the armie against some places in Afrike, from whence they received great annoyance, were slowe in execution this yere. Yet after many delays, D. John general of the league could not avoid it, but granted two and twenty gallies to the confederats, and fixe thousand foot to be distributed among their gallies, himselfe remaining at Messina, with the rest of the armie, to succour where his Majesties occasions should require, if the French should shew themselves enemies.
 D There parted then from Messina Marc Antonio Colonna, with the gallies of the Church, and the knight Gil d' Andrada, whome D. John had made Commander of the king of Spaines two and twenty gallies, and being ioynd at Corfu with James Foscarin, who was newly made general for the State of Venice, Veniero being dissint, in favor of D. John they thought to haue some certain intelligence of the enemies fleet, being come forth vnder the comand of Placcialy, who was much made of & esteemed by Selim for those poore spoiles which he got of the knights of Malta, being a signe that hee had fought and vanquished, although his companions in the battel had bin defeated, and forced to flee: who like a politick & courageous Captaine, did so solicit new prouisions of an armie, shewing that the losse was not so great as the amazed multitude did esteeme it, as hee put his Lord E in better hope. Having drawne all his forces together, he had a fleet of two hundred gal-lies, galleots and foists, with five galleasses, with the which they sailed towards Maluagia.
 The general Colonna, who in the absence of D. John held the first place, & Foscarin, hearing where the enemy was, after consultation, they went to fight with him, having 140 gallies 23 ships, six galleasses, and thirty smaller barkes descouering them as they parted from Dragoniere; but for that the wind was contrarie, they could make no vse of their galle-asses, which kept them from fighting. But Placcialys fleet being more in number than in force, he thought it sufficient to keep the enemy that yere from attempting any matter of importance, and not to hazard a battell: and therefore still in his retreat he made a shew as if he would fight, with which art he fled from them with reputation. At that time D. John F had a resolute answer from the Catholike king, that he might ioine with the army of the league with all his forces, and attempt some thing against the Turke, whar they should thinke most fit: whereof hee had aduertised the Generals at Corfu, at such time as they had resolved to goe and affront the enemy, so as they thought it not fit to stay and attend him, as hee desired. But Placcialy being retired, and the Ge-neralls being come to Capfali vnder Cerigo, there they had letters from D. John,
 who

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 29.

who called them backe to Zante, and then to Corfu, whether after many difficulties they brought the armie: but D. John would not willingly free the generals, especially Colonna, for that they had not attended him; whereupon their resolutions against the enimie fell out crossly; but Folcarin and others laboured by all means to pacifie that disdain: and they made a new resolution to goe against the enimies fleet, which they vnderstood lay in the port of Nauarino, and some vnder Modone.

The Christians had sayled as farre as Striuali, when as D. John de Cardone, being sent to discouer the enimie, gaue them that aduice, which made them resolute to hasten their voyage that night, so as they might bee vpon the enimie before day; the which was better deuised than executed, for they arriued so late, as being first discouered by the Turkes, they might retire with all their fleet, vnder the fort of Modone, and defend themselves long from the Christians armie, who sought by diuers means, but alwaies in vaine to draw them out of the fort to fight. They refused, for that they would not remaine there in vaine, to beseege the Castle of Nauarino, a place of fame, hauing giuen the charge thereof to the prince of Parma, but with weake prouisions, where hee preuailed nothing, they being soone relieved by land with many horse and foot, by the garrisons thereabouts.

Hauing staid in those seas some daies, being in October, and fearing an Autumne storme, and the kings Gallies beginning to want biscuit, they were constrained to depart: the which did much discontent the Ministers of the State of Venice, for that they had spent that time, wherein they had designed great enterprises, without any fruit, but with incredible charge. The Navy then returned towards Corfu, leauing the passage free for Vlucially to retire to Constantinople, at such time as hee beganne to feare the euent. D. John hauing retyred to Sicile, and from thence to Naples, Marc Antonio Colonna, and Doria went into Spaine to relate vnto the king what had bene done that yeare; and Colonna to free himselfe of some imputations laied vpon him by such as did malice his greatesse, wherein hee did preserve his honour, and returned into Italie with great reputation.

After the arrest of the English Merchants, and their goods both in Spaine and the Low-Countries as you haue heard, the English sought all means to bee reuenged of the Spaniards. Some vpon their owne coast, and others went vnto the Indies: Among which Master Francis Drake, who was then a man of no great note, with the helpe of other aduenturers manned forth two ships and a Pynnace, and went to Nombre de Dios in Noua Hispania, where hearing that the Towne was not very well peopled, hee landed in the night with one hundred and fiftie men, whereof he put seauenty into a fort, and the rest seized vpon the market place, the inhabitants in this amazement flying to the Mountaines, but soone after they within the fort apprehending that their companions in the Towne had bene all slaine, for that they had heard some shot, and their trumpet did not answere them. They retyred inconsiderately to their Pinnace, which they of the Towne finding, made all the hast they could to get to their ships. Thus Master Drake without any losse but a Trumpeter, and hauing slaine but one man within the towne, retyred much discontented from Nombre de Dios. After which hee came to the sound of Darien, where hauing conference with certaine Negros which had fled from their Master of Panama and Nombre de Dios, they did aduertise them of certaine Mules which were to passe from Panama to Nombre de Dios laden with gold and siluer, whereupon hee landed a hundred shot, and went to attend them with these Negros, where hee tooke two troupes of them, hauing none but their driuers, being without any feare: hee unladed the Mules and tooke the gold onely, being vnable (as some of them write) to carrie the siluer through the Mountaines. Within two daies after he came to a place called the house of Croffes, where hee slue siue or six Merchants: he found not any gold nor siluer there, but much merchandize, & fired the house with the goods being valued at about two hundred thousand ducats, & thence his went to his ships: presently after there came downe three hundred shot, Spaniards, but it was too late.

The

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A The Venetians seeing that there was no likelihoode to make their profite by the support of this league, and that in this warre they had lost the realme of Cyprus, spent foure millions of ducats, and recovered not any one place of importance; finding also, that the Spaniards after all their delays, would still be masters, command in all their counsels, and haue the honour of all executions; they resolved to make a peace with the Turke, by the mediation of the French King, and the diligence of Marc Antonio Barbaro their Consull, who had bene staid at Constantinople, the which was concluded vpon restitution of certaine small places in Dalmatia, and 300000 crownes which the Venetians should pay vnto the Turke at three payments. The Senate being certified of the conclusion, they sent their embassadours to the Pope and catholike King to iustifie their actions: Pope Gregorie the thirteenth was discontented, but there was no remedie, for hee must allow of their reasons, which seemed pertinent.

B The King of Spaine seemed no wayes distasted with this peace of the Venetians, but would shew by the effects, that hee was able of himselfe, without the help of any other, to maintaine continuall warre against the Turke, for the defence of Christendome, and not only defend himselfe from him, but make warre against him at his doore. He therefore commanded that the fleet which was prepared at Naples and Sicile, should goe and attempt some thing in the Leuant Seas, or be employed to annoy Vlucially vpon the coast of Africke, where hee had expelled Amida out of the realme of Tunes, for that hee had performed all duties to the King of Spaine, and paid the tribute which his father had promised to the Emperour Charles: the which did much displease the Turkes holding Alger and other places in Africke, who procured Selim approbation to haue him dispossessed, and another set in his place, who should be more at his deuotion, the which was executed by Vlucially: wherefore King Philippe thinking that he had an interest therein, and that it was necessarie to weaken the Turke forces in those partes, being greatly suspected to Sicile, and other parts of Italie, which Countries the Turkes desired much to ioine vnto his empire, hee sent commaundement to D. John by Soto his Secrerarie, whom hee had sent into Spaine to that end, that hee should employ the gallies hee had readie in this expedition which would be verie profitable for Christendome, whilest that the Turkes forces were but weake at sea, to attempt a succour so farre off.

D In the meane season there was great means made for the deliuerie of Aly Bassa sons, which had bene taken at the battell, whom D. John had obtained from the Confederates with great instance, but one of them was dead before, to his great griefe, that hee could not wholie gratifie the mother: wherefore he sent him home that was liuing, called Mosmed, accompanying him with a dwarf of his owne, and foure Turkes that had bene taken with him, and many presents which the mother had sent vnto his Highnesse, in signe of honour, but he refused to accept them, and wrote the reason thereof vnto her, wherein he shewed the greatnesse of his mind. I haue forborne, said hee, to accept the present which you sent me, and Mosmed hath it, not for that I doe not esteeme it, as come from your hands, but for that the greatnesse of my ancestors is not accustomed to receiue gifts from such as are forced to flie vnto them for saueur.

E The armie beeing ready for the enterprise of Tunis D. John parted with the Duke of Sessa, Antonio Doria, John Andrew, and other noblemen, on the eight day of September 1573 from the port which in old time was called Lilybee, and had bene long neglected, (notwithstanding that it be one of the best ports in the Island, and had bene much vied by the Romans in the Carthaginian warres) others write that they went from Palermo. There was in the fleet one hundred and sixteene gallies, foure and thirtie shippes, and other vessells of burthen. The Duke of Florence did send six gallies to this enterprise, vnder the command of Simon de Rossermini. They landed at Goulette, whereas they found not any difficulty, to keep them from entering into Tunis, for it had bene abandoned vpon the brute of their comming, and all the Moores and Turkes were fled to the mountaines and defarts, carrying away all their goods, yea their victuals: yet the King that was aduanced by Vlucially was taken prisoner: Biferia a city some forty miles from Tunis was recovered with the like facility, yielding by the persuation of Amida, who thought by this conquest to recover his estate.

Q 9999

The

Christian army retires to Corfu.Sir Francis Drake's first voyage to the Indies.Peace betwixt the Turke and the Venetians.Ridout of
the King of Spaine to Naples
March 2. 1573.
the Turke.Some of Aly Bassa's son liberty by D. JohnEnterprise of Tunis.

Fort built at Tunis.

D. John effects to be King of Tunis.

D. Diego prince of Spaine borne

Amida and Goulette recovered by the Turkes.

Porto Carrero
an indifferet gouernour of Goulette.

The matter being called in question, there were many of the Kings counsell in Spaine, G and of D. Johns, of opinion that Tunis should be demanded, & Goulette raised, for that those places brought nothing but charge vnto the King, but they were not beleueed: yea it was concluded to fortifie the City better, and to make a new fort betwixt it and Goulette, and to ioyne the fort vnto the towne by two long curtines; to beate downe the old wall of the towne, and to lay it open towards the fort. For the effecting whereof Gabriel Serbelloni had the charge, and was made Colonell generall of the garrison that should bee left there, which should consist of fixe thousand men, three thousand Spaniards vnder the commaund of Salezar, and three thousand Italians vnder Pagan Dorria: afterwards they said that D. John led eight thousand men there, with labourers sufficient for the fortification, and a troupe of horse. D. John having thus ordered all things, hee returned happily to Messina, and then to Naples, where he was receiued with much ioy in November, being assured that the Turke could not send a fleet from Constantiople to Barbarie, vntill the next yeare, and that in the meane time Serbelloni should haue leisure to fortifie. D. Pedro Porto Carrero was gouernor in Goulette, a man more respected for his birth, than for his iudgement and knowledge in martiall affaires: he was preferred vnto it (no man knowes the reason) in the place of D. Alphonso Pimentell, an indolent and a valiant captaine. In Tunis there was left more like a gouernour than King) Mahomet brother to Amida, who was alwayes opposite vnto him: some write hee was but his cousin, and as for Amida, he was carried backe into Sicile, whereas in former time they had seene his father Muley Hassen, disposedd and made blind by him, and with him was the King whom Pluccially had aduanced in his place: for that Amida had giuen D. John some cause to suspect him; yet some write it was for that the Moores did hate him deadly for his crueltie. This happie exploit of D. Johns, made him to discouer his intentions more plainly vnto the Pope, which was, to remaine King of Tunis, with the good liking of King Philip his brother: continuing in this opinion, he intreated the Pope to be Intercessour for him; taking counsell both in this and all other affaires of his Secretarie John de Soto, whom hee fauoured so much, as he caused him to marrie (about that time) with the baronesse of Saint Philadelphus at Palermo: the which did nothing please the King, as we will shew hereafter. But the Sultan Selim did soone make him loose that desire. D. John being come to Naples from the taking of Tunis, their ioy and feasts were doubled: hauing receiued newes, that King Philip had another sonne, the which being christned was called D. Diego. He staid there some moneths much honoured: then hee passed into Lombardie, being called into Spaine by his brother; but he went not by reason of the Turkes successe at the enterprise of Goulette.

The great Turke being much incensed for the taking of Tunis, by a young man, who had so much preuailed over his forces, as after that he had in a manner disarmed him at sea, he had dispossessed a King which had beene placed by him at Tunis, and set an other in his place, which was contrarie vnto him: hee sent in the yeere one thousand five hundred twenty and foure Sinan Bassa into Barbarie, with a nauie of one hundred and three score gallies, thirty shippes, with many galecons, foists and other small vessells, carrying twenty thousand harquebuziers, and almost as many archers, with great store of ordnance, and at land they had fiftene thousand Moores and Arabians on horse backe. At the newes of this great fleet, the viceroys of Naples and Sicile made preparation to defend their gouernement, if the Turke should make any attempt vpon them. D. John had commaundement to furnish Goulette, (where as we haue said Porto Carrero was gouernour) who required certaine money of cardinal Granuelle then viceroys of Naples, for the leuying of certaine men to send thither, the which he refused, saying that he had no other charge, but to preferre the country which he had in gouernement. So as Tunis and Goulette were left to their defence that were in them: where the Commanders did not agree amongst themselves; for Porto Carrero could not endure that any man should thinke hee wanted counsell, or that he was not verie sufficient to defend Goulette; taking it in ill part, that Gabriel Serbelloni should presume to send him five ensignes of Italians, to fortifie his garrison, saying that he would not impart the honour of the gard, and defence thereof to any but to his owne nation: but it was not long before he changed his opinion; for whenas he

Strife among the Moores.

Ignorance of Porto Carrero.

Goulette 22.
taken by June.

Fort at Tunis taken by assault.

A he saw the fields covered with Moores and Arabes; which they of Alger and Caruan had sent about Tunis, as fore runers to Sinan Bassas army, which arriued soone after, he then demanded men of Serbelloni importunately, protesting that if he sent him not some, he should be the cause of the losse of Goulette. King Mahomet thoughtd haue filled forth with nine hundred horse, and foure thousand soore of his owne nation, against these troupes of Moores; but he was suddenly abandoned by his trecherous, and disloyall subjects, so as with three score horse only, being supported by the Regiment of Salezar, and some Spanish horse, he elaped. Serbelloni being grieved with these accidents, thought that it was no time now to regard the vanities of Porto Carrero, but went himselfe to view the estate of the garrison of Goulette, when hauing caused some faults in the fortification to be amended, he returned to his fort, where hee made them to labour with all diligence to put it in defence, vnd the citie also, but they gaue him too great respite: for the Turkes army being landed, and meaning at the first to assault Goulette, Sinan sent Aydar king of Caruan to besiege Tunis, the which he did, and battered it furiously with a great quantitie of ordnance, so as Serbelloni resolved to leaue it, and to defend his fort betwixt the citie & Goulette, the which was presently inuested by the Moores towards the towne, but he scattered them often by his continuall sallies, and flew great numbers. Goulette being besieged, Porto Carrero did importune Serbelloni to send him help, the which he did by the lake: but the Turkes did soone take that passage from them, making a long bridge of barques bound together, and thereon as it were a causey of earth, whereon they placed many musketiers. The batterie planted against the bastion which looked towards the sea, made a great breach, where the Turkes gaue a terrible assault, with bridges made of mameyours, according to their custome, the which notwithstanding was defended by the valour of the Christians: but Porto Carrero did either forget the duties whereunto men besieged are bound, or hee did not know them: Hee neuer would suffer his men to make a sallie, it seemes hee feared to wast powder and shot, so as the Turkes had good meanes to view the fort, to lodge, and to plant their ordnance at their pleasures: And to shew the great arrogancie of this gouernour, whereas Antonie Carrase a gentleman of Naples sought to giue him good aduice, he caused him to be strangled & to be cast in a sacke into the sea. Serbelloni, although he had need of all his strenght within the fort, yet knowing the importance of Goulette, he weakened himselfe to fortifie it, being continually called on by D. Pedro, and sent him men as he could; yet could he not prevent it, but that Goulette was taken by force, Sinan hauing caused a general assault to be giuen, the which was continued with such fresh supplies one after an other without intermission, as they within it were no longer able to make any more resistance, but were forced, and all (or the greatest part) put to the sword: some write that Porto Carrero with three hundred soldiers were made slaues, and that the sonne of King Amida was taken in that place. Goulette being taken, the Turkes went and besieged the fort both by sea and land, hauing filled certaine great barques with packes of wooll wex, to choake their cannon shot, and planted many harquebuziers in them, with long towling peeces, which carried very great bullets, to keepe the besieged from their defences. Sinan made batteries, and cast vp trenches to approach vnto the fort, as he was accustomed, to batter, sappe, and mine at one instant in diuers places; where hauing made great breaches, hee caused three seuerall assaults to be giuen, but they were all resolutely defended; and hee caused fire to be set to a mine, the which did more harme vnto the Turkes than vnto the besieged. The assaults were continued vnto the fourth time, & still they were repulld with great slaughter: but this valor decreasing by litle and litle through their ordinary assaults, they were loeweake at the last, which was generall and more obstinate than any of the rest, as the place was forced, and all within cut in peeces. excepted Serbelloni, who was taken being wounded, and drawne by the beard before the Bassa, who caused him to be kept. Pagan Dorria flying the Turkes, and thinking to find more mercie with the Moores, was slaine by them, and his head set vpon a pike. Porto Carrero being a prisoner, died within few dayes after, (as some say) of poison. D. John de Sinoghera after these two losses, was left alone with three hundred and fiftie men to defend the tower vpon the lake, standing betwixt Tunis and Goulette, the which (although it were very strong, yet considering his owne strength, strength, and the enemies, he could not hope to make any long defence) he yielded vpon certain conditions, and passed afterwards into Sicile, to carrie newes of this great losse. Thus Gouletie (the honour of the Emperours conquests, the which kept Afrike in awe) was lost through carelesse Sinan caused it to be rased to the ground, and then returned triumphantly to Constantinople.

D. Sebastian King of Portugall gets into affike.

17 This yere the Christians reaped both losse and dishonour in Afrike, for D. Sebastian the yong King of Portugall, of too warlike a disposition, as we haue shewed, and desirous of glorie, seeking to aduance himselfe by some enterprises against the Moores, hauing not imparted any thing vnto the Queene his grandmother, nor vnto the Cardinall his vncle, by whose care his actions should haue bene gouerned, by reason of his age, which was voyd of experience: He sent D. Antonio Prior of Crato his cosin, but base, to Tanger in Afrike, which did belong vnto the Crowne of Portugall, and made him his lieutenant generall there, deliuering him the Standard with great solemnitie. He would haue him accompanied with some numbers of soldiers, but specially with many knights: and within few dayes after the King himselfe, taking many of the chiefe noble men with him, imbarked at Cascais, whenas no man suspected it, and went in like maner into Afrike, leauing order in Portugall, that some knights should follow him, and therefore hee did write many priuat letters vnto them. Being come to Tanger, and hauing tried the Moors forces in the neighbour garrisons, and seeing his men in all their skirmishes to be ouerlaid with multitudes, and the nimbleness of the enemies horse, he beganne to consider better of the daunger wherinto he had runne, of whom depended the peace and quiet of his whole Realme; and so being better aduised by some noble men of authoritie that were with him, but especially being moued by a letter written by father Lewis Gonzales a Iesuite, who had bene his Scholemaster, and was then in great credit with him, he resolved to returne presently.

THE

THE 30 BOOKE OF THE Historie of Spaine.

The Contents.

- 1 D. Lewis de Requefens great Commander of Castille, sent gouernour into the Low Countries for King Philip.
- 2 D. Iohn of Austria sent Gouernour into the Low Countries.
- 3 Death of D. Iohn of Austria.
- 4 Xerxes Kings of Alaroc and Fez, their beginning and proceeding.
- 5 D. Sebastian first of that name King of Portugall.
- 6 He led an armie into Afrike.
- 7 Battell in Afrike, and death of D. Sebastian.
- 8 D. Henry 17 King of Portugall, a Cardinall.
- 9 Pretendants to the Crowne of Portugall.
- 10 D. Anthonie Prior of Crato a bastard, made legitimate, disannulled by King Henric.
- 11 True gouernours in Portugall during the inter-reigne.
- 12 Death of the King D. Henric.
- 13 Confusions in Portugall during the inter-reigne.
- 14 The king D. Philip meanes to debate his right by armes.
- 15 Advice and Councell of the Doctours in Spaine touching the Kings title.
- 16 D. Antonio is declared Defender of the Realme against King Philips forces, and then is slayed King.
- 17 Duke of Alba generall of the King of Spaines armie in Portugall, and his exploits.
- 18 Defeat and flight of D. Antonio, and the taking of Lisbon.
- 19 Death of D. Anna Queene of Spaine.
- 20 D. Antonio layes aside armes and retires himselfe.
- 21 Articles granted by the King D. Philip to the Estates and realme of Portugall.
- 22 D. Philip receiued and acknowledged for King at Lisbon.
- 23 Terceres Islands, their conquest, and the rout of the French armie.
- 24 D. Philips sonne Prince of Spaine acknowledged and sworn at Lisbon.
- 25 Absolute conquest of the Terceres, by the defeat of Emanuel de Silva, and of Monsieur de Chatters.

¶ All the Realmes of Spaine vnited to the Crowne of Castille vnder D. Philip the second.

Great Commander of Castille sent gouernour into the Low Countrie.

On Lewis de Requesens great Commander of Castille was sent to succeed the D. of Alba in the gouernment of the Low Countries after that the duke of Medina Celi had refused it. He was a man approaching somewhat in disposition to his predecessor. He had accompanied D. John of Austria in his sea-army, when as he fought with the Turke at Lepanto, as his chiefe Councillor, and after his returne into Sicile, the King D. Philip had made him gouernour of Milan, where hee remained not long, the King thinking him fit to calme that which the Duke of Alba had left in trouble in Holland and Zeland, into which prouinces it seemed that the whole warre was reduced. Among other disorders, he found the Spanish souldiers discontented, and cursing the Duke, who owed them foure and thirtie moneths pay: whom he was forced (for the first triall of his wisdom) to seeke means to pacifie, the which he did in some sort: but when he beganne to enter into the managing of affaires, he fell grossly into an inconuenience which did preiudice the rest of his gouernement. What his actions were, during his charge there, you may reade at large in that Country historie. He liued not long there, but died of a pestilent feuer in the yere one thousand siue hundred fouentie and sixe, leaving those Countries in greater confusion than the Duke of Alba his predecessor had done.

King of Spaine
renewes his of-firmations; and breakes with the Genouois.

In the yere 1574 it was found that king Philip was indebted to the merchants of Genoua and Spaine in 37 millions of ducats; for the which hee gaue them assignments out of his royall reuenues: whereupon for the relieving of his necessities, and to free the king from the Genouois, the Deputies of the chiefe Cities and Townes were called to Madrid, to consult how to relieue the king in these great wants. Among other, there was one in Court, whose name was Francisco Bravo, who told the king, that the contractions which he had made with the merchants, were in respect of them, against all law and equitie; the which, if he did not remedie within a yere, hee would not haue any means to free himselfe: telling him moreover, that he had beene fraudulently circumvented by them, in very great summes, contrarie to all diuine and humane lawe. Whereupon in the yere 1575 the king of Spaine made a decree touching the losse and preiudice which his royall reuenues had received by the contractions which he had made with the Genouois and others, making a staie of all the said contractions and assignements, the which did much trouble the Genouois and others, to whom the king was indebted, for by reason of this suspension they could not giue satisfaction vnto their creditours, which made them to present an answer to this decree vnto the King, shewing that it would bee a blemish to his honour, and verie preiudiciall to his seruice; yet could they not get it reuoked, but were forced to make a new composition.

Genoua di-
uided into factions

The citie of Genoua was diuided into two factions, the old (which were the noble men and gentlemen) and the new (who were some gentlemen, supported by the common people.) D. John Idiagues as embassadour for the Catholike King, had labored much to quench this fire which beganne to kinde, and had persuaded them to lay aside armes: but this yere the furious multitude little respecting the promise of the wiser citizens to disarme,

A disarme, and to treat an accord with the liking and authoritie of the Catholike King, for whom Idiagues was employed in that action, matters were brought to despair, the faction of the new offering by force to reforme the publique gouernement after their owne manner, and to abate the power of the nobles, who were called the old; who not suffering so great an indignitie, went most of them out of Genoua, John Andrew Doria being as it were their head. The Pope sent Cardinall Morone thither, but the Genouois would not treat with him alone, vnlesse the Catholike kings Embassadour were called, he being the chiefe protector of that common weale. The matter was found so difficult, as the faction of the old despayring, were come with good forces, some to Final, and some to A-qui, resolving to recouer their countie and dignitie by armes, choosing John Andrew Doria for their Generall in that warre, who refused that charge, vntill he had leaue from the king of Spaine, whom he serued. In the meane time, they had newes that the king was ready to send another Embassadour, to adde authority and counsell to the other two, which was the Duke of Gandie: but D. John d' Austria came first with a naue vpon that coast, to see that no Prince, by means of this tumult, should enter into Genoua, and make himselfe master thereof: and therefore they made prouision of souldiers, drawing into the duchie of Milan two regiments of Germans, and leysing some Italians. The people of Genoua grewe ielous that D. John meant to seise vpon their citie; but he, according to the order he had from his brother, hauing conferred with Prince Doria and the gouernour of Milan at Spetie, they concluded onely, that there should be all means attempted to quiet that citie, and if the people should continue in their obstinacie, the faction of the Old should haue leaue to recouer their countie, with their auncient rights and dignities: and the rather, for that they offered to make warre at their owne charge, requiring nothing of his Maiestie, but Doria person, and the gallies wherewith hee serued the king. The Emperour and the French king sent their Embassadours to pacifie this tumult, but they could not effect anything, especially he of France, whom for that they would not breed a ielousie in the king of Spaine, they dismist with good words. They without the citie finding by the treatie that there was no hope of any pacification, were readie to goe to armes, when as Charles Borja Duke of Gandie arrived; but hoping that his authority, and the priuat instructions of the catholike king, would preuaile much, they staid: but yet the mischief could not be thus cured. Soone after, the Secretarie Escobedo hauing beene sent by D. John, returned from Spaine, who brought order from the king, that all the resolution of that businesse, for that which concerned his Maiestie, was referred to D. John, who was then at Naples, whither John Andrew Doria was gone to that end, the nobilitie hauing provided money to make warre: when D. John hearing that they to whom it was compromitted in the name of those great princes, could not pacifie them, he sent order to the Gouernour of Milan to dismisst his Germans and Italians, that the faction of the Nobles might employ them, to reduce them to their duties that had no will of an accord. With which troupes, the faction of the Old went to field, and tooke diuers places. In the end, after many letters written from the Pope, Emperour, and King of Spaine, it was wholly compromitted to their agents, who caused a suspension of armes, and there were hostages giuen by both factions to stand to their arbitrement, but the accord was not fully concluded vntill the yere following.

This yere there grewe seeds of warre in Africke, which past into Europe, to the great preiudice of Christendome; for that Muley Mahomet king of Marocco, being loath to leaue the gouernment of that realme to Muley Moluc his vnckle, according to the will of his grandfather dying, Moluc fledde vnto the Turkes for aid, and obtained it; with the which, and with the Moores which fauoured him, he made warre against his nephew, and defeated him thrice in battell, so as he remained absolute Lord of the realmes of Fez and Marocco, his nephew being fled vnto the mountains, where, with some that followed him, he ranne vp and downe, not as a king, but like a thiefe; being by nature both couetous and cruell, vntill that in the end he perswaded the ill aduised king of Portugal, not onely to giue him succours to recouer his realme, but to passe thither in person, with the ruine of that royall house, as you shall hereafter heare.

Muley Mahomet
expelled out of his realme

After

1576

D. John of Austria was appointed to succeed him in the government of the Netherlands, to which end he came into Luxembourg, but he would not advance, vntill that the Estates had accepted him for gouernour, and Lieutenant generall to the king his brother. This prince

John de Escovedo Secretarie to Don Iohn,

D. Iohn aspires to the crowne of England,

1577

D. Iohns carriage in his gouernment,

Voyage of Sir Francis Drake into the South Sea, and about the world.

2 After the death of Lewis de Requesens, great Commander of Castille, D. John d' Austria was appointed to succeed him in the government of the Netherlands, to which end he came into Luxembourg, but he would not advance, vntill that the Estates had accepted him for gouernour, and Lieutenant generall to the king his brother. This prince was once in an humour (as we haue said) to obtaine the crowne of Tunis, by the bounty of the king D. Philip, whom hee had caused to bee often importuned by the Pope, wherein the king tooke no delight, but the taking of that citie by the Turkes, and the raising of those forts which the Spaniards had built to keepe it in awe, made him to forget that humour: but it did not quench his desire to raigne in some other countrie, in the which a Secretarie of his called Iohn de Soto entertained him. Which the king vnderstanding, hee tooke him from him, and commaunded him to vse the seruice of Iohn d' Escovedo; by which change he got little, he animating him more to greatnesse: wherefore he thought it expedient (to diuert him somewhat from these ambitious desires) to drawe him out of Italie, and from those honourable employments which presented themselves, and to send him into Flanders, to contend against his rebellious subiects: the which D. Iohn hearing, hee bare it with great impatiencie, to see himselfe so much dejected, as to become (as a man would say) an Algoznil, or Prouost Marshall, to punish common people, whereas he had beene Generall of armies to the greatest Potentates in Christendom, against the incomparable forces of the great Turke.

Having failed of Tunis, he conuerted his thoughts vpon England, and caused the king to be solicited to make warre vpon that realme; for that (said he) Queene Elizabeth had alwaies fauoured the Estates and townes of the Lowe countries, in their conumacie and rebellion, and to make him Generall, hoping to make himselfe king; thinking that the affaires of the Lowe countries were too little to keepe him occupied. The king D. Philip, for that hee would not flatly refuse him, seemed to yeeld to it, but hee said, they must first subdue the Flemings, commaunding him to goe directly out of Italie thither, and not to passe by Spaine: but he obaied him not, for he went out of Italie into Spaine, and all by the counsell of Escovedo; which made the king to bee ill conceited of him: but in the end hee was forced to goe, and arrived as you haue heard, being accepted for their gouernour, hee ratified the treatie of Gand, made by the Deputes of the Prouinces, for the expelling of all strange souldiers, and other things, the which was confirmed by the king of Spaine, in April, 1577, and his Letters of approbation sent to D. Iohn.

Then the poore Netherlanders beganne to hope for better vsage, thinking that they were at an end of all their miseries, but the effects which followed did soone shew that this hope had beene conceiued vpon apparances. For in all D. Iohns gouernement there was nothing but dissimulations, secret enterprises, accusations, false imputations, surprises, and apparent delignes to heap vpon this people all the miseries of the precedent gouernements; although the effects did not follow according to the Spaniards desires. The which they imputed to D. Iohn, who was not come into the Low Countries to liue there in a quiet estate, or to walke in his night gowne, but with an intent that the enterprife of England should proceed, and that the King would make him Generall: but seeing that (notwithstanding all troubles in his gouernement were in a manner pacified) they made no preparation tending to inuade that land, and that there came no aduice out of Spaine conformable to his desire, yet would hee commaund an armie, and breed occasions to employ it where hee was. What his particular actions were you may read in that countrie historie.

Sir Francis Drake being encouraged by the good successe of his first voyage to the Indies, resolved to make a new attempt, and to passe into the South, thinking thereby to doe his Prince and Countrey great seruice, to winne himselfe immortal fame, and to annoy the King of Spaine and his subiects: wherefore in November in the yere one thousand five hundred seuentie and seuen, he went forth of Plimouth with five English shippes and barques, bending his course towards the Indies (my meaning is not to report the particularities of this voyage, but onely to touch the action summarily, for

A for that it concerns Spaine) in August after his departure he past the Strait of Magellan, and came into the South sea, where as the Spaniards liued secure from all feare, hauing neuer seene any Englishman there before. Being in this sea, hee tooke many shippes and barks, with great store of treasure: but there was one shippe which exceeded all the rest in wealth, hee tooke it at a place called Cape S. Francisco, 150 leagues from Panama: the shippe was called by the Spaniards Cacatuego, which name (after the taking thereof by Sir Francis) was wittily changed by a Spanish ship-boy, and teamed Cacaplata, for that it yielded him so much siluer. They found in her (besides great store ofiewels, and pretious stones) thirteene chests full of ryals of siluer, foure score pound weight of gold, and 26 tunne of siluer. Having done diuers exploits, and sackt some townes vpon the coast of Peru, and Noua Hispania, being now full fraught with treasure, and sufficiently reuenged (as he thought) of the Spaniard, hee resolved to goe to the Islands of the Molucos, and so returne to England by Cape Bona Esperance; the which he performed happily in November, being the third yere of his voyage. By the report of Nugno de Silva a pilot (whom he had taken in the beginning of his voyage at the Islands of Cape-Verd) & others, Sir F. Drake carried hie to the coast of Peru, 866 kintals of siluer, every kintal being worth 1200 ducats of Spaine: all which amounteth to a million thirtie nine thousand and two hundred ducats. He had besides, tenne kintals of gold, every kintal being valued at ten thousand and five hundred Spanish ducats: which last some amounteth to a hundred and fiftie thousand ducats, besides other treasure in that shippe which had not bene custumed (the value whereof was vnknowne) as pearles, pretious stones, ryals of plate, and other rich commodities.

These exploits of his in the South sea, (where they had neuer seene any enemy) did much trouble the Viceroy of Peru, who sent forth Pedro Sarmiento, a good navigator, with two shippes, to meet with Captaine Drake if hee could, or to fortifie in the Strait of Magellan, against such as should hereafter seeke to passe it. D. Pedro passed through the Straite with one of his shippes, and so went into Spaine, where he informed the king of the nature of the Strait, and of the means to buda a fort there, the country being rich, and abounding with all necessities. Whereupon the king (being aduertised that there were more shippes making ready in England) sent Diego Flores de Balde with twentie three shippes, and three thousand and five hundred men, and a new gouernour to Chili, with five hundred old souldiers come out of Flaunders; but before they were free from the coast of Spaine, they were surprized with a storme, and eight of the Fleet cast away, with aboue eight hundred men, the rest put into Cadiz.

D. Iohn d' Austria hauing drawne a world of miseries vpon those Prouinces which which were vnder his gouernment, died in the Campe, neere vnto Nemours this yere 1578, of a pestilent feuer, a prince who conceiued high and great enterprises in his mind, but aboue all, hee was much incensed against the Lowe Countries, and their generall Estates: his death was happie for them, hauing thereby some ease of their miseries and calamities. Men made diuers censures of his death, and of Escovedo his Secretaries, who in a manner at the same time was slaine in Spaine (as some said by the kings commaundement) for the which Antonio de Peres was afterwards called in question, as you shall heare.

Alexander Farnese prince of Parma, who was D. Iohns lieutenant, had commaundement of the armie, and was afterwards gouernour in his place: hee was more temperate and modest in his gouernment than the Spaniards that went before him. This prince was allied to the king of Spain, hee hauing married in the yere 1565 D. Maria of Bragançe, daughter to D. Edward of Portugal, who was brother to the Emperresse D. Isabella, so as they were cousin germans: which marriage might purchase to the house of Farneses some right to the crowne of Portugal: where, soone after there happened a lamentable change; for that this realme which had maintained it selfe with honour and reputation, in all the parts of the habitable earth, for so many ages, was reduced vnto a Prouince, vnder him of Castille, as you shall heare.

1577

1588

Treasure Sir Fr. Drake brought out of the South Sea.

Ships of Spain cast away.

1578

Death of D. Iohn of Austria.

1577

Moors.

Xeriffes kings of Collanuco their beginningMahomet Ben Hamet Xeriffe
the father.Three brethren Xeriffes.Burning and Armes killed makes a man complicat.Emanuel king of Portugal fortified by Moors.

4 We must now enter into the mournfull Tragedie of the death of D. Sebastian king of Portugal, who thrust on by his ambitious desire of glorie, governed by ill counsell, and among other affections, by zeale of religion, wherein the Iesuits had instructed him, would (contrary to the graue aduice of the Catholike king) and without any reason, bee an actor in the quarrels of the Xeriffes, princes of Afrike, contending for the empire of Marocco and Fez, from whence the race of the kings, Merins, (of whom wee haue often made mention in this worke) had bene expelled by their fathers. It will be fit, to give more light vnto our historie, and more tast of the fruit which may be reapt, to relate briefly the beginning of these Xeriffes, and the policie of their suddaine and admirable advancement to the large dominions, so neere vnto Spaine, there being but a small cut of sea betwixt them, or (as a man would say) a puffe of wind.

Mahomet Ben Hamet called Xeriffe, which signifies famous and sacred, the which among the Mahometans they giue vnto them that are of the line of their Prophet Mahomet (from whom he said hee was descended) lived in the times of our fathers, in the towne of Tigumeder, in the countrie of Dara in Numidia. He was a politicke man, and a great hypocrite, who had by a fained sanctitie purchased the reputation of very religious and wife. He was learned in their law, in Astrologie, and in art Magike. He had three sonnes; whom hee instructed in the same manners, arts, and disciplines, and were esteemed as the father; especially after that they had bene at Mecque, and at Medina Tal Nahi in Arabia, which is a voyage held among them of great merit: for at Medina is the sepulchre of their prophet Mahomet. Their names were Abdelquibir, Hamet, and Mahomet the youngest, who past the rest in policie and valour.

Hamet and Mahomet being come to Fez, a great and well peopled citie in Afrike, and the chiefe of the reale of Mauritania Tingitana, to make themselves knowne there, they were much made of by men that were curious of Sciences, and in a short time one of them obtained a publike Lecture in the Colledge of Modarafa, and the other had the charge to instruct and bring vp the children of Muley Mahomet, and Oataz, who was the last king of Fez saue one of the race of Benimerins. The Xeriffe their father hearing that his sonnes prospered, hee admitted them to ioyne the art of warre with knowledge and learning; for those two faculties vniued, make a ready way to greatesse: the which they could practise in such sort, that as they had bene esteemed for their learning, so they got a reputation to be valiant among the Xeques and Alcaides of the realme; and vpon this opinion they had charge giuen them of some troupe or corner of horse, at their instance, vnder colour of religion, saying that it was to make warre against certaine Moores and Africans which went to seue the king of Portugal, and did annoy the other Mahometans of their sect: Muley Nacer brother to the king of Fez, was very vnwilling they should haue this Commission giuen them; saying, that by the like practises, and vnder a cloake of holinesse, the families of Isfakis, Magaracs, Almorauides, and Almohades had raigned in Afrike, and ruined the ancient royall houses. Yet they had commission to leuie men, and proued famous captaines in a short time; for hauing for a time ouerrunne the provinces of Duquene and others, where the Portugals had some forts, and done many gallant exploits, they past into that of Sus, which depends vpon Marroc, whither their fame was spread; and being there visited by many Moores and Africans of those marches, liuing then in libertie, without any king, and who beleued that their designe was to make warre against the Christians which did hold the coasts of Afrike vnder the kings D. John the second, and D. Emanuel of Portugal, and the townes of Ceuta, Tangir, Arzile, Alcafar, Ceguer, Azamor, Mazagon, Saphi, and Cap d'Aguer, & farther off, the citie of Arquin, they had presently a great troupe; especially for that king Emanuel entertained many Moores and naturall Africans: so as that Christian king might at sometimes haue drawne into armes of those nations aboute fiftie thousand horse, and twice as many foot. Vnder the name of this religious warre, the Xeriffes became strong and fearefull in the field: and in fauour thereof, they did obtaine of the inhabitants of the province of Dara in Numidia, where they were borne, the tenths of their reuenues: for vnto God, said they, the tenths of the fruits of the earth are due by ancient

A ancient constitutions. The citie of Turedant, which is a seat royall, and in olde time was the third member of the Miralimums estate, did not onely receiue this import willingly; but they also perswaded the other Westerne Provinces to doe the like, and to chooseth for their gouernour the old Mahomet Ben Hamet, the father of these two Xeriffes, Hamet and Mahomet: by reason whereof, he made himselfe master of Turedant, & made sharpe warres against the Moores which held the partie of the Portugals, in the province of Dara and others. A certaine Xec of the towne of Tiguin, in the mountaines of Atlas the greater, towards the province of Sus, drew vnto the Xeriffes the people of Hea; lying neere vnto him, who did contribute the tenthes of their fruits, and of the seedling of their cattell, and in the end hee put them in possession of the towne of Teneff, which is the chiefe of that province of Hea, one of the best of Afrike: and then they called themselves princes, by the practises of this Xec, who was a Genouois renegado. But they were expelled by Nugno Fernandes of Atayde a Portugal, who forced them to retire to Tazarot, a towne of the iurisdiction of Marroc, and in the meane time old Mahomet Ben Hamet the Xeriffe died. His three sonnes continuing their enterprises, besieged the towne of Alquel, and tooke it from a Xec, called Cidi Bugima African, vassall to the king of Portugal: and then they seized vpon the citie of the mountaine of Xanxaua, the which they fortified, and were continually assisted by the Lords, townes, and communalities of that Westerne quarter of Afrike, in regard of this holy warre. After which, they got more reputation, hauing incountred and taken D. Lope de Barriga, gouernour of Alifio, who was the most redoubted captaine king Emanuel had in Afrike. Notwithstanding Abdelquibir the eldest of the Xeriffes was slaine in this conflict. The two others continuing their designes made themselves masters of Marroc, a goodly great citie, and chiefe of the realme, by a notable treason practised against Nacer Buxenuf of the race of the Hententats, who was king, but hee held nothing, in a manner, but the very towne, for all the dependancies were at that time held by pettie tyrans; and the champaigne country by the Alarabes, who in that countrie doe commonly hold Lords; towns; yea and kings in subiection. This Nacer hauing often receiued the Xeriffes very kindly into Marroc, and used them with all honour and courtserie; hee was one time poysoned by their fraud, goeing forth to sleepe at the Hexon with him. They had suborned a certaine Moore, who crossed these noble men in their way as they returned from hawking, hauing a cake in his basket made of flower and sugar that was poysoned, who seeming to go on his way like a traueiler, he was staied by the Xeriffes, who demanded of him what hee carried in his basket, and if he had not something good to eat, or to mingle with water to disalter the king, who was there present; whereupon this Moore drewe out his cake, and presented it vnto the king, who did eate thereof, and dranke the water, into the which he had sleeped it; whereof hee did not presently complaine: but being come to Marroc, hee fell sicke and died within 6 daies. In the meane time Mahomet knowing what would happen, went to Xanxaua to fetch his forces, to second his brother Hamet, as they had agreed, who by the meanes of some confederates, which vnder other pretexts were then at Marroc, seized vpon the citie, euen as his brother arriued with his troups, and made himselfe to be acknowledged for king of the Marroquins; and seeming with a counterfeit modestie to be very much grieved for the accident which had befallen king Nacer; as a thing (said he) practised by some of his enemies vnknowne to him, hee said that his election was a blessing of heauen, the which must follow: seeking to pacifie the children of the deceased, promising them honours and estates at their desires. Then hee sent to aduertise the King of Fez, that hee had bene created King of Marroc; and that hee would hold the citie of him; and sending him certaine presents, accompanied with submissions and promises, hee rested satisfied. Thus hee got the possession of Marroc, and of the rights of that realme, the iurisdiccions whereof extend farre towards the South; which (as wee haue said) were distracted by the usurpations of pettie Lords: and many townes also had infranchised themselves, gouerning themselves like common weales, but they reduced them to their old obedience. The warres against the Christians and Moores which did adhere vnto them, being the chiefe support of their authoritie and credit with the people, they continued it, and had diuers incounters with the Portugals.

1577

Xeriffe makes himselfe master of Turedant.Xeriffes seize vpon Marroc
by treason.

1577

Portugals; but that wherein they did labour more curiously, and wherein they were most fortunate, for the setting of their great enmity, was to practise the Moores which followed the king of Portugals partie, to draw them vnto themselves, wherein finding some difficulties, they sought to let a diuision among them, and they faining to be partakers in their quarrels, did so bandie them one against another, as the Moores and Alarabes of the countie of Duquele and they of Xarquie of the one part, and they of Garbia of the other, by mutuall encounters and bloodie battels made themselves so weake, as the Xeriffes did easily subiect them one after another, and enrich themselves with their spoyle: which was so great, as afterwards they had not any need of armes, horses, nor followers: and then the two brethren diuided their estates, so as Hamet was king of Marroc, and Mahomet king of Sus, or of Tarudant, which towne he did beautifie with buildings, and fortifie very much: but, as the prosperities of this world are neuer absolute, going to besiege the towne of Cap d'Aguer in Sus, hee was roughly repulst, with the losse of a great number of men; the which did but quicken his spirits and courage to find means to recover this losse, and to maintaine his reputation: wherein both hee and his brother Hamet were much assisted by the approbation they had of the king of Fez, who was content when they had any losse, that they should repaire their forces by new leuiues made in his countries, and by his subiects which did voluntarily follow them: and therefore for some yeares they entertained friendship with this king, who was the cause of their aduancement, by all duties and good offices, paying him the like tribute that Nacer king of Marroc was accustomed to paie, and moreover, the fifth penie of their spoiles taken in warre. But finding themselves once strong, they began to neglect it, wherewith the king was discontented, commanding one of his capitaines to let them vnderstand, that if they sent him not this tribute, he would make warre against them as enemies. The death of king Mahomet Ostaz ensuing, pacified this quarrell, for that the children of the deceased who had bene scholars to one of the Xeriffes, would not molest them, but confirmed them easily in their conquests, making a new promise of a light tribute, of the which they neuer paid any thing, being glad to haue such an occasion to breake with them of Fez, whom they knew to be men of little valour, liuing in delights and pleasures: Ambition which hath no bounds, prouoking them to passe all the bonds, respects, and considerations of the fauours which they had receiued from the house of these Ostaz Merimes, whom in the end they did ruine: and the better to attaine to that which they pretended, they made an alliance with Aben Hadu, and Muley Ferez, brethren, and Muley Drys, with other Lords of the mountaines, & enemies to the familie of the Ostaz; so as when Muley Hamet, who had succeeded Mahomet his father in the realme of Fez, thought (after that the tribute had bene discontinued some yeares) to force the Xeriffes: they gaue him plainly to vnderstand that they owed him not any thing, and that they had more right to raigne, and to demand tribute of the kings and people of Afrike, than any other; for that they were descended from the Prophet Mahomet, and his lawfull successours: wherefore, if he thought it good to bee their friend, they would bee his: and if he attempted to crosse them in the warres which they made against Christians, that both God and Mahomet would punish him, neither should they want power to defend themselves. And soone after, the Xeriffe of Marroc, who confined vpon the country of Fez, made triall if this king had the courage to enter into warre; for he began to force the inhabitants of some places of his iurisdiction which lay neere vnto him, to paie him the tenthes of their fruits, which was the chiefe article at that time of the receipt of their treasure: yea, they did not exact any other thing, but certaine customes or tolles. Whereupon the king of Fez resolved to proclaim war against them, & came in person to besiege Marroc, being vnprouided of Ordnance: for hee had but two peeces, with the which hee made a batterie neere vnto the port of Ciet Belabez Cebti. The other hearing of this siege at Sus, came speedily and put himselfe into Marroc, with three thousand horse, the which the king of Fez with his armie could not preuent: then instantly, with his and his brothers forces, they made a furious sallie, and put the assaillants to rout, pursuing them vnto the Province of Escura, doing infinit harme euen in the taile of their army. King Hamet Ostaz making halt, with the first to come to Fez, where he had news the same night, that

Hamet and Mahomet diuide their estates.

Tenths of fruits
the reuenues of Kings.

Muley

A Muley Mus and her brother, had raysed a tumult in the citie, & that he would make himself King: which rebellion he suppressed by his comming. By this bad triall which the King of Fez had made, he was so incensed, as he would returne againe to the siege of Marroc, whereas the two brethren, did not attend him, but came forth to meete him, and charging him at the passage of the riuer of los Negros, at a place called Buacuba, they defeated his forward: in which conflict Muley Mahomet his son was slaine, and with him King Aben Abdalla, he who had lost Grano in Spaine, and the King of Fez was forced to returne in disorder, with great losse of his men, baggage, and women, and to leaue the field to the Xeriffes, who by fauour of this victorie, made all them of the iurisdiction of Fez, which confined vpon Marroc, to contribute the tenths, without any resistance, and when as afterwards the King of Fez sought to be reuenged, they made head against him and his Captaines, and put them to many routes, so as that wrong remayned vreuenged.

B The Xeriffes hauing handled the King of Fez thus roughly, he of Sus led an armie beyond the mountaine Atlas, he tooke Tafillet, a towne of Numidia, and carried away the Lord thereof called Amar. He also took some other places, some by force, some by composition: so as these two brethren extended their dominions towards Numidia and Lybia, and subdued the Arabians and Affricans which liued in those drie countries. But that which gaue more fame to Mahomet, was the taking of Cape d'Aguer, which he had already attempted, and was then ill defended by D. Guttierre of Montroy a Portugois, who was forced and taken there with a good spoile, especially of armes and ordinance, whereof the Xeriffes could make great vie. This conquest settled them in their Estates, and made all the people of the mountaines and valleys, friends, yea obedient vnto them, and some thought that they had made Emanuel King of Portugal giue ouer the warres of Affrick, and demantle the townes of Azamor, Safi, Arzille and Alcaçar Ceguer, the which happened soone after.

Xeriffes in querell betwixt themselves.

C But as all equalitie is odious in great men, and their societie nothing firme: these two brethren fell in the end to quarrell, and to open war. The cause was the hatred which Hamet bare to his younger brother Mahomet, for that hee was more esteemed and respected then he, he was indeede more valiant, more iust, and more loyall in that which hee promised: he was discontented also, that of all the boote which Mahomet his brother had taken at Cap d'Aguer, of the which he should giue him the fifth part, hee had not sent him any thing but D. Guttierre prisoner, and some few slaues: Wherefore he sent him an imperious message, that he would haue all the Ordnance, the harguebuzies, and the munition, which he had wonne and 400. slaues more, and then the fifth penie of all the rest of the boote: whereupon there were diuers answers and replies. Hamet seeing that hee did not performe what he desired, sent certaine troupes to leaue tribute of the land, which his brother enioyed; the which he did for that time endure. After which Hamet desired that they might haue an enterview in Marroc, but Mahomet knowing his brother well, excused himselfe, and seeing they were vpon complaints, Mahomet sayd, that he had deprived him of the lawfull succession of their father, who had left him great treasure in Tazaror, demanding a moiety both of the moueables and conquests, where he had alwaies bene in the greatest dangers. He sayd moreover, that Mahomet Harran his son hauing bin borne before that Hamet had any children, he ought to be sworne King and successor to all the Realmes, according to a certaine ordonance of their father. From these words they fell to armes, and without the meditation of Cidi Arrabal (who was an Alfgau of great authority among the Moores and Alarabes) the warre had then growne furious and bloody, but he pacified them, and procured an enterview vpon the bankes of the riuer Hued Isfen, whether either of them came with 500. horse, and lighted in the field, where there were two tents pitched, betwixt the which they parleyed, without any other companie, but the aboue-named Alfgau, their troupes being far from them. At their coming together, Mahomet humbling himselfe something, Hamet presently laied hold of him, shaking him after a rough manner, and seeking to ouerthrow him: but Mahomet, who was strong and active, kept himselfe vp, and in the end in wrassling, got his brother vnder him, doing him no harme, but reproched him with his disloyalty, the other pouting forth many injuries, vntill the Alfgau parted them, and then they both retired, so as this vnkind meeting

Rrrrr

did

Gouverneur of Alger, who had some intelligence of these Carauels, who assayed them with fourescore Gallies, tooke them, and carried them to Alger, with all the Christian souldiers, notwithstanding any thing that Buafon could pleade, who sayd, that hee had brought them for his seruice, that by their ayde hee might enter into the Estate of Fez, from whence the Xeriffe, their common enemy, had chased all their house and family by force: but hee could get nothing from Salharrais at that time but reproches, that hee should bee ashamed, beeing a Mahometane, to haue recourse vnto Christians in his affaires, rather then vnto Turkes: yet notwithstanding afterwards, hee not onely deliuered these Portugall souldiers, but came himselfe with the forces of his Gouvernement to ayde Buafon to recouer the Realme of Fez: for it happened, that the Xeriffe hauing greater desseignes, and aspiring to the Empire of all Affricke, made an enterprize vpon the Towne of Tremessen, which was a store-house for the Turkes, where they had a Gouverneur and a Garrison, sending his three eldest sonnes Harran, Cader, and Abdalla, to whome it was yielded without resistance. Abdalla remayned there with a good Garrison, but hee stayed not long till hee was inuested by Salharrais with a mightie armie, by whome hee was vanquished going forth to fight with them, notwithstanding that the father had sent him a supply of eight thousand horse, vnder the command of Cader and Abderramen his Brethren, who were the cause of this losse, by their accustomed iares and diffentions: for beeing brethren by diuers mothers, they had alwaies some quarrell a foote, and could not agree in this important action. Cader was slayne in this conflict, beeing not succoured by Abderramen, and Abdalla (fore wounded) was forced to retire in disorder.

Bahami an old Captaine, and Cousin to these young Xeriffes, thinking to reprehend Abderramen for the fault which hee had committed, vsing some sharp and manly words vnto him, hee wounded him in the arme with his sword; whereof hauing afterwards complained vnto the Xeriffe Mahomet, hee was so incensed against his sonne, as some thought hee was poysoned within a moneth after, with the fathers consent: so in a short time three of the Xeriffes sons dyed: for Mahomet Harran the eldest, who was appoynted Successeur to the Realmes of Marrocc and Fez, and had assisted him in the Conquest of Tremessen, returning afterwards to Fez, he dyed of sickness. In the meane time the Xeriffe had newes that the Inhabitants of the Mountaine Nefuca, called otherwise Derenderen, a people subiect to rebellion, were reuolted. They had mutined before, by the perswasion of a Preacher of the sect of Mohaydin, called Cidi Abdalla: but now the Xeriffe imputed this tumult to the praetises of Muley Hamet the disposessed King of Fez and his children: but more vpon a conceipt, then any wel-grounded reason: so as incensed with a violent passion, hee sent his sonne Abdalla to Marrocc, where this poore King was, with charge to cut off his head, and there was commaundement sent to Habis, Gouverneur of Sus, to do the like to his two sonnes Cazeri and Nacer, who liued at Taradant, the which was executed.

The Rebels of Derenderen had annoyed the Xeriffe, beeing animated by their Preacher Cidi Abdalla, and now they shewed themselves no lesse obstinate. It is a mightie people, but barbarous, superstitious, and disloyall, inhabiting this long mountaine, which was strong and of hard access, hauing with in it spacious valleys well tilled, carrying grayne, oyle, and other fruites, which is a branch of the great Atlas, in the territory of Marrocc: who made such resistance against the Xeriffe, who came against them in person, as after that he had lost a great number of his men, hee resolved to leaue them vntill another time.

The town of Tremessen beeing recovered by the Turkes, Buafon Lord of Velez, who was at Melille, came againe to intreate Salharrais, that he would not ruine his good fortune, but deliuer the Christian souldiers which hee detayned, paying him some reasonable ranfome. Salharrais beeing incensed against the Xeriffe, and thinking that if hee should assaile him after the route of his sonnes, hee would bee so amazed, as hee might dispose him of Fez, requiting him with the like as he had attempted to do against him at Tremessen, hee granted Buafon his request, and moreover offered to furnish him with a good number of Turkes, hauing agreed vpon some pay, and he himselfe went with him him in person. Buafon promised to pay him a thousand doubloons of gold daily, for forty daies together, and gaue him caution in the town of Alger: Hee agreed also that Salharrais should carry away all the mouables, iewels and treasure which should bee found in Fez, belonging to the Xeriffe.

Cousin of the
Xeriffe Mahomet.

This accord being made, the Turke went to field with foure thousand men of his nation, and twelve peeces of ordinance, giuing order to other troupes to come and ioyne with him at Tremessen: the Lord of Dubude of the bloud of the Meritis, came also with some souldiers. It may be the newes hereof made the Xeriffe retire from pursuing the Montanyards of Derenderen, sooner then hee would haue done, and to put himselfe into Fez, whether all his forces being come, hee went to encounter the Turkes vpon the Marches of Tezar, whereas the Realme of Fez confines with that of Tremessen, and there attended his coming many daies: but seeing his long stay, and his victuals being cut off by Buafon's children, who held the passages, and had their retreats into the mountaines of Matagara, hee was forced to retire. Xeriffe was no sooner parted from Tezar, but Salharrais arrived, to whom the Inhabitants opened their gate, and received a garison of Turkes: then causing his army to march against Fez, hee went along the foote of the mountaines, being coasted by the Xeriff's army which held the plaines, and was much stronger then he in horse. Salharrais was a captaine, and could embrace all occasions, so as one day hee surprized the Xeriff's reereward, led by Abdalla, his sonne, and put it to route, and made him to abandon his munition and baggage, so as the Xeriffe was forced to goe hastily to Fez, marching all that day and the night following without any stay, and then Salharrais lodged presently vpon the bankes of the river Sebu.

The Inhabitants of Fez haue a preiudice, that if their King suffers the enemy to approach within halfe a league of the city, as being to weake and wanting meanes to resist him, they may open him the gates, and not bee taxed with treachery, and so they cause their Kings to sweare at their coming to the crowne: For it is a great folly, say they, by a vaine, weake & vnseasonable loyalty, to expose such a city to the spoile, in supporting a Prince obstinately, who is vnprovided of force and meanes to defend them. This preiudice forced the Xeriffe to goe forth againe to fight with the Turkes army, and with his enemy Buafon, and fearing that the captaine of the Turkes which hee had for his gard, would abandon him, and retire to Salharrais, hee caused his head to bee cut off.

All the captaines and gouernors of Sus, Daa, Marrocc, and the Prouinces of Fez, were in his army with their people, which shewed to bee foure score thousand horse, of the which he sent eight thousand good horse of Sus against the enemy, to fight with him at the passage of a river, and hee with the rest of the army followed after, stretching it out vpon the river side, so as there was nothing but the river betwixt the two armies, Salharrais finding great difficulty in his passage, planted his ordinance, vpon the rivers side where there was a ford, and caused euery horseman to take a Harguebozier behind him, and the ordinance to play continually vpon the Xeriff's squadrons, so as hee past a great number of his shot in despite of them, who with admirable celerity cast vp a kinde of rampart to defend them from the horse, and shooting incessantly gaue meanes to the rest of the Turkes horse and foote to passe, neither could they bee forced to quit the place, which they had taken, notwithstanding the many charges of the Xeriff's horsemen.

The Turkes army being past, they lodged that night as strongly as they could. The next day they marched towards the city, whereas the Xeriff's army made great resistance, the which was diuided into three battailions, and hauing made a trench vpon the great high way, planted with ordinance, they could not passe; but Salharrais making a shew as if he would goe and beseege the bourrough of Zefere with part of his army, whereas the Xeriff's victuals and munition lay, hee caused his sonne Abdalla to leaue a little hill called Dardubag, which hee had in gard, of the which hee himselfe, with the other part of the Turkish army, seized instantly; and then hee feared not the enemies horse, the which could not then annoy him, the way being rough and full of stones. Notwithstanding the Xeriffe charged the Turkes, but they of that nation and the renegados which were in his army, and of his gard, betrayed him so as Salharrais Turkes got the aduantage, and

Preiudice of the Inhabitants of Fez.

Turkes make the Xeriffe retire.

and with their shot disperced their first Squadrons: and put them to flight, wherefore A the Xeriffe seeing that they of Fez that were with him began to wauer, and that most of them retired towards the old city, hee resolved also to retire himselfe into new Fez, with hisouldiars of Marroc and Sus, in whom he did most relie, and the Turkes marching on in good order, came and camped neere vnto the port called Bebelsetoh, whereas many of the Inhabitants came vnto them, and Arabians that were friends to Buafon, with an intent to haue it opened vnto him. Muley Abdalla the Xeriffs sonne, who had entred the city by another port, caused two peeces of ordinance to bee planted vpon the por-tall of Bebelsetoh, which made many shot into the Turkes campe, and did them much harne, but Buafon and his friends brake open the gate, and made way for the army to enter.

Fez abandoned by the Xer-iffe to the Turkes.

Then there beganne a furious and bloody conflict in the streetes, where there died many good men of either side, in the end Abdalla, who had no confidence in them of Fez, abandoned it, and retired himselfe into the castle of new Fez, passing by the suburbs of Merz, where he reported vnto his father how all things had past in the great towne, who holding himselfe not safe in new Fez, went to field, in a manner flying towards Marroc, hauing aduised his wiues, his daughters and household traine, to saue themselves as they could: abandoning his treasures, jewels, and mouables (whereof hee went alwaies well furnished) to them that could lay hold of it. Some escaped, others were staid and taken, and amongst them two of the Xeriffs daughters, who had that day a notable losse. Aliken Bubcar, who was captaine of the fort of new Fez, held it, vntill he thought that the Xeriffe was in safety, and then hee yielded it to Salharrais by composition, his men going forth with their armes and horses, and what goods they could carry with them.

Fez taken by the Turkes.

The city of Fez being thus wonne, some captaines of the Turkes army, who hated Buafon, gaue Salharrais to vnderstand that the Inhabitants of Fez did detest him, for that hee was affected to the Christians, and was proud, and of an ill disposition. That they murmured already against him, and gaue it out that they would neuer receiue him willingly for their King; and therefore hee should binde them much vnto him, if hee gaue them Muley Bubcar, one of the sonnes of Muley Hamet Outaz, to whom by right the Realme did belong, and that it was their desire. Vpon these reports and perswasions Salharrais caused Muley Bubcar to bee proclaimed King of Fez, retayning Muley Buafon in the fort of new Fez well garded, which made the people to mutine: for whereas the Turkes had said that Buafon was hated and reiected by the Inhabitants of Fez, it was a meere slander, and the contrary did soone appeare, for they tooke armes for his sake against the Turkes, so as Salharrais was forced (to pacifie this tumult) to send him vnto them with an Alcaide, he promising to returne againe to accomplish their conuentions.
Buafon being brought into the city, cast himselfe into the Mesquite of Caruin, and would not come forth, saying, that he had bene ill intreated by the Turkes, and in danger to be slaine by them, and therefore he would not fall againe into their hands. But the Alcaide, which did accompany him, gaue him so many reasons, as hee returned with him to Salharrais, who pacified him with good words and made him King of Fez: but hee condemned the Citizens to pay an ounce of gold for euery house, because they had seditiously taken armes against the Turkes: whatsoever past betwixt them afterwards, it is certaine, that Salharrais departed very ill satisfied of King Buafon, and returned from this enterprise (where hee had gotten much honour and profit) in such a rage against him, as hee aduertised the Xeriffe, that he might boldly make warre against Fez when hee pleased, assuring him that hee would neuer giue aide to Buafon: It may bee hee was the more incensed, for that hauing sent Ta Haya a Turke to Veles, to receiue the fort of Pipnon, which it may be was an Article of their Conuentions, the captaine that was in it, would not yeeld it, but deliuered it vnto Muley Mahomet sonne of Buafon, and when the Pirat demanded it of Mahomet, hee refused him, but it happened on a time that the Pi-rat tooke Mahomet out of his fort, and intreated him so roughly, as hee yielded vp the place.

The Xeriffe Mahomet being chased from Fez, thinking that the towne of Meguineus, would

A would be of great expence hee commanded his sonne Abdalla who was in it, to abandon it, for the which hee repented himselfe, hearing how much Salharrais was discontented with Buafon: for this place was very commodious to make an enterprise vpon Fez, which hee presently resolved. But hee had reason to thinke how to keepe it from the Xeriffe Hamet his brother, who vpon the newes of this losse was returned to Taflet, and had made himselfe Master thereof, with an intent to attempt some great matter.
Hee therefore resolved to punish him in such sort, as hee should neuer haue more cause to feare him, going himselfe in person to beseege him in Taflet, and in the meane time he sent an army against Buafon the new King of Fez; giuing the charge thereof to his sonne Abdalla; Buafon for his part sent his army to field, being led by Muley Nacer, and Muley Mahomet his sonnes: but these two brethren (the one being base) disagreeing, they diuided their forces, and gaue Abdalla meanes to defeat Mahomet, and to make the other retire: which made Buafon goe out of Fez with a great army, who charged Abdalla so furiously, as hee put his army to rout with great slaughter. In this battaile there was a race of Arabians cut in peeces, called Arrahamenes, whom the Xeriffe drew out of the country of Sus, and had placed them in the Prouince of Temecene, of the which there escaped not one.

Abdalla de-fected by Buafon.

The defeat of Abdalla was held secret by the Xeriffe, who did beseege Hamet his brother in Taflet, so as the beseeged knew not any thing: but contrariwise they found meanes to haue it bruted in the towne, that Abdalla was a conqueror in Fez. Wherefore Hamet who had put himselfe into that place, in hope to be releued by Buafon, beleeuing that he had bene wholly defeated, and without hope of that which hee expected, he sent Zidan and Nacer his sonnes vnto their vncke, and yielded himselfe vnto his mercy: Who confined him at that time into an hermitage, but hee caused the heads of his Nephewes, to bee cut off, to free himselfe of all feare; and hauing left a good garrison in Taflet, hee tooke the way to Garciluin, and by that way entred into the Realme of Fez.
Buafon seeing himselfe thus obstinately pursued, went forth against the Xeriffe, where there was a bloody battaile, in the which Buafon was slaine vpon the place, and his army put to flight. Nacer his sonne fled to Mesquineuz, to recover the mountaines, his other sonne Mahomet, entred into Fez, with fifty horse onely, but the Citizens, who alwaies held with the stronger, let him know that he was not welcome: wherefore hee went also to Mesquineuz, where hee found his brother Nacer, and so they past to Sala or Rabat vpon the Ocean sea, where they imbarked to passe into Spaine, but they were taken at sea by certaine Pirats Brittons. Muley Bubcar, sonne to the deceased King Hamet Outaz, being in this battaile with Buafon, fled to Tremessen, and from thence to Algier, where he died of the plague.

Mahomet the Xeriffe beseeged his brother Mahomet.

Buafon King of Fez defeated and slaine.

Thus by this victory the Xeriffe was peaceable King of Fez, and all the Xecques of the people, and Gouernors of the Realm, came and yielded themselves vnto him. Being vnable to force them of the mountaines, or being loath to blemish the glory of so great a conquest by some sinister accident, in seeking to subdue those base desperate people, he made an accord with them, that they should yeeld him a certaine homage. Being then cometo Marroc, hee caused his brother Hamet to bee brought thether, with the children that he had remayning, giuing them in gard, to Ali Ben Buar, and then hee went towards Taradant to make a marriage (for hee was accustomed euery yeere to marry some faire gentlewoman) and therefore hee carried two of his daughters with him, with a great trainee of women, some troupes of horse, and twelue hundred Turkes of his gard; but he came not thether, being slaine by the way, by treason, vpon this occasion. Hee had a priuate hatred with Hassen Balsa, sonne to Haradin Barbarousse (but the cause is not well knowne) so as Hassen sought all meanes to be reuenged. Being at Algier there came a Turke vnto him, who had heard speake of their quarrell, his name was also Hassen, a wicked and a murderous man, who made offer to kill the Xeriffe, and hauing receiued money, and great promises from the Basha, he came to Fez, whereas Abdalla was viceroy for his father; whom hee gaue to vnderstand that hee had fled from Algier, for that Hassen Balsa would haue put him to death vpon certaine false reports, beseeching him to receiue him into his seruice. Abdalla who did not much loue the Turkish nation, would

Fez wholly subdued to the Xeriffe.

would not entertaine him, but willed him to goe to Marroc to his father the which hee A did, where he was receiued, and soone after made captaine of the Turkes of his gard, who were all discontented, and ready to mutine, for that they had bene about a yeece without their pay, the which they had often demanded of the treasurers, and were disdainfully reiected, with injuries, as it is the custome of that kinde of people: so as when the Xeriffe beganne his voyage to Tarudant; they were much incensed. The Turke Hassen taking this fit occasion to execute his designe, increased their discontents all he could, so as he grew confident to treat with some of the most mutinous of his garde, to kill the Xeriffe, and to spoile his treasure, shewing them how easily they might escape by Numidia, and get to Tremessen, before they should haue means to pursue B them.

This practise succeeded for the execution of the murthér, but they could not escape as they expected. The Xeriffe being at the passage of Mont Atlas, which is called Bi-bone, at a place named Algier, he would take a view of his garde, who for this cause were armed on horsebacke, and in battaile, Hassen who was their captaine, lighting from his horse, drew neere vnto the Xeriffe, who was at the entry of his tent, as if hee had some thing to say vnto him, being followed by foure other his confederats; being neere, and seeing him attentue to some other thing, the Treasurer who was not farre off, seeing Hassen lay his hand vpon his Cymitere, he cried out to Xeriffe that he should beaue of himselfe: the Xeriffe thinking to flie into his tent, was intangled among the cords and C fel, then the traitor cut one of his hamstrings, & the rest made an end of murdering him, killing his chiefe Treasurer (whom they hated) with him. This murthér being done, it was published by the Turkes themselves, with curses against the dead. Many of the troupes which followed in this voyage, ioyned with them, so as Hassen was presently strong and so feared, as marching towards the Prouince of Sus, wherefoeuer hee past, they did him honour and seruice, and being come to Tarudant they easily made themselves Master of the towne, finding it abandoned by Muley Odman, one of the Xeriffes children, and there they gathered together the treasure that was found in his, and his two daughters traines, with that which they found in the castle of Tarudant. Thus perished the Xeriffe Mahomet, who from little was aduanced to one of the greatest D principalties in the world, built vpon the rapine of three mighty and ancient realmes, wherevnto hee had annexed many other Prouinces, by notable murders, and incredible effusion of bloud, with an intent to make himselfe Monarke of all Africke, high-minded, proude, a dissembler, a parricide to reigne alone, couetous, without loue, iniurious and contemning all other men: against whom God raised a petty enemy, when as hee thought to enioy all his conquests, and that he glorified himselfe, who slue him in the midst of his guards, yea and by them; so variable and inconstant is worldly great-nesse. The murderers liued not long vn timer. They found amongst the prisoners whom they deliuered at Tarudant, a Moore issued from the race of the Lewes, who was called Gazi Musa, and had bene superintendant of the Engines of sugar which the Xeriffe E held in that Prouince, and was then restrained vpon his accounts.

He was knowne by the Turkes to be a man of great iudgement and vnderstanding, and that might giue them good aduice, wherefore they honoured him with the Office of Iustice Major of the towne and country of Sus. Being doubtfull what to doe, hee advised them to fortifie themselves in that great and rich city, where they might well defend themselves for a time, vntill that succors came vnto them from Algier by Numidia, but Hassen who was rich, could not see the happinesse to returne vnto the Basha, whom he had serued lo wishfully, and therefore he resolved to depart with his booy, and seeke to get through the desarts to Tremessen, the which they might haue easily done, if they had taken this resolution sooner: for hauing spent about 3. weekes in Tarudant, they might wel thinke they should find incounters, hauing so long a iorney to goe, which they should not be able to resist: Gazi Musa seeing that the Turke should bee no longer his Lord, he secretly gaue intelligence to Muley Odman (who was in the Prouince of Dara, and leauied men, both Africans and Arabians his friends) of the departure and voyage which Hassen and his confederats made, who carried away his sisters
and Xeriffe Mahomet the red.

disposition of the Xeriffe Mahomet.

A and the treasurer of the Realme, thinking by this aduice to bee freed from the remainder of his accompts. These theuees were not two iorney from Tarudant, but they found themselves charged, and so prest as they were forced to loofe both prey and life, for they were all slaine. So the virgins and the treasurer was recouered, and Tarudant also. This happened in the yeere 1557.

At Marroc the Alcaide Ali Ben Buhcar remained Gouvernor, who had bene a good seruant to the Xeriffe that was dead, and was much affected to Abdalla his sonne. Hee vsing wordly wildome, hearing how his Master had bene slaine, not attending any order or commandement from the new King Abdalla, slue the old Xeriffe Hamet, who had bene giuen in gard, least the people should force him to deliuer this Hamet, to seat him in the royall Throne, where they had seene him some yeeres before, the which might hinder Abdalla who was then at Fez, desiring to settle him quietly in the realme as he did.

Among the Princes which this Gouvernor slue, there were two sonnes of Muley Zidan and of Mariana daughter to the deceased Xeriffe Mahomet, who found an easie means to be reuenged, for after the death of Muley Zidan her husband, she had retired to Abdalla her brother, whom she gouerned whilst he liued with great fauour, so as Ali Ben Buhcar had a most dangerous enemy of her about the King. Abdalla succeeded in the realmes of Marroc, Fez and Tarudant, with their appurtenances, without any contradiction: The father had ordained by a sollemne will, made in a Parliament or Conuocation held expressly, that the eldest of his sonnes should succeed in all his Estates, Lands, and Siegneu-ries, as King, and after him his other brethren vnto the last that should be lying, according vnto the prerogative of their ages, and that not any one of their children should come vnto the crowne, during the life of any one of the vnckes, which Order Abdalla in the course of his reigne thought to breake, in fauour of his sonne Mahomet, and there-vpon Mariana tooke occasion to be reuenged of Ali who had slaine her children, and procured his ruine by this means. This woman who was of a great spirit, gouerned the King absolutely, yea she presumed to meddle in his greatest and most secret affaires, and to giue him counsell, which he tooke not ill, but did conferre willingly with her. Hauing then a designe to breake this testamentary Ordinance made by his father, and to leaue the realme to his eldest sonne called Mahomet. She told him that the fould he should haue some contradiction, if he should die during the life of Ali Ben Buhcar, who was vizir of the realme, a cheefe dignity next vnto the King, yea of so great authority, as in the election of Kings, the voice and approbation of the vizir was very necessary; for according to the custome of the Moores, all their Kings were chosen after this manner, notwithstanding any Ordonances and dispositions which Kings in their life time may make to the contrary, and she told him that this vizir would seeke to maintaine his fathers wil, for the saw him much affected to one of his brethren, (she speake it not by surmise: for dissembling the hatred she bare vnto Ali (as shee was very cunning) and diuising often with him of diuers affaires, and euen of this, as if it had bene a desire of her owne onely, and no intent of the Kings, she discouered his heart sufficiently, by his discourse and answers, being to open and free for a Moore. Moreouer he was rich and mighty of himselfe, for he was Xeeq or Lord of a great people called Zaragana, and for his wisdom and valour, which were great, he was held lo necessary for the realme, as the King ought to respect him, and gouerne his affections according to his counsels. The King in truth did much esteeme him, and knowing that the election of his succesor depended of the vizirs voice and nomination, he did entertaine and gratifie Ali, thinking in time to bind him by his bounty to second his intentions. Confering alter with his sister of this desire which he had to leaue his realmes to Mahomet his sonne, she still objected vnto him the sincerity or rather severity of his vizir Ali Ben Buhcar, seeking to incense the King against him: So as on a time seeing the King discontented at some thing that Ali had done, according to the duty of his charge, but against the Kings will, this cunning woman fell in speech of the succession saying, that hee assured himselfe more of Ali then he sought, and namely in this businesse concerning his sonne Mahomet, perswading him to certifie himselfe by some tryall, and therefore she aduised him to counterfeite himselfe sicke for some daies, and not to suffer any one to enter into his Chamber, if he were not called

Services rashly performed.

Abdalla King
of Marroc, Fez, and Tarudant.

Testament of the Xeriffe Mahomet.

Vizir a dignity at Marroc.

Kings of the Moors elect time.

called the which is not strang among those nations, whereas their Kings being out of war remaine whole monthes shut with their women, and no man sees them, but such as are called. During this fiction, the Vizir Ali, who loued the King and the Estate, came daylie to the pallace, morning and euening, inquiring of his health, yet could not bee admitted into his Chamber. Mariane talked often with him, and made him beleue that the Kings sicknesse was very dangerous: who obseruing her words and countenance, perswaded himselfe that he was dead, and that she sought to conceale it, so as one morning he intreated her to tell him the truth, which should not be hidden from him; for if he were dead it were needfull to prouide another King speedily for the Estate, and that such affaires could not admit delaies. Then Mariane seeing how this businesse wrought, brought him into the Chamber, where he saw the Kings bed couered, and he stretched out and couered with a cloath, as if hee had beene dead, and so hee held him: Then she said vnto him, consider Ali I pray you, seeing the King my Lord is dead, to worke so as his sonne may be chosen King, as you know he much desired. It is very fit answered Ali, that you women should meddle with such matters, what reason were it to choose a young man for King? It must not be, the Xeriffe Mahomet hath wisely ordained, that the brethren should succede one another, knowing that Kingdomes must be gouerned by men that are ripe of yeeres and Iudgement, and being ready to goe out of the Chamber to assemble the counsell, hee was amazed when he saw the King vp, who called him, and said vnto him, that he thanked him much, for the good office he intended to his sonne. Ali was so daunted, as not able to answer, nor to excuse himselfe with any reason, hee fled home to his lodging, where having taken the habit of a woman, he commanded a seruant of his to bring him two horses to a certaine place where he would attend them, and sodainely departed, with an intent to goe out of the realme. Being in that place, set at the foote of an oliue tree, attending his seruant, there past by two young Knights, which came from hunting, who seeing that Ali hid his face, thinking it had beene some leud woman, they came neere to see, and made him to vncouer himselfe, knowing him, they doubted some mischief, so as they carried him backe vnto the King, who caused his head to be presently cut off. And thus was Mariane reuenged for the death of her children.

This matter being knowne, the Kings brethren and all they of the bloud dispersed themselves, yea after that hee had caused Muley Mahomet Aben Abdelcader his Nephew, sonne to his elder brother deceased, to be slaine at Melquinez, whom he had married with Lela Sophia his sisters daughter, onely for ieaousie, for that hee was a wife and a valiant Knight, and much beloued of his subiects. His brethren and other kinsmen being gone out of the country, he did not care much to persecute them. This Abdalla Xeriffe was the mightiest King of Affrike, the most peaceable, and the most happy, if he had abstayned for the bloud of his owne house. His dominions extended from Benais in the Negros country, whether the Prouince of Sus doth bound, which they call Remoto towards the South, vnto the North sea, and from the Westerne sea, vnto the limits of Tremessen towards the East, in the which are comprehended foureteen great Prouinces. Hee did commonly entertaine three score thousand horse, well paid, the which were thus diuided 15000. in the realme of Sus 25000. at Marroc, and 20000. at Fez; and our of these hee drew fife thousand horse, which were his batrallion or Cornet: And moreouer hee had two thousand Harguebuziers on foote, Christians renegados, and fife hundred on horse-backe; with a thousand Harguebuziers of Sus for the gard of the towne of new Fez, which is the Kings pallace, and as bigge as a good towne. Hee gaue pay to all these souldiers as well in peace as warre, being paid euery foure monthes: when he had any enterprife, if need were, he assembled all his trained bands, and moreouer did entertaine what Arabians and Africans he pleased, lyuing in his countries, vnder a certaine vassillage, and paid them for the time they serued. He reigned seuentee yeeres, and ordained Mahomet his sonne to be heire to those their realmes, and to all his treasure, who beganne to persecute his vnckles, hauing three yet lyuing: that is, Abdelmumen, Abdelmelech, whom the Spaniards call Muley Moluc, and a bastard called Hamet.

Abdelmumen

*Dominions of Abdalla King
of Fez and Marroc.*

Abdelmumen was slaine at Tremessen, by a murtherer who shot at him being at his prayers in a Mosque; Hamet liued among the Alarabes, but Muley Moluc had first retired to Alger, from whence hee did for a time sollicit the King of Spaine, by the meanes of D. Rodrigo Alonso Pimentel, viceroy of Valencia, to assist him to annoy Abdalla his brother, who sought to deprime him of his right, but seeing it was in vaine, he past to Constantinople, where hauing complained of the iniustice was done him by his brother, hee continued in Selims seruice, seeking all occasions to giue a testimony of his valour, and to make him willing to aide him to recouer the realmes of Fez, Marroc, and Tarudant, which did belong vnto him, and were vturped by Mahomet the sonne of Abdalla, his Nephew. He had beene in the warres which the Turkes had against the Venetians and the confederats, and at the recovery of Tunes, and the fort Goulette, where hee had carried himselfe so valiantly, as by the report of Sinan Basba, the Sultan Selim held him worthy to be assisted and fauoured, sending him backe into Affrike, with letters of fauor and commandement to his Lieutenants, to giue him what ayde they could; so as hauing by this meanes gathered together a good army of Turkes and Moores his friends, and some Arabians which his brother Hamet brought vnto him, he came vpon his Nephew Mahomet, and gaue him three defeats, the last whereof was admirable; for Mahomet had three score thousand horse, and tenne thousand foote, and 360. peeces of ordinance, yet hee disposed him quite, and chased him out of the realmes of Fez and Marroc, and their dependances. It is this Mahomet, which did incite D. Sebastian King of Portugal to passe into Affrike, whose misfortunes we must now relate.

Mahomet is belied by Moluc.

D. Sebastian the sixteenth King of Portugal, alone of that name.

On Sebastian King of Portugal had beene bred vp since the death of King John the third (being but three yeeres old) vnder the gouernment of Queene Catherine his grandmother, and of his vnckle D. Henry the Cardinal, who were his tutors, and Gouernors of the realme, who bred him vp in delights and superfluous pompe, in steed of that commendable simplicity of his predecessors: wherefore being twenty yeeres old, put vp with those vanities, being strong of body, of a courageous minde, full of ouerweening, (a natural vice in Portugals) and not content with his owne Dominions, he resolved (as it were by force) to alter the quiet of his realme, and to make triall of his valour, to his owne ruine, and of the crowne of Portugal: for not measuring his owne forces, hee would needs (without any constraint, and contrary to the aduice of Princes, which were allied vnto him, and his most faithfull friends) meddle in the warres and quarrels of the Xeriffes of Affrike: the chiefe blame whereof was imputed to the Iesuits, to whom Queene Catherine had given him in charge to frame his affections and Iudgement. These fathers who were in great credit, and well provided for in Portugal, being tired with their long peregrinations to the East Indies, where they are bound to procure the soules health of the Barbarians, with whom the Portugals doe trade, desired much that there might bee some occasion offered to set footing into Affrike, which was neere, by some enterprife of warre: enterrayning this young King in this humor, who to bee ready when time should require, made certaine legions or trained bands on foote, in Lisbon and other townes, causing them to bee inrowled, and armed with pikes, and harguebuzes, and some of them to bee drawne once a weeke out of Lisbon to bee trained.

Portugal;
5
D. Sebastian
first of that name King of Portugale

D. Sebastian
bred up by the Iesuits.

In the yeere 1574. he had an ything desire (as I haue said) to see the skittishes which were daily made betwixt the garrisons of Ceura and Tanger, & the bordering Moores, he past the straight with some companies of soldiers, saying that he went only to visit those places: Being arriued in those countries hee discovered his lowne weaknesse, hauing a desire to do more then he spake, and being yong & without experience thought to effect more then hee did. Being returned to Lisbon, he did still meditate vpon some warre,

*Death of D.
Sebastian.*

Stiff especially especially in those parts, and in this desire hee did things nothing befitting a King: A practising amongst the common people, to the end, said he, to bee better accustomed to the toyles of warre. He thought that a happy occasion was offered, hearing that Muley Moluc, or Abdelmelech was come with Turkes to assaile Muley Mahomet his Nephew, to whom he presently sent to make offer of his forces if he had need, but the Moore (who was no discreeter then hee) thanked him, saying that he was strong enough to repulse Muley Moluc, and to ruine him, whereof hee repented himselfe afterwards; for hauing beene vanquished and dispossest, he was forced to come to intreaties. This Moore after his defeats, fled with such as would follow him, hauing some iewels and other wealth, vnto certaine places called Montes Claros, which is, a sauage country, but finding B

Mahomet flies to King Philip for refuge.

himselfe neither safe there, nor in a place fit to negotiat, hee went to Pegnon de Veles, casting himselfe into King Philips armes, for hee was ashamed to haue recourse to him of Portugal, whose offers hee had refused. Yet hee was forced to come vnto him, for he found not King Philip disposed to deale in that businesse. King Sebastian who desired nothing more then to goe to the warre in Afrike, granted him whatsoever hee could demand, and did easily credit the promises and bragges of this Moore, who said, that as soone as euer they should thew themselves in field on the other side of the streight, the whole country would turne vnto him; for Abdelmelech, said he, had no friends, and was in a manner vnknowne, the which was found false, for after the victory he had beene receiued and acknowledged with great ioy and contentment, by them of C Fez and Marroc, as their lawfull King, as well in fauour of the testamentary decree of the old Xeriffe Mahomet his father, as for that he was held amongst the Xeriffes to bee most valiant, and much regarded for his mildnesse and humanity, being alouer of Iustice, and temperate, and modest in his behauiour, vertues which grace a Prince, and which wanted in Mahomet, the effects whereof Moluc had made his subiects to tast: for he presently ordred the affaires of the Realme to their content; and for that the Turkes which he had brought with him, committed many inolenencies (as men accustomed to all excesses, lying in the garisons of Barbary, farre from their Sultan) hee freed himselfe, and sent them away well satisfied. So as being respected and beloued of euery man, they D came and offered their seruices voluntarily vnto him; and sent him rich presents from all parts of his dominions; yet some Christian Princes were glad to haue his friendship, and among other, King Philip, whom he did also honour, so as many Christians began to frequent his Court and countries, to whom he shewed both fauor and bounty: One of his chiefeest cares was to provide for the succcession of the realme, wherefore he caused the Noblemen, townes and states, to sweare fealty and homage vnto Muley Hamet his base brother, according to their fathers testament, notwithstanding that he had a sonne:
 the which was held by them to be a generous act, for the which there were great feasts of ioy made at Fez, Marroc, Tarudant and other townes. Whilest that Mahomet begged succors of the King of Portugal by his Deputies; hee liued at Ceuta, a fort belonging vnto Portugal, being in Afrike; the Governor whereof being aduertised of his E Masters disposition, did him honour, attending an answer, the which hee had soone, and according to his desire.

Muley Moluc a friend to Christians.

Mahomet Xeriffe craves aide from Portugal.

*King Philip
disuades D.
Sebastian from the vniuers of Africke.*

But the King D. Sebastian being aduertised by some that were about him, that hee might finde himselfe too weake for so great an enterprize, hee tooke counsell to fol-licit King Philip his vncle to bee of the partie, and to the end they might negotiat such an action with more efficacy, hee sent Peter d'Alcauosa a favorite of his, to craue an interview at Guadalupe vpon the confines of the realmes of Castile and Portugal, who returned with a good answer; whereas these two Kings met to their great contents, namely of Don Philip, there was some treaty of a future marriage betwixt Don Sebastian, and one of the daughters of Castile; but coming to confer of the waite of Afrike, which was the chiefe subiect of their meeting, King Philip disuaded him from it, as well for that he had a peccable treaty with Muley Moluc, as also for that he saw such a war had need of a more experienced commander then D. Sebastian was, & better soldiers then the Portugals of those times: for since the time of King Emanuel, that nation had not done any thing memorabile in warre, at the least in Europe, or the countries confining

A confining vpon Europe, yet hauing well defended their forts at the East Indies. The conclusion was that King Philip aduised him not to meddle in the quarrels of those Princes Moores, but whatsoever hee did not to goe in person to those warres. Being importuned by D. Sebastian to contribute men and shipping to this enterprize, hee excused himselfe vpon the great affaires he had in the Low countries, and the ieaousie he had continually of the French, but especially of the Turke, who threatned Sicile and Italy, and had already taken Goulette and Tunes, being ignorant, what this new Sultan might practise against him; yet being intreated and conured by D. Sebastian not to abandon him in his first enterprize, he would not leaue him discontented, but promised in case the Turke did not arme against him, to furnish him with fifty Gallies and fūe thousand fouldiars, so as he for his part should entertaine tenne thousand, and aduising him, what warre soeuer he made in Afrike, not to abandon the sea shore, and that he should attempt the recovery of Alarache, and so proceed by degrees along the Ocean, and then they parted. King Philips aduise was very good, and the Portugals haue not yet any cause to complaine.

*Aduise of King
Philip to D.
Sebastian.*

After that he had heard his Nephew speake, and discovered his heat and obstinacy, he fell to discourse of the inconueniences that might fall vpon him, and began to thinke of his affaires, as if the royall line of Portugall failed, and to seeke out what pretensions he might haue, were they cleere or doubtful, and from that time hee resolved, that if Don C Sebastian should chance to die in this warre, not to suffer any other to seize vpon the Realme. The young King of Portugal being returned to Lisbon, full of hope and ioy, hee still pressed King Philip to grant him a free promise of his succors, without that reseruatiō, if the Turke should send an army against him, the which hee granted, and there-vpon hee thought it was but a leape to passe into Afrike with great troupes, which hee imagined to haue ready; but when they came to examine euery thing in particular, they neither found men, money, shipping, nor hories of seruice, nor any thing that might serue to good vse, so as to provide all these things, which giue motion vnto armies, they were forced to spend all the yeere 1577. And without doubt if D. Sebastian had had his men and prouisions ready, as it was concluded, King Philip would haue furnished the

*D. Sebastian
unfurnished of all things, for the warre.*

D gallies and men which he had promised. D. Sebastian beganne then to tast the difficulties which are found in making warre, especially for Estates which haue enioyed a long peace, and whereas both Nobility and people, haue neglected armes (the which is an inexcusable fault in them that gouerne common weals, who should know that it is one of the maine pillars of an Estate, especially in this age full of iniustice.) Seeing then that Portugal at that time had neither capitaines, souldiers, treasure, victuals, armes, nor horses, which are the essentiall parts to make a warre, into the which D. Sebastian would enter, he was forced to provide all these things extraordinarily and in hast, seeing that in time of peace they had not thought of it. Hee was therefore forced to write into Italy and Flanders, for some Regiments of old souldiers, the Prince of Orange (who was then in armes against the Prince of Parma Lieutenant to King Philip) sent three thousand E Lanquents into Portugall, vnder the command of Martin of Burgongne, Lord of Tamberg. And it happened that the King of Spaine being peraued by Pope Gregory the thirteenth, to succor the rebels of Ireland against the Queene of England, there was a leauy of Italians made in the territories of the Church, the action went in the Popes name, but the King bare the charge, six hundred of these vnder the command of a Licentious English man called Thomas Stukeley (who not long before had gotten from the Pope the title of Marquis of Ireland) being shipped at Ciuita-uechia, came into the riuer of Lisbon when they were preparing for this warre of Afrike. The King being desirous to see them, staied them, and intreated them to goe with him to this war.
 F He was forced to seeke money by meanes that were vnpleasing to the whole realme. The king tooke the portions of Widowes & Orfāns, he made forced borrowings of the Clergy, Nobility, townes and commonalties, he laied an imposition vpon salt: he made the new Christians (as they call them) to buy the exemption of the confiscation of their goods in case they should fall into the Inquisition, and hee vied other exactions, which made all men complaine.

He staied marchants ships. He enioyed some of the Nobility, to mount themselves like men at armes, and many gentlemen to march with the foote, being so aduised, to better his new leauied Portugal footmen, of the which hee made foure regiments; In these preparations he spent the time vntill Sommer, being in the yeere 1578. And when he thought to take shipping, hoping that King Philip would haue sent him the gallees and men which he had promised, he found himselfe deceiued, for that the Castilian (hauing changed his minde) excused himselfe vpon new accidents which had happened that yeere, which would not suffer him to doe then, as he might haue done the yeere before: wherefore he had no aide from thence, but some voluntary aduenturers, and one very expert capitaine in matters of Africke, called Francis of Aldana. There was no man of any iudgement and experience in worldly affaires, but saw that this preparation was weake, and unfitting for such an enterprize, but there was no counsell, nor perswasion, no difficulties, nor any other consideration, could stay or diuert him. Hauing intreated the Cardinall his vncke to gouerne the realme in his absence, he excused himselfe vpon his age; wherevpon he made foure Gouernors, that is, George of Almeida Archbishop of Lisbon, Peter de Alcaçoua superintendant of the treasure, Peter de Sa-da and Iohn Majcarenas. They that did accompany him into Africke were Diego de Sofa, Generall of the fleet at sea, Christopher Tauora Master of his horse and capitaine of the voluntaries of Portugal, Don George d' Alencastro Duke of Auero, Don Alphonso of Portugal Earle of Vimiofo, Don Lewis Cotigno Earle of Rodoudo, Don Alphonso de Norogna Earle of Myra, Don Iames brother to the Duke of Bragança, and his Nephew the Duke of Barcellos, Vasco de Gama, and many others of the Nobility, but most of them in stead of good armes, were appareled in fatten, enrich with imbroyderies, as if they had gone to some feast or marriage; yea there were some which had lined their tents and pavillions with fatten.

Gouernors made by D. Sebastian going into africke.

Superfluity of the Portugalls going to the warre.

6 D. Sebastian's Armie going into africke.

In this equiPAGE D. Sebastian parted from Lisbon, being about foure and twenty yeeres old, the day after Saint Iohn Baptists, being the five and twentieth of Iune, hauing about two thousand sailes in his fleet, but there were scarce 60. ships of warre, nor defence, the best were five galleies and foure galleasses; he came to Cadiz, where he staied fifteene daies, attending the Castilian souldiers of Andalusia, which should follow him D the suffrage of King Philip, which some said were two thousand, others, fifteene hundred or lesse. He had a Legat from the Pope in his army, with ample power to giue pardons to all such as went this voyage; then sayling towards the coast of Africke, they cast anchor right against a place called the Almadraues, betwixt Tanger and Arzille. This place of Arzille was held by a Moore called Albacarin, who by the perswasion of Muley Mahomet, had consigned it some few daies before vnto the Gouernor of Tanger. The King landed at Tanger, and there Muley Xecq, the sonne of Mahomet, came vnto him, and soone after the father presented himselfe, and made a goodly oration of his rights and pretensions, and of his friends and confederats which he had in the country, promising to giue the King three ports of the sea, and other places in Barbary; and for a pawne hee gaue him his sonne in hostage. King Sebastian being fed with these fictions, past with his army towards Arzille, hauing drawne all the old souldiers out of Tanger and Ceuta, and put new in their places, hauing first caused Muley Xecq to runne towards Mazagon, to see if any Moores would ioyne with him, but there was not any one that offered himselfe, but to skirmish.

King Abdelmelech or Muley Moluc had bene aduertised of this preparation from Cadiz and Castile, and also from Portugal, and was much greued at the enterprize of this young Prince, nor that he feared him, or his forces, but for that he saw him abused, and also in regard he bare some affection vnto Christians. What moued him (said hee) to be mine enemy, and to trouble himselfe to take from me a realme which doth belong vnto me, yea by hereditary right, confirmed and allowed, to giue it to an other, and thereby not to benefit himselfe nor any Estate in Christendome? Doth hee thinke we are so vnprovided of souldiers, so faint hearted, so poore and needie, as wee cannot resist him. I foresee to my great griefe that the country of Barbary shall be a tombe for the King of Portugal and his army, for God who is iust will neuer suffer that so

Muley Moluc speech of D. Sebastian.

vniust

A vniust an enterprize shall succeed. This Moorish King did often vse these or such like speeches, as it hath bene since reported. But because he would not bee found vnprovided, hee gathered together a mighty army, and went timely to field, vpon the Marches of the realme of Marroc, and hearing that the Portugal army had landed at Arzille with an intent to goe to Alarache, hee aduanced into the country of Temifan tending to the Portugals frontier, and then being aduertised that the enemy hauing left the sea shore, approached neere vnto Alcaçaquibir, and had already waded through a little river called Macazen, which fallies into that of Luco, whereat hee wondred, knowing well that there was ignorance and confusion in the conduct of the King of Portugals army, and that it was not strong ynough to leaue the sea shore, and to march into the country.

Error of D. Sebastian.

In truth this was one of Don Sebastian's chiefe errors, who (meaning to goe to Alarache which stands vpon the sea, and hauing his vessels already at Arzille to carry him in an instant) would rather trie to lead his army by land, and enter farre into a country, which was vnknowne both to him and his, to finde a bridge which is vpon the riuer of Luco, the which is not to bee waded through in those parts, and being betwixt his army and Alarache, stopped his passage. He marched vpon the riuer of Luco, and made five lodgings, before he had any newes of Muley Moluc's army, but such as vncertaine: yet hee was so neere it, as he was ready to fall into it before he saw it, doing all things after his owne fantasie, not suffering any one to contradiet him: Hee had commanded Diego de Sofa, Generall of the fleet, to goe and attend him neere to Alarache, marshalling his army to lead it by land, as wee haue said; against the opinion of all men, yea of Muley Mahomet, who beganne now to despair of his restitution. Some said that hee had a great desire to see his army in battaile, and to play the Sargent, and to trie if hee could order his squadrons, who like a young man and without experience, did not consider that the conduct of armies is no childrens play, growing into choller when any one told him, that a good capitaine must haue a good foote, a good eye, and good eares, and that hee should alwaies take the surest way, how strong foucer his army were, so as no man durst speake vnto him. Muley Moluc came to Alcaçaquibir, and hauing there ioynd with his brother Hamet, hee made hast to get the bridge, which the Portugals fought after, and there past his army, so as the two armies were so neere in a plaine champion field called Tamira, as if night had not approached, they might haue seene one another that day. Then were they to resolute what to doe; for they must of necessity fight or retire in disorder to recover the sea, the one or the other was very dangerous, but a battaile most; for there was no comparison betwixt their forces. King Mahomet made the greatest instance to haue Don Sebastian retire with his army, although it were with some losse. Most of the captaines were of that aduice, especially of strangers, but howeouer, either in a picht field, or in a retreat, hauing so many horses to pursue them, this army must of force be defeated, wherefore let vs leaue this testimony to posterity of Don Sebastian, that hee made choise of the most honourable manner of dying. Hauing therefore put his army in battaile by the breake of day, hee beganne to march courageously against his enemies. Hee had about 14000. foote, two thousand horse and three thousand pioniers; and there was double the number of boyes, whores, victuallers, carters and other vnprofitable people. But to describe the King of Portugals army more particularly, it did consist of three thousand Lanquenets vnder the Sieigneur of Tamberg their Collonel, fixe hundred Italians, vnder Strukeler an English man, two thousand Spaniards vnder D. Alphonso d' Aguilar, fixe hundred souldiers drawne out of Tanger, 2050. aduenturers on foote, the rest were peasants of Portugall. Amongst which footmen there were eight thousand pikes. Moreouer five hundred horse of Tanger, and 1500. as well of the gentlemen of Portugal, as of the Kings attendants. The souldiers were ill paid, the campe ill furnished, and all things managed with small order. In Muley Moluc's army there were 42000. horse, Moores and Alarabes, carrying lances and targets after their manner, and about 15000. harguebuziers, whereof two thousand were on horsebacke, fixe and twenty peeces of ordinance well mounted, and expert gunners.

Resolution of D. Sebastian.

Stiff 3

Moreouer

The generall History of Spaine.

Lib. 30.

Moluc falls very sick.Captaine in Moluc's army.7 battalions Af-fricke and
death of D.
Sebastian.Death of Muley Moluc.Death of King Mahomet.Defeat of the Portugall army, and death of D. Sebastian.

Moreover there was great store of victuals, his men well paid, and all orderly gouerned: All the discommodity thereof (the which in deed was very great) was the indisposition of King Moluc, who hauing drunke milke to greedily, it quailed in his stomack, whereupon he fell extremely sicke and died in the heat of the battaile, the which did not hinder their victory. The armies approaching nere together, Moluc made hast to ioyne, for he feared that some of his troupes would disband, and goe vnto the enemy, and in truth there were some which left him, but not many, nor they whom he most distrusted. Hamet his base brother was Generall of the horse, Duali and Mahomet Faba captains of the Andaluses and Christians renegados: Ozarin of Ragoufa led the harguebuziers on horsebacke, and Musa was captaine of his gard, with other good captaines Turkes. These two armies ioyned on a Monday the fourth of August, it being past noone, the canon hauing plaied a little, the Portugall army was presently enuiored by great numbers of the enemies horse, but Moluc left point was furiously charged by three hundred men at armes, led by the Duke of Auero, the which was put to route; there were about ten thousand Arabes which fled about twenty leagues, to carry newes that the Christians were victors, which disorder made Muley Moluc to get to horsebacke, so full of griefe, as he would haue gone thither to fight notwithstanding his sick-nesse: But the souldiers of his gard staid him, and put him into his Litter, where within halfe an houre after hee died, but they concealed his death. The Duke of Auero fearing to ingage himselfe to much, being not followed, ment to retire, after that he had broken that part of Moluc's army: but the Moores being ashamed that so few horse had thus shaken them, they sent a great number of harguebuziers, both of foote and horse-backe thether, who charged them in front, so as they chased these men at armes troupe of Arabian horse, came vpon them in front, so as they chased these men at armes vpon their battalions of foote, and disordered them very much: But they were presently repulsed by the King, Don Sebastian, who was mounted vpon a strong horse, and in greene armor, being followed by the Duke of Auero, and a squadron of fresh horse, who being charged by a great battalions of the Moores Cavalary and shot, were soone put to route, in which retreat they happened the like confusion. And then the whole bodie of Moluc's army, with Hamet, fell vpon the disordered troupes of King Don Sebastian, with such fury, as they were no more able to resist them.

In this charge the Duke of Auero was slaine, with many gallant gentlemen, the whole army put to route and the ordinance abandoned. Yet King Sebastian charging Hamet troupes made a breach in them, and forced them to turne their backs, but returning, he saw all his battalions, ouerthrowne, euen to that of Mahomet, which was the last and nerecest to the riuier, with an incredible slaughter of his men; so as Mahomet being forced to flee, thinking to passe the riuier of Mucazen, missing the foard, he was mired and drowned with his horse; but to increate all these miseries, D. Sebastian was charged by so great a number of Moores, as both he and all they that did accompany him, were slaine; it is certaine that many left him, flying towards Arzille; but they fell into the like misery, for being pursued by the victorious Moores, they were in a manner all cut in peeces. There died about 12000. Christians, amongst the which the chiefe, with the King Don Sebastian, were the Duke of Auero, the Marquis of Aranda, the Bishops of Coimbra and Porto, the Popes Legat Christoph de Tauora, and his brother Aluaro Pe- res, Alphonso of Portugal Earle of Vimiofo, Lewis Cotigno Earle of Rodondo, Vasco de Ga- ma Earle of Vidiguera, Alphonso de Noroña Earle of Mira, John Lobo Baron of Aluira, Aluaro de Melo sonne to the Marquis of Ferrera, Roderigo de Melo eldest sonne to the Earle of Tentugal, James brother to the Duke of Bragança, John de Silueira eldest sonne to the Earle of Sortella, the captaines of the Regiments of strangers, with others, so as by this defeat many Noble families of Portugall were extinct. There were many more taken prisoners of all sorts: The Duke of Barcellos, and the King of Spaines Ambassador were deliuered without ranome. Don Anthony (who was base sonne to the Infant Don Lewis) Prior of Crato, of the order of Saint Iohn, being taken prisoner, escaped miraculously: some of the rest redeemed themselves, but the greatest part remained slaues in diuers places.

Hamet

Lib. 30

The generall History of Spaine.

1203

A Hamet, a Conqueror, hauing gathered his people together, and caused a retreat to bee founded, did that night publish the death of his brother Abdelmelech or Moluc, whereupon he was receyued and acknowledged for King, but to the great griefe of most of them who knew him to be a man of little valour, and not like vnto the deceased.

The day following, the new King sent some troupes to view the dead, where they found about 1500. of their men slaine, whose they buried in the same place: they also found the bodie of Mahomet, who had bene the cause of all these miseries. The body of King Sebastian was found naked among a troupe of his men that were slaine, and knowne by two of his seruants, as they say, to whom they had promised libertie, if they could find him. D. Sebastian's bodie was left (as it were in deposito) at Alcaçar: but a while after the Xeriffe Hamet (renewing the alliance and peace which his brother had made with the king of Spaine) offered him this bodie, and to set his Ambassador, and the young Duke of Barcellos freely at liberty.

The King would not accept of D. Sebastian's bodie, but intreated him to deliuer it vnto the Portugals, the which he did, and sent it to the Gouernor of Ceuta, to whom An- drew Gaspar of Corfica did consigne it in Hamet's name, and tooke an act thereof: Hamet caused the bodie of Muley Mahomet to be flead, and the skinne to be stuff with straw, the which was carried in great ignominy throughout the Realme: and the bodie of Abdelme- lech, was carried twenty leagues from Alcaçar, and buried with his ancestors. Thus there died three Kings in that battell. The King of Spaine accepted of the deliuerie of the duke of Barcellos, and of John de Sylua his Ambassador, in requittal whereof he sent a present to the Xeriffe in Jewellst o the value of an hundred thousand crownes. Don Sebastian had reigned one and twenty yeares, one moneth, and sixe and twenty dayes, and dyed being foire and twenty yeares old, sixe moneths, and fiftene dayes.

The losse of this battell being knowne in Portugall, caused a generall sorrow and mourning, but they were doubtfull for a time, who were slaine or prisoners, wherof they were certified by degrees, and this desolation crept into priuate families, so as there were scarce any among the Nobilitie but felt of it. The Kings death was held doubtfull many yeares, some denying, that there was any certaine testimonie that his bodie had beene found among them that were slaine in the battell: saying, that the liberall offer which Hamet Xeriffe made to king Philip, who demanded it not, was a great presumption, that he himselfe doubted, that the bodie which he left at Alcaçar Quibir, was not Don Sebastian, yea, that he did not beleue it: others haue presumed to say, that they had seen him after the battell in Portugall in a disguised habit, shrowding himselfe for shame in religious houses, and that being oppressd with griefe for the death of so many of the Nobility, he had bene so sorrowfull, as holding himselfe vnworthie to raigne, he had returned into Affricke in a religious habit, and wandred among the Barbarians, who giue free passage to them that do penance for their sinnes, of what religion soeuer they be: yet two and twenty yeares after this battell, there hath bene a man found so resembling D.
Sebastian, shewing markes vpon his bodie, naturall or accidentall, so like vnto those wherewith this Prince had bene marked, and speaking so confidently of things said or done by this king from his infancy, to the time of this lamentable day, and of secret conferences and speeches which he had had, as well with Ambassadours of forraigne Princes, which had bene sent vnto him, as other persons yet liuing, which haue certified it, and discourfing so particularly and truly of the estate of Portugall at that time, as it hath made many doubtfull whether he were Sebastian or not, whom they held to haue bene slaine at the battell, in the plaine of Tamita in Affricke. You shall hereafter here it at large, and the man himselfe speake. But howsoeuer, Don Sebastian's funerall was made at Lis-bone with great ceremonie, at the end whereof they cryed Reall, Reall, for the King Don Henry. King Philip did also make a funerall pompe at Madrid, where it was obserued, that the Duke of Alba sayd, that the King should go and do those obsequies in our Ladies Church at Belem in Portugall, and not at Madrid, which made some thinke, that the king had discouered his conceptions, and had resolved touching the succession of the Realme.

Don

D. Sebastian's body consigned Portugals.Death of Don Sebastian was belieued of many.

Don Henry the seuenteenth King of Portugall.

8
Don Henry 17.
King of Portu-
gall.

BY the decease of Don Sebastian, the Crowne of Portugal seemed to belong to Don Henry his great Vncle, Cardinal of the title of foure Saints crowned: but King Philip Councill, (I know not by what law) found that the right which he pretended, was stronger then the Cardinals, yet he modestly gaue way to his preferment, and the rather for that seeing him old and broken, he thought he might with more content of the Portugals take his ranke afterwards without any difficulty or dispute. Yet there were many other pretendants to this succession, which might cause some troubles in the State, and therefore the first request which the citie of Lisbon made vnto Don Henry in the name of the whole country, was, that for the quiet and tranquillitie of the State, hee would be pleased in his life time to name him, or her, who (in his opinion) ought to raigne after him: wherein they layed a burthen vpon him, which did exceed the force and capacitie of his iudgement. For this Prince in the whole course of his life had shewed a simplicitie of manners, and a weaknesse in his discourse, which had made him to be alwaies held fitter for the Church, then to gouerne a temporall State. Yet seeing himselfe King, hee sought to be feared, and gaue way to his ambition and choler, which procured him no more loue then before, but made him to be both hated and cursed. He disappoynted and dismist all those, that had had any fauour or office in Court during his nephewes raigne, for that they had not respected and honoured him, as he thought, according to his ranke and neerenes of blood, causing some to be arraigned by course of Iustice, for their char- and neerenes of blood, causing some to be arraigned by course of Iustice, for their char- ges, for words proudly spoken, and such like things which had past in the life of the de- ceased King, who were degraded of honours, deprived of the rewards which they had de- served, and sent from Court: He intreated Pedro d'Alcaçaua more roughly then any o- ther, who had bene of the seeret Councill and high Treasurer. He appointed other Offi- cers in their places that were dismist, who were no honeste then the former, but much more ignorant in affaires, who framing themselves to their masters humors, thought to shew themselves sufficient to bring in examinations and reuisions of accompts, against such as had made parties, and contracted with the King, causing most of those contracts to be broken, and it may be such as were least vniust.

To know the disposition of this new King, and to make his ministers conformable to King *Philip*s desire, which was to vnite the Crowne of Portugues to that of Castile, in what sort hee would, he sent Christopher de MORA, a Portugall, bredde vp in Castile, to reside there, with the title of an agent onely, who spared no paines, cost, nor presents to pour- chase friends to his Master. But the better to assure his pursuit, he was aduised in Castile to send some man of qualitie vnto the king Don Henry, with the title of Ambassadour: the which the King of Spaine had till then forborne to do, for that he thought he should thereby preiudice the right which he pretended from the death of Don Sebastian, if hee did by this act acknowledge him for King of Portugall, in sending an Ambassadour vnto him. There was chosen to this charge, Don Pedro Giron, Duke of Ossuna, after the resolu- tion taken by the King Don Henry in an assembly of the Estates of the Realme, touching the nomination of his successor, which was, That the King would not name any one at that present, but might do it in time, by the aduice of the Iudges, assigned by the Estates, and in the meane time to preuent all inconueniences that might happen, if the King should dye suddenly, being very old, there should be a rowle made of fifteen of the chief and worthiest men among the Nobilitie, of the which the King should choofe fise, who should be after him Gouernors of the State, vntill the Iudges had determined who should be the true successor to the Crown, in case the king had not named one: and that the fise of e- thus chosen by him, should be kept seeret during his life: and to examine the rights of e- uery one of the Pretendans, and to iudge with the King (being aliue, and sitting in his Estates) or after his decease, in case there were no sentence giuen, there should bee ano- ther rowle made of foure and twenty Doctors, and men of State, of the which the king should Proceeding for the succession of Portugall.

A should choofe eleuen Iudges, which should make a royall Chamber to that end; and it was decreed, that all the sayd Pretendans should bee cited and adourned to appeare, or their Ambassadors, or Agents, before the sayd Chamber, there to produce their rights and pretensions, and to be heard in all that they would say and alledge, to the end they might make report, and proceed to the nomination. The Pretendans were Don Philip King of Spaine, Don Anthony Prior of Crato, Donna Catherina of Portugall, mother to D. Theodose of Bragança, Rainacio Farnese, son to her sister D. Maria of Portugall, both being daughters to the Infant Don Edward, and Emanuel Philebert, Duke of Sauoy, borne of Donna Beatrix of Portugall: all these deriuing their rights from Don Emanuel, King of Portugall: moreover, there was Catherine de Medicis the French Queen, the Pope but especially the realme and states of Portugall.

Pretendans to the Crowne of Portugall.

Don Philip was borne of D. Isabella, eldest daughter to Don Emanuel, the Duke of Sauoy was sonne to D. Beatrix second daughter to the sayd King, Don Anthony was is- sued from the Infant Don Lewis, who was also sonne to King Emanuel, but Don Anthony was base, yet he maintained that he had a sentence for his legitimation. The Duchesse of Bragança was daughter to the Infant D. Edward, who was also sonne to King Emanuel, but Rainacio Farnese was issued from Mary, the eldest daughter of the sayd Don Edward. As for the Queene mother of France, she fetched her pretensions farther off, saying, that the Kings which had raigned in Portugall since Don Alphonso the third, brother to Don Queene mothers title to Portugall.

Sancho Capello, had bene vlturpers of that Realme, the race being base and proceeding from an vnlawfull coniunction: for that they say, Don Alphonso being married in France with the Countesse of Bullen, by whom he had one sonne named Robert, from whose the Pretendant was descended, he had left the sayd Countesse to marrie another wife in her life time, which was Donna Beatrix of Castile, and that from this vnlawfull marriage, all the Kings were issued which had held the Realme vnto that day. The Pope pre- tended it to be a fee, saying, that the Realme of Portugall was a fee of the Church, and was so acknowledged by Don Alphonso Henriques the first, who obtayned the title of a king, who in acknowledgement had bound it to pay a certaine quantitie of markes of gold for a yearly rent, and for not paying those rights the Realme was deuolued vnto the Church, to dispose thereof. This right was corroborated after the death of the Car- dinal then raigning, for that (said they) it was the spoiles of a Cardinal. But the realme and the generall Estates, pretended to haue an aduantage aboue all, for that (sayd they) women could pretend no right in Portugall to the succession of the Crowne, neither for themselves, nor their descendants: for they had neuer seene any women raign, although it had bene often in question, euen with the Castilians, who had bene reiecte, and if they should haue any access, or their descendants, it must be after the males, before whome, women haue no precedence, in regard of their age, the which is not considera- ble in fees, much lesse in Soueraigne Estates.

Popes title to Portugall.

Most of these Pretendans being cited, they sent their rights, titles, and Pretensions, the which were receyued by the sayd chamber without any difficultie, but in regard of Queene Catherine de Medicis, whose cause was odious, and her allegations iniurious to the king then raigning, and to his Predecessours, the Abbot of Saint Gelais her Agent found great difficultie to haue it admitted. Onely King Philip appeared not in this Chamber, dislayming the Iudges that were chosen, yea all the Portugals in his cause, the which (he sayd) was so iust and cleare, as it needed not any examination nor doubt, ha- uing had consultations vpon that point in the best Vniuersities of the world, as well for that which concerns right, and the lawes of Realmes, as for conscience, and to satisfie the king Don Henry, (whom he did importune by his Ambassadors to name him, with- out any other forme obserued by the Estates) he sent him a coppie of the counsels which many Lawyers and Diuines in Spaine had made him, that other reasons being exami- ned and weighed, hee might not make any difficultie to name him. Aboue all they had wonne father Lyon Henrique a Iesuite, his Confessor, who hauing first made him incline to the Duchesse of Bragança, laboured afterwards to perswade him to name King Philip for his successor. The Duke of Ossuna and Christopher de MORA his Ambassadour doubting that this iudiciall proceeding would not preuaile, & that the familiaritie of the Castilians had

Lisbon refused the King
of Spaine
letters.

had bene alwaies odious vnto the Portugals, who detested their gouernement, they had letters from the King their master, to the chiefe of the Nobilitie, to the Cittie of Lisbon, and to the principall townes of the Realme, full of perswasive reasons and promises, concluding in the end, that if they did not receiue him willingly (his title beeing so well grounded) he would vse force, and therefore they should aduise not to draw themselves, their families, and the whole Realme into a warre, and the miseries which follow it. These letters were deliuered to many with good words and presents: but the cittie of Lisbon would not receiue them: and as Christopher de Morza had left them with the Officers of the Cittie: they sent them sealed vnto their King, who was much troubled with this weightie busines, and could not resolue any thing that was pleasing to king Philip, who threatened him, and began to let the Portugals know, that he prepared to armes: for not meaning to be taken vnprovided at Henries death, which could not belong, and that this delay should not any way preiudice him in that he pretended to be King of Portugal, in despite of all those that would contradiet, he had drawne into Spaine of Germans, Italians and Spaniards of his old regiments of Italy, to the number of 18000. foot, whom he enteratyned many moneths with great charge and hinderance to his subiects, in Andalusia, and other places nere to Portugal, which they could not coniecture to be to any other end, but to invade that realme, where they sayd openly, that armes and force were his best title: for he had no right vnto it. He among all the pretendants which did most trouble him, and the King Don Henry also, was Don Antonio, Prior of Crato, who was very well beloued of the people, and of many of the Nobilitie. The King was so incensed against him, as he gaue commandment he should not be heard, and taking vpon him to re-examine his cause of Legitimation, he sought to dissolue the sentence which was giuen by Emanuel d'Almada, Bishop of Angra, appoynted Iudge by the Pope: whereof Pope Gregorie the 13. beeing aduertised, he retayned the knowledge of the cause to himselfe: yet Don Henry either moued by his owne passion, or prest by the Castilians, declared this sentence to be voyd by his owne authoritie, without forme of law, or solemnitie of iustice: but Conefagio in the Historie of Portugal, writes, that king Henry had obtayned a Breefe secretly from the Pope, by the which he gaue him authoritie to iudge the cause of legitimation absolutely, without any forme of Processe, and that of foure witnesses, two confessed that they had bene suborned by Don Antonio, and that the other two were suspected, as his neere allies, and disagreeing betwixt themselves, and that Lewis his father tearmed him Bastard in his last will, whereupon hee declared Don Antonio illegitimate, imposing him perpetual silence touching the pretended marriage and legitimation, sending a Sergeant to Crato, to seaze vpon the Prior, but hee found him not. This he writes. But were it true or false, the King leauing the qualitie of a Iudge, commanded Don Antonio of his royall authoritie, not to come within thirtie leagues of the Court. Then his indignation increasing, he banished him the Realme, deprived him of all pensions, priuiledges and fauours which he had receiued of precedent kings, seeking by all meanes to haue him apprehended, and to put him into some straight prison: yet Don Antonio went not out of the Realme, but retired to some of his friends, or to some Monasteries vpon the frontier, neither did he forbear to come and sollicite the Iudges, with the which the king was dayly incensed. Being prest by the importunities of king Philip's Ambassadors, terrified by his preparation to armes, and perswaded by his Confessor father Lyon Henriquez, he did adhere wholly vnto him: and there was then no difficultie, but to find meanes to name him, and to get the consent of the Estates, and therefore he propounded a kind of accord betwixt the Realme and king Philip, the which should be treated by his means in an assembly of the Estates, the which he called to that end.

K Henry falls
sicke.

But the king of Castile would not put his right to Compromise, and detested this Assembly of the Estates, aduertising king Henry, that he should not treat of this businesse with them, vnited in one bodie, but particularly with the chiefe of the Clergie, the Nobilitie and the townes. In the meane time the king D. Henry found himselfe ill, so as being taken with great faintings, which held him long, the Council, which was about him, and the Deputies assembled in the towne of Almerin, (whether they were retired by reason

A reason of the plague, which was very violent in Lisbon, and in a manner in all the other townes of the Realme, thinking that he would neuer recover it, they presumed to open the boxe, wherein was the lyft of such as he had chosen to be Gouernors of the Realme, and to proceede to the nomination of a Successor, in case he had not done it, where they found, that of the fiftene that were contayned in the rowle, he had chosen George d'Almada Arch-bishop of Lisbon, Francis de Sada, Lord Chamberlain, John Telle, John Mascaregnas, and Diego Lope de Sosa, President in the Councell of Iustice at Lisbon. The king was somewhat recovered, but knowing that he drew neere his end, employing the remainder of his daies in the care of his soule, and leauing this businesse with others imperfect, he dyed the last of Ianuary, 1580. having held the royall state, (as the Castilians sayd) fteuenteene moneths and some dayes, beeing 68. years old, for he dyed in the same moneth, and on the same day that he was borne.

An. 1580.
Death of King
Henry.

This was the last king of Portugal, in whom ended the direct masculine line. And as the first Lord of Portugal, (though with the title of an Earle) was called Henry, euen to the last. He was of a thinn bodie, low of stature, and leane of his visage, hee had an indifferent good wit, and was endowed (besides the Latine tongue) with some knowledge. He was alwaies held to be chaste, and did neuer blemish that angelicall vertue, but with the desire of marriage in his latter dayes. He was accompted sparing, giuing rather then denying, for he refused seldome, but he gaue sparingly: he was ambitious of all Iurisdiction, as well ecclesiasticall as ciuill, zealous in religion, but more seuerer then was fit in the reformation of Clergi-men. He was Bishop, Gouernor of the Realme, Inquisitor Maior, Cardinal, Apostolicke Legate and King. But the greater he grew in dignitie, the more he discovered his incapacitie and weaknesse, suffering himselfe in greatest affaires, to be ouer-ruled by his ministers, not able to determine the cause of the succession. Hee was very oblitinate in his opinions, neuer forgetting any wrongs, so as iustice was in him but an vnusuall execution of his passions, and therefore a religious man (whome hee had prest to take vpon him a most strict course of life) sayd vnto him, that hee would obey, seeing there was no humane helpe against his Commandements, for he had the will of a man, the authoritie of a Pope, and the execution of a King: To conclude, hee had many virtues, and fewer vices, yet they were equal: for he had the vertue of a Church-man, and the defects of a Prince: during his life he was feared of many, and beloued of few, so as no man lamented his death, onely such as were well affected, (desiring the cause of succession had bene first decided) had some feeling.

Life of King
Henry.

The fise Gouernors being at Almerin, at the time of his death, they began to exercise their charge as Kings, and their first resolution was to send Ambassadors to king Philip, (whome they saw in armes; and who had in a manner threatened the deceased king, and the Realme) to intreate him to proceede in this busines, by the way of iustice, and to assure him, that it should be done him, witnessing moreover the great good will and respect which the Gouernors, the chiefe of the Nobilitie, and the good townes of Portugal, bare vnto his highnesse. The king before their audience, made some difficultie, whether he should receiue them with the accustomed ceremonies to Princes Ambassadors, or as simple Deputies of his subiects: but he was counselled to heare them as Ambassadors, to the end he might winne the loue of the Portuguese, so as they were heard with their hats on, the king beeing vncovered at their coming in. The Ambassadors were the Bishop of Coimbra, and Emanuel de Melo, and they came vnto the King being at Guadalupe, who made a long relation vnto them of his rights, and of the consultations which he had made, as well to make them apparent to the world, as to satisfie his owne conscience: that he knew well there were many among the Nobilitie and townes ill affected vnto him, whom he had good meanes to draw vnto their duties: wherefore the Gouernours and the Estates should be well aduised, and not be the cause of a warre in their country, giuing them a short time to send him their last resolution. The Deputies of the Estates of the Realme, who had bene called by the deceased king, were all at Saint Iren, a towne right against Almerin, the river of Tagus running betwixt them: who seeing the Gouernors manner of proceeding, they gaue them to vnderstand, that their Councell and Assembly was superiour vnto them: as representing the Realme, and the general

13 Disorder betweene the Gouernours and the Eftates.

D. Antonius proceedings.

generall Eftates thereof, and therefore they sent word vnto the Gouernours, that leauing Almerin, which was finally, and not able to lodge so great a multitude, they should come to S. Iren, to the end they might all together determine of that was fitting for the preseruatiō of the Realme, and put it in execution, and not make them, vpon euery occasion, to passe the riuier, for their affaires required expedition, and no delays, saying, that their most necessarie prouisiōs, was to man the entrie of the Realme with soldiers, the which they should haue done before they sent Ambassadors to King Philip. This did amaze the Gouernours, and caused bad intelligence betwixt them and the Eftates, so as in disdain one of another, they did not any good for the publike. Among these Gouer-nours, there were there noted to fauour King Philip, the other two were for the Realme. B Among the Deputies of the Eftates, most of them were for Don Antonio, Prior of Crato, who hauing notice of the death of Don Henry, came presently to Lisbon, spake vnto the Magistrates of the Cittie, shewed himselfe vnto the people, saluted euery man, seeking to maintaine himselfe in the loue of the multitude, with all the humilitie that might be: hee wrote vnto the Deputies of the Eftates at S. Iren, and came himselfe to present the Popes Bull vnto them, by the which the sentence of the deceased King, given against him, was suspended, he remembered his rights vnto the Crowne, and protested that he would submit himselfe to iustice, according to the resolution which was taken whelest he liued in the open Eftates, and conformable also to the sayd Kings last will, which eight moneths before his death, by the which he declared him his successor, that should be found to haue most right by the Iudges: This course was desired by all in generall, C namely, by the other Pretendants, except King Philip, who pressing the Ambassadors much to haue their last resolution, whether they would receiue him for their King or not, and they desiring him to giue them a longer time then he had prefixed, he told them plainly, that he would vse his rights according to his meanes and dignitie. The which Gouernours, the Duke of Bragança, and other Noblemen, that were at Almerin, seeing, they began to prouide for the frontiers, but so late, and so slowly, as all men wondered: the Deputies of the Eftates insisting still, that they should all assemble in one place, to consult ioyntly together how to repulse the iniurious force, which the Castilians, their ancient enemies, would do vnto the Realme. And although it seemed reasonable, that D the Gouernours, who were but few in number, and had but a transitorie and limited au-thoritie for a time, should passe vnto S. Iren, and make shew to allow of it, yet they did it not, they still remaining in their severall lodgings, making very preiudiciall decrees apart, which in the end blemished the honour of the Crowne of Portugall, one weakning anothers authoritie, whereas if they had beene well vnited, euery man would haue obeyed them, and they might haue opposed such forces against King Philip, as happily he might haue yeelded to a iudiciall court.

The Gouernours sent Commissions into the Prouinces, to raise the Commons, and commanded the Lords which had lands and vassals to be mounted and armed readie to march, when they should be called, but they did little regard it. The King of Spaine being aduertised of all their disorders, was exceeding glad, for that they prepared a way for him to attaine vnto that which he pretended: and without any further delay hee caused those troupes which he had so long enterrayned, to march towards Badajos, where hee had appoynted the Rendez-vous for the armie: he commanded Don Fernando de Silva, Earle of Cifuentes, Guidon Major of Castile, to draw forth the Standard-royal, which is neuer displayed, but when as the King goes to the warre in person. Hee made choice of the Duke of Alba to be his Lieutenant to leade this armie, whom hee freed from prison for a certaine precipitated marriage made by Don Frederick his sonne, and by his counsell causing him to come to Merida, to the which he saw not the King, but marched directly to the armie: F to Portugall, yet some say, that he saw not the King, but marched directly to the armie.
In the meane time he did write againe, and perswaded the Gouernours, the Eftates, the Nobilitie and Commons, to receiue him without resistance, sending them new consultations, which he had drawne from the Diuines of the Vniuersity of Alcalá of Henares of Castile, to the which he sayd, there was no reply, and that they were conformable in euery point to those which he had before from other Vniuersities. King Philip with his Council

14.
Philip troupes marcheth towards Portu-
gall.

A Councell and Lawyers did set downe (as a thing which they ought not to call in question) that beeing the most ancient male liuing of the race of Don Emanuel of Portugall, he should preceede all others in the succession to the Crowneye presently after the death of King Sebastiam: for the Cardinall (whome he had suffered to raigne) was not capable thereof, considering his qualitie, beeing a Clergi-man. This beeing presupposed, he demanded of the Diuines: first, whether he were bound to submit himselfe to any Iudge or Arbitrator, to haue the Realme of Portugall adiudged vnto him. Secondly, if there were any other pretending that Crowne, who might decide their controuersies: and that there being no competent Iudge to do it, and the Portugals refusing to receiue him before the cause were decided, which might be a meane to oustrate him, whether hee might not take possession of his owne authoritie by armes, without any scruple. And last of all, if the Gouernours or Eftates of Portugall alledge, that they are bound by oath, not to acknowledge any one for king, but he to whome the Realme shall be adiudged by iustice, if that may excuse them.

To the first point the Diuines of Castile answered, That Don Philip beeing a Soue-raigne King, he was not bound to submit himselfe to any Iudge, but onely take coun-cell, and that he might thereupon adiudge the Realme vnto himselfe, and not charge his conscience, grounding vpon the neerenes of blood, which was apparent. And if there were no Iudge in this cause, they sayd, that the Pope, who had the greatest power, might not take knowledge of it, for that it was merely temporall, hauing not any circumstance to bind it to the Spirituality. The Emperor in like manner was no competent Iudge: for the Kings of Castile are Soueraignes, Emperours in their countries and Eftates.

The Eftates of Portugall were inferiours and subiects; and therefore in no sort Iudges: the deceased King Don Henry could not preiudice the right nor dignitie of King Philip, in appoynting eleuen Iudges to determine of the Succession of that Crowne: besides, hee beeing dead, the Commission of those Iudges was expired, and their autho-ritie extinct. As for the referring it to the compromise of Arbitrators, it was not vsed but in matters which were doubtfull: and whereas their titles and interests were obscure. If they would say, that in this cause King Philip should not be regarded as a King, but as a private person, bound to plead against the rest, pretending the same succession by reason of blood: it was a fruitiuous distinction, for that the dignitie of a King cannot be separated from the person that carryeth it, in any case whatsoever. If they did pretend, that the controuersie must be ended, whereas the matter in question lyeth: that this rule hath no place in matters of Kingdomes.

To the second point they did apply some of the former answers, and to make it more plaine, they sayd, that it was sufficient for the King to exhibite his titles and right to the Gouernours, or to the Eftates, to iustifie his proceeding by armes, the which he might lawfully vse in case of refusal, the which was a kind of contumacie and rebellion. And last of all they sayd, that an oath made by whomsoever, to preiudice another, doth not bind him that hath taken it, especially where there is no Iudge, and he cannot pretend it for an excuse against a Soueraigne, especially when his title is apparent.

King Philip hauing resolved to enter Portugall with an armie, more (sayd he) to feare the Portuguezes, then to do them harme, besides, the armie which he prepared at Ba-dajos, he caused his vassals (after their example) in euery Prouince bordering vpon Portugal to be in readines, commanding the Lords which had their lands there, to shew themselves in armes, but not to aduance, and that if any neare Townes, Noblemen or commons would acknowledge him for their King, they should assure them of all good vfrage: The Gouernours were much amazed, yet they made shew, as if they would defend themselves, sending into France, to the Emperour, and to other Christian Princes for succours.

But they did aboue all imploy the Popes authority and prerogative, that he would be a meanes to make King Philip lay aside armes, and submit himselfe to a quiet course of iustice: whereupon they obtayned, that there should be a Legate sent into Spaine to decide

Allegations made by King
Philip, concerning his title to Portugall.

15 Advice of the Diuines of Alcala of Henares

cide this controuersie; which was Cardinall Alexander Riaris, who was not pleasing vnto the King, being held suspect, neither would he that the Pope should meddle in this business, much lesse determine of it: Besides, this Legate came late, the Castilian armie being already entred farre into Portugall: and the Gouernors were in such a confusion, and did so disagree among themselves, as they suffered to haue a Croisado preached against the Castilians, as if it had beene to go against Infidels: the Magistrates did the like in many townes, and they sayd, that there were slaine Noblemen of Portugall, who by the meanes of prisoners which were yet in Affricke, since the ouerthrow of D. Sebastian, did sollicite the Xeriffe Hamet to take vpon him the protection of the Realme of Portugall against the King of Castile: such was the hatred of these two nations, and the proceedings of Don Philip so much detested, seeking to be Iudge in his owne cause, and to decide it by armes, to the prejudice of the other pretendants, and namely, of the generall Estates of the Realme.

The contrarieties which were obserued in all that the Gouernors did, being fearefull, irresolute, and yet very ambitious, seeking to retain the royall authoritie longer then they might, and to sell their fauours to their owne priuate benefites, did witness the confusion that was in their minds, and in their affaires, being solicited by the Ambassadors of Castile, they yeilded to declare D. Philip King, vpon certaine conditions, whereof they drew Articles, which were all signed by the Duke of Ossuna, but the difficulty was to publish this decree with any collour.

On the other side they witnessed themselves daily both within and without the Realme. In the meane time they had not any money, and suffered the reuenues of the Crowne to be lost by their bad intelligence, and withall the peoples loue, who might haue supplied their present necessities out of their store, if they had seene any order or grauntie in them.

They refused to sell the Jewels of the Crowne, but the Ambassadors of Castile opposed themselves, saying, That they did belong vnto the King their master, who was the true and lawfull king of Portugall. They sent John Tello, one of the bodie of the citie of Lisbon, vnder colour to assist Emanuel of Portugall his brother-in-law, who did fortifie Belen, and other places, at the mouth of the riuer of Tagus, beneath the citie, but it was to be ridde of him: for he did not fauour the Castilian partie, no more then Emanuel his brother-in-law: and for that the Deputies of the Prouinces and townes which were at S. Iren, did crosse them, they fought to send them home as vnprofitable, saying, that after the Kings death, who had called them, their procurations were void, and that there was not any assembly of Estates: yet they were content that tenne of the said Deputies should remaine with them, to bee witnesses of their actions, who should come to Setuual, a towne and port of the sea, twenty miles from Lisbon, whether they meant to retire themselves, by reason of the plague which was crept into Almerin. The Deputies on the other side maintayned, that their proclamations were still in force, that the Estates were not ended, and that in the business, which was now in question, their assembly was more requisite then in any other occasion, inuiting them againe to come vnto Saint Iren, where there was not any danger of the plague: the which they would not doe, but went to keepe their Councell at Setuual, farre from those that did obserue them, being accompanied by the Duke of Bragança, and the Ambassadors of Castile.

Setuual was one of those places whereof the King of Spaine desired to seize, for that in holding this port, he might shut vp the riuer of Lisbon: and therefore hee had commanded Don Aluaro de Bassan, Marquis of Santa Cruz his Admirall, to go thither with his Fleet, consisting of aboue fixtie galleies, and to make some enterprise, whilst that the Duke of Alba should enter by land, from Badajos to Eluas, and other places of that country, as he did soone after, the king hauing first sent Pedro Velasco, Iudge of Badajos, to see, if with perswasive words, promises, and presents, he might draw the neighbour townes and places to yeeld themselves voluntarily, and without force: where hee behaued himselfe so discreetly, as he caused D. Philip to be acknowledged for King of Portugall at Eluas, Oliuença, Serpa, Mora, Campo Maior, a noua, Arouguez, Portalegre, and others.

Matteo of the Portugueses to the Castilians.

Gouernors
bring King Philip into Portugal.

Gouernors set to dissolue the Estates.

A others. The Duke of Alba coming to the army, found it much wasted with sickness, being in all but 4500. Italians, 3500. Germans, and 3000. Spaniards of the old regiments of Italy, the which the King supplied with 7000. Besognes, or new soldiers, which he had leuied in Spaine, after which he took a view of his army, where he found about 18000. foot, and 6000. horse, with 25. peeces of ordnance, and store of victuals, and other warlike necessities: for the carriage whereof he had aboue 6000. carts and wagons. The Duke of Alba was General both at sea and land: in this expedition Peter de Medici was General of the Italians, being diuided into 3. regiments: of the one Prosper Colonna was Colonel, of the other Vincenc Carrasa, and of the third Charles Spinelli. Ierome Earle of Lodron was Colonel of the Germans, Sancho d Auila was Marshall generall at land, and Francis d Alana was Master of the ordinance. There was no Generals of the horse, for all the companies were commanded by Noblemen that were of the Kings councill, but in executions Don Francis de Toledo the Dukes son should lead them. With these forces the Duke of Alba past the riuer of Caya, and entred into Portugall the 27. of Iune, 1580. threatening such as would not acknowledge K. Philip his Master for their king. The Deputies of the Estates, which remained at S. Iren, seeing the king of Castile to enter the realme with an army, they accused the Gouernors to haue abandoned the publike cause, and declared D. Antonio defender of the Realme alone, but soone after the people proclaimed him king, & although he excused himself, being content (said he) for that time with the title of defender, yet was he forced to accept it, seeing himselfe enuironed with many swords in the midst of a furious multitude, cursing the Gouernors, & crying, that he must lead them against the Castilians. If D. Antonio did then somewhat want a spur to prick him forward to the royall dignity, he had afterwards more need of a bridle to curb him, not to abandon himself as he did, in a time of so great confusion, hauing an armed enemy in the hart of the country, who wan the Nobility daily, & wanted neither money nor credit, which are the finewes of war. He might haue apprehended the want both of friends and money, into the which he soon fell, hauing no support, but the multitude, and some Monks, who shewed themselves in his cause, not only passionat, but desperate, or rather mad. A royaltie is held to bee so sweet a morsell, and the desire to be a king, is so vehement, as they do willingly breake the bounds of law to deuoure it, when occasion is offered, without any respect: yea there haue beene many who to raigne one day, haue not cared to be slaine the next: whereof there are some examples in the course of this History: so it is no wonder, if D. Antonio, who had suffred so many crosses to come to it, hauing got it, sought to keepe it. The first error he committed, was to haue caused Fernand de Pina, one of the Magistrates of Lisbon to be slaine, for that he spake against him, and then hee suffered Suarez, who had committed the murder, to be hanged, whom he might haue saued by his authority. The opinion of the Portugals is and hath beene for many yeares, that the city of Lisbon is the force of a world, and that whosoever holds it, may make head against the mightiest Monarks of the earth. In truth it is one of the greatest peopled cities in Europe, of great traffick and wonderfully rich: but a multitude of people is but a weak support, and riches in the hands of priuate men in tumults, when as euery man sees himselfe in danger, and seeks to preserve that which he hath, are not assured, nor to be accompted of, vnlesse they will vse violence and tyrannie, which make the most lawfull kings to be hated. These considerations were not regarded by Don Antonio, hee must needs runne to Lisbon, thinking that if all the Realme were lost, Lisbon alone would restore him.

The bodie of the citie, and the Magistrates, apprehending this hastie coming, and the peoples proclamation at Saint Iren, who had cryed Real, Real for Don Antonio, intreated John Tello, one of the Gouernors, with Don Emanuel of Portugal, as wee haue sayd, to come and hinder Don Antonio's entrie, if he could, and to perswade him not to take the name of King vpon him, but only to tearme himselfe defender of the State and Crowne of Portugall, against the vniust and tyrannous inuasion of the King of Castile, that this title would be more fauourable for him, and make him to be followed and supported by the Nobilitie, and the great men of the realme: whereas that of King, seemed to bee vsurped out of season, whilst that hee with the rest of the Pretendents demanded it by iustice.

Duke of Alba enters into Portugal.

16
D. Antonio declared defender of the realme of Portugal.

Ttttt 2

Don

Don Antonio reduced into Lisbon.

Don John Tello sent Diego de Sosa, and Francis de Meneses, who could not stay him, but they returned together into the Cittie, where they durst not stoppe his entrie, yet comming neere vnto Lisbonne, there was a harguebuze shot of, which past neere his haire, but they could not learne whence it came. Being entred into the cittie, hee was receiued with acclamations, and all signes of ioy, as the time would permit: for the greatest part of men of qualitie were retired to their houses in the Countrey, by reason of the plague, which was very great, so as the common people onely made him this reception, crying, God saue the king. But hauing once seized vpon the pallace, the riuier, and the Arsenall, and the armes, he went to the towne-house, whither hee called all the Magistrates that were within the Cittie, and was there saluted for king, and the othe taken and receiued with the accustomed formalities: which done, hee wrote vnto the Gouernours beeing at Setuall, that they should come vnto him. Don John Tello (who had bin sent by his companions to Lisbonne, with procuration to see what was necessarie as a preservation of the Cittie, according to their desseigne, and had till then authoritie as a Gouernour) departed presently, and carryed some others away with him, whome Don Antonio would haue employed: and by that meanes hee carried away fortie thousand Crownes, which he had gathered together, vnder colour of reparations that were to be done at Belen, S. Iulian, Cascais, Cabeça Secca, and other places lying vpon the riuier.

Beeing come to Setuall, the other Gouernours would no more admit him into their companie, saying, that he was confederate with Don Antonio, and that hee might haue hindered his entrie into the Cittie if hee had would. The new King beeing discontented with them all, he wrote againe vnto them, to draw them to Lisbonne, yet vsing very mild words, but they would not do any thing. Hee wrote also very kindly to the Duke of Bragança, who was with them, and in the end he sent Don Francis of Portugal, Earle of Vimiofo, to perswade them if hee might. In the meane time the Duke of Bragança taking leaue of the Gouernours, retired himselfe to one of his houses, seeing, that neither the one, nor the other, did any thing to purpose, and that they could not prevent it, but King Philip did raigine in Portugall, with whome soone after he made an accord. The Earle of Vimiofo seeing that he could not preuaile with the Gouernours, he incensed the people against them, who chased them out of Setuall so hastily, as some were forced to creepe out of windowes, and to slippe downe the wallies in danger of their liues, yet the Arch-bishop of Lisbonne, and Don John Tello stayed still, beeing assured to be spared, the one for his Ecclesiasticall dignitie, the other, for that he had not bene opposite to Don Antonio, but had done him good offices.

By this meanes the king seized vpon Setuall, and went thither to haue the place fortified and furnished, and then he returned to Lisbonne, to whom there yeelded the aboue-named places vpon the riuier, and other about the cittie. The Gouernours beeing thus eclipsed, got, with the Ambassadors of Castile to Castro Marin, where they made a strange Decree against Don Antonio, Prior of Crato, condemning him as a Rebelle, and declaring, that the will of the deceased King Don Henry was, that King Philip should succeed him in the royall dignitie.

Whilst these things past, the Duke of Alba aduanced, and had taken Villa-vitiosa, the Duke of Bragança's chiefe house, a place of strength, which might haue stayed him some daies, and then without any care to march in order with his army (for there was no enemy to feare) he came with small iournies to Setuall, whither he had appointed the fleet should come. This place was soone yeelded to the Dukes discretion, by men without iudgement and experience: yet he suffered all the soldiers to depart, retayning onely Diego Bello the younger, Captaine of the garrison, who fought to escape in a barke. There remained only one tower which garded the port, the which he battered, and then the captaine and souldiers yeelded it, to haue their liues and goods saued: after that they had beaten one of the royall galleons in peeces, thinking it would haue yeelded to the Castilians. This place being taken, the Marquis of Santa Cruz came with his fleet (consisting of 60. gallies and many ships) and lodged most of them within the port, from whence they did so stop the mouth of the riuier of Lisbon, which is nere vnto it, as nothing could go in, nor come forth, but by the mercy of the gallies.

The

A The Duke of Alba continuing his course, meant to go to the Cittie of Lisbonne, which is the head of the Realme, and therefore he deuised how he might passe the riuier with his armie, wherein there was some difficulty, by reason of the old foris which were at the mouth of the riuier, and those which Don Emanuel of Portugall had newly built and erected.

Don Antonio being returned from Setuall, (whether hee had gone before the losse of it) was receyued by the Inhabitants with greater estate then before, causing him to enter vnder a Canopie, but hearing of the losse of this important place, their ioy was turned into feare and amazement, for they must now studie how to make head against the enemy, who they might assure themselves, would be soone at their gates, if they did not speedily prouide for it. The remedie consisted in a multitude of souldiers and money to enterayne them, which they had not. There was a great multitude of common-people in Lisbonne, but not trayned vp in armes, yet full of courage, when the enemy was farre off. He commanded them to be readie, and to furnish themselves with armes, giuing them Captaines of their owne sort, for there were few men of qualitie that followed him, and the best families of the Cittie were absent: but he made publike Proclamations to call them home in this necessitie, and some he inuited particularly: to such as hee found willing, hee distributed in paper, honours, offices, commanderies, crosse of the Orders of Knights which are in that countrey, without regard whether they, to whom he gaue them, were men of merit, and capable according to the Orders: for many base men were seene to carrie the crosse of Saint James, of Christ, of Alcantara, and others vpon their Cloakes: but he was indifferent, so as they gaue money. Such as did not obey his commandements, and were slow in comming to the towne, hee vled with all rigour, causing their houses to be opened, and their goods to be sold for the charges of the warre.

If any rich man within the towne, feareing to be taxed, or forced to pay money, did seeke to escape, he was stayed at the Port, stript, and put in prison, so as the great fauor which Don Antonio had found at his first coming, grew now cold. His most constant friends were the begging Friars, many of which leauing their hoods, tooke armes, and garded the ports, or followed him, and made a company in his armie, which he sought to rayse of this multitude, hauing no other: but they shewed themselves mutinous and rebellious, when they came to lye in field, a practise which Shoo-makers, Taylors, Mercers, Vintners, and the other skumme of the people; had not bene inured vnto, by whome the estate and reputation of Don Antonio were supported, who could not be ignorant of this absurditie, but that glorious name of King couered all defects, and made all dangers light. Hee had sent Diego de Meneses to Cascais, with some troupes to gard the passage, yet hee did not thinke the enemy would haue past there, but rather would haue gone about the towne towards Saint Iren, where the riuier grows narrow, for towards the sea, it is very broad: but notwithstanding any thing that Meneses could do, the Duke of Alba past vnder Cascais, at a place called Marines Vechos, neither did he euer seeke to hinder his landing, nor offer him skirmish, so hauing forced Meneses to retire, the Duke was master of the field, Don Antonio who expected some good seruice from Diego de Meneses, had made him Generall of his forces by land, and his brother George de Meneses of his armie at sea: where he had good Gallions, and some other Vessels, but growing iealous of George, he had taken his charge from him, and put him in prison.

It may bee, hee would haue done as much to Diego, if hee presented himselfe before him after the Dukes passage, but hee put himselfe into the Castle of Cascais, which cost him his life. Don Antonio, King of Portugall, must of necessitie issue forth of Lisbonne against the Duke, and fight with him for his honour, but hee found himselfe very vnfit for it: for neyther by faire meanes nor rigour could he gather together at that time about a thousand foote, and some five hundred horse, ill appointed, and neuer trayned vp in the warres, neither could hee possibly stay them about that day, for night beeing come, most of them returned to the towne to supper, for that there was not any breade in his campe.

Ttttt 3

The

Effat of Lisbon
vnder Antonio

Decree of the Gouernours against Don Antonio.

17
Duke of Alba's exploits in Portugal.

Setuall taken by the Casti-lans.

The Duke of Alba meaning to attempt Cascais, found it abandoned by the inhabitants, the castle which was somewhat strong, refused to yeeld, whereupon it was battered and forced. The captain who commanded there, called Antonio Pereira was hanged, and his souldiers stript. Diego de Meneses was found in this place, whose head the Duke caused to be cut off, although there were some that did sue for his life. The cittie of Lisbon being amazed at the taking of Cascais, expecting to heare the like of the Castle of S. Julian, which is, as it were, their key, they protested to D. Antonio, that they would make their peace, if he did not put himselfe in defence, who offered himselfe to go, if they would follow him. Then every man was forced to take armes, and go to field, even the Negro slaues, of the which there is a great multitude in that City, so as of one and other hee found himselfe to haue an armie of 8000. men, ill armed, ill apparelled, and ill led, (for there was scarce one that could execute the office of a Sergeant, or place a Sentinel) with which troupe he went and camped at Alcantara, within fise miles of S. Julian, which the Duke did beseege and batter, which place was yeelded vnto him by Tristan vax, by the perswasion of a woman, who had obteyned a safe-conduct from the Duke to draw fourth a daughter of hers with her husband, which were within it. Cabeça Secca which was a fort built vpon the sand in the midst of the riuer right against S. Julian, was also abandoned to the Duke. So as there was not any thing that could hinder him from coming to the city gates, but Belem, and Don Antonio's armie, which lay in their ill-made trenches at Alcantara, and kept that bridge, the which was forced in it's lodging, and put to route by the Duke, and chased euery into the towne with some slaughter. Don Antonio escaped by flight, being hurt, but he staid not there: for passing through the town, and as it were, bidding them farewell, whom he could not defend, he tooke the way to S. Iren, hauing caused his wound to be drest at Sacaben, where he might haue bene taken, if they had pursued him: but he had the good hap to find meanes to retire to Coimbra, which of all the townes in the Realme had most resisted King Philip, and most disputed their pretended rights.

It is the onely Vniuersitie of Portugall, for all faculties, which had giuen aduice and counsell contrarie to the Doctors of Castile. The Duke of Alba tooke Belem, and soon after the Magistrates of Lisbon came to offer him the keys of the Cittie, demanding their liues and goods: the which was promised them, for King Philip's meaning was to haue it preferred, yet they could not prevent it, but the goodly suburbe which was vpon the way, was spoyled, and all the houses and gardens which were about the cittie, whither the Inhabitants had retired themselves by reason of the plague, and had carried most of their best moueables thither.

King Philip's gallies which were entred into the riuer, tooke them of Portugall, and the eleuenth of September, that yeare 1580. the Duke of Alba tooke possession in the king his masters name, of the city of Lisbon, and made him to be sworne and acknowledged, the people crying Real, Real for King Philip. Whilst that the Duke of Alba did these exploits in Portugall, King Philip was at Badajos, whereas he fell so dangerously sick, as the Physicians depayred of his life, and it was bruited in Portugall, that he was dead, so as many Noblemen did put on mourning weedes, and among others the King Don Antonio: He recovered, but his Queene Donna Anna, who fell sicke at the same time of a continual feuer, died.

The newes of the taking of Libone beeing knowne at Court, and what had followed, many Courtiers sought to disgrace the Duke of Alba's actions, accusing him of great negligence, to haue suffered Don Antonio to escape: they sayd, that he was more fitt to destroy then to edifie, not knowing how to do his master service, not to get him the possession of any thing, but desied, spoyled, and made vnsprofitable, and with such excessive charge, as it did exceed the value of the thing gotten: this was spoken, for that the suburbs and places about the cittie were spoyled. It is certaine, that this man for his fower, disdainfull, and haughtie grauitie, was hated of most of the Noblemen in Court. Then the King entred into Portugall, hauing first caused a generall Pardon to be proclaimed for all those that had opposed themselves against his reception, except Don Antonio, those that had fauoured him at Saint Iren, at Lisbon, at Setuall, and some others that were

A were named: the number of which hee did afterwards abate, causing his pardon to be reiterated, yet still reseruing some, so as it was commonly sayd, he knew not so well how to pardon, as to offend.

He did set a price of 80000. crownes for him that could either take or kill D. Antonio: yet notwithstanding this temptation, there was not any one that did attempt against his life, to reueale him, in eight moneths that he went wandring vp and downe the realme after all these miseries, being pursued and fought for in all places, with the greatest care and diligence that might bee. Hauing elcaped at the route of Alcantara, hee retired to Coimbra, as we haue said, where hee found so great loue and obedience, as hee gathered together about fise thousand foote, with the which hee approached neere vnto the city of Porto, a strong place neere vnto the sea, where although the Inhabitants had made shew to be Neuters, or rather inclining to King Philip's party, yet hee entred, and was well receiued. Being resolved to trie againe the hazard of a battaile, hee made a kinde of campe vpon the riuer of Duero, neere vnto that city: There hee made some spoile of them that were of the contrary faction, and fought to draw money from the Inhabitants. In case of any sinister accident, hee was resolved to flie into France, and therefore hee caused a barke to lie ready in the roade neere to Viana, a little place vpon the sea, at the mouth of the riuer of Limas. Whilst that hee busied himselfe about these things, the Duke of Alba sent Sancho d'Avila against him, with about fise thousand foote, some horse and foure canons. Vnto whom the city of Coimbra (which till then had bene faithfull to Don Antonio) carried their keies; they of Auerro did the like, who had bene spoiled by Don Antonio after that they had yielded vnto him. D. Sancho being come to the riuer of Duero which was not to be waded through, he past his men ouer in certaine boats, which he had brought with him in carts, and others that he surprized running along that riuer, notwithstanding that D. Antonio had commanded that all the boats should bee drawne to the other side. Don Sancho found not any resistance, for as soone as the Portugals, which were camped on the other side of the riuer, saw him come towards them, they fled, euery man sauing himselfe as hee could, without any great slaughter: this was in effect a multitude without experience or courage. D. Antonio hauing no more meanes to subsist, left the towne of Porto, where after that he had let the Magistrate vnderstand how hee had employed himselfe to the defence of the realme, and hauing excused himselfe by the baseness of the Gouernors, and the final assistance he had had from the Estates, he bad them farewell with teares, promising to see them before it were long, better accompanied, to free them from the tyrannie of D. Philip: for hee did hope to finde meanes and succors in France and England to restore him.

From thence hee went directly to Viana, with an intent to take shipping, where one attended him, but the sea went so high as it was impossible to put forth, staying there vntill the storme were past, beheld there came a troupe of horse which fought for him: whereupon he put himselfe into a small boat, desiring rather to commit himselfe to the mercy of the winde and waues, then vnto men. Being come vnto the ship with great paine and danger, there was no meanes to force the winde, nor to put to sea, so as hee was forced to come againe to Land in his boate, the sea driuing him to shoare, whereas he was not seene by them that pursued him. They of the house of Portugal were with him, who had alwaies followed him, namely the Bishop of Guarda, the Earle of Vimiofo, and some others; all which hauing disguised themselves like seruants and mariners, yet well furnished with rich iewels which were sowed vp in their doublets (for D. Antonio had made good prouision during his short reigne, as well at Lisbon, as in the pallice royall, as in other places) they saued themselves as well as they could. By this retreat the name of D. Antonio was suppressed in Portugall; neither was there any place or man which made opposition against King Philip in all the maine land of Portugall.

The townes and forts which are in Afrike beyond the Straight, yeelded obedience to King Philip, as Ceuta, Tanger and the rest, where he was content to leaue the same Gouernor and garriisons that were before: And it was not long before he had newes that D. Lewis d'Alcaide Earle of Zoghia, viceroy at the East Indies, had acknowledged him

Apries let vp on D. Antonius head.

D. Antonio resists a new army.

Sancho de Avila sent against D. Antonio.

20 D. Antonio later affixes armes.

Portugal wholly reduced under King Philip.

Places belonging to the Portugals in Africa yield to King Philip.

18 Army of Don Antonio put to rout.

Lisbon yeelds to K. Philip.

19 Death of Donna Anna of Castile

for his King, notwithstanding that he had beene much sollicitod by D. Antonio. Wherefore there remained nothing for the King of Spaine, of all the dependances of the realm of Portugall, to subiect vnto him, but the Islands of the Tercera, which are of great importance both for the Easterne and Westerne nauigations, for the which he prouided after that he had made his entry into Lisbonne.

Imputations
laied vpon the Duke of Alba.

Before that the King parted from Badajos, the imputations and slanders laied vpon the Duke of Alba were such, as euery one was perswaded that he caused this goodly conquest to be trodden vnder foot by his souldiers, and that he gaue them such liberty, as without feare of punishment; they did spoile, sacke, kill and violate all diuine and humane lawes: wherefore the King sent two counsellors to informe, the one was called Francis of Villafaguana, taken out of the royall audience of Castile, the other in that of Galicia, whose name was Francis Tedaldi, who found much lesse disorder there then was spoken of: yet there were some infolencies supprest. There was something iustly imputed to the Duke of Alba, that by his sower and proud manner of proceeding, hee had hindered D. Antonios reception into fauour with the King, yea after that hee had beene saluted for King at Lisbonne, and when as the Duke went about to take the forts that were neere vnto the city, being certaine that King Philip shewed himselfe willing, when as he was moued by Diego de Carcamo. This Carcamo was a gentleman of Castile, who had serued D. Antonio when he was but Prior of Crato, in the life of King Henry: who seeing that King Philip had refused after his decesse to seize vpon the Realme of Portugall by armes, and that the Governours made a shew that they would defend it, he had demanded his leaue, and was retired into Castile, whereas the King suffered him to follow the Duke of Albas campe as a voluntary. Being in the army after the taking of Setuall, at the passage of the riuer of Tayo, he had leaue giuen him to goe to Lisbonne, to see the new King D. Antonio, letting the Duke vnderstand that it was the King their Masters pleasure. Being well entertained by D. Antonio, they beganne

Discours betwixt D. Antonio and Car-camo.

Carcamo speech to D.
Antonio.

to discourse of the present Estate of the affaires, and of what might happen, seriously and without vanity; they both concluding that D. Antonio had committed an error, in taking vpon him the title of a King, and that he should haue beene satisfied with that of defender of the country, and that hauing in effect no support, neither from the Governours, who were opposite vnto him, nor from the Estates, who were dispersd, nor of the Nobility, nor of any other, but of the Inhabitants of Lisbonne, and some other townes, whereas the multitude being ignorant, inconstant, base and vilde, are alwaies mutinous and disobedient in such occasions, he must needs thinke that he could not subsist, and that he must yeeld vnto the forces of Castile, being in danger to be ill intreated, and without any respect if he were taken: and escaping, hee must not hope that any Prince in Christendome would undertake a warre for his sake. He might well procure some weake succors from France or England, vnder the name of voluntaries, without aduow, for once, with the hazard of some encounter, but this were no great foundation, obtaining a victory either at sea or land, to thinke your selfe thereby settled against a mighty Prince, as King Philip is, who hath meanes, in an instant, to repaire all the losses that may happen vnto him. It is true (said Carcamo) that this name and title of a King or Soueraigne Prince is a sweet enchantment to bewitch men, and it seemes that honour doth binde your highnesse, hauing once gotten it, to maintaine it with the hazard of your life, and rather to die fighting then to leaue it: This were good if we knew our aduentures, which are most incertaine; Man dies not when, nor how hee doth imagine, it depends of the wil of God. A King is as soone taken as slaine in a battaile. If your highnesse should be taken, consider, what would be your condition, and seeke no farther into Gods secret Iudgements, who shewes plainly by the successe of King Philips enterprises, that he hath ordained the realme of Portugal should be vnto that of Castile. That he should haue recourse whilest he had time, to those remedies which might warrant him from dishonour and infamy, rather then to contend in vaine against heaven and nature: and cast himselfe into the Kings armes, whom hee holds for his enemy; assuring him that he should find him milde, and forgetting all that was past, giuing him meanes to liue with honour, if not with the title of a King, yet in quality of a Prince, whom

A whom hee will loue and acknowledge as his kinsman. Diego de Carcamo did without any dispute, make D. Antonio allow of these reasons, who knowing them to be most true, resolved to write an humble letter vnto King Philip, yet still retaying some right vnto himselfe.

He excused himselfe for that hee had taken the name of King, and receiued royall honours at Saint Iren, Setuall, and at Lisbonne, the question of succession being not decided, saying, that he had beene forced by the multitude, who would haue yeelded him no obedience, if he had onely carried the title of defender of the country, and that if he had prepared to make defence, it was by authority from the states, which is the greatest power within the realme, the royall seat being voided: and that his Highnesse should impute that to the loue and charity which euery good Portugues should carry vnto the crowne of Portugal: being then free, and full of honours purchased by the proper and peculiar vertues which God had infused into the Nation, both in Kings and subiects, the which hee greued to see confounded, and in danger to be darkened, being mingled with the trophies of Castile: And howsoeuer he held himselfe bound to perseuer in this defence, thinking the quarrel iust in his conscience, and by the consultations which hee had had both in the vniversities of the country, as strangers, as well of Diuines as Lawyers, yet considering the condition of humane things, and the vncertainty of their euent, and also to spare blood, and to prevent the infolencies and spoiles which follow warre, he was content to lay aside armes, and the title of King, knowing how his highnesse ment to intreat both the realmes and him. This was the substance of the letter which Diego de Carcamo, carried vnto King Philip, being yet at Badajos, the which hee receiued in good part, seeming desirous the quarrel might be ended by such submissions, without any more force. But for that this negotiation fell out, either during the Kings sicknesse, or vpon his recovery, being it may be aduised to haue this matter treated of farre from him, to the end hee might not haue his spirits continually importuned, nor haue occasion to alter his humors by any difficulty, that should put him in choller, hee gaue the whole charge thereof to the Duke of Alba, to whom Diego de Carcamo was sent, who made some voiaiges more to Lisbonne, and had so well aduanced the businesse, as there remained nothing, but to draw neere, and to conferre together by their Deputies, or in person if it might bee; when as Don Antonio receiuing letters from the Duke, conceiued by the termes thereof, an opinion that hee contemned him, and that hee would treat with him as a Master: for although that the Duke did witness by the tenor of his letters, that hee would imploy his best endeavors to attaine vnto a peace, saying that he honoured the memory of the Infant D. Lewis his father, the which did binde him to seeke D. Antonios aduancement in this treaty, yet he gaue him no other title but your Lordship, where they had beene accustomed to say vnto him, your Highnesse, since he was King, and before your Excellency, when he was but Prior of Crato. This ceremonious kinde of speaking being omitted by the Duke of Alba willingly, to humble Don Antonio, was the cause that the treaty went not forward, which was a great crosse both for the country and himselfe.

D. Philip being now King of all Spaine, entred into Portugall soone after his recovery, and came to Eluas, where he was acknowledged for King, and in all places where hee past, and then hee did free them of a forraigne imposition which was leauied vpon all merchandise which past from one realme vnto another, which was valued yeerely at a hundred and fifty thousand crownes, for a token of the vnion, and to shew that the Castilians and Portugals were now but one people. He appointed an assembly of the Estates at Tomar in April the yeere following 1582: hee visited Catherine Dutchesse of Braganca at Villa Boim, who yeelded her right to the Realme vnto him, if she had any. The Pope who had till then beene somewhat opposite to the Kings pursutes, did allow of all that had beene done in Portugall, being aduertised how matters had past; hee exhorted him that he shew himselfe thankfull vnto God for the prosperities which hee had giuen him, he should undertake to make warre against the Queene of England, either directly, or vnder hand, in fauouring the Irish: hee not onely offered him his spirituall treasures, but also quit him the fruites of the Archbishopricke of Toledo, which had beene long

D. Antonio
writs to King Philip.

King Philip enters into Portugal.

Pope Gregory allows of the conquest of Portugal.

long in the hands of his Stewards, whilst that the Archbishop remained suspended of his dignity, and that his proceffe was in question at Rome, the which amounted to some millions of crownes, and did belong to the Church and Sea of Rome. The King knew well that he should not restore those fruits, and therefore he was not eager to enter into well that he should not restore those fruits, and therefore he was not eager to enter into open warre against the English, yet he promised to succor the Irish from Spaine, with our any further declaration, but saying, that he would deale with the affaires of Ireland, as the Queene of England did with them of Flanders. Hee was also to provide for the reduction of the Islands of the Tercera's, without the which his fleets could hardly continue their navigations to the Indies.

Description of the Tercera's.

These Islands are in the Atlantike Ocean, and are otherwise called the Açores; they be seven in number, most of them small, and not greatly inhabited. The best are the Tercera (which carries the name of them all) Saint Michel (which is the greatest) and Fayal: the other, which be, Santa Maria, Pic, Flowers and Corues, are barren and vnpeopled. The city of Angra the Bishops Sea, is in the Tercera, but the Bishops aboad is in that of Saint Michel, at a place called Puncto del Gada, which Island is some hundred miles neerer vnto Spaine then the rest. All the Inhabitants of these Islands are brutish, superstitious and vain, yet instructed by Iesuits and many sorts of Monkes which haue their dwellings there. Vntill that the Marquis of Santa Cruz had conquered them, they were of opinion that the King D. Sebastian was not dead at the battaile of Afrike, they did hate the Castilians mortally, & were entertained in this hatred by D. Antonio, who held them two years for this King being expelled, after that he had wandered throughout the realm, poore and in a disguised habit, for the space of eight months, and yet was neuer wronged nor discovered, notwithstanding that he spake to diuers men, in the end he had means to fraight a ship of the Low countries at Setuial, who for 600. crowns brought him to Callis, from whence going to the court of France, he was kindly entertained by the Queene Mother, one of the Pretendants to the crowne of Portugal, by whose fauor and authority, hee found in many priuat men that offered to do him seruice, & went to sea, & to the Islands, vnder his warrant, hoping to take some Spanish or Portugal ships coming from the Indies, and to enrich themselves with their spoiles, so as it was an ordinary trade from the ports of France to the Tercera's: where for a time D. Antonio Cyprian de Figueredo commanded, but not well pleased with him, he displast him, and gaue his Government to Emanuel de Sylua, who called himselfe Earle of Torres Vedras. They of the Island of Saint Michel, being some distance from the rest, did presently acknowledge the king of Spaine, diuiding themselves from the rest, whether French ships came many times to spoile it, and some Spaniards to defend it, who meeting made furious war, but the Spaniards had alwaies the worst. They of the Tercera's were firme for Antonio, and tooke all that came vpon their coast, and vpon that of Fayal, or that they could see at sea, to make a stock for D. Antonio, who reaped great commodity. There was one called John de Betancourt, descended from some French house, dwelling in the towne of Angra, who thought to draw the people into a mutiny for the King of Spaine, who being almost slaine, was cast into an obscure prison, where he remained long, and it is doubtful whether he died there. The Iesuits thought to speake, but they walled vp the gates of their conuents, and kept them long shut vp after that maner, giuing them meate twice a weeke, and yet they feared to bee worse intreated: but the other Orders of Monkes spake of none but D. Antonio, whose vertues and praises were most commonly the subiect of their Sermons, meddling much with affaires of state and warre. King Philip to assure himselfe of the Island of Saint Michel which held for him, and receiue the ships which came from the Indies, being not aduertised of that which had past in Portugal, least they should vnwillingly fall into the hands of the contrary party, he commanded that D. Pedro de Balde should bee sent with foure ships and six hundred Spaniards, who aduerturing to land in the Island of Tercera's, with an opinion that there were many in the Island affected to the King his Master, and by their meanes to doe some good exploits vpon the city of Angra, which was vnwalled towards the land, he was charged by the, who slue 400. of his men, so as he made all the haste he could to get to sea, and returne to Lisbon, where for his welcome

People of the Tercera's brutish.

Pedro de Balde defeated by them of the Tercera's.

he was put in prison, charging him that he had fought contrary to his Commission, yet he was soone releas'd, finding that he was not expressely forbidden to fight. Lope de Figueroa being sent after to second him, thought to find him about the Island of S. Michel, but hearing of this defeat, he returned also to Lisbon, so as it was then resolved to send greater forces the next spring.

We haue formerly made mention of certaine companies sent by Pope Gregory the 13. to succor the Rebels of Ireland, vnder the command of Thomas Stukely, who comming to Portugal with sixe hundred foote, when as D. Sebastian did arme against the Moores, they were intreated by him to serue him in that warre, where most of them were slaine with their chiefe Commander. The rest returning into Portugall, with Sebastian Saniosep one of their Commanders, they had order to passe into Ireland; and the Popes Nuntio there had order to leauy Spaniards to fill vp the number, and to increafe it, who should saile into Ireland vnder the Standard of the Church, yea at the King of Spaines charge, hauing money to raise foure thousand men of the country, they being but nine hundred men in all vnder diuers captains Italians and Spaniards. These men landed in Ireland, and built a good fort, called Smerwicke, the which was furnished with ordnance, victuals and munition to maintaine a long seige, into the which three entered but sixe hundred men, the other three hundred returning in three ships, leauing three behind, but before they were fully fortified, the Lord Gray, Lord Deputy for the Queens Maiesty in Ireland, came and beleaged them, and prest them in such sort, as some of the captaines, compounding for their owne liues, the rest were put to sword: And so that enterprife was soone made frustrate, hauing more desire then means to annoy the English in those parts.

The time appointed being come for the holding of the Estates at Toisnar; the Deputies of the Clergy, Nobility, Prouinces and good townes of Portugal came thither, where King Philip was acknowledged by them all for King of Portugal; without any contradiction, and receiued the oath of fidelity, the which hee caused to be taken to the Prince his sonne. There they also treated how the Realme should be gouerned, where the King shewed himselfe very bountifull, for he granted vnto the realme, in a manner, all the Articles which the Duke of Ossuna his Ambaffador had promised and signed to the five Gouernours, before the taking of Lisbon, the chiefe whereof were: That the King should take an oath, as he did, to maintaine the realme in her lawes, customes, preuiledges and liberties. That the Estates of the realme should be held within the realme, and that they should resolute there, and no where else, of matters concerning the realme of Portugal. That the viceroy, or by what name soeuer they called the Gouernour, should be a Portuguese, vnlesse he were a Prince of the blood, sonne, vncl, brother, cousin or nephew to the King. That the offices of Iustice, charges of the treasure and reuenues of the crowne, should be giuen vnto Portugueses alone. That such as had offices and dignities within the realme, as well at land as at sea, preferred by former Kings, should enioy them still, and in like manner the offices of the house and crowne of Portugal. That the Gouernours and Captaines of places and the souldiers in garrisons should be all Portugueses. That the commerce of the East Indies should remaine for the Portugueses, distinct from them of Castile, as they had beene before this vnion, and vnder the same lawes. That the money which should be coined in Portugal, should haue the armes of Portugal alone, without any other mixture or addition. That all Clergy dignities, both great and small, should be giuen to Portugueses, and in like maner all commanderies of the Orders of Knights. That no Croisadoes, nor thirds of Ecclesiasticall liuinges, should be obtained from the Pope, to be leauied in Portugal. That no fees nor iurisdiccions should be granted in Portugal, to others the Portugueses. That rights, exchequing to the crown, should not be giuen to any but to Portugueses. That the King should take into his seruice two hundred Portugueses, giuing them the pension which is called Moradie. That the King comming into Portugal, the lodgings of his Court and traine should be made after the manner of Portugal. That the King going through the realme he should carry with him a priuat Councell consisting of a Prelate, Chancellor, Treasurer, superintendant, and a certaine number of Secretaries, which should bee called the

Forces sent into Ireland by the Pope and King of Spaine defeated.

An. 1581. Estates of Portugal held at Toisnar.

22 Articles granted by King Philip to the realme of Portugal.

council

counsell of Portugal, all Portugueses. That the prouisions of offices, as wel of Iustice as others should be made within the realme, & that their supreme Iudgements should haue execution. That the Kings Chappell and singing men should be entertained, as had bin vied in the time of other Kings, in the city of Lisbon commonly, or where the Kings person should be within the realme. That all forraigne impositions vpon the confines of either realme, should cease. That all Portugueses should indifferently bee admitted to serue the Kings and Queenes, and that the Queenes taking Portugal maidens to serue them, should marry then according to their qualities, as had beene accustomed.

At these Estates there was a generall pardon granted to them that had carried armes, or otherwise opposed themselves against king Philip. Out of the which were excepted D. Antonio, the Bishop of Garda, the Earle of Vimiofo, and others named to the number of 52. All the religious men which had adhered to D. Antonio, and those that had receiued office from him, were also excluded out of this pardon, and were made incapable euer to receive any grace or charge from the King. The vniuersity of Coimbra, which had held D. Antonio's part, and published his title, was (contrary to the opinion of many) confirmed in their priuiledges, and taking into the Kings special protection. As for grauties and rewards to private Portugueses, the King gaue much, yet he pleased not all factors. He confirmed the Duke of Bragança in the dignity of Constable of the realm. The Duke of Ossuna, who had left Portugal after the Gouernors flight from Setuual, was made viceroy of Naples, which is the goodliest charge of Spaine, wherevnto the Nobleman aspire and seeke to come vnto by degrees, as the chiefe of dignities which is given in that court. Christopher de Moya was made gentleman of the Chamber, which is much in Spaine. All that had imploied themselves to serue the King in his pretension and pursute of that realm of Portugal, as well of the nation, as others, yea and many which had opposed themselves, and were afterwards by some meanes reconciled, were gratified and rewarded, some superfluously, others more sparingly, so as some thought his recompences and rewards amounted to six millions of crownes.

The Estates being ended, the King drew neere vnto Lisbon staying some daies at Almada, not far off, attending the preparations which they made for his reception, and on Saint Peters day he made his royal entry, where after the triumphes, he wanted not importunat suitors for guifts and recompences, and there was so great a number of petitions presented, as the counsell was ouer-charged, and there could not be any expedition, so as to abridge al delays, the King discharged the body of the counsell, and committed the examination and prouision vnto two only, which were, D. Antonio Pignero Bishop of Leira, and Christopher de Moya.

The Great Turke being at truce both with the Persian and the Catholike King, had some cause giuen him to doubt a warre in Africke, for that in Tunis the people had taken armes, and expelled the Turkes that were there in gard, calling home their old King Amide, who had beene expelled and liued at Malta, wherevpon Amurath did presently send Vlucially with some galleies, who attempted to land some men, but the King of Fez opposed himselfe, hauing no wil that the Turkes should grow potent in Africke. And the Catholike King, who had made a league with the Moore, would not haue the Turke aduance on that side, protesting to Vlucially, that by reason of the truce, formerly made betwix him and the great Turke, he could not attempt war against him of Fez, vnlesse he would breake the truce; and therefore if he attempted any thing, hee would send his galleies against him; which threats made Vlucially resolute (hauing past thither wel provided) not to alter any thing this yeere. The disorders at the Tercera increased daily, many comming thither for refuge, after they had beene spoiling at sea, whereof some were French: And King Philip being aduertised that in France they prepared many ships of warre, and leauied souldiers publicly vnder the fauour of the Queene mother, to come vnto those Islands, there to fortifie themselves against the Spaniards, to cut off their nauigation to the Indies, and to assure them against the enterprises of the King of Spaine, and deprive him of the vse of them, he had already commanded D. Aluarez Bagan, Marquis of Santa Cruz, to carry 5000. men thither, when as hearing that D. Antonio had set saile with about 70. ships and 7000. souldiers (as reports are alwaies greater then

A then the effects) he prest the Marquis to be gonne, and seemed to be somewhat discontented with him, for his slacknesse in making ready the ships of Andalusia, whereof there were a good number appointed for this voyage: so as hee was forced to goe from Lisbon on the tenth of Iuly with eight and twenty ships only, some Biscains, the rest Flemings and Esterlings, appointing the rest which were at Saint Lucar, Santa Maria, and other ports to follow him. This Castilian army being come to the Island of Saint Michel, they found that the French were already landed, and did spoile it. So as they came happily to preserve the Island, and the chiefe fort of it called Punta Delgada. Hee was glad that whilst the French were busied about the spoile of that poore Island, they had suffered a great ship, and very rich, coming from the Indies to escape, the which had come unwittingly vnto those Islands, being ignorant how the affaires of Portugal had past.

These two enemies fleets were at anchor some thirty miles one from another, being couered with points of Land which runne into the sea: The French being about Laguna towards the West, and the Spaniards at Morro, which is to the East, with this diuantage, that the Marquis laying along the Island to finde a fit place to land, the army had beene fully discovered by the French, which hee could not doe of theirs, lying couered and hidden: besides the French had taken a Caruell of aduice, the Marquis hauing sent two vnto the Gouernor of the Island to aduertise him of his comming, and of the number of ships and souldiers which hee brought with him, and of those which should follow him. Being therefore hard to discouer the French army by sea, the Marquis was desirous to land some men to learne some certentie, but they were forced to returne without any certaine knowledge. Wherefore to bee better assured, he waited anchor, and put to sea with all his fleet, in order to fight, meaning to passe in that manner along the South part of the Island, where the enemy lay (for the other side of the Island was desert and had no landing) and by that meanes see what their strength might be, where at the breake of day there came a small barke vnto him, in the which was the Master of a Biscain ship, with letters from John de Castilo, who commanded in the fort of the city, by the which he did aduertise him of all that had past since the comming of D. Antonio and his army vnto the Island: That the French had in all 58. sailes, whereof 28. were great ships, and 6000. souldiers; that they had sackt the village of Laguna, and put to rout Pedro Pexot, and Laurence Noghera, who went to encounter them with 3000. men, part Islanders and part Spaniards, and then had entred into the city which they had found empty, and that they fought to winne the fort, into the which they were fled that had escaped at the defeat. That Laurence Noghera was dead of a wound which hee had receiued in the fight, and that Pexot went away soone after in a Carauel towards Lisbon, leauing many of his vessels in the Port, which had beene taken or brothen by the French, and that hee was straightly besieged in the fort; and therefore hee should take counsell, whether hee should fight, or retire with all his ships vnder the fort to fauour it.

E The Marquis being glad of this aduice sent the Master backe to John de Castilo with this answer. That hee should not trouble himselfe but hold good, for hee was resolved to fight, with hope to vanquish the enemy. This report came neere the truth for the number of their ships, for the French fleet at their comming from Belille in Britan consisted of fise and fifty sailes, whereof there were fise and thirty ships of warre, and twenty pinaces, carrying feuen and thirty companies of foote, which might make some foure thousand souldiers, whereof Saincte Salene was Collonel of fiftene Ensignes, nine were vnder the command of the Siegneur of Buz, eight vnder Beaumont, and fise vnder Fumee, ouer which Philip Stroffy was Generall, and the Earle of Brissac was his Lieutenant. The Marquis hauing spent that day in consultations, and in ordering all things necessary for the army, the next day, which was the three and twentieth day of Iuly, the two fleets were at sea, their prowes turned as if they ment to fight, which it is verie likely they had done instantly if so be that a calme had not kept them from ioyning. After dinner the vvinde growing somewhat fresh, the Marquis thinking that the French (vvhich had the vvinde) should haue charged him, and hee

Vvvv

King Philip's bounty in Portugal.

22
Entry of King
Philip into Lisbon, and as knowledge
King.

Armist of French and Spaniards in the Island of Saint Michel.

Number of the French army
at the Tercera.

¶ Many of the dead in the battaile.

Crucell: of the Marquis of Santa Cruz, to the French.

Spainish cruelty of the Marquis of Santa Cruz

Thus the French army retired, having lost their Commanders with about 2000. men, and eight of their best ships in the conflict, in the which the Spaniards said they had not above 200. slain, and about 500. hurt, wherein they flattered themselves strangely, for in the Gallion Saint Mathe-w, alone, there were above 600. soldiers and mariners, who by their owne confession were reduced to 70. when as Stroffy was oppressed by the Marquis and the rest that came. The Spanish fleet remained master at sea, neither cared to pursue them that fled, both for that night approached, as also thinking that he had done ynough. He was kept foure daies at sea, by reason of the winde which did rife, and could not get to the Island of Saint Michel, where he afterwards landed his men to refresh them, and to cure them that were hurt. There D. Aluaro de Bazan Marquis of Santa Cruz did an act which was held barbarous, discovering the pride and insolency of certaine Natures which cannot be pacified, and which neuer take delight in their victories, vnlesse they be seasoned with some new cruelties, committed after the fact in cold blood: for the first day of August the army being landed, Francis of Bouadilla having caused a great scaffold to be set vp in the market place of Villa Franca, in the Island of Saint Michel, he caused all the French prisoners, to the number of 300. to be brought thither by foure companies of souldiers, where he caused a sentence to be pronounced. That whereas (there being a peace betwixt the Catholike King and the most Christian) they had presumed to come out of France, in fauor of D. Antonio, sometimes Prior of Crato, in form of an army, with an intent to spoile the King of Spaines ships, comming from the Indies, and seize vpon his Islands, where they had already taken great booties; he therefore declared them common enemies to the commerce and publike quiet, and fauorers of his Maiesties rebels; and that as pirats and theues he condemned them to die, commanding the Iudge of the army to cause that sentence to be put in execution, vpon all of those that exceeded the age of 17. yeeres, for the seruice of God, and of the two Kings required. The age of these prisoners, which were exempted from death, to vse them in the galleys, was iudged after that they were carried backe to prison by their beards, so as many which had little or no beards shaued their liues, hauing secretly pulled the haire off their chins. There were found among those that were condemned foure score gentlemen, who lost their heads, or rather had their throats cut, for want of a good hangman, and the rest, both soldiers and mariners, were hanged, within two foot of the ground. This inhumaine and bloody slaughter, was detested by the Spanish souldiers, and by many of their captaines, saying, that it did blemish the honour of armes, and that they did wrong to those prisoners to terme them theues, being apparent that they were not come to that voyage for D. Antonio, but to doe seruice to the French Queene, by reason of the pretensions she had to the realme of Portugal, and that they should make them faire war, hauing behaued themselves like valiant souldiers, wherevpon they made many requests vnto the Generall, seeking to diuert him from that cruel resolution, but he was immouable. After this vnworthy fact (howe soeuer they may colour it) the Marquis staid some daies about those Islands, to receiue the India ships, if any came, so as he shaued two, which might haue somewhat repaired D. Antonios losse, if they had saile into his hands, whom he put in some feare, and all them that were with him at Angra in the Island of Tercere, that he would land there, for he past and repast twise or thrice in view of the city, but he had an other desaigne; for seeing the season approach, when as the seas grow high, he gaue order for the gard of the Island of Saint Michel, where he left Augustin Inyguet with 2000. Spaniards, and then sailed towards Lisbonne.

The defeat of D. Antonios army, and the death of Philip Stroffy did much trouble the French King, and the Queene-mother; after which he could not procure any great means to annoy the King of Spaine: Some of the ships of that fleet making hast to recouer the Ports of France, their captaines were reproched with base cowardise, and some of them were put in prison, being charged to haue bene corrupted by the King of Spaine, or his Agents, before they parted from France; and to haue failed of their duties in the day of battaile. They had prepared for D. Antonio (hauing newes of the comming of this army) a stately entry in the city of Angra; whether he came two daies before the battaile, to attend the issue thereof out of danger, by the aduice of the French captaines,

D. Antonios
estate after the defeat of the French at sea.

His returne into France.

Am. 1582.
King of Spaine
fortifies the straights of Magellan.

Sarmiento fortifies in the straights of Magellan.

A captaines, the vnfortunate successe whereof made the triumphs to cease: and when as after the defeat he saw the Marquis lie howring vp and downe, he grew a fraide, causing a light barke to lie ready for his flight, if he should be assailed, but hearing afterwards of his departure, he grew assured. This poore Prince saile from all his hopes staid their a while, and was perswaded by Emanuel de Sylua, whom he had made Governour of those Islands, to commit many insolencies to get money, whereunto he willingly gaue care, for he fore-saw his future necessity. He caused money of a base standard to be coined, and set it at a high rate. Yet would he not imitate the Marquis of Santa Cruz in cruelty, being sollicit to put to death fifty Castilians which were in prison at Angra, to reuenge the death of those that had bene executed in the Island of Saint Michel, which shewed his generous minde. About the midst of October he resolved to returne againe to France: for danger and want would not suffer him to liue any longer in the Island of Tercere. Having therefore recommended vnto Emanuel de Sylua, that which concerned the government of those Islands, for the gard whereof he left him five hundred French soldiers, besides those he had before: he parted with about thirty saile. And for that he would not arrive in France, whilst that the memory of the losse of so many gallant men was fresh, whereof they imputed the cause to him, he directed his course towards the Canaries, and the Island of Madera, to spend the time, and to get some spoile to content his souldiers: some ships both French and English abandoned him in a storme which disperst them about the Island of Saint Michel.

C The Marquis of Santa Cruz being arrived at Lisbonne, he was welcome to the King, who told him, that seeing he had bene so fortunate in that voyage, he would send him the next sommer to the Tercera with a stronger army, and that he should carry some galleys with him, to make an absolute conquest of those Islands, and to chase away the French and D. Antonios partisans, and euen there he gaue order for that voyage.

We haue formerly made mention that the King of Spaine after the returne of capitaine Drake from the South sea, had sent D. Diego Florens de Balde with 25. ships, to fortifie and plant in the Straights of Magellan, & to stop the passage of any other Englishmen that should attempt the like, and that five of his ships had bene cast away in a storme, vpon the coast of Spaine, notwithstanding the King sent commandement that he should proceed in his voyage, the which he did with sixteene saile, but he could not get into the straights that yere, so as leauing Diego de Ribera his Lieutenant, & Pedro Sarmiento (who should be the Governour of those forts) to attempt it the next yere, he returned for Spaine. And they happily got into the Straights, where they landed 400. men, with their victuals and munition, which done, Diego de Ribera left Pedro Sarmiento with 400. men, thirty women, and a ship with victuals for eight months, and returned with three ships, hauing staid but eight daies in the Straights. Pedro Sarmiento built a towne in the mouth of the Straight to the Northward, in the which he put a hundred and fifty men, calling it Nombre de Iesus, from whence he went by land, and sent the ship some five leagues within the Straights, where in the narrowest part he found a very good port, and built an other towne, which he called Ciudad del Rey Phillippo, or King Phillipps towne, but the snow and extreme cold of the Winter would not suffer him to finish his fort. Wherevpon pretending to goe to his other towne, hee sailed to the Straights mouth, to his first built towne, where hauing staid a day or two, he brake his cable in a storme (as hee said) and went to the riuer of Ienero, and then to Fernambuck to seeke for some supplie of victuals, where he obtained what he desired: But Sarmiento sayling towards his Colony, his ship with all his prouision was cast away, three of his men were drowned and himselfe hardly escaped. At Baya the Governour of Bresil fitted him with a barke, & furnished him with clothes and victuals for his people, but vpon the way he was surprized with so furious a storme, as he was forced to cast all his freight ouer bord, & to returne againe to the riuer of Ienero, where attending a whole yere, he neither receiued succors nor letter from the King, who was offended with Pedro Sarmiento, for that he had giuen him wrong informations touching the straights, and put him to a needlesse charge, and losse of men, so as Sarmiento hauing no means to releue his people, was forced to saile towards Spaine, where at sea he was taken by certaine Englishmen, so as in

Death of D.
Diego Prince
of Spaine.

Death of the Duke of Alba.

Death of D.
Sancho de Almeida.

An. 1583.
D. Philip the King, gave jurme at the Estates of Portugal.

Archduke Albert made Governor of Portugal.

King Philip gave out of Portugal.

Successors to the Tercera.

Fort built at the Tercera.

four yeeres those poore Spaniards which hee had left in the Straights had no succors. A

This yeere D. Diego the Kings sonne, Prince of Spaine, died, for the which he was very sorrowfull; but he did not much regard the death of the Duke of Alba, which followed soone after, at the least he made no shew of it, whereat the Portugueses (who had seene their Kings retire themselves for privat men) wondered. They remembered that King Emanuel had shut himselfe vp three daies for the death of a Pilot. The Duke of Alba was 74. yeeres old when he died in the Kings lodging at Lisbon: of whose deeds and disposition we haue spoken sufficiently. D. Sancho de Aulsa, accounted by the Spaniards for one of the best captaines of his time, died soone after the Duke, being hurt with a horse he sought to be cured by a souldier, with charmes, and neglected the Art of Surgery. B

Among other Acts of his the sacke of Antwerp is memorable, in the yeere 1576. King Philip being prest to returne into Castile, to consider of a marriage which was treated of betwixt the Emperour and one of his daughters, being also to goe to the Estates of Arragon, he made hast, before his departure out of Portugal, for that which was necessary for the government of the realme, and for the firme vnion thereof with Castile. He therefore summoned the Estates for the 26. day of January the yeere following.

1583, and there he caused his sonne D. Philip to be sworne lawfull successor to the crown of Portugal; he caused the funeral of the deceased King D. Henry to be made at Belem, where he was buried with his Predecessors, and he caused the bones of King Sebastian, and of diuers other Princes his kinsmen, which had bene left, or buried in diuers Monasteries, to be brought thither. As for the Government of the realme, in his absence, he gaue it to the Archduke Albert Cardinal, contrary to the opinion of most Courtiers, who thought he would haue left it to his sister D. Maria, widow to the Emperour Maximilian, who had retired her selfe into Spaine, and was come to him into Portugal at the time of this conqueit. He left for Counsellors to the Archduke, D. George d'Almeida, Archbishop of Lisbon, Pedro d'Alcaçova, who had bene so ill intreated by King Henry, the realme, who was honored by him with the office of Scribe of the purity, which is one of the greatest dignities of that Court: but the King contrary to the Articles concluded at the Estates of the realme, and against their priuiledges, put into the Counsell of the Hazienda, which is for the revenues of the crowne, two Castilians, one a Lawier & the other a Merchant. The Emperesse did also somewhat discontent the Portugals when as visiting the conuent of Santos, which is a retreat for Ladies of great houses living like religious women, but yet may marry, she drew out D. Iuliana d'Alencastro, daughter and heire to the Duke of Auer, being thirteene yeeres old, and tooke her with her into Castile, whereas they thought she would marry her. The Portugueses were also discontented at the Archdukes proceedings, who after the Kings departure, in the beginning of his government, made difficulty to signe the prouisions and ordinary letters, which ought to be dispatched within the realme, as the King had agreed, sending suitors ordinarily to Court. In the end the King, to pacifie the discontents, and to leaue a good conceit of him in his new conquest, gaue many gifts and rewards to them that presented themselves, and made their seruices knowne, or their desire to doe him any: the Duke of Bragança and the Marquis of Villareal were they that tasted least of his bounty, the which was noted, being the principal persons of the realme, from whence he parted the eleuenth of February that yeere, presently after the ending the Estates. E

The Marquis of Santa Cruz, after his returne to Lisbon, vied all diligence to make ready the army which he should leade the Sommer following to the Tercera: the which being knowne in France by D. Antonio, and those that fauored him, they wrought so as he had meanes to send about 1200. men, vnder the command of Monsieur de Chates a Knight of Malta, and Gouvernor of Diepe, a man well practised in marittall affaires both at land and sea: there were already in the Islands of Tercera and Fyal, feuen hundred French and three hundred English, and about three or foure thousand Portugueses and Islanders. The Island of Tercera was the place which must bee chiefly kept, to defend the approaches whereof, and the landing places, Emanuel de Sylua had caused some thirty forts to be built within compass of it, which was a weake fortification, for

A for being all small, capable of few men, and farre one from another, they might be easily forced with few men, and one could not releue another. This Emanuel de Sylua (as the Spaniards describe him) was a man full of will, and opinion of his own sufficiency, but in effect he was ignorant of the art of war, (as in a manner all Portugueses at that time were) and of a very tyrannous disposition: so as he omitted no kind of cruelty to get money: and did willingly giue care to them that found out any inuention to call the inhabitants of the Island in question, for the breach of his capitulations, Edicts, and Ordonances, to the end he might forfeit their goods. To effect the which, one Amador de Vieira gaue him good meanes, who being secretly enterrayned in that Island by King Philip, to

B discover who was affected to him, and to enterrayn them in that good will to serue him, when as he thought he had discovered all, he carried the roule to Emanuel de Sylua, who made his profit thereof. Monsieur de Chates being arrived at the Tercera, he would see all the fortifications of the Island, and vnderstand the reasons: for he did not comprehend much, considering the number of men, the defence of so many forts would require: withstanding that Emanuel de Sylua had rather made one strong retreat, capable of all that was good in the Island, both men, victuals, munition, and other things in the best place thereof, which might haue bene able to endure a sege vntill winter, with the souldiers and inhabitants that were there, the which making in all sue or fixe hundred men, good and bad, being well led and commanded, might make a gallant defence, and not trust to those small forts, which were neither made with iudgement, nor able to hinder the enemies landing: for they did not defend the third part of the approaches of that Island, the which hee found not so inaccessible as they had described it vnto him in France: This Knight did also find, that there was small prouision of victuals and munition, although there were good store of Ordinance. So as he made account, that if the Marquis came with such forces, as were giuen out, these Islands were lost without recoverie, Yet like a man of courage, he repayed, as well as he could, the defects of these hen-rouits, exhorting them all to be of good cheare, and to hope well, and that howsoever, he would dye honorably with them. The presence of this Captaine did much comfort the inhabitants of the Island, and did somewhat assure Emanuel de Sylua: who notwithstanding had prepared for his escape, if he saw himselfe prest; for he kept two vessels readie in the port, to

C fly into, whereof Monsieur de Chates was in doubt, and therefore he obserued him. The Marquis of Santa Cruz hauing put to sea with 30. ships of watre, 12. galleies, two galleasses, 5. galleons, and other smaller vessels armed, to the number of 60. besides carauels, pinaces, and other ships of burthen, carrying 10000. men, Spaniards, Italians, Germanes, and Portugueses, vnder Lope de Figueroa, Francis d' Bonadilla, and John de Sandoval, Colonels of the Spaniards, Lucio Pignatello of the Italians, Jerome Ledron of the Germanes, and Felix d' Arragon of the Portugueses. He came to the Island of S. Michel the 3. of Iuly, where hauing also imbarcked the Regiment of Augustine Inigues, which he had left there the yeare before, he then sayled towards the Tercera, where the city of Angra is, in the port whereof hee saw the ships which had brought Monsieur de Chates and his men, and some other vessels, which the Gouvernors did vie to send to sea: the he left certaine galleies to keepe them in, and instantly caused the city to be summoned, offering a pardon to the Inhabitants, and a good composition to the Captaines and souldiers: but they answered him with the Canon: the Marquis seeing that all landing places neere vnto the cittie were fortified, he began to coast along the shoare to find some fitter descent, but it seemed to him, that all were rampared and fortified: being in this care, he was aduertised by a Portugeze, that there was a good landing place at port des Moles, farre from Angra, where presenting himselfe, he found some access, but difficult, both for that the place was stonie, and there was a fort built: yet he did hazard some souldiers, who did assure the way for the rest. Being at land, they that garded this fort made some resistance, which gaue Monsieur de Chates time, being aduertised by the fires and smoke, and by the bels which hung at either of these forts, to draw his men together French and Portugueses, to go and succor them: but vpon the way he found the souldiers which had abandoned this fort flying, whom he caused to returne with him, being resolved to fight with the enemy, the which hee endeauored to do, and might haue amazed him, if Emanuel

Monsieur de Chates comes to Tercera.

Army of Spain going to the Tercera.

Conquest of the Islands of the Tercera, as for King Philip.

Grande's and chiefe Noblemen of the Court, the Marquis of Aguilar, and the Cardinal A of Toledo swearing last of all.

Ambassadors came from Japon into Spaine.

The ioy of this ceremonie was augmented by the arriuall of three Ambassadors, which had bene sent two yeares before from three Kings of Iapon, of Bugno, Fiunga, and Arima, to the Pope, by the perswasion of the Iesuits, who desired that those Princes, seeing the noble and politike gouernement of these countries, and the greatnes of the greatness of the Pope of Rome, might be edified and freed of a certaine opinion which they had conceyued, that Christians came into their countries to get meanes to liue. They came into Spaine beeing accompanied by father Alexander Valignari, Visitor in those parts, at such time as the Court was full of feasts and ioy, for the prosperous successe of Portugal, for the conclusion of the Infanta's marriage, and for the swearing of the prince: so as they were not onely receiued by the Catholike king, and the whole Court, with greate pompe and state, but with extraordinarie content. The King at their reception, would not suffer them to kisse his hand, but embraced them as his equals, and to do them the more fauour, would haue both the Infanta's to do the like: hee made them see all his delights, and rarest things: and at the Princes ceremonie he commanded they should be set at his right hand, in the first place, whereas two men appointed for that seruice, instructed them in the order of the ceremonie, naming every Nobleman, and what place hee held, as they went to sweare obedience to the Prince. The king hauing royally intreated them, and honored them all that might be, being to go for Italy, gaue them a Caroch and a Coach, commanding, that throughout all his realmes, they should be receiued with all magnificence, causing a shippe to be prepared for them in Alicante, where they imbar- ked, but they were driuen by foule weather into Maiorca, yet in the end they arriued in Tuscany.

Antwerpe, one of the chiefe townes in the Low-countries, was this Sommer so sleight- ly beleaged by the Duke of Parma, with the forces of Spaine, as hauing no reliefe, nei- ther by sea nor land, they were driuen to extreame want, and almost to despair, where- upon they prest their Confederates to succour them: but the Estates not able to rayse lo great an armie, sent a sollemne ambassage of twelue of their Deputies to the French king to intreat him to take the Netherlands into his protection, as his owne subiects and val- sals: the which did much trouble the Councell of Spaine, seeing that the French king might with small difficultie get the possession of those countries, hauing the subiects hearts inclined vnto him: whereupon they sought by letters, and all other meanes to draw them of Antwerpe to a reconciliation with the King of Spaine. Don Bernardin de Mendoza, Ambassador at that time in France for the Catholike King (hauing been sent with some disgrace out of England, for that contrarie to the dutie of his charge, he had bene a busie practiser against that State) vpon the arriuall of these Deputies to Paris, came with a great clamor vnto the King, telling him that the Estates of the Low-coun- tries, as Rebels to the King of Spaine, had bin condemned of high treason by the Councell of the Inquisition of Spaine, and therefore were to be rooted out. That remembring the strict league and alliance betwix him and his master, he should not giue them audi- ence, but rather driue such rebels out of his countries: the which would turn to the good of France, (lying so neere vnto Spaine) and of all Christendome, which was disquieted with these wicked people.

Bernardin de Mendoza his speech to the French King.

That he should do wrong vnto all other Princes, to whome such presidents are very preiudiciall, if they should countenance and support their Rebels. But the King answered, that he would not giue audience to the Deputies of the generall Estates, as to Rebels, re- uolted, but as to afflicted people, who complained of oppressions. That Princes had ne- uer, neither ought they refuse to ayde the afflicted, especially when as their greatest de- sire is to be reconciled to their Prince (to obtaine the which they informed the King, that they had made many petitions vnto the King of Spaine, and could get no answer:) and therefore he thought, that any man might seeke support where he could, if right and iu- stice were denied him, so as he was not to be blamed, if he gaue them audience.

In the beginning of this yeare, there was preparation made in Spaine for the mar- riage of the Infanta Donna Catharina, with that pompe that was befitting such Princes: for

Answer of the French King to Mendoza.

A for the effecting whereof, the King with his children, and the chiefe of the Nobility of Spaine, came to Sarragossa, about the end of February, the Duke of Sauoy being arri- ued in Doña galleies at Barcelona on the 18. of the said moneth, from whence hee went by land to Sarragossa, where his Maiesty attended him without the city: and receiued him with wonderfull signes of ioy, doing him exceeding great honours. The same day that he arriued, he put the ring vpon his spouses finger, the King her father holding her hand, these assisting at the ceremonie, the Cardinall of Seuille, (to whom some few daies before a hat had bene sent) with the Cardinall Granuello, who made them sit: Mon- sieur Taverne, the Popes Nuncio, the Arch-bishop of Sarragossa, Vicentio Grudano, Am- bassador of Venice, with other principal Noblemen. The next day, according to the cus- tome of the Realme, the married couple came to the Arch-bishops church, (who per- formed the ceremonie) couered with a white yale. Masse being sayd, and returning to the pallace, they dyed in publick as one table, his Maiesty, the Duke, his wife, and the Infanta Donna Isabella, being all set of one side: for many daies after there were great triumphs, tiltings, tourneys, and other knightly sports made by the Nobility of Spaine, who shewed themselves very gallant in all their sports, especially the Duke of Medina del Rio-secco, Admirall of Castile, the Duke of Albuquerque, the Duke of Medina Celi, the Duke of Maqueda, the Marquis of Denja, the Duke of Patrana, the Marquis of A- guilar, and the Prince of Acoli, besides the great Commaunder of Castile, who was fauor- ite and Lord Steward to the Prince D. Philip.

Marriage of the Duke of Sauoy, and the Infanta D. Catharina in Spaine.

C To these there ioyned a great number of Knights, of no lesse Nobility, but not of so great dignitie, as well Spaniards as strangers, who were come thither to honour this feast of the Catholike King their Lord. The Duke of Sauoy had also brought with him a great troupe of gallant Nobility, of este which, on the foure and twentieth day of May, he made Knights of the Order of Saint Stephen, John Baptista of Sauoy, and the Marquis of Chambry, and besides these the Marquis of Nemours his cousin, and Alejandro Roba who were able and withall, Carlo Pallancino, newly made Master of the Dutcheise horse, Count Saporiti, and Michel Bonelli. But eight dayes after the King did honour three Princes with the Order of the golden Fleece: the Duke his sonne-in-law, the Admirall of Castile, and the Duke of Medina Celi. There were many rich presents mutually giuen by the King and Duke, and by the Noblemen both Spaniards and Italians. Then in the beginning of Iune the married couple being accompanied by the King, Prince, and the Infanta Donna Isabella, went to Barcellona, where they tooke shippe in Doña Admi- rall gally, and being accompanied with forty other galleies, hee brought them safely to Genoua, and entertayned them with great state in his owne house, from whence they past to Niцца, then going with an honorable trayne towards Turin, they were receyued with great signes of ioy, and the feasts were renewed. But the King of Spaine being re- turned to Sarragossa, whither he had already sent the Court, he caused the Prince to be sworn to the ordinarie solemnities, and then he past into Castile.

About the same time there came to Court Pomponio Torello, Earle of Mont Chiaru- lo, with an Ambassage from his Princes, the Duke and Prince of Parma, the first requi- ring of his Maiesty the restitution of the castle of Placentia, so necessarie for the pre- seration, not of his Estate, but also of his life, the mutinous people of Placentia being ani- mated by the Spanish garrison, to practise against the Duke, as some conspirators had lately done, who being not suppressed and punished, although they were discovered, gaue him continuall cause of feare.

*Ambassage
sent into Spaine from the Duke of Parma.*

The Prince did sollicite concerning the enterprise of Antwerp, and also about his fa- ther's affaires: yet he refused to receiue it as a fauour done to him, for that hee would not spon- sifie an opinion, that he was as distrustfull as his father, of the Crowne of Spaine, to whom, and not to him, hee would haue the castle yielded. This busines was referred to Cardinall Granuello, the great Commaunder of Castile, and to John Alduques, at that time Secretarie of State, with commission not to treat with any other of the Councell, if seeming the king should yeeld that which hee ought. Granuello shewed himselfe very willing, not onely for the equize of the cause, but also for a priuate bond he had vnto the Prince, from whome he did acknowledge, that his brother Monsieur de Champagne held his

his

so as they receiued little harme by their shot, and comming close vp to the wall, after some resistance they ouerthrew the Barricado, and forced the Spaniards to retire, they entred pel mel with them into the towne, and wan the market place, where the Spaniards made head awhile, after which they abandoned the towne, and retired to other places, whither they had carried their wiues at the comming of the English. They had drawne many Indians vnto them, all bow-men with poysoned arrowes; them they had placed in corners of aduantage, so as if they did but breake the skinne of any one, he dyed. The armie staid here fixe weekes, and burnt the out-parts of it, but in the end there was a composition made, by the which they should pay an hundred and ten thousand duckets for the ranfome of the rest. They had bene aduertised of this Fleet 20. daies before their arriual, which had made them fortifie in that manner for their defence, and to conuey away their wealth. Hauing made this composition, they left the towne, and lodged in an Abbey, within a quarter of a mile of it, demanding a new composition for it, and a fort which stood at the mouth of the harbor: but not able (as they sayd) to ranfome the fort, it was blowne vp. From thence the Fleet went to Cape Saint Anthony, and then to the Cape of Florida, where they found a fort held by the Spaniards, the which, vpon their approach they abandoned: They found in it thirteene peeces of brasse Ordinance, and a chest of some 2000. pounds sterling, to pay the Kings Garrison, which consisted of a hundred and fiftie men. This fort was called Saint Johns, from whence they went vp the maine riuer to a towne called S. Augustines. And then the Fleet returned into England. They tooke in this action 200. peeces of brasse Ordinance, and 40. of Iron. In Saint Iago two or three and fiftie peeces: In S. Domingo foure score, whereof most was Cannon, Demi-cannon, Culuerin, and such like. In Carthagea sixtie three peeces: and in Saint Augustines fort fourteene, the rest was Iron Ordinance.

There was such excesse in their styles, and in their speaking and writing one vnto another, as vpon petition made vnto the King, he made an Edict and set downe a forme, what termes they should vse both in their speaking and writing, as followeth:

Pragmatica, or an Edict:

In the which is set downe a forme which is to be kept and obserued in their entertainments and courtesies of word and writing, and in carrying of Coronets vpon their Armes.

Don Philip by the Grace of God, King of Castile, Leon, Arragon, the two Sicilies, Ierusalem, Portugall, Nauarre, Granado, Toledo, Valencia, Galicia, Maiorca, Seule, Sardinia, Cordoua, Corfica, Murcia, Isten, the Algarues, Algezire, and Gibraltar: of the Islands of the Canaries, of the East and West Indies, and the Lands and firme land of the Ocean sea; Arch-duke of Austria, Duke of Bourgondie, Brabant and Milan, Earle of Ausbourg, Flanders, Tirol, and Barcelona, Lord of Biscay, Molina, &c. To the Prince Don Philip our most deere and welbeloued Sonne, and to the Infanta's, Prelates, Dukes, Marquises, Earles, Barons, Priors of Orders, Commanders, and sub-Commanders, Captaines of Castles and places of strength, and to those of our Councell, Presidents, and Iustices of our Courts, Commissioners, and Prouosts of our House, Court, and Chancerie, and to all Corrigidors, Assistants, Gouvernours, chiefe Iustices, &c. and to all other our Officers, and naturall subiects, of what estate, preeminence or dignitie soeuer they be, or may be, in all the cities, townes, places, and Provinces of our Realmes and Seigniories, both present and to come, and to euery one of you

A you whom the contents of this our Edict may concerne, health and peace.

You shall vnderstand, that at the sute of the Atturneys of Courts of the Cities and Townes of these our Realmes, we haue bene forced to prouide a necessarie and conuenient remedie, concerning the disorder and abuse, which is in the entertainments by word and writing, the excesse whereof was growne so great, and come to passe, as it had caused some inconueniences, and daily more might be expected, if it were not reformed, and reduced to some good auncient order, seeing that true honour doth not consist in vanities, or titles given by word or writing, but in greater matters: whereunto these do neither adde nor diminish. And hauing often treated thereof with our Councell, Wee haue ordayned as followeth in this our present Edict.

First, although it be not necessarie to treat herein of our selfe, nor of the persons of Kings, yet to the end that it may be the better obserued and kept, which doth concerne them, We will and command, that from henceforth, on the toppe of the letter or paper that shall be written vnto vs, there shall bee no other title put, but Seigneur, or My Lord, nor in the end of the letter, any thing, but God preserve the person of your Catholike Maiestie, nor the subscription below, any thing but his name that writes it: and vpon the superscription, there shall be onely set, To the King our Lords.

C That to the Princes heires and successors of these our Realmes, they shall write in the same forme, changing onely Maiestie into Highnes, and that of King into Prince, and in the end of the letter, God preserve your Highnesse.

The same forme and style shall be obserued, with the Queenes of these our realmes, as with their Kings, and likewise with the Princesses of the sayd Queenes, as with their Princes.

That the Infants and Infanta's of these our Realmes, shall onely haue the title of Highnesse: In the top of the letter they shall write, My Lord, and in the end, God keepe your Highnesse, without any other ceremonie: and vpon the Superscription, To my Lord the Infant D.N. or, To my Lady the Infanta Donna N. Wherefore when they do speake or write Highnesse, without any other addition, it is onely to bee vnderstood of the Prince, the heire and successor of these our Realmes. Declaring, that it is not our will nor intent, that the contents of this Edict shall extend to Donna Maria the Emperesse, my most deare and welbeloued sister, although she be an Infanta of Castile, beeing certaine, that she is to be called and written Maiestie; and vpon the superscription, To my Ladie the Emperesse: and her sonnes, (brothers to the Emperour, our most deare and welbeloued Nephew) shall haue the same titles that are giuen to the Infants of these Realmes, and in like manner to the Arch-dukes his Vncles.

That to the sonnes-in-law, and brothers-in-law of the kings of these Realmes, shall be giuen the same titles that their wiues haue, and daughters in law to the sayd Kings, shall be vsed like vnto their husbands.

E And as for the entertainment which the sayd royall persons are moreouer to haue, our meaning is not to innoate any thing of that which hath bene accustomed.

That the style vsed in the petitions which are presented to our Councell, and in the other Councells, Chanceries and Tribunals, and the words which they vse when they are in Councell, shall be obserued as hath bene hitherto, vnlesse it be contrarie to this our prouision, and on the toppe they may set, Most mightie Lord, and no more.

That in the signing of all our letters, sedules, and prouisions, our Secretaries shall set, By the King our Lord, in the stead of Maiestie, and in the signing of our Secretaries of the chamber, they shall do the like.

F That in all iudiciall seates, as well belonging vnto vs, as to any other, and of what qualitie soeuer, whether they speake in private or in publicke, the petitions, demands, and quarrels shall be begunne in a lyne, with that which they are to treat of, without setting any title, word, or signe of courtesie on the toppe: And in the conclusion, they may say: For the which I implore the office of your S. or your W. (according to the persons and Iudges to whome they are to speake.) And the Notaries shall onely say: By the commaundement and decree of N. the Iudge setting to his name and surname only,

Xxxxx

onely: they may also adde the name of such a mans Office, and the dignitie and degree A which he hath taken, without any other title.

That no man of what estate, condition, dignitie, degree or office whatsoever, shall assume vnto himselfe, either by word or writing, the title of Excellencie, nor of excellent Lord, neither may any be called Reuerent Lord, but onely Cardinals, and the Archbishop of Toledo, as Primate of Spaine, although he be no Cardinall.

That to Archbishops, Bishops, Grands, and such as we command to be covered, all men within our Realmes, shall be bound to giue the title of Your Lordship, and also to the President of our royall Councell.

That to Marquises, Earles, great Commanders of the Orders of S. James, Alcantara, B and Calatrava, and to the Presidents of our other Councels and Chanceries, the title of Lordship may be giuen both by writing and word, and not to any other, vntill it be to the chiefe cities of the Realme, and to Senates, and to Metropolitan Churches, to whom they may giue that addition, as they haue bene accustomed.

That to Ambassadors in like manner, which haue place in our Chappell, may be written or spoken Seigneurie or Lordship.

That in what concernes writing from one man vnto another generally without exception, this forme shall be obserued. They shall begin the letter with the busines they are to treat of, without setting beneath the Crosse, or on the toppe of it, or at the beginning of the line, any title, cypher, or letter: and they must end the letter, saying, God C keepe your Seigneurie, or Lordship, or Worship, and then the date of the time and place, and then his signature, without any courtesie before it: and hee thath taken a title, shall mention it when he signes, and whence that title is.

That in Supercriptions, to a Prelate shall bee set downe the ecclesiasticall dignitie which he hath, and to a Duke, a Marquis, or an Earle, that of his estate, and to Knights, and other men their names and surnames, saying, To the Cardinall, Archbishop or Bishop of such a place. And in like manner, To the Duke, the Marquis or Earle of such a place: and to meaner men: To Don N. or to N. adding his surname, and to euery one named in this Article, may be set the dignitie, office, charge, or degree which hee holds.

The vassall shall not be excepted out of this order, writing to his Lord, nor the seruant D to his master: but the father to the sonne, and the sonne father, may adde their naturall name to their proper, and betwixt the husband and the wife, they may note the estate of their marriage, and betwixt brethren the like allyance.

That the complements to women, and among themselves, by word or writing, shall be the same that is vsed to their husbands.

That to men of religious Orders, there shall be no other title giuen but father-hood, or reuerence, according to the charge which he holds. And in the supercription with his name, they may set the charge and degree which he hath in those Orders.

That whatsoever is contained in these our letters and prouision, shall be obserued by all the subiects of our dominions, yea writing to them that are absent.

Moreover, to preuent the great disorder and excess which hath bene, and is daily committed, in setting Coronets to their Scutcheons of armes, and to their seals and somer cloathes. We do ordaine and command, that no manner of person shall set any Coronet to his seale or somer cloath, nor in any other place where he hath armes, except Dukes, Marquises, and Earles, who we hold may carry them, being in their right forme, and not otherwise: And that the Coronets which haue bene carried, shall be presently left, and no more vsed.

And to the end it may be the better kept, obserued, and executed, we ordaine and command, that whosoever shall go against the contents of this our Edict, or any part thereof, shall for euery breach incur a penalty of 10000. marauidis to be diuided after this manner: F a third part for the Informer, another third part for the Iudge that shall giue sentence, and the rest to godly vses, the which shall be executed without any remission. Wherefore we command all and euery of you, that shall see these our letters and prouision, and the contents thereof, (the which we desire should hold the force of a Law or an Edict, made and registred in our courts) that you obserue and keep it, and cause it to be obserued in euery

A euery point, according to the contents, against the forme and tenour whereof you shall not do, nor suffer to be done at any time, nor in any sort, vpon the penalties which they do incur, which breake the commandements of their Kings and naturall Lords; and vpon paine of our displeasure, and the said thousand marauidis, for euery one that do to the contrarie. And to the end that no man shall pretend ignorance thereof, we command that these our said Letters and prouision shall be proclaimed publicly in our Court, and that the contents be precisely and inuolubly obserued, from the first day of the year following 1587. and that no man do otherwise in any sort, vpon the said paines: Dated at S. Laurence the 8. day of October, in the year 1586.

B

Signed. JO EL REY.

THIS yeare Don Pedro de Toledo, sonne to D. Garcia, sought to make an attempt vpon Affricke, but the little experience of some Neapolitans which landed in a small land called Chेरchine, was the cause of their ouerthrow and death, being defeated by a small number of Moores which put them to flight. Toledo being landed with the rest of his troups, and gone vpon the other side of the Island, he vnderstood by the mariners of C his mens successe, which holding for an ill presage, without care of any reuenge, hee began to faint, retiring with all his men into his gallies, and bent his course towards Sicily, where seeking to find some Pyrates, in the end he came to Naples, whether soone after came D. John de Zuniga, or Effuniga, Earle of Miranda, and Viceroy of Naples, the D: of Ossuna being called home into Spaine, to the great content of the Neapolitans, who taxed him for his cruell and couetous gouernement.

This yeare there was another enterprise by an English Gentleman, whose name was Thomas Cavendish, who passed into the South seas, as Sir Francis Drake had done: where after many accidents in November 1587. the Generall hauing two shippes, mette with a great shippe of the King of Spaines called Saint Anna, the which was Admirall of the D South-sea, being about 700. tunnes burthen, the which, after six or seuen houres fight, and three severall charges, yielded, to haue their liues saued. In which shippe, by the confession of the Captaine and Pilot, they had an hundred and two and twenty thousand Pezo's of gold, and the rest of the lading was in silkes, satten, damaske, muske, with many other good commodities: in the end they let fire of the Kings shippe and burnt her, hauing to the quantitie of 500. tunnes of goods in her: then sayling by the Philippina's, the Moluccos, and the Cape of Bona Speranza, they arriued safely in England, in September 1588.

King Philip (after much warre, the losse of his wiues and children, and the little hope he had of long life in the Prince his sonne, being of a weake complexion, and ill disposed) began this yeare to haue more cause of content, for now the young Prince began to bee vigorous, and of a spirit besitting an heire of so great dominions: and on the other side, the second Infanta Donna Catharina hauing had a sonne the last yeare, did this yeare double his ioy with another, giuing him the more content, for that the first was christened with so great solemnitie the twelfth day of May, foure daies after that the second was borne.

Yet touching his publike affaires, the Low-countrie warres troubled him much, the which hee referred to the valour and wisdom of the Duke of Parma, and liued himselfe quietly in Spaine. But finding, that the Queene of England did fauour and protect his Rebels of the Low-countries, (as hee learned them,) and that shee did feed the fire, of F that long warre, to be reuenged of that iniurie, and to employ his forces to aduance the Romish religion, he made preparation to transport the miseries of warre into England, giuing countenance and entertainment to all the fugitiue Papists of that country.

The Queene of England being aduertised of this great preparation in Spaine for the inuasion of England, shee was aduised to prevent it: whereupon shee armed forth a Fleet of some 30 sayle, in the which there were 4 ships, and 2 pinaces of her Maiesties, the rest

xxxx 3

Pedro de Toledo de conseruans in Affricke.

Earle of Miranda Viceroy of Naples.

Cavendish takes the S. Anna in the South seas.

rest were Merchants of good seruice. Sir Francis Drake was appointed Generall of this Fleet, which went towards the coast of Spaine this year, in Aprill. And being aduertized, that there was great store of warlike prouision at Cadiz, the which was readie to go for Lisbon, he made all possible speed thither, to intercept these prouisions: so as on the 19 of Aprill, he entred with his Fleet into the harbour of Cadiz; where at the first they were affronted by fixe gallies, but they soone retired vnder their fort.

Ships burnt at Cadiz by the English.

There lay in the roade sixtie ships, with diuers smaller vessels vnder the fort; and such as could passe the shoals, fled vp to port Real: there came foure gallies more downe against them from Saint Mary port, and port Real: but they were well beaten: they burnt in this harbor a shippe of Ragouça, of a thousand tunne, having fortie peeces of brasse Ordnance in her, and richly laden, and another great new ship of twelue hundred tunne, belonging to the Marquis of Santa Cruz, high Admirall of Spaine, with many others laden with victuals, wine, iron workes, biscuit, oyle, fruites, and other commodities, which were to be transported to the Indies, or to serue for the prouision of the Fleet which was preparing for England: so as they burnt, sunke, and carried away to the number of thirty shippes and barks, being as they esteemed them ten thousand tuns of shipping. Whilist they lay in the roade, the gallies and forts shot continually at them: and such shippes as they could defend no longer, they fired, to shoue among the English shippes, who were somewhat troubled to auoid them. This resolute attempt was performed in one day and two nights, to the great amazement of the King of Spaine, and the Marquis of Santa Cruz his Admirall.

After their coming out of the roade of Cadiz, this English Fleet was followed by ten gallies, who notwithstanding sustered them to ride quietly at an anchor by them. Then they bent their course towards cape Sacre, being well victualled at the enemies charge: vpon the way they tooke at severall times, almost an hundred shippes, barks, and carauels, laden with hoopes, gally oares, pipe-staves, with other prouisions for the King of Spaines armie intended for England; all which they burnt, and landed the men. They also spoyled the fisher-boates, and nets, for the fishing of Tunies. And coming to Cape Sacre, they landed, and tooke three forts, some by force, the rest by composition. From thence they came neere vnto Lisbon, anchoring neere vnto Calcais, where the Marquis of Santa Cruz was with his gallies, and yet he came not forth against them. Hauiug a message sent him by the Generall, that he was readie there to exchange certaine bullets with him: the Marquis returned him an answer, that hee was not readie for him, neither had he any such commission from the king his master.

Carack of Portu-gall taken by Sir Francis Drake.

The Generall seeing no more good to be done vpon the coast of Spaine, hee bent his course towards the Ilands of the Azores, where (by good fortune) being within thirty leagues of Saint Michels, he met with a Caracke of Portugall, called S. Philip, the which they tooke, hauing made little resistance, sending the people home into their country, in other vessels well furnished with victuals. And this was the first Caracke that euer was taken coming from the East Indies. The riches of this prize was held exceeding great, whereupon they resolved to returne into England, the which they did with their whole Fleet, and their admirable rich prize.

S. Diego canonized.

The religious desire which the Catholike King had long had, to haue Friar Diego Senilius of the castle of Saint Nicholas, to be canonized a Saint, being dead in Spaine some hundred and fise and twenty yeares before, with an opinion of holinesse throughout all Spaine, did this yeare take effect: for that since the year 1563. instance being made by him, and the Spaniards, to Pope Pius the fourth, to Pius the fifth, and then to Gregory the 13. all which dyed before this busines could be ended. But continuing in this zealous disposition, he commanded the Earle of Oliuarez, his Ambassadour resident at Rome, to moue it againe to Pope Sixtus the fifth, so as on the third of Iuly this yeare, hee was canonized a Saint, at the charges of the King of Spaine, and his feast day appoynted the twelfth day of Nouember, to the great content of all Spaine. This yeare the Catholike King sent the Duke of Sabioneta out of Italy into Poland, to pacifie the tumults and confusions of that Realme, which were growne by the election of two kings, the Pope hauing also sent Cardinall Aldobrandini thither to that end.

The

A The King of Spaine after the conquest of Portugal, hauing gathered together a great Navy of shippes, and leauied a mighty army, euery man thought, hee would make some great enterprize according to the opportunity that was offered; but mens opinions were diuided touching the action, for that their humors and dispositions being diuers, they propounded things according to the qualitie of their owne passions. And so it fell out in the ordinarie discourses which were made touching the Catholike Kings enterprize, which they all restrained to three, against Afrike, England, or the vniited Estates of the Netherlands: but to resolve which was most expedient for his Majesty, they all disagreed, some seeking to perswade him to attempt the Netherlands, others Afrike, but most England.

In the end a truce being concluded betwixt the King of Spaine and the Turke, and thereby the enterprize of Afrike cut off; the question was now whether hee should invade England or the Netherlands. Wherevpon there was one which deliuered his reasons, by way of discourse to the Catholike King, shewing that it was more conuenient for him to make warre against England, then against the vniited Estates. It features hee was vassall to the King of Spaine, as you may iudge by the vanity of his discourse. Many (said he) considering at the first sight, the Catholike Kings interest to the Netherlands and to England, affirme, that although hee haue great pretensions to this Island, yet he is more bound to recover the Netherlands, then to conquer England; for that in all policy of state, wee should rather seeke to preserve that which wee hold, then to conquer new. Although this maxime of state be of great force, yet (said he) I doe not hold it to be of such import, as it shall sway downe the ballance, without all contradiction.

For in these graue consultations, we must not onely consider what is to be done, but how it may be most profitable, most easily, and most conueniently done: For that many times Princes are incited to enterprizes by honour and duty; and yet the consideration of many circumstances and discommodities restrain them: wherefore the consideration (which binds vs more to preserve that which wee hold, then to get new) is not sufficient to conclude, that his Catholike Majesty should rather vndertake the enterprize of the Netherlands, then that of England, neither should wee in effects of so great importance, giue credit to such light reasons. But to the end it may appeere plainly that the King of Spaine is bound in all respects to the enterprize of England, I will first of all (said he) lay not onely a true, but a necessary foundation, which shall support the whole building of my opinion; which is, that conquering England, hee shall at the same instant conquer the Netherlands: but winning the Netherlands, England is not gotten, nay their hopes are no whit increased.

Moreover, hee said, that the conquest of England was not so difficult as that of the Netherlands. If then (said he) the conquest of England draws with it the Netherlands, and if be more easie and more certaine; who doubts, that to peruert this order, were to loofe a goodly occasion, and to be the workman of his owne disgrace? but I will prouoe (said he) with pertinent reasons either member of my ground. That the conquest of England is more profitable then that of the Netherlands; and that it is more easie. For my prouoe of the first ground, I will produce three heads. The first that the Low countries haue not so long maintained warre, but with the helpe of England, without the which they could not stand, no more then mans bodie can liue without nourishment: That fire is more easily quenched by taking away that which feeds it then by casting on water, for that not hauing wherewith to feed it, it consumes it selfe: but seeking to vanquish it by the contrary; it may be it will grow more violent. So the Florentines could not quench the rebellion of the Pisans, before they had taken away the matter which nourished that fire which came from strangers, and therefore it was all one action to take away their succors which came from confederate Princes, and to winne the city, which otherwise all their forces and of their confederats would not haue bene able to effect.

For my second head (said he) I set downe, that England doth not onely maintaine the rebellion of the Netherlands by sending succors, but also by her countenance: for where as the Netherlands see the forces of Spaine converted against them, they flie vnto England as to a Sanctuary, knowing that the English would alwaies take armes against any that should invade them. Wherein they imitate the Athenians, who thought themselves safe as long as the Olynthians stood, who being subdued, they knew not how they should keepe Philip out of their country. Euen so if England should fall into the Spaniards hands, the Netherlands should loose the ground of their rashnesse, being destitute of that support which hath maintained them in their infolencies.

My third reason (said he) is, that the burthen of so long a warre, hath so wasted the spirits and faculties of the Netherlands, as they scarce haue any pulse remaining; they hauing not onely beene cruell butchers of their owne liues, but Tyrants ouer their goods, taxing themselves at about forty in the hundred, besides hauing lost so many yeeres profit, their land being vtilld, and their trade of Marchandise sayling which doe much import them; hauing also endured so many spoiles, inuasions, burnings, routs of armies, and ruines of townes, with other great losses: So as they cannot possibly maintain this rebellion wanting life and spirit, which England gaue it. Whereby it appeeres that the conquest of the Low countries followes that of England, as the shadow doth the body. But on the other side we must not thinke the Netherlands being won England would be so easily vanquished: the which being a rich and a mighty Kingdome, seekes no support from any other, but relies vpon her owne forces; the which they would oppose against their forraine enemies, if the Netherlands should fall absolutely into the Spaniards hands, standing as they doe now, wherefore England in her defence depends onely of her owne power, and if it should expect any forraine succors, they would not flie vnto those rebellious States, which are needy, and depend vpon others.

Hetherto (said he) we haue shewed the difference of these enterprises, and how much more profitable that of England would be. Now I must prouoe the second head of my ground; that the conquest of that Island is more easie then that of the Netherlands, and therefore ought to be preferred, whether wee doe consider the profit, the opportunity, the possibility, the honour, and safety, or any other important consideration whatsoever. But discoursing now of the easinesse of this conquest, in regard of that of the Netherlands, I will proue (said he) that the difficulties be the same to invade England and the Netherlands. First of all I presuppose that a sufficient army being leauied, a royal enterprise is sooner brought to perfection, when as they are attempted both by sea and land, the which King Philip may do with greater aduantage in the enterprise of England then in that of the Netherlands: for as the voyage by sea is shorter and more easie, so he may more commodiously invade England by land, hauing meanes to land part of his army safely in Scotland, as we will hereafter shew: whereas if he should send an army by land into the Low countries, the way would be long to passe from Spaine through Italy and Germany, and it would be exceeding chargeable and dangerous. The second reason is, that it is more commodious, neerer and more safe to passe into England; for that from the straight of Gibraltar thither, is all open sea, without any let; but to go into the Low countries, hee must of necessity passe by England, the which by all reason of state should let the King of Spaine vnderstand in his passage, that neither friends nor foes are welcome, when they come with a great power, wherefore there is no doubt that whosoever will invade the Netherlands hee must breake this barre, or make plaine this mountaine of England, which crosseth him in his passage.

My third reason (said he) is grounded vpon a firme maxime of the Art of warre; that thou must neuer seek to invade any place, and leaue any thing behind to disturbe thee, wherefore it were a rash enterprise to attempt the Low countries, and leaue England behind, who being full of iualousie, may sodainly set vpon the Catholike Kings army in the hottest of their warre against the Netherlands.

The fourth, that going to conquer the Low countries, they must fight with braue old souldiers bred vp in the warre; but on the other side the English are without Art or practise of warre, they cannot vie the hargubuse, nor any other offensive armes, but onely bowes and arrowes, the which are of no force against corselets and head-peeces, as wee viz:

See here his error and ignorance.

A vse: so as (said he) there is the like comparison to bee made betwixt the English and the Dutch souldiers as is betwixt idlenesse and exercise; or an armed and disarmed man. And what an aduantage it is to fight with vnskillful souldiers, it is apparent by the example of Miltiades in the fields of Marathon, who with lesse then 10000. braue men, put to flight that mighty, but vnwarlike, army of Xerxes, being about 600000. men.

The fifth, that there is more difficulty in that of the Netherlands, for that they will keepe themselves more close, so as they must bee wonne by inches, and a whole army must be employed in the seige of a towne and so of the rest, the which happily wilbe of no great importance, but that they will stay in course of his victory that seekes the winne them, but contrarywise England hath not any towne to stay: the violence a victorious enemy, hauing once set footing into the Island, the which wilbe no difficult thing for the King of Spaine to effect. So as England being without any forts but vpon the frontiers, and the Low countries full of forts both within and without, there is no doubt but the enterprise of that is more easie then this, as it is more easie to vanquish them that make no resistance. Whereof the Low countries are a familiar example, where notwithstanding that the King had great garrisons, yet they many times found great crosses, as they were often vanquished by the opposition of those forts, whereas there being no place in Portugal able to resist the enemies forces, the Spaniards entred into the heart of the realme, they being not able to make resistance.

The sixth reason is that forts and townes of strength are to an invading army but incombers after they be wonne, for that the greatest part of the army, is drawne away into garrisons, whereby it is much weakened.

The seventh reason (said hee) seemeth sufficient in this case to proue the truth of my opinion. If the King of Spaine sends an army to purge the rebellious humors of the Netherlands, it is to bee feared that this Phisicke will rather stirre vp the good humors then euacuat the bad, breeding a disease full of corrupt matter: whereas now the good matter hauing the predominant power, wee may hope that in time it will vanquish the violence of the disease: whereas by this course the humors of Malcontents may be corrupted, and they drawne to desire innovations: we know that by the composition made betwixt the King and his subiects, the Malcontents, they haue taken vpon them the burthen of this warre, so as the Spaniards and other strange souldiers might bee drawne out of the Low countries: If then an army should bee sent out of Spaine to subdue the Netherlands, or they should but heare it were so resolu'd: they would easily vnderstand that the victors would prescribe a Law to the vanquished: and the Malcontents would not onely loose that great desire they had to beare that great burthen of the warre, and the reward which they expected from his Maiesty, but they would feare to loose their preiudges and liberties, in regard whereof they haue made cruell warre against themselves. By this then and many other reasons it appeeres, how dangerous it is to exasperate the mindes offriend with so sharpe a medicine. If the Malcontents should ioyne themselves with the aduerser partie, and oppose against the Spaniards, that warre would proue more difficult then euer for the Catholike King, not only for that the Kings forces should be diminished, but also for that the enemy should be fortified: So as we haue hetherto proued that it is more easie and more commodious to invade England then the Netherlands.

Now we will shew (said hee) not by way of comparison, but in respect of it selfe, how much it doth import the Catholike King, and how easie it is for him to invade England. It is not to bee doubted but the Phisicke is best, which not onely cures the member that is greued, but also takes away the cause of the disease. If then the Catholike King seeke to conquer the Low countries, hee may well close vp the wound of their rebellion, but he shall neuer euacuat the corrupt humors, which haue fed the disease, seeing that England hath alwaies nourished the rebellions of the Low countries: And admit it were cured of this present indisposition, what health can it bee called, when as the body is still subiect to these peccant humors: wherefore England is fittest to be attempted, that afterwards wee may with safety digest or euacuat all concurrent humors. But to intreat more plainly of the facility of this enterprise: I denie not but that England is a mighty Kingdome, and experience doe teach. The fourth, that the Catholike King being Lord at sea by A reason of his great fleet, he will at the same instant bee Lord at land: For having sufficient forces to vanquish the defences of the Island, he shal with ease land his men, and over-run the Island with his victorious armies, for such is the condition of that Island, that as soone as an enemy is entred, and his army orderly lodged, hee may cut off their victuals, and famish the Islanders.

F

Fifthly, for that by sea King Philip shall have the fauor of them of Ireland, who haue securely shewed themselves to adhere vnto him, and by land there is no man doubts (said he) but that Scotland will assist him in his designses with all her means.

The sixth in order, but the first to be considered, is the Iustice and honesty of the cause, B the which carries so honorable a title, as the defence of religion and the Catholike faith, as nothing shalbe able to hinder it, yea his Maiesties pretensions (said he) are such to that realme, and such is the duty which hee owes vnto the name which he carries, of Catholike, as there is no enterprise more due to him then this; whereby he shal not only take possession of a realme which is his due, but also hee shal purchase vnto himselfe immortal glory, aboute all other Kings, adding so rich and famous a Kingdom to that of Spaine.

The seuenth is the commoditie of the passage, knowing how short a cut it is from the Streight of Gibraltar to the Island, and what great commodities grow by expedition, and the ease of transportation of victuals, soldiers, artillery, munition, and al other provision necessary for the enterprise.

The eight, if King Philip makes warre against his enemy at his owne doores, he shal fill C England with feare and amazement, and the approaching danger will trouble all their counsels. There is nothing more terrible then to see the sword that must be the murderer of them and theirs.

The ninth, for that (said he) his Catholike Maiefty had many partisans in that Island; it importing much to haue some that fauor him among his enemies. And to proue that he hath some at his deuotion in that Island, I will produce three reasons. First the remembrance of this clemency which remains yet in the hearts of those people, and of his cunctess, hauing sometimes gouerned them as their lawfull Prince, with so great satisfaction to them all in general, as any other government, in respect of his, should seeme tyrannous. D The second reason is that of religion, knowing that there are many in this Island which adhere to the Church of Rome. The third is the riches of King Philip, who in his large dominions hath so many commoderies, pensions, offices and rents, to aduance men that shal deserue well, as it wilbe easie for him to draw the hearts of the English vnto him.

Hauing thus shewed the reasons why the Catholike King should rather inuade England then the Low countries, and with what facility it is to be performed, I will (said he) to the end that nothing shal remaine vsatisfied, make answer to an ordinary obiection which is made by many vpon this subiect, which is, that the king of Spaine making an attempt against England, he shal reuiue the emulation which hath bene betwixt him and the house of France, which fire lying now smothered vnder the ashes of peace, may kindle a great warre, for if the French should remaine as spectators of this tragedy of England, it might in the end turne to the preiudice of France, whereby they conclude that the Christian King should be forced to ioyne with England, least that hauing conquered that Island, he should afterwards turne his forces vpon France, which obiection notwithstanding he left vsatisfied.

During this great preparation of three yeeres in Spaine, which held all Europe in suspence, the King of Spaine caused an ouerture of a peace to be made vnto the Queene of England (onely as it seemed to abuse her with the imagination of a treaty, and to make her neglect the defence of her realme) who embraced this proposition, and sought to draw the vnited Provinces into this treaty, which they absolutely refused. Notwithstanding the Queene desirous of a peace sent her Commissioners in February 1588. F to Ostend; and in March following there came others to Bruges from the Duke of Parma, to treat with them in the King of Spaines name; who these Commissioners were, and what the successe of that treaty was, I leaue to the Netherland History, beeing but a fained shew of the Spaniard, to winne time, and to find England vnprovided when

A the Queene of England (seeing the Spanish fleet almost at her doore) called home her Commissioners, and prepared for her defence.

But now to come to this admirable fleet; the King of Spaine had deuised how hee might conquer England, hoping by that means to recouer his Inheritance in the Low Countries; for beeing Lord in England, hee might cut off their traffick by sea, the which many (well acquainted with the situation of both countries) held easie to be done. Wherefore the King of Spaine (hauing spent one and twenty yeeres, and wasted an infinite treasure, in those Lowe Country warres,) resolved to make an other attempt vpon the Netherlands by sea, but with greater forces, for that England was now his enemy, and might hinder all trade into those parts. So as hee resolved first to inuade England, wherevnto he was perswaded by diuers subtil spirits, both Spanish and Dutche, and by some English rebels, holding it more easie to be conquered then Holland and Zeland, and that it would be more profitable to inuade both England and the Lowe Countries by sea at one instant, then to maintaine a continuall armie to cut off their traffick from both the Indies. For the effecting of this resolution, hee had for some yeeres together made preparation of a great Naue at Lisbon, the like whereof had not bene seene in many ages in the Ocean sea. It was ready in the beginning of this yeare 1588. the same of this action was such, as there was not an honorable house in Spaine, but had a sonne, a brother, or some of the blood in it, thinking all to winne everlasting C honor with this invincible Armie (as they called it) and to make themselves rich with the spoiles of England and the Netherlands.

The King had resolved to make Don Aluaro de Bassan Marquis of Saint Cruz, (a Nobleman of great note, who had done the King great seruice in the conquest of Portugall, and the Tercera's) Generall of this armie. Hee sent vnto him, and acquainted him with his desseigne; hee put him in minde of his promise, that hee would spend his life in his seruice, and hee commanded him to prepare himselfe to conduct this fleet. The Marquis in his answer humbly thanked his Maiefty, yet he seemed by circumstances to dissuade the King from this enterprise, telling him that the English were gallant men at sea (of whom they had made good tryall) that they had good shipping, and that he should finde strong opposition. The King was much discontented with the Marquis for this answer, hauing euer relyed vpon him, and sent him word, that seeing hee failed his expectation, and had no courage to vndertake this Action, he would finde another to command his Army, wherevpon he made the Duke of Medina Sidonia his General. The Marquis finding himselfe in disgrace with the King, conceiued such greefe as he died before the fleet went to sea. But let vs returne vnto the Armie, whereof I will make a particular relation, as the Spaniards themselves haue set it downe.

Portugall did furnish ten great Gallions, with two smaller ships, vnder the command of the Duke of Medina Sidonia the General, in the which were 1300. saylers 3300. soldiers and 350. peeces of Ordinance.

E Biscay set forth ten Galeons and foure Pinasses, with saylers, soldiers, and ordinance proportionably, vnder D. Iohn Martin de Ricalde, the Admirall. Onipiscos did arme ten Galeons and foure Pinasses, vnder Michel Oquendo. Andalouzia set forth ten Gallions, & one Pinasse, vnder command of D. Pedro de Baldes. Italie had furnished ten Gallions, the which were commanded by Martin de Bretendona. Castille provided foureteen Gallions, and two Pinasses, ouer which Squadron Diego Floris de Baldes had charge.

There were also three and twenty Hulks conducted by D. Iohn Lopes de Medina. From Naples there were foure Galeas sent, commanded by D. Hugo de Moncada, they had in them 1200. slaues to row, 480. saylers, 370. soldiers, and 200. peeces of Ordinance. F Portugall sent foure gallies, vnder the conduct of Diego de Medrano, with all things proportionably.

There were 22. Pinasses and other smal ships, vnder the government of Antonio Buccado de Mendoca.

Besides all these there were 20. Carauells, which carried owers and other necessaries for the ships, so as there were 150. sayle of all sorts, in the which they had about 8000.

Y y y y y.

saylers

King Philip
resolved to inuade England and the Netherlands.

Description of particular preparation of the Spanish Fleet.
An. 1588.

there to attend the Duke of Parma, whether the next day the English fleet came and anchored close by them, who that night sending downe ships before the winde, being full of wood, poulder, wild-fire and other combustible things, and beginning to burne, they made the Spaniards in that amazement, cut their cables, and to put confusedly to sea. In this confusion the great Gallies of D. Hugo de Mendoza, lost her helme, and was driven vpon Callis sands, where D. Hugo was slaine, and the Gallies spoiled by the English and lost, where there were three hundred slaues set at liberty.

The morning after their disorder, the Spaniards had put themselves againe into battail: and the English charged them before Graueling, but they desired to passe along with the winde, and to stand vpon their defence onely; this fight continued the whole day, in the which some of the Spanish ships were sunke, and some being spoiled, and not able to follow the fleet, were taken by the States men and carried to Fleetsingue. I omit the repetition of every particularity, because you may read them in the Dutch History. The Duke of Medina seeing that he had done what hee had in charge, thought it best now to retire, holding it better to hazard a dangerous passage by the North of Ireland, then to stay still vpon the coast of Flanders, with apparent danger, hauing no means to ioyne with the Duke of Parma: wherevpon they packt on all their sailes, hauing a greater will to die then to fight, whom the English followed for a while, but seeing them bend their course Northward, they left them, and retired into England. It seemes that God did miraculously defend the English, for in all their severall fights, they lost not one ship, nor a man of account, and not above a hundred common persons.

Thus the Spanish fleet hauing lost ten or twelve of their best ships, with foure or five thousand men, besides those that were sicke and wounded, whose number was great, distressed with want, and despayring of all helpe from the Duke of Parma (who prepared for their returne) they fought to get into Spaine behind Scotland and Ireland, expecting snail releefe in Scotland, and that Norway could not supply their wants, they took all the fishermen they could meet withall to serue them for Pilots, and fearing the want of fresh water, they cast their horses ouer-board, and so they sailed Northwards, till they came to 62. degrees. Then the Duke of Medina commanded the whole fleet to bend their course for Spaine or Portugal, and himselfe with about 25. saile, that were best provided of fresh water, kept out at sea, and so got into Spaine. Don Martin de Riscalde the Admirall with some forty ships, sailed neerer Ireland, hoping to refresh themselves there, but a great storme arising about the second of September, they were disperst, and many of them were driven vpon that coast, and there cast away; some sunke, some broken, some runne on sands, and some burnt by the Spaniards themselves, to the number of seuentene great ships: some write, they lost vpon fixe and thirty or eighty and thirty ships, in which I take it they comprehend some that were lost vpon the coast of Norway and that sunke at sea. Yet it was constantly reported, that of all that great fleet of a hundred thirty foure saile that went out of Lisbon, there returned but fifty three ships great and small. Of them perished in Ireland there were specially named a Gallies two great Venetian ships, called La Rasta and Balanxara and the Gallies called our Lady of Rosa, of a thousand tunne, in the which D. Michel d' Oquendo, General of the Squadron of Guipulcoa, was, in which ship there perished (by the confession of the Pilot) five hundred men, and not any one was saued but himselfe, among others (besides the General Oquendo) there died as he said the Prince of Alcely (held to be the King of Spaines base son) Masur a Commander of the souldiers, Villafranca capitaine of the said ship, with many Knights and Aduenturers of account: Moreouer hee confest that there was in that ship 50. canons all brasse for the field, 25. peeces of brasse and iron belonging to the ship, 50. tunns of sack, 15000. ducats in gold, with much plate and rich furniture.

After the Duke of Medina's returne with the remainder of his fleet into Spaine, many died of sicknesse, or of the wounds which they had received. Many taxed the Duke for this vnfortunate successe, but hee (like a iudicious Prince, who had unwillingly undertaken that charge) laied the blame vpon his Pilots, and the Duke of Parma, who was not ready to ioyne with him, so as the King allowed of his reasons, and gaue him leaue to goe home, and rest himselfe. There died many Commanders and men of account after their returne

Ships cast away vpon the coast of Ire. land.

Others write that heere-in Flanders after his lang at Callis.

A returne, as D. John Martinez de Riscalde, D. Diego Floris de Baldes, D. Alonso de Lieua, D. Diego de Maldonado, D. Francisco de Bousadillo, & D. George Manriquez, al of the counsell of warre. And many were taken prisoners, some in Ireland, as D. Alonso de Lufon, a Collonel, two of the house of Cordoua, and D. Roderigo de Lasso, and some in Zeland, as D. Diego de Pimentel a Collonel. Finally the losse was such, as there was not any great house in Spaine, but had some particular cause to mourne for some one of their blood. The Duke of Parma was much blamed by the Spaniards that were in the Low countries, but he excused himselfe, for that (as he said) the Spanish fleet came to soone, and to free himselfe, he caused some to be hanged, which had not discharged their duties. After the ruine of this great Spanish fleet, there fel a great iarre betwixt the Lord of Champagni and Mounseur Richardot, who was much fauored by the Duke of Parma, these two hauing run contrary courses in their treaty of peace in Flanders, with the Queene of Englands Commissioners. So as after this bad successe, Champagni taxed the Duke of Parma of negligence, writing many letters of the like tenor into Spaine, whereof the Infanta Isabella the Kings eldest daughter, affecting the Duke well, did still aduertise him, who seeing his reputation and seruice thus called in question, sent Richardot, President of Arthois, into Spaine to the King to make answere to all objections and slanders, wherewith they had incensed him, seeking to bring him in disgrace; and to get his government from him, accusing him that hee had not done his duty concerning the Spanish fleet, and that hee had received a great affront before Berghen vp Zoome, for that hee would not beleue the counsell of such as would haue dissuaded him from that enterprize; but Richardot gaue good satisfaction to the King and his Councell, and returned with a Commission for the continuance of his government, in despite of his enemies.

The King of Spaine being aduertised of the vnfortunate successe of his fleet and army, which he had sent to invade England, after the returne of such as were remaining of that miserable wracke, hee beganne to examine euery mans meritis; and who had deserved reward, and who punishment in this action, to preferre vnto himselfe, with the feare of some, and the loue of others, the authority of a wife Prince: wherevpon hee rewarded the heires of Don Alphonso de Lieua, who (as they said) was drowned with a thousand persons vpon the coast of Ireland.

He did punish seuerely Fernando Lopez, who was campe Master generall; and Antonio de Gueuara, Pouruoier generall, was depriued of his Office, for his milde-means.

In the meane time they had newes in Spaine of a great army preparing in England to send into Portugall, for the restoring of Don Antonio, wherevpon the King made provision for the defence thereof, sending the Earle of Fuentes for Generall into Portugall, with good troupes, hee augmented the number of their horse, giuing the charge to D. Alphonso Vargas, he made D. Francis de Padiglia Camp-master Generall, Andreas d' Alua Pouruoier, and John Maldonado Auditor.

E The provisions for this enterprize being made, they went from Plimouth in April: Sir John Norris and Sir Francis Drake being Generalls; they had with them fixe of the Queenes twenty ships of warre, and (as some write) a hundred and forty for transportation, hauing when they tooke shipping a cleuen thousand souldiers, and two thousand five hundred mariners: within fixe daies after their departure from England being the twentieth day of April, the army landed in a bay within a mile off the Groine, without impeach, from whence they marched presently towards the towne, approaching within halfe a mile they were incountered by the enemy, who being charged retired to their gates, and then the Generall lodged the army in the villages and houses thereabouts. F Generall Norris hauing viewed the towne before daie, resolved for to attempt it by scalladoe, and to land some Artillerie to beate the shippes and gallies which did play vpon their troupes, the which was effectually performed, so as the Gallies were forced presently to abandon the roade, and goe to Farrol, and then they prepared with all speed to surprize the base towne, the which was done the next day after, they entering it in three severall places, where after good

YYYYY 3 resistance

An. 1589.

Richardot sent into Spaine by the Duke of Parma.

Provision for defence of Portugall.

Village of Forlugal.

Groine the base towne surprized.

The generall History of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

resistance in one place, they were forced to abandon it, they all retreating into the high towne, the which they might easily doe for that the English knew not their passages. The rest that were not put to the sword, fled to the rocks in the Island, where they did hide themselves in caues, whereas many were daily found out.

D. John de Luna, a man of great command, having hidden himselfe in a house came forth the next morning and yielded himselfe. John de Vera a Commissary of the victuals was also taken that night, who confessed that at the entry of the English into the towne, there were five hundred Spaniards in seven companies, (as it seemed) returned weake from the voyage of England, all vnder D. John de Luna: the capitaines names were D. Diego Bazan bafe sonne to the Marquis of Santa Cruz. D. Antonio de Herera, D. Pedro Manriques brother to the Earle of Paredes. D. Ieronimo Mouray, of the Order of Saint John, hee was in the fort. D. Gomes de Caruajal, capitaine Moucon and Causca de Secas. And that the day that the English landed there came from Retenzas the companies of D. John de Mosale, and of D. Pedro Ponce de Leon. He confessed moreouer that there was order giuen for the baking of 300000. of biscuit: that there was two thousand pipes of wine in the towne, and a hundred and fifty in the ships. That there was lately come 300000. ducats from the Marquis of Seralba. That there was a thousand larrs of oyle, with great store of beanes, pease, wheat and fish. That there were three thousand kintals of beefe, and not twenty daies before, there entred three barks laden with mach and harguebuses: There were some others taken, and there were slaine by the common souldiers about five hundred. At their first entry into the towne, the souldiers finding three cellars full of wine distempred themselves, so as many beinge drunke were hurt from the high towne, and this disorder was the cause of a great mortality which fell in the English army. There was abundance of victuals, and prouision for shipping and warre; which the Commissary confest to be for a new voyage into England.

After the taking of the bafe towne, there came some two thousand men out of the country, downe to the very gates, as resolutely as if they would haue entred, but the English that were in gard making head against them, they fled away disorderly, hauing lost some eightene of their men. The Generall attempted the high towne both by mine and battery, and going to the assault the loose rubbish vnder their feete failed them so as they could not stand. They had diuers men hurt in their retreat, and they lost some twenty or thirty vnder the ruines of a tower which fell.

The day after that the English had offered an assault, the General vnderstood, by a prisoner, that the Earle of Andrada had gathered an army together of eight thousand men, at Puente de Burgos, six miles from the towne, which was but the beginning of an army, there being a greater leauy ready to come vnder the conduct of the Earle of Altemira, either to releue the Groyne, or to incampe neere vnto the place where the English should imbarke, and to hinder their shipping for to that end the Marquis of Seralba had written vnto them both the first night of their landing, as the Commissary had confest, or else to stop their passage into the country, whether they went daily by troups, and burnt, spoiled, and tooke great booties. The Generall resolved the next day to goe and visit these forces, leading nine Regiments with him: In the forward were the regiments of Sir Edward Norris, Master of the Ordinance, Sir Roger Williams and Collonel Sydneys: In the battaile that of the Generall, of Collonel Lane, and Collonel Medkerke: And in the reereward, Sir Henry Norris, Collonel Huntleys and Collonel Brets Regiments, leauing the other five Regiments with Generall Drake for the garde of the Ordinance.

Vpon the sixth day of May in the morning they discovered the enemy within halfe a mile off their campe; against whom the shot of the forward skirmished, and forced them to retire vnto their bridge, which was of stone, built vpon Arches, ouer a creeke that came from the sea. At the foote whereof on the other side the enemy lay verie strongly intrenched, who beinge with his shot at the further end of the bridge, Sir Edward Norris (who ledde the forward, and marched in the head of the pikes) past the bridge without any stay at all, beinge accompanied by

Lib. 31

The generall History of Spaine.

1251

A by Colonell Sydney, Capitaine Hinder, Capitaine Fulford and others. The way was euen, but they must passe thorough a storme of small shot; for the bridge was flanked on both sides with their shot, at the farther end there was a barricado, but they that had it in gard, seeing the proud approach of the English, forooke it, where Sir Edward Norris entred, and charging the first he encountered, with his pike, ouerthrusting himselfe beee self, and was fore hurt on the head, at the sword, but was honorably releued by the Generall his brother, Colonell Sydney, and some other Gentlemen: Capitaine Hinder having his cask shot off, had five wounds in the head and face at the sword. This was a most difficult, beinge seconded by the Generall, their brauest men which defended the place, beinge ouerthrowne, their whole armie fell presently to rout, and the English had the chafe three miles foure hundre waies. The Generals Standard with the Kings armes was taken, what number of the enemy was slaine, was not certain, but only by coniecture how many, two thousand men, (for of so many consisted the forward) in such a pursuit might kill. And to increase the number, hauing giuen ouer the execution, and returning to their stands, they found many hidden in the vineyards and hedges, whom they slue. And Colonell Medkerke beinge sent with his Regiment three miles farther to a cloyster, which he burnt and spoiled, he found two hundred men there, which he put to the sword: The English lost onely one Capitaine Cooper, and a private souldier. The execution beinge past, the Generall sent three parts of the armie three several waies to spoyle and burne; so as the countie round about was on fire. They found good store of victuals and munition in the campe, with some plate, rich apparell, and other booties, which they had left behind them.

Thus the English armie returned to the Groine, bringing small comfort to the Spaniards that were within it: and the next day the shippe their Ordinance, and then they let fire vpon euery house in the bafe towne, and on the Cloister, so as they left not any one standing. And on the eight of May, the English imbarked their armie without losse of one man, which (had they not beaten the Spaniards at Puente de Burgos) they could not possibly haue done, they hauing (as it seemed) an intent to charge the English when they should imbarke: the Commissarie confessing, that the first night of their landing, D. the Marquis of Seralba did write vnto the Earle of Altemira, the Earle of Andrada, and to Ternis de Sentisso, to bring all the forces they could raise, wherewith they might either beseege the English in the bafe towne, if they tooke it, or lye betwixt them and their imbarking place, and so fight with them vpon an aduantage, they hauing about 25000. souldiers vnder their commands.

The English armie leauing the Groine, on the thirteenth of May, there came vnto the Fleete the Earle of Essex, his brother Master Valter Deuereux, Sir Roger Williams, Colonell generall of the foote, Sir Philip Butler, and Sir Edward Wingfield. The Earle hauing put himselfe into that action, contraie to the opinion of the world, and with the hazard of his fortune, yet much to his honour. After which, the armie went and landed at Peneca in Portugall, within shot of the castle. The enemy beinge five companies of Spaniards (vnder the command of the Earle of Fuentes) sallied out of the towne, and came to the water side, as the English landed.

But the Earle of Essex, with his brother, and Sir Roger Williams hauing landed men enough to make two troups, they left one to go by the waters side, leading the other ouer the sand-hilles: which the enemy discovering, they retired further into the land, that they might haue the better meanes to passe away, yet they did it in such fort, as beinge charged, they came to the push of the pike, where they slue an English Capitaine: These Spaniards beinge fledde, the English entred the towne, which was neither fortified nor defended by any man.

F The Generall summoned the Castle that night, which was held by a Portuguese, called Antonio d'Aurid, who promised to yeeld it, so as he might bee assured, that Don Antonio was landed, and so he did. Thither came some Friars and poore men to their new king, promising within two dayes good supplies of horse and foote. Hauing staid at Peneca one day, the Generals resolved, that the armie should march by land to Lisbon, vnder the conduct of Generall Norris, and that Generall Drake should meete him

Sir Edward Norris hurt.

Spaniards defeated at Puente de Burgos.

English leave the Groine.

Souldiers come to releue the Groyne.

him in the riuer with the Fleete, that there should bee a companie left to guard the Castle, and fue in the shippes.

After which conclusion, hee marched with fourteen Regiments towards Lisbonne, commandement being giuen from the Generall, that no man should spoyle the countrey, nor take any thing from a Portuguesse, the which was very strictly obserued, so as the souldiers grew to some want of victualles in their march, but vpon complaint made vnto the King, it was better supplied. In fixe dayes march the armie came to Lisbonne, without any encounter of the enemy, who was betwixt them and the citie, but they dislodged as they approached.

English armie
comes to Lisbonne.

Being come to the suburbs of Lisbonne, Sir Roger Williams, and Captaine Anthony Wingfield with some thirtie shotte, scoured the streetes neere vnto the Towne, where they found not any but old folkes and beggers, crying Viva el Rey Don Antonio, and their houses shut vp, the inhabitants hauing carried much of their wealth into the town, and fired some houses by the water side full of Corne, and other prouision, for that the English should not make vse of it. The whole armie being quartered in the suburbs, the souldiers being tyred with their fixe dayes march, and desirous of rest that night, the enemy being aduertised thereof, sallied forth about one of the clocke, and came vpon the English by three severall streetes, but especially vpon Collonell Bress quarter, who being (as most of the Companies) at his rest, made all the hast hee could to draw his men into armes, in which charge hee was slaine, with some other Captaines of his Regiment: but there was such resistance made in all quarters, as they were suddenly put to a foule retreat, and chased euen to the Citie gates, where they lost many of their best Commaunders: In this salley the Spaniards lost treble the number of the English, and some of good qualitie.

Cascais entred
by the English.

During their march, Generall Drake came with the Fleete to Cascais, where hee entered without any resistance, the inhabitants being fledde with their goods to the mountaines, but the Generall sent a Portuguesse vnto them, to offer them all fauour, if they would acknowledge their king, and supply the wants of his armie: which offer they willingly embraced, sending two chiefe men to signifie their loyalty to Don Antonio, and their loue to the English. Wherevpon the Generall landed his Companies, but the castle was held still by 65. Spaniards.

The day after the Spaniards salley, Generall Norris called a Councell, to aduise whether it were fit to attend there for the horse and foote, which the King of Portugall had promised, and to send some conuenient troupes to Cascais to fetch their Ordinance and munition, which was with their shippes. The opinions of the Commaunders were diuers, some fedde with a vaine hope of Don Antonio, thought it best to stay there, and to send some three thousand men for the Ordinance. Others (despayring of all succours from Portugall) perswaded to march away, and not to stay vpon any vaine hopes. The Generall being loth to haue an imputation layed vpon him for his too great hast, or to loose any more time vpon Don Antonio's promises, tould them, that although the expedition of Portugall was not the onely desseigne of their iourney, but an adventure, the good successe whereof might get them great wealth, and much honour, wherein they had done so much, as whatsoeuer happened, it could not blemish their credits and reputations.

Yet in regard of the Kings last promise, that hee should haue that night three thousand men armed of his Countrey, hee would not dislodge that night. And if they came, that he might send the like number for his munition, and resolute to trie his fortune for the Towne. If they came not, he thought it not fit to diuide his forces, by sending any to Cascais, knowing how boldly they had sallied forth the day before, and that there were more souldiers armed within the town, then was in their campe. And that before their men could returne from Cascais, they expected more supplies: for the Duke of Bragança, and Don Francisco of Toledo were attended with great succours: wherevpon he concluded to march away the next morning, if the promised supplies came not that night: yet all the Portugueses which came vnto their king, would not make a cornet of horse, and two hundred foote.

The

A The Generall attended the effect of the Kings promise vnto the last houre, and hee sought to perswade him to stay eight daies longer, in which time he might haue ingaged himselfe, and receiued an affront, attempting a town that was well fortified, and great troupes of men in it. So as the next day, seeing no Portugueses appeare to ioyne with them, as was promised, the English Generall gaue order to march away, the Earle of Essex, and Sir Roger Williams making a stand, untill that the whole armie was drawne into field, and so they marched out of the suburbs: Captaine Anthony Wingfield, and Richard Wingfield, being in the reere of them with some shotte: after which the Battalions marched in order that night to Cascais. In their march, that day the Galleys of Lisbonne did somewhat annoy them, (their way lying along the riuer) and followed them untill they were past Saint Iulians, (spending many shotte, but doing little or no harme. The horsemen followed them a farre off, and cut off many sicke men, which were not able to hold march, hauing no carriages for them).

English armie
retires from Lisbonne.

Hauing bene two dayes at Cascais, they were aduertised by a Friar, that the Spaniards came marching strongly towards them, and were at Saint Iulians, wherewith the Earle of Essex, and the Generals were much pleased, desiring nothing more then to fight with them: Wherevpon the English Generall sent away a messenger with a trumpet that night, who carried a challenge to the Spanish Generall, wherein he gaue them the lye, for that they reported, that the English had retired disorderly and with feare from Lisbonne, challenging him to meete him the next morning with his whole armie, if he durst attend his comming, and there to trie the iustnesse of their quarrell by battell: by whom also the Earle of Essex (preferring the honour of his countrey, before all other respects, sent a challenge to any one of his qualitie, that would meete in the head of their Battalies, single, or with more companie, to trie their fortunes, offering assurance for their returne, and honorable vlsage.

Challenge sent by the English
Generall to the Spanish.

The English Generall put his armie in a readinesse by three of the clocke in the morning, and marched to the place where they incamped: but they had dislodged in the night in great disorder and feare, as the Generall was the next day informed: so as the troupes followed them to Lisbonne, but could not get any answer to his letters, they threatening to hang him, for that he presumed to bring such a message: but fearing the like measure to their prisoners, they sent him away without answer.

The armie being come to Cascais, the Castle was summoned, where the Captaine promised to yeeld it vpon sight of the Cannon, and not otherwise. Wherevpon the Generall caused three or foure peeces of batterie to be brought, where after the first volley, they compounded to depart with their Armes and baggage, he had in the Castle one Cannon, two Culuerins, one Basiliske, and three or foure field peeces, three-score and fife souldiers, with good store of victuals and munition, which hee might haue kept longer then the English had any intent to stay: the armie being imbarcked and readie to set saile, the fort was blowne vp.

Castle of Cascais yeilded to the English.

E Whilest they lay there in the roade, the Fleete, in fixe dayes, fetched in to the number of three-score Hulkes, laden with Spanish commodities, as it seemed, for the Kings prouision, and were going for Lisbonne: their chiefe lading was corne, Maits, Cables, Copper and Waxe: among which, some were of great burthen, very well built for sayling, hauing no great lading in them, and therefore it was thought they were brought to supply the Kings decayed Naue. Into the which the English that were in flie-boates were shipped, and the flie-boates sent home, with an offer of Corne for their hire. And then they sent shippes to fetch their men which they had left at Penecha, where as the enemy entred presently.

There were nine Galleys sent from Andalusia, to strengthen the riuer of Lisbonne, who in their returne, set vpon some shippes that were becalmed, and farre from the Fleete, but they did no great harme. The Fleet, by reason of the wind, went to the Islands of Bayonne, where they landed two thousand men, being all that were able to fight, and marched to the Towne of Vigo, which being entred by Captaine Anthony Wingfield, hee found the streetes full of Barricadoes, but not any one to defend them: for hee found but one man in the town, they being fledde away to Bayonne: the

Vigo taken by
the English.

the Generall with some others, beeing entred into Vigo, they sent some Captaines out to spoyle, and burne the Countrey, which they did fuen or eight miles in length. In the towne they found not any thing, but wine, all their goods beeing carried away, and in the morning the Colonell generall hauing drawne the Companies out of the towne, he caused euery house to be set on fire, and then they imbarked againe, and returned home into England.

King of Spaine
sends forces to the Duke of Sauoy to be-sege Genoua.

The Duke of Sauoy had an intent to beseege Geneva, which he pretended to bee his, in which attempt he craued ayde from the King of Spaine his father-in-law, who sent vnto him out of the Dutchie of Milan, Pyrro Malacenza with fise thousand foot, who went vnto him with all speed: from Naples hee had Alexander Sforza with a good number of horle, and Paul Sforza with foote: and from the countrey of Cremona, William of Lodron with fise thousand Germanes, and hee obtrayned the Marquis of Saint Martin from the Duke of Ferrara, to bee Lieutenant generall to the Duke of Sauoy, to whom he was allyed, furnishing him also with money, so as it seemed rather the King of Spains action, then the Duke of Sauoy.

An. 1590.
Pretence of the King of Spaine
to make warre
in France.

The King of Spaine aspiring (as it seemed) to the Crowne of France, whereof he had taken vpon him the name of Protector, tooke now a new cloake to make warre, which was in the name of his eldest daughter, Donna Isabella Clara Eugenia, whom he had by Elizabeth of Valois his third wife, daughter to Henry the second of France, pretending the Dutchie of Brittanie to bee fallen vnto her by lawfull right and succession, by the death of King Henry the third, her Vncle by the mothers side. Vpon this pretext hee sent certaine troupes thither, seeking to dismember it from the Crowne of France, to the which it was incorporate, by the death of the Ladie Anna of Brittanie, accomplishing the descendants from the sayd Ladie Anne, who was promised to Maximilian Arch-duke of Austria, and afterwards Emperour, but married to Charles the eighth, the French King, who dyed without heires, and then shee was married to Lewis the twelfth, by whom shee had one daughter married to Francis the first, father to Henry the second his succellour, who had by Catherine de Medicis foure sonnes, all which dyed without children, and three daughters, Elizabeth third wife to the King of Spaine, Claude married to Charles Duke of Lostraine, and Marguerite wife to Henry the fourth King of France and Nauarre.

All the fore-sayd children beeing descended in the direct feminine line from the Lady Anne of Brittanie, their Grand-mother, so as the sonnes hauing no lawfull heires, the succession of of the sayd Dutchie of Brittanie did belong vnto the Lady Elizabeth of Valois, the eldest of King Henrys two daughters, and mother to the sayd Infanta: the which, according to the Lawe, the King her father would maintaine, should represent her deceased mother: for that the sayd Dutchie beeing but a fee of Fraunce, may descend vnto the daughters as well as to the sonnes, as appeareth in the sayd Dutchesse Anne, daughter to Francis the last Duke of Brittanie, who brought it to Charles the eighth, and Lewis the twelfth. The French answered, that Dutchie, which were but fees, and held by homage of the Crowne, beeing once incorporated, can bee no more dismembered, with many more allegations, as you may reade in the French.

The King of Spaine could not forget the affront hee had receiued the last yeare by the English in Portugall, hee fought how to bee reuenged, if not of the whole State in generall, yet of priuate Merchants, whose liuing consisted, and wholly depended vpon Trafficke into diuers parts, and hearing that the English Merchants had great trade within the Streights of Gibraltar, to Venice, Constantinople, Alexandria, and other places of commerce, hee resolved to interrupt them, and intercept them if he could by any possible meanes: Wherevpon hee gaue charge vnto certaine Gallies to lye continually in the Streights to attend their passage.

Fight betwixt
the Spanish gal-lies & English ships.

It happened this yeare, that there were tenne good English shippes, and well fraught, coming from diuers parts, mette together at the Streights, and were bending home-ward. These shippes coming neere to the mouth of the Streights, hard vpon the coast of Barbarie they decayed twelue tall Gallies, wonderfully well manned, and gallantly appoynted, beeing commaunded by Andrew Doria for the King

A King of Spaine: who on the foure and twentieth day of Aprill, in the morning, bare vp with the shippes, and waied them amaine for the King of Spaine, and the English did the like for the Queene of England: after which, the fight beganne, one of the shippes at her first shot raked away all the men of one side of a Galley, and so pierced it, as it was ready to sinke, but the fight continued very furious, for the space of fixe howers. In the meane time, whilst they were in the hottest of this fight, there came in two Flemings to the Fleete, who seeing of what strength the Gallies were, the one of them strucke her sayles, and was presently taken by the Gallies: the other Flemming was also ready to yeeld, if the trumpetter of that shippe had not threatened to kill the Pilote at the Helme, if he did not speedily put off to the English fleete, and take part with them, by which meanes they were preserued from the Spaniards, whereas the other was taken basely and cowardly. After this long and furious fight the English shippes escaped, for the Gallies were so torne, as they were forced to flee into harbour, for that some of them were ready to sinke, neither durst they come any more forth, notwithstanding that the shippes lay becalmed in the streight.

The Catholike King finding himselfe ouer-burthened, and weakened with the warres which he had at one instant maintayned against his enemies, his treasure beeing exhausted, and hee wanting money to make his necessarie prouisions both for Flanders, and France vpon all occurrents, hee commaunded the Duke of Sessa, who was newly come Ambassadour to Rome, to succede the Earle of Oliuarez, who was gone Viceroy into Sicily, to intreate his Holinesse to grant him part of the reuenues of the spiritual liuing in Spaine, leauing vnto the Priests a competent liuing according vnto euery mans qualitie, but this demand was not allowed of, nor held conuenient in the Court of Rome.

This yeare there was a memorable fight at the Ilands of the Azores betwixt the king of Spaines Armado, and one of the Queene of Englands shippes called the Reuenge. The Lord Thomas Haward, second sonne to the Duke of Norfolk, and now Earle of Suffolke, going forth with fixe of the Queenes shippes, fixe victuallers, and some pinaces to attend the West Indian Fleete in their returne, lying at one of the Ilands of the Azores, they were aduertised of the approach of the Spanish armado, (beeing three and fiftie sayle of men of warre, commaunded by Don Alphonso Bacan, brother to the Marquis of Santa Cruz) the which were presently in sight, many of the English beeing then on shoare, to furnish themselves with ballast, fresh water, and other necessities, so as their shippes were light for want of ballast, and halfe their men sicke and vserviceable for fight.

Fight betwixt
the Reuenge & the Armado of
Spaine.

The Spanish Fleete beeing covered by an Iland, were come so neere, as they had scarce any time to weigh their anchors, yet some were faine to slippe their Cables, and to set sayle. Sir Richard Greenfield (who was Vice-admirall in the Reuenge) wayed last, staying to recouer her men that were in the Iland, which otherwise had beene lost, and not able to recouer the wind, as the Admirall, and the rest had with some difficultie done, he was perswaded by the Master and some others to cast about, and to trust to the sayling of the shippe: but Sir Richard would by no meanes turne head to the enemy, protesting that he would rather dye, then dishonour himselfe, his Countrey, and her Maiesties Ship. But he could not force through them, as he thought, but was boarded of either side by their huge Gallions.

The fight beganne at three of the clocke in the after noone, and continued very furious all that euening. The Spanish shippes were full of souldiers, in the English there were not any but Marriners, and some few voluntarie Gentlemen, with their seruants. They made many assaults, thinking to force her with their multitudes, but they were still repulst. The fight continuing all the day, and some howers in the night, many of her men were slain and hurt, and one of the great Gallions, with the Admirall of the Hulses sunke, and a great slaughter made in diuers other Spanish shippes. The Spanish shippes which attempted to board the Reuenge, as they were beaten off, others came in their places, there beeing neuer lesse then two mightie Gallions by her side, so as shee had bene his fortune in France with 6000. foot, and 2000. horse, then to stay any longer in the A government of the Netherlands. On the other side, Don John by his letters which hee did write into Spaine, made strange complaints, full of bitterness and despair, yea with threats; if they suffered him to languish any longer in that estate: and his letters were seconded by Escovedo, who wrote to Antonio Perez, whom he held to be a friend to Don John and himselfe; but hee discovered all their secrets vnto the King; as it appeared by letters written from Perez vnto the King, and noted in the margent with the Kings owne hand.

assayled

During all this businesse, Escovedo being sent for into Spaine, the King resolves to haue him made away, either by murder or poyson, as well for the great liberty and boldnesse hee vled in his writing, as for the strange speeches he sometimes vttered, which were very displeasing vnto the King, taking for a colour a certaine proposition made by him to fortifie and man the rock of Magro, and of some 6000. Ducats imployed by him, contrary to the Kings intent. In the end, after that he had conferred with the Marquis of Velez, and duly considered of all Escovedos practises: holding it a dangerous matter to send him back to Don John, the King found it expedient to haue him slaine. So Escovedo returning home to his lodging in the night, he was murdered in the streete by Garcia of Arras, and his confederates, at the induction of Antonio Perez, who had receiued commandement from the King. Hauing bene formerly concluded betwixt the King and Perez, that if the murderers should chance to bee apprehended, that Perez, taking the fact wholly vpon himselfe should flee into Arragon, whereas the King might more easily defend him then in Castile, Escovedo being murdered in this manner, the fact began to be discovered. The widow and her sonnes made their complaints against Perez. The King receiued them into his Councell of State, but hee sent them not before their Ordinary Iudge, himselfe giuing the whole knowledge of the fact to the President of Castile, and commanding him to talke with Escovedos sonnes, and to the Secretary Mathew Vasques, who presented their complaint, to the end they might bee silent. But all the Presidents admonitions were of no force, yea hee made them more violent in their complaints. Perez aduised the King to suffer this fact to come to a triall of lawe, with a moderate & slow pursuit, yet not to decree any thing, or else that he would giue him leaue D to retire from Court; the which the King tooke in ill part, promising him by the faith of a Knight, neuer to abandon him, and that hee would keepe him in his seruice. But Perez in the meane time saw the storme approaching, whereof hee was the more assured after the death of the Marquis of Velez, who had bene a liuely witnesse vnto him. The King seeing him perplexed, and in distresse for this death, did confirme this promise againe vnto him more strictly. In the meane time they doubled their complaints, the which (in like maner tending to the dishonor, and to charge the Princeesse of Eboly) the complainants framed at large by writing, and presented it to the King, yet for all this hee gaue no sentence: but being prest by Vasques, to whom he had begun to discover himselfe, as appeared by the answer which hee made him in writing, copyed by Perez, with a postscript E of the Kings.

In the end the King commanded his Confessor to reconcile the Princeesse and Perez, with Vasques: wherevnto the Princeesse would not giue eare, finding her selfe wronged, for that he held him vnworthy to conferre with her. The which did wonderfully discontent Perez, not daring to moue her therewith, for that he held himselfe bound vnto her seruice, for the fauours he had receiued from her. And seeing that by their reiterated complaints, notwithstanding the Kings promise in the faith of a Knight, they pursued him with all violence: he belouged the King, at the least, to do him this fauour, that he might retire himselfe. The King finding himselfe wronged on both sides, by the Princeesse, for that she would not reconcile her selfe with Vasques, as hee had commanded; and with Perez for that he would retire himselfe. After that hee had consulted with his Confessor, and with the Earle of Barayas, he caused the Princeesse and Perez to be committed to prison, vpon a colour, that by this imprisonment hee should force them to bee reconciled, the King himselfe being a spectator of this apprehension, made by his commandement, the which was in the year 1579.

The

A The next day, the King sent to visit Perez wife, and to comfort her, wishing her not to be troubled for her husband. Hee in like manner sent his Confessor to visit Perez, seeming to haue a care that hee should be well intreated. After that he had bene detained some moneth in prison, hee sent him with a certaine garde home to his house, where he commanded Perez that he should sweare to Don Rodrigo Manuel, by the faith of a Gentleman, that he would continue friend with Vasques: Perez remitting his plene (yet hauing the knife neere his throte) yielded thereto: and so continued in his house, bearing the charge thereof, vntill the year 1585, and receiuing no allowance nor fee. At the end of which time (to the end the blind should not see any thing) hee was with other Secretaries put to the Visita (which is a lawe to examine the actions of such as they meane to intrap.)

La visita in Spaine is the law of fishing.

The charges of this Visita were more honourable to Perez then hurtfull. They did consist of two points, the one concerning the Kings secrets, whereof hee aduertised the King, for that he would not discover them, seeing that they meant to force him thereto; hauing alwayes faithfully acquit himselfe in keeping them in his bosome, as the King had trusted him. Hee in like manner informed the Confessor, shewing vnto him for his discharge, a writing of the Kings owne hand: wherevpon the Confessor did forbid him to purge himselfe by his Kings writing: wherevnto he obeyed, for that he would not diuulge his secrets: suffering himselfe to bee condemned in a fine of thirty thousand Ducats, suspension of his office, two yeares imprisonment, and then to be banished eight yeares. The which Perez endured by the perswasions and goodly promites of this Father Confessor.

This condemnation was made by the strangest Act that hath bene scene, whereof the Councell had no knowledge, neither was it signed, nor any iudicial sentence pronounced. The Act being insinuated to Perez, being lead from his house to the Castle, his goods before seized on were freed, and it was told him that hee should not performe the said Act, so as hee would deliuer the papers and Instructions which hee had written vnto the King, and from the King to him: that by this meanes hee might wholly discharge the King, and lay all vpon Perez owne head, wherein consisted the end of their proceeding. For there were yet two secret points in the sentence: the one was, they would make Perez guilty of Escovedos death: the other, that hee had no meanes to complaine of force and violence in his Countrey of Arragon: besides an accusation of ten thousand Ducats wherewith they charged him, whereof by many liuely reasons, and by a note of the Kings owne hands hee was discharged. Which note hauing bene deliuered into the Confessors hand, hee read and retained it, and afterwards denyed the hauing it.

Trick of a false Monke.

When they came to execute the said Act, Perez thinking to preuent it, fled into a Church for liberty (fearing that his enemies would murder him in prison) from whence notwithstanding hee was drawne, but hauing obtained a sentence to his advantage, this execution was stopt. Notwithstanding hee was afterwards taken againe, and carried to the Castle of Turnegano, where hee was cruelly intreated by one Torres of Aulda a Licentiar, who kept him ninety dayes in Irons, from the sight of his wife and children, who were in like manner committed to prison; to the end they should not demand Iustice, as the wife had done once at Lisbon, vpon the Kings promising by the faith of a Knight, the which was done to the end they might the better come to the Kings papers and her husbands, which this Friar Diego Chines hunted so after, knowing how much they did import to free the King. To attaine vnto the which hee had already written two letters (by the meanes of the Earle of Barayas President of Castile) to Perez wife, sending her word, that there was no other meanes E to see her husband in liberty, then in yielding vp the sayd papers: and in so dooing, that both shee and her husband should bee deliuered out of prison, wherevnto shee resisted courageously, refusing flatly to giue them. So as in the end her husband did write a note vnto her with his owne blood (so straightly was he kept) that she should deliuer them, the which shee did, yet by a diuine instinct shee refused some, sending them in two cofers to the said Confessor, being at Monzon, with the Keyes, the which were deli-

Zzzzz. 2.

delivered into the Kings owne hands by him that had charge of the cofers ; by the deliverye of which papers, the Lady onely was set at liberty.

luerie of which papers, the Lady only was left in liberty.

At the Kings retorne from Monzon, the papers being read, Perez was somewhat enlarged in the towne of Madrid (but not without a further meaning) for the space of foure moneths, hauing leaue to bee visited, and the weeke before Easter to go to Maffe, but this was a short ioy, for Escuados sonne came to renew his old complaint, and Perez was againe sent to the Caste to prison, and loone after hee was called into the Court: where being examined vpon this complaint, hee continued faithfull and constant vnto the King; refusing to declare any thing according to his commandments and promises; aduertising him notwithstanding what the euent might be of such kinde of proceedings: but all was in vaine; for it was ordered that hee should answer within ten dayes, vnto the cheefe points of a proceffe, which had lasted ten yeares. At this examination the Confeisseur aduised him, to confesse Escuados murder, but not to declare the motives and reasons; which Perez did not approue. But rather, to the end the King might bee discharged, to compound with Escuados children, who were the parties interessed, the which was effected at Perez charge, for twenty thousand Ducats, and it was presently paid. All this did not serue the turne, for the President Rodrigo Vazquez, a Kinsman to Escuado, seeing that Perez could auoyde all stormes, wrote vnto the King that hee should consider well of the composition which Perez had made, by the which the world did murmur and surmise, that his Maiestie had caused him to do it. And therefore his regall authority required, that hee should declare, or cause Perez declare the reasons of this accord; whereby his Maiesty should stop all mens mouths, and Perez should bee better discharged. Wherevpon the king did write vnto Perez, to tell the reason why, by his commandement and for his seruice, hee had caused Escuado to be slaine. This note and commandment from the king, made the greatest to murmure; for (said they) if the king hath commanded him to murder Escuado, what reason, or what preparation do they pretend? Is it now time, after twelue yeares since it was done, to demand the cause? yea a Cardinall, & the Popes Legat passe vnto the Confessor in Perez behalfe: To whom he answered, that they should rest satisfied, and that what had beene done, was to giue contentment to the President Rodrigo Vazquez; and that all should be well. As in like manner Father Salinas preaching Friar, discoursed sufficiently in a Sermon which he made in the kings Chappel, in Iustificatiō of Perez, but all was without effect, the Confessor holding it a sinne to demand Iustice: Notwithstanding Perez remained firme and constant, and being examined vnto the Kings note, he would not declare any thing, for he did not easily giue credit thereto: wherevpon the Iudge took occasion to put Perez to the rack (although his minde were sufficiently tortured, with the confusion of a precedent order) yet relying vnto the Kings first instruction and commandement, he continued constant, & endured the torture, euen to the effusion of his blood, yet in the end hee was forced to declare the motive causes of the murder of Escuado, with the circumstances, producing the Kings originall letters to that end, and an Autentike witness, who was yet liuing: whose testis biller, and did not produce it. Perez finding by all these violences and outrages, that they would draw his life into question, he found no better means, then to seeke how he might escape out of prison in Caphise: as he did by the assistance of his wife, and of Giles de Maza, a Gentleman of Aragon, his kinsman in the night, the Thursday before Easter: Maza, a Gentleman of Post, without any rest, vntill he came into Aragon: for the which his living thirty leagues foot, without any rest, vntill he came into Aragon: for the which his wife and children smarted, for they were cast into prison, with a friend of Perez, which cruelty was intolerable before God; as in such twents, whereas, where men were slaine, God makes foolles to speake, and to tell Kings and Princes the truth, to their confusion. For This Martino the kings foolke, & a naturall heeling that the chiefe in Court receiued that Perez had so feared, asking the King what Perez was for whom such a man did so much reuerence? Surely said he, he was not guilty, and therefore, Sir, be thou also glad. These words by a foolle were observed by the wisest. It seemed that imprisonment of Perez wife and children, proceeded from hatred, or to stop their iust complaints, so that the Confessor sought to be reuenged of them, for that the said Lady had once charged him

An. 1591.
Arragon
action.

Perez escapes out of prison, and flies into Aragon;

A him that instead of a Confessor, hee was a Soueraigne Iudge, teaching him what was written of the poore widow in the holy Scripture. And also for that which Donna Gregoria Perez: their daughter; after a long puritie, spake with great courage and griefe of heart, vnto the President Rodrigo Vazquez: that she was come with her young Brethren and Sisters, to the end that without making them to languish any longer in misery, he should make haile to suck vp their blood, and that they were come to that end, desiring rather to dye at once, then they should thus suck their bloods by degrees. Wherewith the President was no lesse terrified, then the Confessor was at the Mothers words. Perez hauing recovered Arragon with great difficultie, being much broken with the Racke, and his long and miserable imprisonment; hee staid some time at Calatajub, where hee retired himselfe into a Monastrie. There were priuate letters sent to a Knight of that towne, without any Act, or sufficient warrant, to draw him from thence: the which not able to effect, being hindered by the religious men of that Conuent, hee gaue him a Monkes Sell for his prison. Perez did write from this place vnto the King, but all was in vaine; for vpon new complaints and accusations, hee was drawn out of this Conuent by the Kings expresse commandment (not without some mutinie of the towne men) and lead to Saragosa, from whence hee did importune the King with new letters, sending a religious man exprelly with good instructions of all matters. This religious man spake vnto the King, who gaue him good words: but hee was not welcome to the reuered father the Kings Confessor. But nothing could helpe him, to stay these pursuites begunne: or else God would haue the truth knowne to all the world, the which some priuate mens mallice sought to suppress.

Peretz seeing that hee preaulled nothing, hee had recourse to his papers, letters, and instructions, as well from the King, as from some others, which had bene kept safe by his wives industrie: whereof hee made a collection, decifaring the whole estate of his businesse, and made a Booke, the which hee presented vnto the Iustice: whereby his aduersaries seeing themselves confounded, and that hee should be absolutely discharged, they inuented an other meanes to intrapp him: which was that the King referring all his rights, should desist from this action against Peretz, and that they would charge him to haue ill acquitted his duty to his Prince. Although that this seperation of the cause was repugnant to the customes of Arragon, and that the King might not doe it: yet they gaue it forth that they had instructions, impugning them of Peretz, the which was alledged wholly against the Kings authority, to the blemish of his reputation, and contempt of his writing, the which Peretz, neither in prison, nor out, for the onely respect hee bare vnto the King, would euer shew, but onely at this last charge, where hee was forced to make vie of them, least he should fall into the like inconuenience that P<sup>is</sup> had done; who would not iustifie himselfe of Germanicus death, by the writings of Tiberius Caesar, who had commanded him: Peretz discharge being the more receivable, for that hee did make euery man know by liuely reasons, what had moued the King to doe it. Peretz enemies seeing there was no advantage to bee gotten of him before the Soueraigne Iudge, they drew him to the, State of the Inquests of Arragon, where as the King is both Iudge and party. There he was examined vpon the old Articles, the fifth day after the separation, and also vpon two new points: by the which in their Interrogatories they did obiect against him, that when as he heard the French King did prosper, hee reioycied, and contrarywise hee was sad, when as he heard of the King of Spaines good successe. Moreover that hee had a desire to retire himselfe into Berne, or into Holland and Zeland. To whom he answered, that they ought not to search into the secret Cabinet of God, who alone knowes the hearts of men, pretelling of the force and violence they offered him, to the prejudice of the Kings seruice: Offering yet to produce more Instructions before any third person, whom it should please the King to name, and especially before the Archbishop of Saragoza: But this offer was not allowed, nay not any one durst deale in his businesse, nor his owne Advocate, hearing the threats of the Marquis of Almenare, who had corrupted some witnesses vpon Peretz, to retreat into Holland.

Yet this Inquest could not worke out any thing to prejudice Perez: then his aduersaries tooke a new resolution, to deliuer him ouer to the Inquisition, vppon

Zzzzz 3

Peres put into the Inquisition.

*An. 1591.
Arragon.*

those witnesses which had bene suborned by the Marquis of Almenare, touching his recreate into Holland, accusing him also of Inchantment. This forged A& of the Marquis, was censured throughout the realme, and every man would take knowledge thereof, who found it to be such, as it was nothing preiudiciall to Peres: yea the Salmidine of Saragoſſa (which is the supreme Magistrate of the towne) was afterwards committed to prison, for that he had received the depositions of these false witnesses: wher-by all the people and Estates of Arragon, did see with what passion and spleene they did proceed against Peres: and would haue them iudge definitively, whether he were guilty or not, the which if they refused to doe, then said they, Peres cause was good. Notwithstanding the Officers of the Inquisition, (contrary to the priuiledges of the manifestation, and other rights of the realme) came vpon the fine and twenty of May, that yea-re 1591. and tooke him out of the prison, leading him to the Inquisition; but within foure houres after, the Inquisitors were forced through a mutiny of the people, to deliuer him back to his first prison of the manifestation: the tumult was very great, with the effusion of some blood; and the burning of houses: yea the Marquis of Almenare, for that he had done against their priuiledges, was committed to prison, hauing a thousand iniurious speeches giuen him by the women and children, and being out-raged and beaten by the skumme of the people: whereof fifteene dayes after, (hauing in his extremitie freed Peres) he dyed in prison. Peres enemies being not yet sufficiently taught, by this third bloody and horrible error, they persisted in their obstinacie to haue him in the Inquisition: wherevpon thirteene Lawyers of the realme, were appointed to Iudge, whether Peres cause deserved to be sent thither, or not. At the first they ordeined, that it was againſt all right to deliuer him to the Inquisition: But afterwards by the solliciting of John Lewis Murano, who had wonne most of them with presents, they gaue an other sentence, contrary to their first, directly impugning the priuiledges, examples, concordants and declarations of the realme, which disannull the Edicts of Conſication, proceeding from the Inquisition. Yet his aduersaries would proceed, and the rather, for that the King had commanded the Gouvernor of Arragon, to keepe Peres in perpetuall prison: or at the least that he might neuer goe out of the realme of Arragon: wherein the deputies, to obey the King, agreed most together. The people notwithstanding were resolute, seeing the wrong and violence they not onely did to Peres, but also to his wife and small children, yea to religious men that were his sollicitors: the which all the world detested: and in like manner to his reuenues, so as in prison hee liued onely of almes, the which were grudged him, besides the wrong which was done vnto his mooueables, basely sold at an out-cry, yea the shirts and smocks of his little Infants borne in the prison, with the thimble and needle wherewith Donna Gregoria his eldest daughter did sows besides many other great indignities, which were done to him, his wife and children, whereof the people had great pittie, concluding thereby, that whatsoeuer he endured, proceeded onely from reuenge, hatred and spleene, and that he was not culpable.

His pursuing enemies knowing well, and hauing found it by experience, how the people stood affected to their priuiledges, and to Peres, durst not attempt to put him againe into the Inquisition (which should haue bene done on the twentieth of August) without force: and therefore they gathered together a good number of the Kings soldiers, with many Noblemen and Knights of the Viceroyes house (which had neuer bene seene before) the which troubled both the City of Saragoſſa, and the whole realme, for that it was directly against their priuiledges: but all turned for this time into smoke, they not daring to effect any thing. Not content herewith, they made better prouision of men on the 24. of September following, hauing raised 2000. men to take Peres, being assisted by the Officers, Noblemen and Knights. On the day appointed, the Gouverneur called his soldiers together before the breake of day, and put them into battaile: and to strike terror into the Burgeses, he caused them to giue a charge of shotte, where there was a yong child slaine, and some hurt by the Gouvernours owne hand. At the houre of Counsell, the Inquisitors arriued, who demanded to haue the persons of Peres and of John Francisco Maiorini deliuered into their hands. Vpon which demand (notwithstanding, a petition presented at the same time, by some good Countrymen) they obai-

A obtained, Fiat. Wherēvpon many Noblemen and officers went to the prison to receive him. Whether being come, a Lieutenant called Miser Clameria, with the Officers of the Inquisition, being accompanied by some soldiers, leading with them two Notaries, the better to qualifie their exploite, they entred into the prison, and caused Peres to come downe, where hauing obserued the ceremonies of his euocation, they demanded to haue him for some points concerning religion, and the faith. Peres seeing this, and standing vpon his right and the priuiledges of the realme, nothing would preuaile, but they put Irons vpon both his legges, and prepared to lead them away. Whilst that the Viceroy, or Gouverneur, the Soueraigne Iudge, the great Noblemen, Earles and Knights of this company, were in Armes in houses neere vnto the prison: at the same instant the people came running in great troupes, crying, Liberty, liberty, (the which in the like case vpon the breach of their priuiledges, is lawfull.) At the first they were but a multitude of labourers, and the skumme of the people (whereof few were armed) which fell vpon them that were vpon the place of Iustice. The rest of the people seeing that they had no leader, and that it was not onely for Peres, but also for their liberties, that made them to stirre, they went and intreated Giles de Meza to bee their head, who hauing taken vpon him this charge, with those men he had, and such as came scattering vnto him, hee charged the horsemen, and the rest of the Gouvernours souldiers, whom he presently put to flight, who were also set vpon by two hundred children, armed according to their ages and strength, and a poore naturall foole, who played his part with stonnes. Finally, their fury was so great, as they slew the Coche Moyles, and burnt the Coches, which should haue carried Peres and his companion into Castile, they also set fire of the house whereas the Viceroy and other Noblemen had saued themselves. There were slaine in this tumult the said John Lewis Murano, and Pedro Ieronimo of Baradix, one of the chiefe Councillors of the towne.

This Combate, happened for their liberties, was done with such zeale and heate, as a very old man would haue exposed sixe or seauen of his sonnes to sacrifice themselves for this cause, commanding them to arme, and rather to dye: and a Gentlewoman of a good family, sent her Nephew and onely heyre. The furie being past by the death of fifty or sixtie persons, and about a hundred and fifty hurt; the people returned to the prison, with an intent to haue Peres. The Officers of the Inquisition, seeing in what danger they were, tooke off his fetters, and by their Maisters commandement, intreated him to goe out of prison, fearing to be slaine there. Peres demanded an Acte, but so that by reason of the confusion hee could not haue it, hee went forth, to the great ioy and content of all the people: who conducted him to the house of Don Diego of Eredia. This done, they went to retire John Francisco Maiorini, setting all the other prisoners at liberty. The same night Peres went out of Saragoſſa, with Giles de Meza, remaining three dayes vpon a Mountaine, during the which hee vnderstood that the Go-uernour caused him to be pursued, wherevpon hee returned back into the towne, where he lay hid forty dayes, to vnderstand what would become of this businesse: which was that they prepared an Armie in Castile, to come towards Saragoſſa, and yet the Viceroy gaue out a brute of an Accord, which was but to vnderstand where Peres remained:
as appeared by the letters of an Inquisitor, who had feed men to that end, hoping by such a service to get an Archbishopspricke: By reason whereof Peres retired the day before that Don Alonso de Vergas entred with his Armie into Saragoſſa, hiding himselfe among the rocks: vntill in the end hee came to Sala, where hee rested himselfe some dayes, vntill that hearing of the new and intollerable Accord, hee sent Giles de Meza vnto the Lady Catherine Princessse of Nauarre, the French Kings onely sister, interceping her to receive them vnder her protection and safeguard. And hauing certaine in-reelligence that they pursued him, and sought him in all places, hee went by night from Sala and came to Pao, where hee found Giles de Meza, with an answer from the Princessse, which was that hee might come boldly, where hee should find all freedom, going, comming, or staying, with liberty of his religion, yea shee sent some horses to fetch him vnto her. Where being arriued, and hauing saluted the Princessse, hee gaue him as good a reception as he could expect of such a Lady.

Tumult in Saragoſſa for Peres.

Peres escapes out of Arragon and comes to Paris.

Allion of Arragon.

Rena

Perez, being thus vnder the protection of this Princeesse, the greedinesse of the Spaniard to shed his blood, did hunt after his death, offering new Accords, to entertaine him neere vnto them, vntill they might finde some meanes to effect their designes, to which end they bargained with diuerse persons for his life. Betting at Pao, there was a very good agreement offered him by Don Martin de la Nuesa, in the behalfe of the Viceroy, of Don Alonso de Vargas, and of the Inquisitors, but he durst not trust them. Many letters haue discovered the reasons and practises to murder Perez, and the names of the vnder-takers: among others, of one Bastamantes his owne kinsman: of another Arragonois furnished with poyson, and letters from the Viceroy, found about him, who being discouered, hee was condemned to dye, but at the request of Perez, the Princeesse pardoned him: then there was another of Nauarre hired to that end, who discouered himselfe to John Francisco Maiorini: to whom in the King of Spaines name, hee promised pardon and great rewards: But going about to perswade him by his reasons, that in executing the Kings will to murder or poyson Perez, was no treason. John Francisco hauing discouered the ground of his speech, hee revealed him, and the Nauarrois was banished. They would also haue suborned a naturall Foole to murder him, but he was wiser then they that sought to corrupt him.

All these practises and attempts were the cause that Perez retired into England, considering that in France hee should neuer bee safe from such practises against his life: Norwithstanding that hee was comprehended in the letters of Pardon granted to them that had offended the King of Spaine, which were afterwards dispersed throughout the world. Wherevnto hee would not trust, taking example by Don Bernardo de Cabrera, the Kings Secretarie, who seeing how hee was enuied, retired from Court, and became a Priest, yet the King called him back againe, being loth to loose such a seruant: being returned, their enuie increased, and he was so violently pursued, as Don Pedro of Arragon caused him to loose his head like a traitor: and yet afterwards, this Don Pedro dying, hee declared him an Innocent, and to haue bene faithfull: saying, that hee had been abused by his household seruants, who hated Cabrera, commanding that all his lands and goods should bee restored to his Nephew, which had bene confiscated: In the meane time the Innocent man was dead, and had suffered wrongfully.

The like was scene at Brussels, in the Councell of the troubles, who put to death during their greatest executions, a poore innocent man that was a prisoner, who had neuer bene called, heard, nor examined, so as some three or foure moneths after his death, when they came to call him to bee examined, they found that hee had bene executed, without any arraignment, or sentence giuen. Wherewith some of the Councillors that were borne in the country, being troubled in conscience, the Councillor Vergas a Spaniard, sayd vnto them: Trouble not your selues, it imports not, if hee bee dead an Innocent, his soule is the more happy, and his body is freed from all miseries.

But returning to that which followed in the towne of Saragoça, after the departure of Perez. The King of Spaine, to bee reuenged for this tumult, gathered an armie together vpon the frontiers of Castile, giuing it out that it was to bee sent into France, to succour the League, of the which Don Alonso de Vargas was Generall, who hearing that Perez was escaped, fell with all his troopes vpon the realme of Arragon, to punish them of Saragoça. There was a petition presented against him and his armie, by the whole body of the realme of Arragon, to the end that the Iustice Maior, according to their ancient priuiledges, should take armes, to repulse the attempts of Don Alonso. According to the which, by a decree of seuentene, the Iustice with the whole realme, fell to Armes, distributed the Offices of warre, leuied men, and brought Saint Georges Stander to field (an vsuall thing in such cases) and so marche in good order out of Saragoça, but with bad successe: for that the Captaines (traitors to their Country) basely fearing the forces of Don Alonso, retiring themselves, abandoned their companies, so as the armie of Arragon came to nothing, euery one slipping away, through the treachery of a Maister Inquisitor, who aduerted the King how many men there were, who were their Commanders and Captaines, with their names and surnames, and the meanes how to defeat them.

To

A To vnderstand the reasons of the Arragonois, to the end it may not be held a rebellion, lightly vnderaken without cause, or an alteration without ground. It shall bee good for the better knowledge of the matter, to relate briefly, the estate, condition, and beginning of the realme of Arragon.

Since the generall losse of Spaine, which hapned vnder King Roderigo, by the means of Cont Julian, for that he had defouled his daughter Caba. The Moores or Sarazins held Spaine long, without either King or Lord. In the end, the realme of Arragon freed it selfe from the power of the Moores, and the Arragonois made themselves their owne Maisters and Lords, not acknowledging any particular Prince, and without any Soueraignty but their owne. So as being weary of their rest and liberty, they required (as the children of Israell did sometimes to Samuel) to haue a King, and therein they demaunded the Popes aduice: who answered them as Samuel had done the Israelits. But seeing they desired to haue a King, he did with them to prescribe him lawes and conditions, and ouer him a Soueraigne Iudge, with assistants, to bridle his ambition. The Arragonois gaue credit to this Councell, and before they would chooseth a King, they erected the dignity and precheminence of El Iusticia of Arragon, which is a Soueraigne Iudge about the King, with seuentene Assistants. And they made a law which was called the Laws of manifestacion for the preservation of the Vassals right, against the out-rages and oppressions of the mighty, be hee King, Prince, or other Iudge. Which law, with other

C Statutes and Ordonances, together with their Priuiledges, are to bee seene Printed, vnder the Kings royall authority, and haue continued many hundred yeares, to the honor and reputation of their Kings, and especially of Don Ferdinand of Arragon, surnamed the Catholicke, who would not giue eare (being come to the crown of Castile, by D. Isabella his wife) to the bad counsell which the Spaniards gaue him, tending to the abolishing of the said priuiledges, saying: So long as the two ballances of the King and realme, shall be in a iust Counterpoise, the king and realme shall continue and flourish together, but if one of the Scales seeketh to weigh downe the other, the one or the other will fall to ruine, or it may bee both together. Moreouer the Arragonois made a law of vnion, consisting in two points worthy the knowledge, for the clearing of this present discourse. The one is, that whensoever the king shall breake their lawes, they may chooseth an other. For you must vnderstand that they do not swear vnto their Kings, but conditionally in these termes. Nos que valemus tanto como vos, y vos tanto como nos, oç hazemos nuestro Rey y Señor con tal, que nos guardes nuestros fueros, y libertades, sy no, no. And hee must humble himselfe vpon his knees, bare-headed, before the Soueraigne Iudge, which is El Iusticia, and swear first, and then the Arragonois after him. The second point of this vnion is, that the Princes and Noblemen of the realme, may make leagues and confederations against their King in case of oppression, or of breach of their priuiledges. And vpon these conditions they did chooseth their first King, who was a Knight of Arragon, called Garcia Ximenes, and after him three or foure: But this election continued not long; for the King D. Pedro, called with the Poignard, desiring to make the realme successiue, and hereditarie, insisted in an assembly of the Estates, to disauill this law of election, the which in the end was granted, by the foure members of the realme, reseruing all their other rights and priuiledges but that: the which hee did willingly accept, and after this Accord made (holding the Charter of the Election in his hand) he drew out his Poynard, and cut it in peeces, saying these words. Que tal fueray fuero, de poder elegir Rey los vassallos, sangte de Rey auia de costar, and withall stabd himselfe through the hand, from which time the King was called Don Pedro with the Poynard: as his effigie is to bee seene at this day, in the royall hall of the deputation in the towne of Saragoça, where as all the Kings his successors are, vnto Philip the second last deceased. By vertue of the law of vnion, and of their priuiledges, the Arragonois took Armes this yeare 1592, proceeding thus iustly in their businesse,

F the chiefe Iustice causing the sentence to be insinuated to Don Alonso de Vargas, by two Notaries and two Lawyers: who hauing made their insinuation vnto him, vpon the penalty of body and goods, they returned freely to Saragoça. Of which their proceeding may appeare by the Commission giuen to Don John de la Nuesa chosen Generall of the armie, signed by El Iusticia, by the Abbot of Piedra, Lewis Nauarra, Don Lewis of Marauillo, Don

Saying of Don Ferdinand
King of Arca-gon.

Manner of the King of Arragons ailes.

of his subiects) to giue ouer the government, and to spend the remainder of his A dayes in contemplation, giuing God thanks for the prosperous course of his life, and the happines of his Estates, retying himselfe into some Religious place, and there pray continually for his soules health: And to resigne vp the government of his Realme to Philippe his sonne, and to Albert his cousin, that with their ioynt Councils and cares they might gouerne his subiects, vntill his sonne grew to more yeares, and were capable of the sole command. That hee would also adde vnto their Councils fiue of the chiefe Noble-men of the Kingdome, Spaniards borne, whose counsell, helpe, and authority, if need were, they should vse, but I doe not find that this resolution tooke effect.

Muley Zeig becomes a Christian.

Muley Mahomet sometimes King of Fez and Marrocco, was expelled by his vnde B Muley Moluc, who, imploring ayde from Sebastian King of Portugall, they both dyed in battell, as you haue heard. Mahomet had a sonne called Muley Xey, who had bene giuen in hostage with some Noblemen to Sebastian, who sent him to Mazagon.
After the battell hee was coueysed with his company into Spaine, where hee was brought vpp vnder the protection of King Philippe, and this yeare beeing instructed in the Christian Religion, hee became a Christian, and was Christened in that famous Monastery of Saint Laurence (called Escoriall) with his couzin and other Coun-ciliars, all making profession of the Gospell.

1594

The Turke this yeare made all Italy to tremble, for that Cigala beeing come forth C with an hundred and threescore Gallies, and other vessells, it seemed at the first, that hee had a desseyne to enter into the gulphes, but finding the Venetians to make great preparation, they fell vpon the coast of Calabria, where they did much harme vnder the coming of Prince Doria into those Seas, who seeing the Turke gone retyred himselfe, but the Turkes hauing fortified their Fleet with more Gallies, returned againe and threatened Italy: Wherevppon Carlo Spinelli, by commandement from the Viceroy of Naples, caused the City of Rhegium to bee abandoned with some others vpon that coast.

Turkes invade
Italy.

Cigala coming to Rhegium, and finding their goods carried to some safer place, D hee burnt it in dildaine, and threatned to passe farther into the country. The misery which the poore people endured, and the cruelty which those Barbarians vsed was exceeding great, the spoyle they made were valued at many hundred thousand crownes: And for that the King of Spaine had need (if hee would defend his owne Estates, and the honour of the holy Church from the Armes of Infidells) of great summes of gold, he made request vnto the Pope, that the Cardinall and Archbishop of Toledo being dead in Spaine, and hauing left a million of crownes to bee employed in godly vses, he would make declaration that the said summe might bee employed in those godly and important warres, wherein the Pope tooke deliberation, and did soone after satisfie the King, confirming the Cardinall Albert of Austria in the succession of the said Archbishop, hauing bene named by his Maiesty. But to treatre more strictly with him of many affayres importing Christendome, he sent John Francisco Aldebrandini Ambassadour into Spaine, who was receaued there with royall magnificence and great shewes of honor and loue.

Albert of Austria Archbishop of Toledo.

1595.

In the beginning of this yeare 1595. the warre began to grow hotte in the Franche Contry of Bourgundy, betwixt the French and the Spaniard, whether the King of Spaine refused to send the Constable of Castile, who was Gouernor of the Dutchie of Milan, with 4500. souldiers of the Realme of Naples, and he gaue commission to Fernando de Toledo, Ladomick Melzi, to Alexander Carraciola, and to Alexander Gonzaga, either of them to raise a troupe of horse, and that they should leauy a thousand foot in that estate, and three thousand in the Duchy of Vrbis.

Constable of Castile sent vnto
the French
Court.

Protestation of the Spanish Ambassador at the disputation of the French
King.

The French King hauing left the religion wherein he had bene bred, and fallne to the Romish Church, was after great sute and instance, absolved by the Pope with the accustomed ceremonies. Before the doing whereof, the King of Spaines Ambassadour made a protestation in the King his Masters name, that whatsoever the Pope intended for to doe in the said busineses, should not any way preiudice his Masters rights to the Realme of Nauarre, nor to the Duchy of Bourgundy, nor yet to the great

A great treasure hee had disbursed at the request of the Catholikes of France, whereof hee meant to bee repaid, and that hee would not desist from armes, vntill that Realme had satisfied him: which protestation being accepted by the Pope, the said embassadours Secretarie caused a publike instrument to bee made with licence from his Holinesse. And this yeare died D. Antonio of Portugall at Paris, which newes were verie ioyfull to the king of Spaine, being freed from the apprehensions of daile troubles in that realme, by means of his pretensions.

Death of D.
Antonio king
of Portugall.

The Archduke Ernestus of Austria being Gouernour in Flanders for the king of Spaine, the earle of Fuentes commanded the armie by provision vntill the coming of a new gouernour, the king resolving to send the Cardinall Albertus to succed his brother: vpon whose dispatch (whether it proceeded from the kings own disposition, or a desire in him to make himselfe the more acceptable to the people of those Prouin-ces, at his first coming) there were many Ships of the East Countries, and the Netherlands, (which had bene staied in Spaine, to serue as men of warre, and to waite home the Indian fleets) discharged in diuers Hauens and Ports: And at Seuil- le the Duke of Medina Sidonia, told the Merchants and Masters of ships, that it was the kings pleasure and command, being moued there vnto by the Cardinall of Austria, and that from thenceforth their ships should haue free passage into Spaine, and haue pasports to goe and come if they would demand it, hoping they would in time acknowledge the kings gracious fauours, and submit themselves vnto their naturall Prince: And the better to perswade the vntied Prouinces of the kings loue and fauour towards them, hee set Philip of Nassau, Prince of Orange, and Earle of Buren, at libertie, hauing bene long restrained in Spaine, which was thought to be done at the instance of the Prince of Spaine, and of the Archduke, to the end hee might haue him with him into the Low-Countries.

Ships of the v-ntied Prouin-ces, discharged
in Spaine.

Experience hath often taught that armes are more fortunate, and produce greater effects in an enemies Countre, than at home, and that there is no such triumph as that which is fetcht farre off. The French held that all their combusions had bin forged in Spaine, that the Iesuits had bene the chiefe workemen: The attempts against the French kings person, by John Chastell who had hurt him in the face, and other their disciples, did verifie this opinion; Besides the French king, had by his letters giuen the Estates of Arthois and Henaute to vnderstand, that if they did not desist from relieuing his rebellious Leaguers, vpon the frontiers of Picardie, hee was resolved to make warre against them, prefixing them a certaine time, to giue him answere, which they neglected: wherevpon the French king grounding the necessitie of his armes, vpon these considerations, hee made a declaration at Paris, in Ianuary this yeare, by which, for certaine reasons therein contained, he denounced war against the king of Spaine and all the Low-countrie Prouinces vnder his obedience, as his enemies, causing it to bee proclaimed in all the frontier Townes of his Realme.

French king
proclaims war against the king
of Spaine.

E After the publication hereof, there was the like proclamation made at Brussels, in the name of the king of Spaine, against the French king (whome hee tearmed Prince of Beame) and against all the French that held his partie: the Leaguers were excepted, whome hee called the good confederate French Catholikes, and he promised to aide and assist them with all the means which God had giuen him, promising the like to all the French, of what qualitie soeuer, that should within two moneths after that proclamation forsake him, and giue good testimony that they are no enemies to the Romish, Catholike, and Apostolike Religion, nor to the king of Spaine. This Ediēt was made in March, and proclaimed in all the Low Country townes vnder the kings obedience.

King of Spaine
proclaims war against the French.

F In the yeare one thousand siue hundred ninetie and sixe, the king of Spaine made an ediēt, complaining that the reuenues of his crowne and the treasure which came yearly from the Indies, were consumed by reason of his great charges, for the defence of his Estates, and of all Christendome, imputing the cause to the great interest which he paid for the exchange of money, and vpon other contrasts made with the Merchants in his Majesties name, so as in a manner all his receipts and reuenues were A a a a a

1596
King of Spaine
breakes with the Merchants.

ingaged

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

ingaged to others, being without any treasure to supply his wants, for that the G Bankers (who had been accustomed to furnish him by exchange) made now some difficultie to deale any farther, hauing in a manner all the reuenues of his Crowne in their possession: for the preventing of which inconuenience, hee found no better meanes than to repaire the treasure, and to free it from the wrongs it hath suffered by interests, which hee hath allowed in his contraction, to auoid greater danger which might grow by the want of meanes, to supply the necessities of the warre, the which his meaning was to prevent by these meanes, being impossible to vse any other vpon those occasions: wherefore (to cut off the said interests) his meaning was to resume vnto himselfe all the assignements which hee had giuen vnto any Merchants and Bankers, for what summes or contracts fouer, which haue bene made by his commandement, since the decree made by him the first of September, one thousand five hundred seuentie and siue, and the first of December one thousand five hundred seuentie and seuen, vnto the twentieth of Nouember this yeare one thousand five hundred nintie and siue, which assignations hee suspended, so as the Merchants might not receiue them, but the reuenues should be brought into his Coffers, and all contracts for interest should cease, as done by his expresse commandement, by his royall Councell in this behalfe, as done by his expresse commandement.

Merchants
breake by re-sion of the Edict

This Edict being published, it bred a strange alteration among the Merchants in Spaine, Italie, and the Low-Countries. The Cardinall Albertus hauing taken vp money at Andwerp for the payment of the armie, and sent his bills of exchange into Spaine, they were not accepted, but sent backe againe and protested, which was a blemish to his credit, and made many merchants to breake, imputing the cause vnto the Edict.

Titles forbidden in Italie.

The corruption of titles being brought out of Spaine into Italie, men honouring one another in their speaking and writing with affected courtesies in such sort, as they found not titles sufficient to satissie their arrogant ambition, so as to tearme meane men, most worthy or excellent (which was due to Soueraigne Princes) they held it no flatterie, the which was growne so familiar among all sorts of people, as euen base and obscure men did arrogate it: the king hauing made a prouision in Spain some yeares before for this abuse, this yeare Henry de Guzman Earle of Olis Spain, being Viceroy of Naples, did send downe an order for that realme, the which was in some sort obserued in the Duchie of Milan; ordaining that in their letters there should bee no title of courtesie giuen to any but onely the dignitie which hee held, as to the Duke, Prince, Marquesse, Earle or Doctor, such a one, taking away all superfluitie or suspicion of flatterie, as well within as without the said letters: the which was rigorously obserued in the Realm of Naples. But the Court of Rome and the Clergie men, disliking to receiue a law from any other than from the Pope, would not suffer it to be obserued.

Inundation of the river of Guadalquivir.

The King of Spaine being desirous to be reuenged of the spoiles which the English made daily, as well in Spaine as in his other dominions, gathered all his sea-forces together, in the beginning of this yeare one thousand five hundred nintie and siue, appointing the Rendes-vous to bee at Seuille, but this sudden preparation was disturbed by diuers accidents. The first was the strange swelling and overflowing of the River of Guadalquivir, to the great spoile of the neighbour Countie, for passing over her banks, there were many persons drowned, with much cattel, and very many buildings overthrowne; but the greatest losse was at Seuille, in which port there lay many Ships of the Fleet, they were staied long from making of their preparations. And in the meane time, whilst they proceeded slowly in this action, according to the custome of that nation, who persuaide themselves to doe great matters with fame onely, and repose the chiefe of their most important enterprises, in tying the enimie, and consuming him at leysure, the English armie appeared vpon their coast, as you shall heare.

Armie of English for Spaine.

The charge of the English fleet and armie was giuen to the Lord Charles Howard, high Admirall of England (who at his returne from that seruice, was by the Queenes Maiestie

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A Maiestie made Earle of Nottingham) and to the Earle of Essex, being ioyned together in Commission. Being vpon their going from the coast of England, they did publish in print in severall languages, the true, iust, and virgent reasons which had moued her Maiestie to vndertake the sending forth of so great an Nauie, with a full declaration of her Majesties pleasure, and so they set saile from Plymouth vpon the third of Iune, this yeare, the whole English fleet consisting of some hundred ships of all sorts, the which was diuided into foure squadrons; of the which the Lord Admirall commanded the first, the Earle of Essex the second; the Lord Thomas Howard (now Earle of Suffolke) the third, and Sir Walter Rawleigh the fourth.

B On the tenth of Iune this fleet got sight of Caliz, or Cadiz, in Andalusia, but they kept not the order appointed for their coming in, by reason of the mistaking of their masters and their falling in the night with the West, sooner than they expected, which made them stand vpon another boord, and had somewhat disordered their fleet. The Lord Admirall (one of the Generals) was with the greatest part of the fleet ahead to the Windward of the other. Generall the Earle of Essex and his Squadron, the wind being then at South; Sir Walter Rawleigh was by reason of some chase in the night to Leeward, and afterne.

English fleet
enters into Caliz, toade

C The Spaniards which were to the number of fiftie and seuen saile, rod vnder the Towne of Caliz and the Gallies being seuentene lay in the mouth of the Bay, to couer the ships and to attend the landing of the English: The Lord Admirall came to an anchor before the Southwest point of the Iland, called Saint Sebastians, the Earle of Essex fecing the Gallies rowe towards the landing place which hee had chosen, bore with them vntill hee made them leaue their course, and then loost vp, and came with his Squadron to another anchor by the Lord Admirall, which the rest of the fleet fecing, came all vnto them, only the Lord Thomas Howard in the Sea-honor anchored between them and the shoare. The Generals called a Councell, where it was ioynly agreed vpon by them that their men should be landed, and the Town presently attempted on the West side, which was next to the anchoring, for which purpose the Earle of Essex Lord Generall, Sir Francis Vere Lord Marshall, and Sir Coniers Clifford Sergeant Maior, went to draw together as many souldiers and Gentlemen as their boats could wel carrie at once: which being done, and all their boats about the Lord Admiralls ship, Sir Walter Rawleigh (who was but then arrived in the Due Repulse) came and protested against their landing, holding the attempt to be dangerous, and the performance (as the wind blew and billowe went) impossible, for indeed it was growne to a storme, whereupon it was resolved that the souldiers should bee returned to their ships, and the Spanish fleet first assailed, according to Sir Walter Rawleighs aduice.

It was past noone before this later resolution was taken, and more than two houres after before the Souldiers could bee carried backe vnto their Shippes, some of their boates miscarrying before they could recouer their shippes; which being done, my Lord Thomas Howard weighed anchor first, to giue the other ships scope to cast about; then the rest of their principall ships, as they could get leaue of the smaller Vessels which rodde close by them, who also put themselves vnder saile; but the winde was so strong, and in such a place, as most of their ships had bene driuen too farre to leeward, if they had not come to anchour, which the chiefe leaders perceiving, they came to a roade: Besides, the Sunne being not verie high, they thought that the bringing in of so great a fleet towards night, would fo disorder them, as the attempt should bee made to their great disadvantage. So as the first day there was nothing executed by reason of these accidents. Onely, in the evening from the Bulwarke called Saint Philip, from the Ships of warre which lay at Anchor, and from the Gallies which did aduance a little towards them, some few Canon shot were bestowed vpon the Due Repulse, who answered them with the like, especially against the Gallies, when they approached, to make them know the English could entertaine them, if they came on.

F That night the gallies coasting by the shore, betwixt S. Mary Port & Rotta, came to obserue what order was kept by the reuerward of the English fleet, but they were soon turned backe.

A a a a a i j.

backe. On Munday early in the morning, there was a Councell held aboard the Lord Admirals Shippe, where it was resolved to weigh anchor presently, and to assaile the Spanish fleet, the which was accordingly performed, after this manner. The Lord Thomas Howard, and Sir Walter Rawleigh (for so the Generall had appointed it) bare right in the middell of the Chanell with the kings great ships which retired before them, scornning to bestowe a shot on the gallies, which discharged their Canon as they passed by them. The Lord Marshall, being in the Raine-bow, looke vp the Gallies, which lay vp with their sternes close vnder the Towne, and kept their prowes towards the Ships that should passe by them: The Rainebow was a good while in fight, before that any other ship came vnto her, and was plyed with shot both from the gallies and from the Towne.

The Earle seeing her so ouer-matched, made haste vnto her, and so making the enimie a fairer mark than the Rainebow (which was a farre lesser ship) cald her of many blowes. Some other ships shot, but farther off, and to lesse purpose. This encounter with the Gallies, was a verie great advantage vnto the enemy, they hauing so many to so fewe, for in effect these two ships aboue mentioned performed this whole seruice. Besides, there were two Bulwarkes of the Towne on their side: all which notwithstanding, the Gallies were forced to tie before them into the Baie, two onely except, which Sir John Wingfield, coming then vp in the Vanguard, did keep so in as they durst not looke out.

During the fight with the Gallies, the wind calmed, and the English fleet went slowly ahead, most of the Spanish ships neuer staied vntill they came to Portreal which is the furthest part of the Bay, the ships moued themselves with their broad sides towards the English, that they might fight to their greater advantage. The English masters of ships were generally of opinion, that they could not go neer without danger of running on ground; the which did much trouble the forwardnesse of the chiefe Commanders of the foremost ships, led by the Lord Thomas Howard, and Sir Walter Rawleigh, whose desire being to draw as neere the enemy as they might, were notwithstanding inforced to come to anchor without the reach of Musket shot, and to attend the flood, where they fought with perpetual volleys of the Canon, from fixe in the morning to eleuen of the clocke: the ships that followed them neere were commanded by Sir Francis Vere, Lord Marshall, Sir George Carew, now Lord Carew, Vice-admirall of Sir Walter Rawleighs Squadron, and Generall of the artillerie, by Sir Robert Dudley, Vice-admirall of the Lord Admirals Squadron, by Sir Robert Southwell, Vice-admirall of the Lord Thomas Squadron, by Sir Robert Croffe, the Earle of Suffex being aboard him, and by Sir George Offord. The Earle of Essex and the Lord Admirall came vp an houre before the flood, hauing bene all that morning soundly battered by the forts of Cadiz: And for that the Atke drew too much water for the narrownesse of the Chanell, where those ships did ride, who also took vp the whole breadth of the riuer, the Lord Admirall put himselfe into the Lord Thomas Howards ship.

When the flood beganne to swell, the Lord Thomas and Sir Walter Rawleigh determined to lay the Armadoes aboard with the Queenes ships, (for the hulkes filled with Muskietiers, which were promised, came not) but as soone as Soto the Spanish Admirall perceived that the said Leaders beganne to hoyle their top-sailes, they presently cut their Cables by the halfe, and draue ashore, sauing as many of themselves as they could carrie at once in their boates; of the rest some were slaine in the furie, and the rest taken to mercie.

The Admirall of the Spaniards called the Philip, a goodlie and a powerfull ship, tooke fire before she could be entred, by an inch of a match fired, and laied in the mouth of a barrell of powder in her gunner roome: But the Lord Thomas Howard and Sir Walter Rawleigh saued the Mathew and Andrew, Viceadmirall and Rereadmirall of the Spanish fleet, the other ships were set on fire by certain Negroes, who leapt into the riuer and saued themselves by swimming.

The India fleet of merchants being about 40 saile, were gotten vp 4 English miles into the riuer; for the redemption of which the K. officers in Cadiz offered the English 600 thousand

Spanish ships vnto ground at Cadiz.

A thousand pounds sterling: The Earle of Essex was often prest to haue them first taken and then sold; but hee beleued that such as offered the composition had meant to buye the money from which hee could not bee dissuaded, vntill he saw the ships all in a flame, which the duke of Medina Sydonia commanded to bee done.

The number of the Spanish Fleet was fiftie seauen ships, foureteeen of the kings men of warre, (and three great Fly-boats which brought the Treasure from Portricco; the rest were Merchants, all faire ships, full of good ordnance, and richly laden than euer any Fleet was that went to the West Indies. Here also I should remember, that during the fight, the gallies and Fort of Pontall, plaied continually vpon the English ships.

The English hauing obtained this great victorie by Gods especiall fauor, the earle resolved to follow it with all possible expedition; and so immediately hee dispatched the Sergeant Maior to get as many Gentlemen and old souldiers into boates, as might well bee landed at once, which being performed, his Lordship and the Lord Marshall went to discouer the landing, and finding it good, he put betwixt two and three thousand men on land, returning the boates to fetch my Lord Admirall with his seconds.

These being put in battell, he commanded the Marshall to march directly with his regiment to the other side of the land, which was halfe a mile from their landing, his Lordship with the rest that were on shoare following him speedily. Beeing come to the Southside; the Earle diuided his troups equally, sending the one halfe with Sir Corniers Clifford, Sir Charles Blunt, and Sir Thomas Gerard, to breake downe a bridge called El Ponte del Suafio, at a streit, that keeps the passage from the maine; marching himselfe with the other halfe towards the Towne: the like directions hee gaue for the seconds, to bee equally diuided, and sent these two waies. When hee came within halfe a mile of the Towne, a cornet of horse, with some shot, made offer to skirmish; but they were soone put to flight: when they came within musket shot of the Towne, there sallied forth great troups both horse and foot, vnder fauor of their walls, with their Cornets and Ensignes, which the earle discouering from a little hill as they fell out of the towne, hee gaue direction to the foremost of the troups being some thirty pikes, and as many shot, to retire away as soone as the enimie offered to charge them, the which they did, giuing the enemy courage to come farther on than they first intended, but the English charged them so fast, as they had scarce time to recover the Port and shut it.

The Horsemen which sallied out of the Towne, were called the Knights of thires: they could not get into the Towne being so closely followed by the English foot; whereupon they forsook their horses, & leapt ouer the walls at the west corner, by which the English also entred. The English in pursuing the Spaniards staied not vntill they came to the foot of their foremost rampar; and then the Earle diuided his troups equally, consisting of twelue hundred men; keeping the one halfe with himselfe on the Southside of the Port, and sending the Marshall with the rest to the Northside. The Earle of Essex, on this side, with much ado found means for himselfe and some few others; to get vp, where he saw on the one side a Parapet of stone, almost inaccessible, for that neither the bulwark nor any part of the Courtine was finished. There the English did first beate the enemy from the Parapet, yet they lay open to another square bulwark of stone; which flanked them within a pikes length, but they durst not beate the bulwark with shot as the enimie did them little harme: Notwithstanding, considering that they must quit the place for that their men lay vncouered, the earle sought for an entrance, which being found, the leape downe being a pikes length, hee commanded one Ennis which stood next him, being Lieutenant to the Earle of Suffex to enter, which after hee and foure or five other souldiers more had done, the like charge was giuen to Captaine Pooley, who carried the Generals red Ensigne, whereupon Sir Arthur Savage, Captain of the Earles company, with diuers Gentlemen followers and seruants to his Lordship took the same course. In the mean time, whilst that thirtie or fortie were thus entred into the Towne, the Lord Marshall who besides his own soldiers, had with him the generals gard of Partizans, forced

English land at Cadiz.

Cadiz entered by the English.

forced the Port, which his Lordship espying, being not ten paces from it, hee presently turned from the leape, and entred that way, carrying with him all the chiefe Adventurers of the armie, and worthy Sir John Wingfield (who before had slaine a Commander of the enemies with his pike, and was cast behind) having a shot in the thigh, but having recovered one of the enemies horses, hee came vp presently to second them, not staying for any dressing.

From the entrance of the English into the Towne, vntill they came vnto the Market place, the enemy fought with them continually, and kept them play aboute halfe an houre before they could recover it, yet at the last having wonne the place from them, they notwithstanding so flanked it, and kept their houses (which were built like castles) as they slue many of the English, and among others that valiant gentleman Sir John Wingfield, who though vnarmed, offered himselfe continually to all daungers, so as hee was shot in the head from the castle which did continually play vpon those that made good this market place.

At length they got into the houses which annoyed them, and slue those they found in them: And as the Lord Generall before it was darke cleared all thereabouts, but the castle, or that which they call the vpper Towne, so the Lord Marshall cleared all the other side towards the water, and brought those that were in the Fort and Bulwarke of Saint Philip, to sue for mercie: which done, the Generals entred the Towne-house, whither all the chiefe citizens came to kisse their feet.

The next morning, both the Castle and forts yielded to their mercie, without any other conditions. The poore and baser sort were dismissed, and all women of qualitie whatsoever. The Corregidor deliuered his sword vnto the Generall, offering to bee his prisoner, and to giue for himselfe and some others of good place twelve thousand ducats: no man was slaine vpon cold blood: it was held there were about two thousand Spaniards slaine in the furie of the fight.

Besides the chiefe Commanders of the armie, who had giuen many proofs of their valor and experience in martiall affairs, there were many gallant gentlemen which seemed worthily in this action, whome in the end the Generall rewarded with the honour of knight-hood. I may not forget to make particular mention of Sir Samuel Baguel who received eight wounds with the pike, and sword, whome the Lord Generall (meeting in the market place all bloudie) knighted, to the encouragement of all others, before that either the castle was taken in, or the whole Towne wonne.

The towne was verie rich, and did much enrich the armie, but the worthiest men got least, for they were fighting, whilst the baser sort intended nothing but pillage, and spoyle. There was good store of brass ordnance, and though no great, yet very happy store of powder, for the English having not about twelve hundred men, their powder was spent, and they were overlaid on all sides, with the number of the enemies shot, who hurt and slue their men from the houses: when they had made them quit the streets, they found by chance by the market place, such powder as they had brought for their owne defence, and the supply of their men that should fight there, with the which they secured their turnes, till their succours were entred and the Towne assured.

The Promissions of Sea for the kings fleet, as masts, pike-staves, deale-boards, caske, and all kinde of shot, cables, anchors, wine, oyle, vinegar, rice, figs, and such like things, wert of great value, and will not be supplied by the king of Spain in many years. And as for his losse in shipping, the kings Officers of his naue, who wert then taken prisoners, did protest with sighes and teares, that nineteene of the ships which they had spoiled, with the S. Mathew and Saint Andrew, which they had taken, were able to beat the greatest part of ships that the king hath in all the world. So as laying together the ruining of the Kings Fleet, the enioying of some of his great ships of warre, which before had neuer beene done, the burning of the Indian fleet of Merchants, whose lading the prisoners confest to haue beene worth eight Millions; the impeaching him to send that yeare to releue his men at the West-Indies, and so by consequence to receive no treasure from thence the next yeare; the taking of the Citie, wherein were foure thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse beset at Cadix.

King of Spaine

A horse of the chiefe cavaliers of Andalusia; the sacking of this place, from whence he is to set out all his fleets for the West Indies, and the spoyle of all his prouisions there: All this, I say, layed together, will proue one of the greatest blowes that euer Spaine received. Yet all this was done in one day, and without any great losse; for in the whole fleet there was not any man of note, but Sir John Wingfield, slaine. At the assault and winning of the towne many gentlemen were hurt, and some slaine; and yet not many, considering the strength of the place, and the nature of the attempt.

As soone as the English fleet was entred into the road, and that the Spaniards had discovered the Dutch Squadron in the fight, immediately, both at Seuille, Saint Lucar, and some other places, they did not onely arrest all such Dutch ships as dealt with them friendly by way of trade and marchandise, but did confiscat their goods, and did imprison the marchants and owners of the same, and, as it was reported, did intreat many of them verie cruelly.

The English being masters of the towne of Cadiz, the two Generals had an especial care for the well-intreating of all religious persons, both men and women, whom they caused to be freely transported out to port. Santa Maria, without any ranfome or other molestation; and, giuing the bishop of Cusco free passage without ranfome, they let him vnderstand, that they came not to deal with Church-men, or vnarmed men, and men of peace, or with children; neither was it their intent to make this voyage for gold, siluer, or any other riches; but that their onely coming was to meet with their dishonourable practices, and many injuries, and to deale with men of warre and valour, for the defence of the truchonour of England; and to let them vnderstand, that whensoever they attempted any base and dishonourable practise against their Soueraigne Queen and Mistresse, that it should be reuenged.

The day before the English departed from Cadiz, being the fifth of Iulie, the citie was burnt, the Ladies, Nunner, and other women and children, being safely sent to Saint Marie port, with their apparell and jewels, euery man being forbidden to search them vpon paine of death.

I have thought good to annexe vnto the end of this relation, for a remembrance to posteritie, the names of such as received the Order of Knighthood from the Generals, as a testimonie of their well deserving in this worthe action.

Sir Samuel Baguel.	Sir Christopher Heydani.
Sir Arthur Savage.	Sir Francis Bopham.
The Earle of Suffex.	Sir Philip Woodhouse.
The Lord Burke.	Sir Alexander Clifford.
Cont Lodowike.	Sir Maurice Berkeley.
Sir William Broward.	Sir Charles Blunt.
Sir George Dinnocce.	Sir George Clifford.
Sir Henrie Neneh.	Sir Robert Crosse.
Sir Edwin Rich.	Sir James Hildemare.
Sir Richard Leuen.	Sir Philip Leigh.
Sir Peter Egmont.	Sir John Leigh alias Lee.
Sir Anthonie Ashley.	Sir Richard Weston.
Sir Henrie Leonard.	Sir Richard Wainman.
Sir Richard Lewison.	Sir James Weston.
Sir Horatia Pore.	Sir Richard Ruddle.
Sir Arthure Throgmorton.	Sir Robert Almon.
Sir Miles Corbet.	Sir William Almon.
Sir Edward Cynoy.	Sir John Bomes.
Sir Oliver Lambert.	Sir Edward Bomes.
Sir Anthonie Cooke.	Sir Humphrey Druel.
Sir John Towne.	Sir Amias Preston.

Names of such as were knighted at Cadix.

The generall Historie of Spaine:

Lib. 31.

Sir Robert Rowington.
Sir John Bucke.
Sir John Morgan.
Sir John Adridge.
Sir John Aschenden.
Sir Mathew Browne.
Sir John Allon.
Sir Thomas Gates.
Sir Gille Merritt.
Sir Thomas Smith.
Sir William Pooley.

Sir Thomas Palmer.
Sir John Stafford.
Sir Robert Louch.
Sir John Gilbert.
Sir William Harney.
Sir John Gray.
D. Christopher prince of Portugal.
Sir John Fanderburgh, Ad-mirall of the Hollanders.
Sir Robert Dudley.

8 August.

Thus this triumphant English armie left Cadiz, hauing received from the duke of Medina Sidonia nine and thirte English prisoners, which had bene slaues in the Spaniards hands: Which done, they past along the coast of Portugall, they tooke, spoiled, and burnt Farol, they march into the country thereabouts after which full they shaped their course for England.

Farol burnt by the English.

Hauing done this great affront to the king of Spaine, they left him full of rage, and desire of reuenge: whereupon presently after the retreat of the English, he gaue commandement to the Adelantado of Castille, to prepare a mightie fleet; wherein he employed great care and diligence, so as it was ready the same yeare. But this fleet had a farr different successe to that of England. It consisted of fourescore ships; which went out of Lisbon the eighth of October 1596: They coasted along Gallicia, to goe and ioyne with the Generall of Biscaye, where they had leuied some troups of souldiers: the Adelantado comming to double cap S. Vincent in the night, it seemes he mistooke his reckoning, and fell short of the cap, where they were taken with a cruell storme; in the which fise and foure of their ships were cast away, on Symon and Iudas day; and the rest were so shaken with the storme, as they had great difficultie to saue them: so as their enterprise ended vaine that yeare.

Fleet of Spaine, and prepared against England.

Spanish fleet cast away.

Canonization of S. Raymond desired by the Spaniards.

This yeare also they treated in Spaine of the canonizing of blessed S. Raymond, the which was afterwards effected at Rome. They renewed their suit vnto the Pope; which had bin made many yeares before to diuers of his predecessors. After that instance had bin made vnto his Holinesse by the rowines of the realme of Arragon; who had sent Paul Costabile, Generall of the preaching friers of which Order S. Raymond had bene also Generall, the Pope hauing pronounced that they should passe on to perfect this businesse, the Archbishop of Tarazona came to Barcelona with two bishops, and the Proctor generall of S. Dominicke, to renew Saint Raymond's boile: the which was done with great ceremonie, and authentical writings sent to Rome to prosecute the rest. About the same time Luca Calanconi, Chamberlaine to the Pope, armed, being sent with two cardinals hats by him, to Francis d'Avila, Archdeacon of Toledo, and to Francisco Nugnes de Guevara, President of the royall Council, who had bene newly created cardinals, being exhorted by his Holinesse to passe vnto Rome, as they did that Winter: so as in the beginning of the next yeare they came into Italie, hauing a good opportunitie to passe in those galleys which were come from Genoua; whither the duke of Medici should also haue gone, being appointed by the king to be Viceroy of Sicile: but he was stayed many monethes by some sinister accidents. And there arrived also Alphonse Cariglia, who required a great aid of money for the price of Transylvania; to maintain the warre against the Turke, who sought the king verie well affectedly notwithstanding that hee was enforced to maintain warre in those places, to his exceeding great voyle and charge. Yet he satisfied that princes desire with a bountifull hand, and gaue free libertie to the Popes Agents, to buy a quantitie of corn in his realmes, to serue the state of the Church. And then about the end of September, the Indian fleet arrived safely at Seuille, being verie rich, the which did much comfort the Spaniards after the great losses they had sustai-

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

A sustained by the English armie. There was nothing did more afflict the minds of the Spaniards, than their hatred and disdain of the English, being not able to endure, not only to be troubled in their traffique to the Indies, and their rich fleets to be layd for, piercing euen into the heart of America, but also to invade the continent of Spaine with a royall armie, and to land there by by force, incounting, spoiling, and burning their ships euen in their ports. Being therefore tormented with a desire of reuenge, and grieved that the last yeares fleet, being ruined by tempest, could not effect what they had designed, there was a new order giuen, that many galleons should bee armed, and new troups of souldiers should bee leuied, not onely in Spaine, but also in Italie.

B The king therefore, touching matters of warre, gaue an extraordinary authoritie to the Cont Fuentes, who was newly returned from the gouernement of Flanders: They caused all ships of foreine countries to be stayed within their ports; with an intent to make vse of them in this armie: but the king falling verie sicke, this preparation was somewhat stayed, they being doubtfull of his life, both in respect of his great age, and the violence of his infirmities. And so the souldiers which were leuied for this seruice, were sent to lodge, some in Gallicia, and some in Biscaye, to bee fully imbarked when time should serue.

1597

Spaniards concerned against the English.

Preparation in Spaine for a new armie.

The important cause concerning Marchants and Bankers, was now in question in Spaine; they hauing for many yeares furnished the king with money for his warres in Flanders, and other places, a businesse which troubled all the Bankes of Europe, as one depends vpon another, with their subalternall credits and interests. Wherefore some princes were moued by an act of true bountie, to help their subjects that were marchants, least they should faile in their credit. Besides the kings souldiers being, by reason thereof, in great want, they fell to mutinies. In this businesse therefore of so great importance, and wherein the king pretended to bee defrauded in diuers manners, of many hundred thousands of crowns, this controuersie with the kings officers was long and tedious, the marchants at the last being well content to come to any reasonable agreement; the which at the length was made about the end of this yeare. And for that it had been discovered, that Girolamo Lomellini had sent great summes of money into Fraunce, the which had bene verie prejudiciall vnto Spaine, and forbidden, by reason of the warre which continued yet with France, he was subject to arigorous punishment.

Controuersie in Spaine touching the Bankers.

There fell out a great accident in the Venetian embassadours palace at Madrid, whose name was Augustine Nani, a man of great judgement, and of a generous spirit, in maintaining the dignitie of that charge which hee held nere the king: The Prouost Marshall of the cite would haue apprehended one who had retired into his palace, flying from the Sergeant which followed him, hoping hee should be safe there, as in a place of franchise, according to the vse of Courts: the Prouost carrying himselfe too imperiously (as such people are accustomed to doe) a gentleman of the embassadours, of the house of Bachero, and his Secretarie, comming at this noyse, could not endure it; so as from great words they fell to deeds, and the Prouosts wand was broken (the which they are accustomed to carrie, as a marke of their authoritie) with other accidents; so as most of the embassadours familie came running at the noyse: whereupon the kings officers complained. But matters were afterwards tempered by the king, with the equitie and respect which ought to bee had to the accident and person. Yet the State of Venice, being willing to take away all causes of distast, that might grow, made a speedie election of a new embassadour, which was Francis Soranzo; but hee past not into Spaine vntill the next yeare, all shadowes of dislike being in the meane time vanished away, taking all occasions to shew mutuall kindnesse betwixt them and the embassadour Nani, who was extraordinarily fauoured by the king and prince; and at his departure hee was made a knight, and honoured with rich presents.

Quarrels in the Venetian embassadours house.

F They were verie carefull this yeare in Spaine, to prevent the English, least they should haue some new opportunitie to annoy them, as they had done at Cadiz; which cite and castle they did fortifie better, with all other places vpon the coast, the earle of Fuentes lying continually towards the sea with great forces, and hauing good garrisons in the coast townes, hee sent his horsemen to runne along the coast, that they might bee free from feare.

1397

Marriage of the prince of Spain published.

And for that the king of Spaine, by the continuall indisposition of his bodie, the great trouble of his mind, hauing such a world of weightie affaires, could not hope for any long life, he sought to provide for the future gouernement of his subiects. Wherefore he did publish the future marriage of his sonne D. Philip vnto the eldest daughter of Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, whom some call Gregoria Maximiliana, others Marie. But whilest they made preparation for the solemnitie of this marriage, and sent to the Pope for dispensations, as well for this, as for the future marriage betwixt the Archduke Albert, and the Infanta D. Isabella, they had newes that the sayd princeesse was suddenly dead, hauing left the greatnesse of this world, to attaine vnto a better life in heauen.

Preparation for the island voyage.

The fortunat successe of the English the last yeare at Cadiz, hauing affronted the king of Spaine at his owne doores, gaue them courage to make new attempts this yeare, and to send forth a goodlie fleet to sea, vnder the command of the earle of Essex, who was both Admirall at sea, and Generall of the land forces. This fleet consisted of an hundred and twentie saile, whereof there were threescore men of warre, the rest were victuallers, and ships for transportation of souldiers, and to attend the English fleet. The Estates of the vnited Prouinces sent ten tall flie-boates vnder the command of Monsieur de Daniard. This fleet was victualled for three monethes, with large allowance, with a supplie of apparell for the mariners and souldiers. It was diuided into three Squadrons: the Admirals Squadron, the Lord Thomas Howards Squadron, who was Vice-admirall, and Sir Walter Rawleighs Squadron, being Rere-admirall. The Netherland flie-boates were commaunded by their owne Admirall. There were six thousand souldiers appointed for the land seruice, with ten peeces of ordnance for the field and batterie, with all necessarie prouisions. And there were in this fleet about fure hundred voluntaries, of knights and gentlemen. The chiefe Commanders of these land forces, were, the Earle of Essex Generall, the Lord Montjoy his Lieutenant generall, Sir Francis Vere Marshall of the field, Sir George Carew Master of the ordnance, Sir Ferdinando Gorge, Sergeant Major of the armie, Sir Christopher Blunt Colonell generall of the foot, with all other officers necessarie in such an action. In all this great fleet there were not aboue eighteen or twentie ships of her Majesties royall Nasie, the names of which, and of the Captaines that commaunded in them, I leaue to a particular discourse written of this voyage, by a worthie knight, who was an eye witnesse, and an actor in it; the which I hope hee will suffer to cometo the presse.

Designes of the English fleet.

This goodlie armie being readie, it seemed they had three seuerall designes, to defeat the king of Spaine fleet, commaunded by D. Martin de Padiglia, earle of S. Gadea, and Adelantado Major of Castille, if they met it at sea, or to rume it in the harbour of Farol, if they found it there; and to take all fleets of treasure, or any East or West Indian ships they should find at sea, in the way to Spaine: and lastly, that they would take the island of the Terceres, which they held to bee an action of great importance. With this resolution they put to sea with this gallant fleet; but neither of these enterprises succeeded: for bending their course directly for Farol, they were in-countred with verie stormie weather, and contrarie windes, so as the whole fleet was scattered, and many of the shippes in verie great danger, a great part of the fleet being forced to put backe againe into Plymouth. The shippe wherein the Generall was, had a verie dangerous leake, and her mastes crackt in diuers places; yet hee held it out as long as possibly hee could, till in the end her vpper workes gaue way, and her maine beames did reare, so as they looked hourly when the Oretoppe would fall, and the ordnance sinke downe into the Keele. Whereupon hee was forced to put backe to Plymouth, where hee found a great part of the

1397

A the fleet. There they repaired their shippes, and the earle tooke another, his owne being made vnseruiceable: But they were kept in by continuall stormes and contrarie windes, vntill their three monethes victuals was in a manner spent, and the sicknesse growne great in the flie boats which carried the land armie. Whereupon the Generall had order to discharge his land forces, all but a thousand old souldiers which had bene drawne out of the Low Countries; so as they were made vnable to land any forces at Farol. After which there was a project made by the earle, to send in certaine ships of fire, and to burne the king of Spaines fleet as it should lye in the harbour, without any danger to the queenes ships. Which counsell being allowed of at Court, they put the second time to sea. But some of good judgement in the fleet, held this exploit vnseable, they hauing not sufficient forces to performe it; neither could they attempt it without apparent daunger, as indeed it succeeded not; for that the Saint Mathew, one of the chiefe ships which should haue bene employed in that action, had lost her fore-mast, and was put backe into England, as they pretended: So as hauing no meanes to doe any seruice vpon the fleet at Farol, they concluded for the intercepting of the Indian fleet, and defeating of the Adelantado, if he did put to sea: for there was no meanes to take in the island of Tercera, their land forces being discharged. Whereupon they shaped their course for the islands, where they layed wait for the Indian fleet; but they escaped them, and got into Tercera road. What the reasons of the missing of this Indian fleet were, and what was else done at the islands by this armie, I leaue to an ample relation of him who was an eye witnesse, and did well obserue it. And so, hauing failed in all their designes, this fleet returned home into England.

The Spaniards did inlike manner arme. There was the regiment of Alexander de Monti, consisting of 15 companies, imbarcked at Naples, the which had like to haue bene cast away in a storme vpon the coast of Romania. In the end they came to Genoua, and there joyined with the troups of Gambalaita, all which were transported into Spaine in Doria's galleys, passing from Barcelona to Cadiz, where a part of the fleet lay: there they imbarcked their land forces in certaine galleons, being six thousand Italians, going towards the Groine, with an intent (being joyined with the Adelantado, and the rest of the fleet) to make some attempt vpon England. But on the eight of September they had so cruell a storme, as they were scattered from their Admirall, and in exceeding great daunger, whereof some were cast away. A galleon, wherein Alexander de Monti was, and some of his companies, hauing lost her maine mast, was driuen to the Canaries, and after that to the coast of Africke, hauing lost his pilot with most of his mariners: there he ran her on ground, and recovered Mazagon, where he furnished himselfe of all that hee wanted; and then he past towards the strait, meeting with an English ship, which fought long with him; but in the end he tooke her: Then joyning with D. Pedro de Toledo, with some other vessels, they scoured the coast of Barbarie, securing the coasts of Spaine, and in the end they came to winter in Saint Marie port. The rest of this Spanish fleet, after this cruell storme, for the most part, recovered Farol. Thus both fleets this yeare, without any fruit, put themselves to the hazard of the sea, and receiued great losses.

The warres hauing continued long betwixt France and Spaine, many princes desired to see the miseries of Christendome at an end. Pope Clement the eight as much affecting this generall peace as any of his predecessors, considering the great miseries which the diuisions of the French and Spaniards did cause, and that the Turke made his profit thereof, and had inroached farre into Christendome, hee resolved to reconcile these two kings of Spaine and France. Father Bonauenture Callagiro, a Sicilian borne, Generall of the Franciscanes (and whil after wards was made Patriarke of Constantinople) was sent by him into Spaine; vnder colour to visit the Convents of his Order, but in effect it was to found king Philip whether he had any inclination to a peace with France: where hee found all things well disposed, and the Spaniards desirous to change the doubtfull events of a troublefome warre, with the assured and more profitable effects of peace; his old age, his son young, whom he desired to make, and to leaue him his Estates quiet, his eldest daughter, to whom he would give the Low Countries, marrying her to cardinal Albert of Austria, who like new Lords should haue need of the loue and good neigh-

Spaniards preparation at sea.

*Mediation for a peace betwixt France and
Spaine.*

neighbourhood of a French king, the French being vnited, and their ciuile warres ended, they were likely to transport the warre into his countries; having taken Amiens by force, euen in view of his armie. All these considerations made the king of Spaine incline to a peace, not onely with the French, but with the Queene of England and the vnited Prouinces of the Netherlands. Calatagiron being returned to Rome, assured the Pope that hee had found a disposition and desire of peace in king Philip, and that hee was wearie of the warres. So the Pope continuing in this good desire, sent this Franciscan into France, to perswade the king to peace and friendship with the king of Spaine. Alexander cardinall of Florence, his Holinesse Legat in France, understanding the Popes pleasure, together with Calatagiron, perswaded the king to yeeld vnto a peace. And on the other side, by the exhortations of the Patriarke Caietan, his Holinesse Nuncio at Madrid, the king of Spaine referred the whole treatie of the said peace to his nephew cardinall Albert.

Whilest that Calatagiron went to Brussels, to sollicite the cardinall to send the deputies to Veruins, the French king aduertised all his allies, to the end they might be comprehended in this accord with the Spaniard, if they thought good. The queene of England (who had more annoyed the Spaniard than all the princes of Christendome) refused to be comprehended in the accord, and so did the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, who sent their embassadours to the French king, to dissuade him from a peace with the Spaniard. The king of Spaine did greatly desire a peace with them, and sought it by the meanes of his kinsmen and allies, who, at his request, sent their embassadours to that end into England, and the vnited Prouinces, but without effect. The king of Spaine hearing of all their answers, and being out of hope of a peace with the English and Hollanders, caused them to proceed in the treatie with the French: whereupon the deputies of either king came to Veruins: Who having long disputed, and being often ready to breake off, almost in despair, in the end a peace was concluded, in Iune this year 1598. The deputies for the French king were, Monfieur de Belieuue, Counsellor of State, and Monfieur de Syllyer, Counsellour also of State, and President of the Court of Parliament at Paris: And for the Catholike king, John Richardot knight, President of his priuie Councell, John Baptiste Taxis, Commaunder of los Santos, of the Order of Saint James, and of his Councell of State and warre, and Lewis Verreichen knight, chiefe Secretarie and Treasorer of the Charters of the said Councell of State: who according to their Commissions concluded in the name of the said kings.

That the treatie of peace made at Castle Cambresis, in the year 1559, betwixt the kings of France and Spaine, should be newly confirmed and obserued.

That all hostilitie and quarels should cease, with promise not to annoy nor prejudice one another.

That their subjects should haue free traffique.

That all places taken since the treatie of Castle Cambresis, should bee restored of either part within two monethes.

That the said kings and the Infanta of Spaine, referred vnto themselves all the rights, actions, and pretensions, by reason of the said reahns, countries, or seignories, whereunto they or their predecessors haue not exprelly renounced, to make their pursuit by some friendlie course, or by iustice, and not by armes.

The force and life of king Philip began to decline, which he foreseeing, hee was desirous to effect the promise which he had made to the Archduke Albert, his nephew, and if the marriage betwixt him and the Infanta Isabella his daughter were not consummated, yet they might be assured by the cession of the prouinces, which he meant to make in fauour of it. Whereupon, the sixt of May, he caused to be read at Madrid (in the presence of prince Philip his only son, who was then about 20 yeres old, of D. Gomes d'Avila, marques of Vellada, Lord Steward of the princes house, D. Christopher de Mera, carle of Castell, Roderigo, great Commaunder of the Alcantara; D. Iohn d'Albuquerque, great Commaunder of Leon, all three Counsellours of State, and Nicholas Dancant, knight, President and Chauncellour of Brabant, with la Loa, Secretaris of the affaires of the Low Countries) the contract, by the which he did institute the future spouses, and their heires, of what

A of what sexe soeuer, soueraigne Lords of all the Prouinces of the Low-countries, of the franche countie of Bourgondie, and of the countie of Charolois, with condition that the donation and cession should be void, and of no force, in case the marriage were not accomplished. That the eldest of the lawfull children issuing of this marriage, should be preferred before the younger, and the male the female, jointly in all the Prouinces, without any diuision: That for want of lawfull heires it should retume to the Crowne of Spaine: And that they should not alienate any part thereof without the consent of the heires and successors of the king of Spaine. That the Princess, heire of the Netherlands, being a maiden or widow, should marrie the king of Spaine, or the prince his Sonne; and if shee haue neither will nor power to doe it with the Popes dispensation, shee shall not take any aliance but with the consent of the kings of Spaine: And so of the heires and descendents of the future Spouses. That all negotiation and traffick to the East and West Indies shall bee forbidden them and their subiects. That the Arch-duke suruiuing the Infanta, hee should hold those Countries during his life. That hauing children, their portions should bee assigned them, vntill that the elder after the decease of the father should take possession of the whole. That onely the Catholike, Apostolike and Romish religion should bee maintained in the said Prouinces, and in case of contrauention by them or their descendents, they should lose their rights to the said Countries.

C Prince Philip did consequently ratifie this donation, more (as some thought) to please the king his father, than for any good liking hee had of it, for the deprived him of many goodlie and rich Prouinces: And the Infanta his Sister hauing accepted the transaction, sent her fathers and bothers letters Patents to the Gouernours and Councels of the Prouinces, with their letters which promised all assistance for the warre, and her owne which contained a declaration of this accord. Thus the Archduke, as the Historie saith, married a great Princess, a troublesome quarrell, and a long sure, all in one day. From which time shee did write vnto him, as a wife doth vnto her husband, taking vpon her the titles of all those Countries and Prouinces, and sending him a procurator to take possession in her name. The empress, mother to Albertus, and sister to the king of Spaine, receiued the promise of marriage for her Sonne, and did also make a promise in the name of the Archduke Albert.

The king of Spaine would moreover shew, that in giuing his daughter the Infanta to the Archduke, hee would not abandon them for want of money to continue the warre against the vnited Prouinces: hee made a new contract with Camillo, Soniolla, Maluenda and Grimaldi, to whom hee did reassigne and confirme the reuenues of Spaine, and reuoked the edict which had bene made at Pardo, vpon condition that for an ouerplus and new loane, they should furnish him with seuen millions and two hundred thousand ducats, paying euery month two hundred and fifty thousand ducats to the Archduke Albert to supply the charges of the low countrie warres, & that for the space of eighteen monethes, the first payment whereof should be due the last of Ianuarie, in the said year 1598, the whole summe for the Low countries amounting to foure millions and a halfe. The rest should be paid in Spaine, or where hee should command, after the rate of an hundred and fiftie thousand ducats monthly, for eighteen monethes together: both which parties amount to 7200000 ducats.

The king of Spaine sent in the beginning of this yere 4 thousand Spaniards, Besognes, into the Low countries, to fortifie the Archduke Albert, whose as it seemed did not greatly trust the Wallons. D. Sancho de Leua was their chiefe comstaunder ouer foure Colonels: they came by sea in 40 ships, the lesser got safely into Callice for that the Estates ships had bin forced by fowle weather to weigh anchor, yet they took one of the greatest, in the which was Alonso Sanchez of Villareal with 150 Spaniards, and made foure more to runne on ground to saue the soldiers.

The States of the vnited Prouinces, finding the number of their shipping to bee great, & that they wanted employment for them, not daring to traffick into Spaine, where their ships and goods were daily arrested, and their men imprisoned, whereby in time their Navigation would decay, they resolved to seeke their fortunes at the East

Bbbbbb

and

Articles of the cession.

Donation ratified by Prince Philip.

King of Spaine makes a new contract for the payment of his debts.

Spaniards sent into the Low-Countries.

Vnited Prouinces sail vnto the Indies.

Queene of England &amp; Estates of the Low Countries resist a peace with the Spaniard.

Peace betwixt Spaine and France.

Contents of the articles of the peace.

Cession of the Low Countries to the Infanta of Spaine.

M

sexe

Jabella, he would needs be carried thither, to seek a safe rampar, against the assaults which G an intestine warre was ready to giue him vpon the trouble some dissolution of the soule and bodie. He, whom Histories oblerue to haue beene greater than any one of his house, who without danger sitting in his Cabinet, hath disposed of more famous actions than any of his predecessors, finds now that the Soueraign Creator hath made the poorest cottager equal to the greatest king in many respects. He hath giuen them the earth for their abode, for they nurse and common mother, the same beginning of creation, one common heauen, one sunne, one Moone, the aire and water common; the soules of one and other haue one nature; they come all into the world naked alike, and all haue one issue out of this life. He finds now that death feares no guards; that he knocks as familiarly at Princes H Palaces, as at the cottages of poore Shepherds, hee laies hold of them, when as teares preuaile not, armes are of no force, prayers cannot moue him, nor presents corrupt him, the Philitions art cannot stay him, nor drugs and receits preuent his power: Yea, that sometimes he takes them away when they haue not leisure to deliuer their last will. Finally after this end they must all run one course, when as their bodies shall putrefie alike.

He had surmounted the crosses of fortune, and great accidents in his time, but hee could find no preferuatiue, to make him insensible of griefe. The gout, a feuer, a stithy Phthiriasis, an apostume on his right leg, foure other, wonderfull soule and stinking, on his breast, an infinit number of lice, breeding of that corrupt & stinking matter, & dispersing themselves ouer his whole bodie, gaue him to vnderstand, that nature could make a wretched Anatomie of his bodie, as well as of the meanest of his subjects. Being come to the Eccuriall, and his paines increasing, hee prepared himselfe for death, and after hee had receiued the Sacrament, hee desired to see D. Geracio of Loyola solemnly consecrated Archbishop of Toledo, by the Popes Legat, it being resigned vnto him by the Archduke Albert.

His feuer and infirmities increasing in the beginning of September, hee called for D. Philip his sonne, and the Infanta Jabella his daughter; where in the presence of the Archbishop of Toledo and some others, he shewed his body vnto the Prince, and said vnto him, Behold prince the greatest of this world, see this wretched carcasse, whereas all human help auails nothing. He then caused a brazen coffin to be brought, and a death head to be set vpon a cupbord with a Crowne of gold by it. He then commanded D. Lewis de Vago a gentleman of his Chamber to fetch a small Casket, wherein there was a rich Jewell, the which he gaue vnto his daughter in the Princes presence, saying, This Jewell was your mothers, keep it in remembrance of her. And forthwith he drew out a paper which he gaue vnto the Prince, saying, That it was an Instruction how he should governe his estate. After which, he drew forth a whip, at the end whereof appeared some markes of bloud, and holding it vp he said, that it was bloud of his bloud, although it were not his own bloud, but the emperor his fathers who had vsed it: which done hee disposed of the order of his funerals. After which, in the presence of the Popes Nuntio, he recommended the Sea of Rome, the Pope, and the Catholike Apostolike and Romish Religion to his children, desiring the Nuntio to giue him absolution of his finnes, & to blesse his children. He did recommend the Infanta vnto the Prince his Son, and the good estate of her Countries. He did not remember the children of D. Catherina duchesse of Sauoy his other daughter, to whom before she died he had bequeathed for a remembrance the picture of our Lady of Lorette. He was so resolute and ready to die, as his Confessor did with that hee might die of that disease, and in that estate, least that his recouerie should alter that good & happy disposition. The continuall feuer, whereof he had languished three yeres, and the violent torments of the gout, had prepared him for death, long before he was ready to take him. He gaue no care to any discourse but touching his departure. A gentleman of his chamber seeing him to haue some intermission of his paines, aduised him to remove into some other chamber that was more chearefull, the Physitians warranting that hee might liue two yeres longer; Giue (said hee) this picture of our Ladie, to the Infanta; it was the Emperesse my Mothers, and I haue worn it fifty yeres: He spake of his departure, as of a royall entrie into goodliest Cities vnder his obedience; and of his funeral, as of a Coronation. I will (said hee) haue this Crucifix hung at my neck, and resting vpon my breast: I will

A will haue that in my hand with the which my father dyed. Hold a candle of Mont Sarra readie, and giue it me when I am in the Agonie. Goe (said hee) to two Religious men, and measure my fathers Herse, obserue how hee is laid; I will be so, and with no more ceremonie than the poorest Monke in this Monasterie. They that were about him, spake of his constancie, as Saint Augustin did of the admirable resolution of a holy Spaniard. The violence of his paine was great, but the force of his courage was greater, the one suffered, and the other lung, the flesh suffered and the spirit spake. Nothing liued more in him than a feeling of his finnes, the which toucht him so neere, as after that they had made an incision in his knee, and the Prince his Sonne asking him if he felt not the paine of his greenewound, I feele (said the king) the wounds of fifty finnes much more.

Approaching towards his end, hee commanded that the Marquesse of Mondejar should bee set at libertie, but restrained from coming to court; and that the wife of Anthony Perez (sometimes his Secretarie) should bee set at libertie; vpon condition that hee should retire himselfe into some Monasterie. Hee receiued the extreme vnctions from the Archbishop of Toledo, after that hee had demanded the manner of the administration thereof, for that hee had neuer seene it giuen. Hee had resolved to send the Prince and the Infanta to Madrid, for that they should not bee present at the pitifull spectacle of the ruine of his bodie; but hee changed his opinion, and would haue the Prince present when they gaue him the extreme vnction; after which hee commanded them to leaue him alone with his Sonne, to whom hee spake these words: I was desirous my son you should assist at this last actio, to the end you should not liue in ignorance, as I haue done, how this holy Sacrament is administered, & that you might see the end of kings, and whereunto their Crownes and Scepters are reduced. Death is ready to snatch the Crowne from my head, and to set it vpon yours. Therein I recommend two things vnto you; the one is, that you remaine alwaies obedient vnto the Church; the other that you doe iustice to your subjects. The time will come when this Crowne shall fall from your head as it doth now from mine: you are young, I haue beene so, my daies are numbered and are ended; God keeps the

C D accompt of yours, and they shall likewise end. They say that hee did enioyne him, with passion, to make warre against Heretikes, and to entertaine peace with France. The Prince thinking that his end approached, demanded the golden key of the Cabinet from D. Christopher de Mora, meaning to grace the Marquesse of Denia his fauourite therewith: but hee desired the Prince to pardon him, saying that hee might not leaue it whilst the king was liuing, but by his expresse commandment: whereat the Prince was offended.

D. Christopher complained hereof vnto the king, who neither commended the demand being too sudden, nor allowed of his refusal, commanding D. Christopher to carrie it vnto the Prince, and to craue his pardon: who returning to visit his father, D. Christopher de Mora kneeling downe, left the key and deliuered it vnto him; the which the Prince tooke and gaue to the Marquesse of Denia: And as the prince and the Infanta stood before his bed, hee said vnto them; I recommend vnto you D. Christopher de Mora, the best seruant I euer had, with all my other seruants. And so giuing them his last farewell, and embracing them, his speech layd him; continuing two daies in that estate vntill hee died, being seuentie and one yeres old; and hauing raigned fifty.

He was borne at Vailledolit the five and twentieth of April, in the yere one thousand five hundred twenty and six, and dyed the thirteenth of September 1598. He was but little of stature, yet of a pleasing aspect, but no goodlie man by reason of his greynethor lip, which is hereditarie in the house of Austria, otherwise he was faire of complexion, rather resembling a Fleming than a Spaniard: offo found a constitution of body, as he was sildome or neuer sicke. He was sometimes troubled with faintings: and did neuer eat any fish: he was of a constant resolution, and of a great spirit, apprehending precisely the ends of things, and foreseeing them with an admirable wildome and iudgement.

Pope Clement the eight, hearing newes of his death; assembled the Consistorie, B b b b b ij. where

King Philips
last speech vnto his Sonne.

Birth and figure of the King
of Spaine.

1598 Pope indignant upon the death of King Philip.

where after audience given vnto the Cardinalls, hee told them in a graue speech full of passion: That if euer the holy See had cause of greefe and affliction, it was for the death of that Prince, the Church hauing lost a great Protector, and her persecutors a mightie enemy. That his whole life had benee nothing but a warfare against infidelities, heresies, and errors. That two things did comfort them in this losse the one, that being dead with an admirable conformitie in the will of God, an incredible patience in his paines, and an vnnchangeable constancie in his Religion, he held him rewarded in heauen with immortall glorie: the other, that hee had left a Sonne which made them hope that it was rather a resurrection of the father than a succession of the Sonne. In the end hee recommended them both to their prayers, paying thereby for what the one had done, and what the other offered to doe by his letters for the good of the Church.

Virtues of King
Philip.

His pietie.

To speake of his vertues: it is said that all good Princes may bee written in a ring. Philip had great vertues, it were a rare thing to haue all. The seedes of such princes as haue no defects are in heauen. Hee was great in pietie, Religion, iustice, liberalitie and constancie. As for his pietie and religion, hee hath bene heard to say, that if the prince his Sonne became an Heretike, or a Schismaticke, hee would bring sigots himselfe to burne him. He alwaies protested that his desires in warre, and his exercises in peace did onely tend to the aduancement of Religion. The last words he pronounced with his last gaspe were, That hee died a Catholike. He respected the Pope as hee that carried the keyes of heauen in his hand, the prince of the Church, and Gods Lieutenant: generall ouer mens soules. The Pope respected him as the chiefe supporter of the peace and vnion of the Church: Pius 5. did so terme him when they made the league against the Turke: and his successeur Gregorie 13. answered him that caused his health to be prayed for at Rome, My life imports the Church little, the which after me may haue a better Pope: Recommend the king of Spaines health vnto God, for it is necessarie for the affaires of Christians for standome. And hee himselfe held his assistance necessarie for the affaires of Christians for being tickle, and the Philistines doubting to let him bloud by reason of his weakenesse, Feare

Speech of the
king of Spaine.

This is spoken for the prisons of Cardinalls which are at the discretion of Spaine.

not (said he) to let me bloud, the estate of Gods Church permits not that I should die of this disease, nor of this bloud letting. Euerie man knowes in what credit hee was in the Confitorie, to haue his intention approued, and likewise in the Conclau for the election of Popes. Hee held Rome by the laire and the throat, being in his power to famish it, refusing the commodities which they may draw at need out of his estates which inuiron it. As hee honoured the Pope, so did hee much esteeme the Prelates of the Church, and had a great care to preferre men of vertue and merit to ecclesiasticall dignities. There was a great controuersie betwixt the archbishop of Valencia, and the Viceroy, to know to whom they should first present the Pax and the Censor: the which hee ended, commanding that hee that presented vnto his Maiestie, should giue it first vnto the archbishop, thinking that the honor that hee did vnto Gods Ministers was an infinite glory vnto him, and that a prince should affect no other commendation, than the care and zeale of Religion; when it is without dissimulation or hypocritie. Hee did witness his zeale and passion in the seeking out of many reliques of Saints, especially to haue the body of Saint Eugenius Bishop of Toledo, hauing to that end sent embassadors expressly to King Charles the ninth: and to the Queene Mother, who granted it, contrarie to the aduices of the Cardinall of Lorraine, Abbot of Saint Denis: hee went to receiue it at Toledo, and caused it to bee conducted to the Escoriall. How much did hee spend for the canoizing of Frier Diego of Alcalá of the order of Saint Francis, and of Frier Raymond of Regnafort a Iacobin, famous among learned men, for that hee gathered the decretales into one bodie, and throughoutall Spaine, for that hee past like another Elizacum vpon his cloake from Majorca to Barcelona, and that which is very rare in our age, refused the Archbishopricke of Tarragone. Wee find not any now that hide themselves in causes from spiritual dignities, or that out off their nose and eares to make themselves incapable of church preferments, which requires sound bodies and sanctified soules. No affaires could interrupt him in the course of his deuotion, and we in the relations of Antonio Peres that hee did often referre the care of businesse to another day,

En este dia no
haue mal ni Sol.

A. day, when he was preparing of his conscience, or among his Monkes at the Escoriall. He went bare headed in the procession of the Sacrament, and being on that day at Cordoua, some one did aduertise him, that the Sonne was offensive: to whom hee answered, That the Sonne that day would doe him no harme. Being a religious prince, hee loued no new religions. He neuer received the Capuchins. They of his house haue built many collages, of Iesuites in diuers places, at Vienna in Austria, at Tumaat in Hungarie, at Prague in Bohemia, at Hal, at Grats, at Munch, at Inspruck, and he alone of his house is dead without any memorie of his bountie towards them. Speaking against that great multitude of religions, and the increase of regular Orders, hee said, That they should reduce the new to the auncient, and maintaine those in the first integritie of their institution, and that it was to be feared the world would abound more in religious Orders than in pietie. Hee vied them of Saint Dominicke in his confessions, and in his other deuotions the Ieronimists, to whom hee gaue that rich temple of the Escoriall. Hee did respect Dominicke de Chaner, his Confessor, as hee caused him to be visited in his cell by the President of Castille, when hee was in doubt of any point of conscience or of penance.

Hee had a Councell of conscience for the direction of his enterprises. This Councell hath often drawne him out of many difficulties, and hath freed him from the bond of his promises. The historie of Portugall doth furnish a memorable example. The duke of Osuna, and D. Christopher de Mora, had promised mountaines of gold to them that should be opposit to D. Antonio, and should fauour the kings right to the Crowne of Portugall. Hee being expelled, these men demanded the effects of those promises, and that their bills should be discharged. The king commaunded that all should bee sent to the table of conscience. The Iudges payed them with this sentence: Seeing that king Philip is heire to the realme of Portugall, the petitioners could not compound for his right for money, gifts, or promises, and haue deserved death, for that they did not willingly yeeld it vnto him: If the realme did belong to Antonio, they could not then deliuer it: And therefore king Philip is no way bound to performe those promises which his embassadors and agents had made vnto the petitioners: But vsing his clemencie and mercie, hee freed them from the paine of death, which they had vpon this occasion de-conscience.

Councell of

Advice of the
king of Spaine
council of conscience.

D. ferred. As for his iustice, the example of his son is sufficient to shew his rigor. It is true, that in many actions he hath proceeded more by his absolute power than by the ordinarie course. These great motions cannot alwayes be ruled by the ordinarie formes, nor subiect themselves to the iudgement of reason, nor to humane discourse. Yet hee protested, being nere his end, That he had not done wrong nor iniustice to any one, but through ignorance, or false impression. It is an act of iustice in a prince, to suffer them to tell him of the vnjust actions of his gouernement. It is true, that it cannot be termed an act of iustice, to haue made his creditors so often to loose that which they had lent him, nor to reduce the 18 millions of gold, which hee did owe the Genouois, so 12.

King of Spaine
a seuerer iusticer

E. His liberalitie hath appeared in recompensing the merits of many of his seruants. He made his Schoolemaster Primat of the Church of Spaine, as his father had advanced him vnto the Popedom. There are few such princes now, that vse such requitals. There are no more Alexanders, who gaue eight hundred talents to his Schoolemaster Aristotle. Kings haue long hands, but few haue them so large after this proportion. The king of Spaine did neuer leave any goodlie action either of learning, iustice, or warre, without reward. Hee did not onely doe good vnto the good, to make them better, but also to the bad, lest they should grow worse. But hee did neuer advance them hee, loued to fauour disproportionable to their condition: Hee did much for Ruy Gomes, for the loue of his wife the princeesse of Eboly: Yet this liberalitie did neuer make a passage for him to great affaires. He was verie circumspect in the distinction of great charges, especially of such as concerned the administration of iustice, whereon, as Plato said, depends the safetie and ruine of an Estate. And although that the earle of Chinchon, being bred vpon him in his youth, should haue expected more than any other, yet he obtained nothing but what he held fit for his qualitie. He was wont to say, That all stomaches were not fit

His liberalitie.

That is 80000
crownes.

Honours raise them that deserve them not.

His confidence.

His great moderation in prosperity.

His confidence in adversity.

Vices of the King of Spaine.

King of Spaine virtuous and distrustfull.

to digest great fortunes, and that ill meat did not corrupt sooner, and turne to bad humors, than honour in a soule without merit.

As for his constancie against afflictions, fortune could neuer shake him. In two diuers accidents, happening at two diuers times, he shewed the constancie of his mind, and the equalitie of his affections; neither puffing him vp insolently in prosperitie, nor deiecing himselfe basely in aduersitie. When the post brought him newes of the victorie of Lepanto, he thought to see him much transported with joy, but hee made no shew of any alteration; and hauing vnderstood the order and successe of the battell, hee spake these words coldly; D. John hath bin caried much. Now, when another post did bring him newes of the losse of that great naue at sea, thinking it would haue plunged him into a gulph of cares and perturbations; at the report of so fatall an accident, hee was not a whit moued; saying onely, That hee had sent it against men, and not against the windes and waues. Vulgar spirits are transported with choler at euerie grosse accident, this vnmarchable losse doth not trouble this prince, who continued his deuotion in his Oratorie. Some other would haue torne his haire, and haue whipt the Ocean, as Xerxes did. The duke of Medina Sidonia, Generall of this armie, sending to know his pleasure, if hee would haue him come and giue an account of his charge, he answered, That hee should first goe home to his house, to refresh and rest himselfe before he came to Court.

It were fit we should see the backside of this Medaile, and speake something of the errors and vices of this prince, as well as of his vertues, seeing it is fit to speake all for examples sake; yet it is not good to trouble the rest of the dead. Xerxes image ouerthrew him that strooke it with a staffe: A dead stone did reuenge the iniurie that was done vnto a dead man. It is sufficient to say, That as this prince was commended for many great vertues; so hee was blamed, in his youth, of great dissolutiō to voluptuoussnesse, and a violent propension to crueltie. These two vices doe seldom abandon one another: Euerie voluptuous prince is cruell, if necessitie constrain him. This plague doth infect and blemish the glorie of vertues, how bright soeuer they be in the life of a prince. Vittorinus might haue bene compared to the best Emperours, yea hee should surpass Traian in bountie, Antonine in clemencie, Nerva in grauitie, Vespasian in sparing of his treasure, Pertinax and Seuerus in the integritie of his life, and in the feruor of militarie discipline: but all these vertues were so quenched by voluptuoussnesse, as no man durst speake vnto him. The king of Spaine hath put many to death in the excessse and first fits of his choler. He was as suspitious, distrustfull, and cruell, as euery ny was. He did not allow the prince his sonne to speake with the Infanta his daughter, but by permission, and in the presence of their gouernors. The jealousie of Soueraigne power makes no distinction of persons, nor spareth not his owne blood, as appeared by his owne sonne: and Sultran Solymen caused his sonne Mussafa to bee strangled, for that the Ianizaries made great acclamations of joy at his returne from the warres of Persia.

Some write of him, That, besides the aboue named vices, he was fearefull, doubtfull, close, and a dissembler, ambitious, and proud beyond the condition of man, and nothing religious of his word in matters of Estate; the duke of Villhermosa, and the marquesse of Fuentes, are good witness; he put them to death after that he had pardoned them the reuolt of Arragon. And those words which he spake in his last instruction to his sonne, speaking of the Low Countries, doe verifie it; it is true (said hee) I haue giuen them to your sister, but it imports not; you haue an hundred euasions, which you may vse in time.

His ambition appeared, in that he affected the Empire by all possible meanes, which not able to obtaine, he sought the title of Emperour of Spaine: yea some write, That he was resoluēd to goe vnto the Indies, to take vpon him the title of Emperour of America. After all his ambitious proiects against Affricke, his attempts against England and Ireland, and his intelligences with the Turkes, Barbarians, and Persians, whom hee hath sought to diuide, and to make vse of, euen against Christian princes, yet in the end he was forced to confesse, That all the power and pompe of this world was meet vanaite.

He

His vices and children.

A He had foure wiues, but he was vnfortunat in the first, the which was Marie princeesse of Portugall, who bare him one sonne, whose name was Charles; but his life was short and vnfortunat, and his end violent, being charged by the Inquisition to haue thought ill of the Faith, and to haue had intelligence with Chastillion Admirall of France, and with the prince of Orange touching the Low Countries. His second wife was Marie queene of England, by whom hee had no issue. His third was Elizabeth of France (surnamed by the Spaniards, the Queene of Peace) who brought him two daughters, the Infanta D. Isabella Clara Eugenia, now Archduchesse of Austria, and Ladie of the Low Countries, and the Infanta D. Catherina Michelle, who was duchesse of Sanoy. His fourth wife was Anne of Austria, daughter to the Emperour Maximilian, and his owne neece, by whom he had three sonnes and one daughter, of the which, at his death, there remained onely the prince, who was then called Charles Lawrence, but at his comming to the Crowne he was surnamed Philip the third.

He ended his dayes with an act of wisedom worthie of his long experience. Princes cannot enter into their realmes by a better port, than the loue of their subiects. If their fathers be dead, desired, and lamented; they must doe some great matter to mollifie this sorrow. Painters are no more bound to represent the true lineaments of the face, than princes are to represent their fathers vertues, whose liuelie images they are. Before his death he made an Edict which could not be pleasing vnto his subiects, who began to murmur, and it seemed that they would not be so satisfied, if they proceeded to execution. It was not made for that the king of Spaine had any desire to haue it executed and obserued; but to the end he might giue the prince his sonne a good occasion to win the peoples hearts; for he sayed presently, that hee would neuer allow of the execution of that Edict, and that he would breake his head that should first speake it; the which hee spake so lowd, as euery man thought himselfe happie to liue vnder the command of such a prince, who would proue better than his father.

We haue formerly made mention of a paper which the king drew out of a casket, and deliuered to his sonne, the which contained this instruction following.

My sonne, I haue bene euer carefull to leaue you your Estate settled and in peace; but neither the many yeares which I haue liued, nor the assistance of princes my allies, could euer purchase it. I confesse that I haue spent in lesse than thirtie three yeares, fise hundred ninetie and foure millions of ducats, all which haue bred me nothing but cares and troubles. It is true, I conquered Portugall, but as France did easily escape me, so may this be wrested from me. I would to God I had followed the aduice of the Emperour Charles, my deceased father, of famous memorie, or at the least that you would beleue and follow mine. I should then beare my crosses more willingly, and should die with more content, leauing you in this vallie of miseries. Behold then what I leaue you for an euertlasting testament, besides so many kingdoms and Estates, that you may see, as in a glasse, after what manner you shall gouerne your selfe after my death.

E Be alwayes verie watchfull of the alteration and change of States, to make your profit thereby according to occurrents. Haue a vigilant eye ouer them that are most familiar with you in counsell. You haue two meanes to entertaime your realmes of Spaine, the one, the present gouernement, the other, the trade to the East and West Indies. As for the gouernement, you must either relie vpon the nobilitie, or vpon the Clergie. If you leane vnto the Church-men, keepe the other in awe, as I haue done; but if you fortifie your selfe with the nobilitie, shorten the reuenues of the Clergie as much as you may. If you seeke to countenance them alike, they will consume you, and trouble your realmes, whereof you shall neuer see a final conclusion. If you will make good vse of the nobilitie, my aduice is, that you keepe good correspondence with the Low Countries, for they are friends to the French English, and some princes of Germanie: therein you can haue little assistance from Italie, Poland, Sweden, Denmark, or Scotland. The king of Scotland is poore; Denmark drawes his reuenues from foreine nations, Sweden is euer in faction, and not well situated, the Polonians are alwayes masters of their kings, Italie, although it bee rich, yet is it far off; and the princes are of diuers humors: On the other side, the Low Countries are populous, rich in shipping, constant in labour, diligent in search, hardie to vnder-

take,

1598 take, and willing to endure. It is true, I haue giuen these provinces to your sister, but it imports not, there are an hundred euasions whereof in time you may make your profit: The chiefe are, that you keepe your selfe alwaies gardian to her children, and that there be no alteration concerning religion: for these two points taken away, you are quite depriued of those countries: And then will some other princes present themselves, and bind them vnto them by some meanes, which may proue your ruine. If you thinke to fortifie your selfe against this by the Clergie, you shall purchase many enemies: I haue tried: yet keepe good correspondencie with the Popes, be bountifull and kind vnto them; entertaine such cardinals as they fauour most, and labour to beare a sway in the Conclauce. Keepe friendship with the bishops of Germanie, but commit not the distribution of their penitions on to the Emperor. Let them know you, they will serue you the more willingly, and receiue your presents more thankfully. Draw not any neere vnto you that are of base condition, neither respect the nobilitie and commons alike: for, seeing I must now speake the truth, their pride is great, they are verie rich, they must haue what they desire, they will be burthensome vnto you, and in the end will be your masters.

serue your selfe then with such as are of the noblest families, and aduance them to preferments of great reuenues: the common sort are not so needfull, for they will procure you a thousand discontents, which will consume you. Beleue not any of them, if they be not of qualitie. Free your selfe from English spies, and French pensions. Employ some of the noblemen of the Low Countries confidently, whom you shall haue bound vnto you by fealties. As for the Nauigation of the East and West Indies, therein consists the strength of the kingdom of Spaine, and the meanes to curbe Italie; from the which you shall with much difficultie restraîne France and England: their power is great, they haue many mariners, the seas are spacious, their marchants too wealthie, their subjects too greedie of gaine, and their seruants too faithfull.

I haue excluded the Low Countries, but I feare, in time, mens humors may change; and therefore you must often change your ministers at the West Indies. Such as you call home make them of your Counsel for the Indies, and so, in my opinion, you shall neuer be circumvented, but both the one and the other will acquaint you with the gaine, aspiring to more honour. See how the English seeke to deprime you of that commoditie: they are mightie at sea both in men and shipping. As for the French, I do not much feare them. Fortifie your selfe with them of the Low Countries (although they be partly hereticks, and would continue so) with this promise, That they shall freely sell their marchandise in Spaine and Italie, paying the kings customs, and other duties. And in taking passages to faille to the East and West Indies, let them put in caution, & take an oath to discharge their goods in Spaine at the returne of their ships, vpon paine of punishment if they infringe this order: the which I thinke they will willingly offer to obseque. By this meane the riches of the Indies and Spaine shall haue free commerce with the Low Countries, whereby both France and England shall be disappointed.

My son, I could prescribe you greater designs for the conquering of kingdoms, but you shall find in my studie such aduertisements & discourses as haue bin giuen me: command Christopher de Mora to deliuer you the key presently, least those secrets shold fall into some strangers hands. I did cause some briefs of those instructions to be burnt the 7 of September; I doubt all are not suppressed, be careful to seeke for them. I haue this day added, if you can, win Antonio Perez, that he may serue you in Italie, or in some other of your Estates, but suffer him not to returne into Spaine, nor to go into the Low Countries. Touching your marriage, she instructions are in the custodie of the Secretarie la Lea. Read this often that is written with mine owne hand. Haue a watchful eye ouer your most secret counsellers, acquaint your selfe with cyphers, discontent nor your Secretaries, keep them alwaies employed, be it about matters of importance or otherwise; make triall of them rather by your enemies than by your friends. If you discouer your secrets to any familiar friend, keepe alwaies the most important within your owne bosome.

The King of Spaine begining that in his life time the marriage of his daughter with the

The king of Spaine fearing that in his life time the mariage of his daughter with the Archduke Albert would not be consummated, and that after his death the Infanta Isabella would like better of the donation than the mariage, hee tied her vnto it with strict con-

Advice touching the Pope.

Council con-ching the Indies.

Archduke
Albert goes into Spain.

A conditions, defiring about all things, that she should liue vnder the protection of the Crowne of Spaine, whereunto this new alliance did particularly bind her. Whereupon the Archduke gaue order for the government of the Low Countries, and prepared himselfe to goe into Spaine, to marie the Infanta. But the king of Spaine, before his death, had concluded a marriage betwixt prince Philip his son, and Marguerite daughter to the Archduke of Austria of Gratz, being young fiftier vnto Marie (who had bin promised vnto the prince, but dyed before the consummation of the mariage:) Wherefore the Archduke Albert had commaundement to goe and receiue the said ladie Marguerite at Gratz, and to conduct her into Spaine. Being readie to goe on his journey, hee receiued newes of the death of the king of Spaine; yet hee went on his journey, and passing by the countrey of Treues, the Palatinate, and the duchie of Wirtemberg, into the limits of Bauria, he came into the countie of Tyrol, being receiued in all places with great respect and presents, and his traine discharged. In this countie hee met with the ladie Marguerite of Austria, and Marie of Bauria, her mother, neerer vnto the place whereas the Emperour Charles the fift, and his brother Ferdinand king of Romans, met, in remembrance of which happie enterview there was a table of braffe hung vp for a monument, and is yet to be seene; which table doth represent them as they embraced one another. This ladie was attended on by 500 gentlemen of high Hungarie, whereas the Archduke her father makes his chiefe residence.

C Having joined their troupes, being about two thousand horse, and three thousand five hundred foot, they pass by Bolzene, and came to Trent the nine and twentieth of October, where they spent some days, to visit the reliques of Saints. Then entering into the territories of Venice, which was neere, they were honourably received by two Senators, at a village called Delce, vpon the riuer of Adde, where there was a bridge made by commandement of the State, for them to passe ouer. They went on by small journeyes through the Venetians country, who defrayed the charges of them and their whole traine ten dayes together.

Hauning past Verona, they entered the duke of Mantouas country, who came in post with ten noblemen to Offia (a small village) upon the river of Po) to salute the queene: where D there were many boats made ready, among others there was a nuptiall barge, verie sumptuously made, and covered with tapistrie of filuer, the which was diuided into chambers, halls, and cabinets. The future queene, her mother, the Archduke Albert, with some noblemen and ladies, entered this barge, where they found the tables ready furnished with all exquisite meates. The rest of the traine past the river in three great boats, vnto the other side, whereas Rouere stands, a towne belonging to the duke of Mantoua, from thence going downe the river they were carried to Ferrara, whereas the Pope was, with many Cardinals (whither he came after the composition of Pance, with D. Caesar of Este).

The Pope being certified of the queenes coming neere the towne, hee presently sent forth two Cardinals Legats, which were, Aldobrandini and Saint Clement, with a great number of Prelats and gentlemen. Having gone three miles, they received the queene very honourably, at a place called the islands, euen as shee landed, in the name of the Apollotike Sea, and of the Pope, presenting vnto her, in his name, a rich caroch, whereof all the yron- worke was gilt, being drawne by fix white horses, in the which the queene, her mother, and the Archduke, entred into Ferrara.

Without the cite gates the duke of Seffa, embassador for the king of Spaine, presented vnto her, in his mazzers mane, a litter couered with cloath of gold, and richly appointed, both in the yron-works, which was of siluer and gilt, as of all other royall furniture, hauing two white mules, and the muleters, in the like luerie, and withall a carroch, with six pied horses, and two coach-men clad in cloath of gold, which made a glittering show.

F At the port called Angels gate, shee was receiued by two other Cardinals, Shew and Alamato, and conducted into a house artificially made, where shee was seated in a royall throne, where she staid vntill the rest of the Cardinals came to visit and receiue her.

After this reception the queene was mounted vpon a white horse, and the princeesse her mother vpon the like (which the Pope had sent them) & in that maner she entred the city, being

He meetes with the future Queene of Spaine.

3
- Venetians de-S siay the charge
e of the future Queen of
spaine.

Duke of Mato-ua entertaines the Queen of Spain.

ly Pope sendes a a present to the c Queene of Spaine.

Present sent by the King of Spaine to his Queene.

9. Arrivall of the Queene of Spaine into Ferrara.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

Myriads of Spain arrive at Binaros.

take some dangerous resolution. Wherefore he retired his gallies into a place of safety, and the storme did arise sooner than the mariner had told them. They thought at Martelles that all had beene lost; and their belief had not beene vaine, if Doria had not given credit to that which the best aduised could not beleue. The danger being past, they continued their voyage along the coast of Cartelonia, they saluted Barcelona, and came to the port of Rode, they surmounted the Promontorie of the Moone, and came to Alsiques, which is at the strait of Gibraltar, on Africke side, and in the end they put in at the port of Binaros, in the realme of Valencia: from whence the queene sent prince Doria sonne to the Catholike king, to aduertise him of her happie voyage, and safe arrival. The last of March they came to S. Mathew, whereas the marquisse of Denia came to salute the queene, in the behalfe of the king her husband, and to acquaint her with his Majesties speciall intentions. Passing from thence to Gabanes, and Villa-reall, they went and stayed at Moluedro, a village built of the ruines of Sagunt, an auncient towne allied to the Romans. The Archduke Albertus tooke post there, and went with all speed to kisse the kings hands, and to visit the Infanta, his spouse: from whence hee past to Madrid, to see the Empreffe, his mother, where hee stayed foure dayes, and then returned to Valencia.

The king in the meane time burning with an amorous desire to see his new queen, came in a disguised habit like one of his noblemen, making his pretence to be sent from the king to kisse her hands, but he was discovered by the princesses and ladies which then attended the queene, where he was receiued with an incredible joy and content to them all.

Magnificence at Valencia at the Kings of Spaines marriage.

In the meane time they made wonderfull preparation at Valencia, for the celebration of these marriages, all which being readie, on the seuenteenth day of Aprill the queene made her entrie into Valencia, with so goodly a traine of princes and noblemen there assembled, as the glittering of their glorious and sumptuous apparel, the varietie of colours, and the shining of the gold, did dazle the eyes of the beholders. Before this royall assemblie there marche fise companies of men at armes, after whom followed thirtie kettie drummes on horsebacke, with trumpets, claires, and hautbois, which did sound continually: then came the courtiers in troupe, without any precedence or prerogative of rank: among which there were foure hundred young noblemen like vnto pages of honour, gallantly attired, attended on by their pages and footmen, some hauing six, others eight, some ten, yea twentie, twentie foure, twentie six, and more, attired in their lueries of diuers colours, richly appointed. There were moreouer 700 knights of honor in the queens colours, which were white and crimson gilt, the ground fatten. Then there followed foure knights, carrying royall maces, after whom followed the Stewards of the queenes house, and then sixteene of the Grandos of Spaine. Next marched the heraulds with their cassocks richly imbrodered with the kings armes: after whom went the Lord Steward and the Master of the horse: and last of all came the queene on horsebacke, vnder a canopie of cloth of gold, the which was carried by twentie of the chiefe nobles of Valencia, and the reines of her bridle, being of silke and gold, were held by the greatest lords of that kingdom. The queenes gowne was of cloth of gold, the ground siluer, very richly imbrodered with pearle and precious stones, so as there could be no more added. The queenes mother and the Archduke Albert followed with the queenes cabinet, and a great number of princes and noblemen, and to finish their nuptiall pompe, the princesses and ladies came last of all in their caroches and coaches. Some thought that there were spent in this nuptiall pompe three millions of ducats.

The queene hauing entered the port, where there was a stately triumphant Arch made, shee was led vnto the church, which was hung with cloth of tisse. The high altar was royally appointed, before the which there was an Oratorie erected, covered with cloth of gold, able to containe three persons: there was also another which might hold fise, which was scene by them all, and was verie commodious to kneele in: thither the queene went, after that shee had kist the Crosse, which was wonderfully enriched with reliques, being presented vnto her by the Patriarke, who was Archbishop of Valencia.

The Catholike king came downe into the church with his sister the Infanta, by a pri-

G

H

I

K

L

M

Lib. 31.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

1295

1599

A uie way, which was made of purpose, where the Popes Nuncio (the solemnitie of the ceremonie being ended) demanded of the king first, and then of the Archduke, if they did ratifie the mariages which had beene contracted before by their embassadours, and celebrated by the Pope: Which either of them confirming, they all went vp vnto the altar, where kneeling downe, they assisted at the last blessing of their marriage. The prayers being ended, they went from the church vnto the palace, where the nuptiall feast was made with all the pompe and state that could be deuised. Two dayes after the king made three knights of the Golden fleece, which were, the Archduke Albert, the Constable of Castille, and Prince Doria. For the space of eight dayes there were all sports and fights that mans wit could inuent. There was a Theatre built, able to containe threecore thousand persons, fit to behold all kind of sports, as baiting of the bull, Ioco di Canna, after the African manner, tilts, turneyes, and all other exercises wherein the Spaniards delight.

This nuptiall pompe being ended, the king and queene went to Vailledolit, whereas the king settled his Court, after the example of Charles the fift, his grandfather, and not at Madrid, which, after the death of king Philip the second, was abandoned. The king, after his marriage, gaue himselfe wholly to the exercises of peace, and left the managing of affaires to his Councell, retiring himselfe in a manner from the sight of all the Grandos of Spaine, being loath to see, or to be scene of any, but of the marquisse of Denia, whom he made duke of Lerma. Since that this prince tooke the scepter in hand, he hath made them change the conceits they had of him, and hath shewed more vigour than they did attribute vnto him. That which he wants by reason of his youth, abounds in his Councell, to whom he commits the conduct of his Estates. A prince must be wise, and that this common Sinne should haue no light but for two eyes; that this fontaine should haue no water, but to quench one mans thirst: which made them to grow in- to great discontent, and the rather, for that his wife was made chiefe Ladie of honour to the queene, wherewith the greatest house in Spaine would haue thought it selfe much honoured, being impossible that so grearnd sudden preferments should not be enuid and maligne. Hence grew complaints and murmuring, wherein the best wits im- ploied their tongues and pennies to write freely. This discontentment was scene in all the sorts that malecontents could discouer it. They made images to speake at the kings coming to the Crowne, and at the entrie which hee made at Madrid, they set vp Iupiters statue, carrying a globe of the world vpon his shoulders, and discharging the one halfe vpon king Philip, with an inscription, That the Empire was diuided betwixt Iupiter and Cesar: they found in strange characters, and an unknowne hand, at the foot of Iupiters image, these words; This is the duke of Lerma. They also made Paquin to speake. The king

*King of Spaine
settles his Court at Vailledolit.*

Favours of princes full of enuie

Diallum Im-perium cum Ioue Cesar habet.

Paquin.

E of Spaine made request vnto the Pope, to grant him the renthes of the Clergie-livings, besides that which his predecessors had beene accustomed to take: The feare they had the Pope would not grant it, made them to write this on the palace gates at Vailledolit: An unkind Pope, an innocent King, and an insolent Duke; They made counterfeite letters, both without name and subiect, hauing nothing but a superscription. The king coming one day from walking, he found vpon his table a letter sealed vp, with this direction: To king Philip the third of that name, king of Spaine, being now at the seruice or deuotion of the duke of Lerma: The post which brought it had not returned without an answer: it hee had stayed; The king, who knew that there is nothing makes such brues vanish sooner than contempt, nor that reuiues them more than a feeling and apprehension, laugh at it, and turning to the duke of Lerma, said, see here what they say of us.

F They spake vpon stages, and in publicke Scenes. They made a Tragedie at Vailledolit: the actors were the King, the Constable of Castille, the Duke of Lerma; and the people: The Argument was the complaints and insolencie of the duke of Lerma: the Catastrophe, the duke of Lermas death, who was torne in peeces by the furious multi- tude.

C c c c c ij

They

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

They made fooles to speake, who are about kings onely to tell truth, and to make wise men, which dare not speake it, to blush. A iester passing betwixt the king & the duke of Lemna, iustled him in such sort as he made the duke to stagger, and said vnto him, Stand fast, for if thou fallest thou wilt neuer rise againe. The king taking the word, answered presently, We will then fall both together. The Grandes, who smiled at the jesters speech, were much amazed at the kings answer. All Spaine admires his fortune. The most happie hold, that who so will be fortunat, must bee borne vnder the same Planet. But no man knowes how long this happinesse will continue: And in the end the great fauours of princes are prejudiciall and ruinous to their fauourites. One sayes, That we must approach neere vnto kings, as vnto fire, neither standing too farre off, least we take cold, nor approaching too neere, for feare of burning. This fauour is a fire, as it shines, it burnes. Courtiers flie vnto it, and burne themselves like Butterflies. Hee is not wise that vseth it as a fountaine, and drinckes as much as he can, for the thirst that is past, for the present, and that which is to come: but he is wise that drincks of these fauours as dogs do of the riuer of Nol, passing and running, least they be deuoured of Crocodiles by enuie and jealousy.

The Archduke hauing brought the kings wife into Spaine, and receiued the Infanta his wife, to condu& her into Flanders, & to take possession with her of those countries, which the king had giuen her in dowrie, hauing taken leaue of the king, queene, and empress, his mother, he took his way towards the sea, which was so fauorable vnto them, as imbar- king at Barcelona the seuenth of Iune, they arrived in 18 daies at Genoua, where they remained the rest of that moneth in prince Doria's palace. From thence they past to Paia, where the duke of Parma came to see them. Then they came to Milan; thither the Pope sent cardinall Dietestain to visit them, who presented a sword vnto the Archduke, in his Holinesse name, and a robe of gold to the Infanta: and so they past on their journey through the Grisons country.

At the conclusion of the peace of Veruins, betwixt the French and the Spanish, the queene of England was not comprehended in that treatie. The king of Spaine desired to enter into a particular treatie with her, the French king being willing to further this good motion, offered the towne of Bouillon for their Commissioners to meet at: whither they came, but it was of no effect, by reason of the precedence, which neither would yeeld to other: for the English refusing to yeeld to the deputies of Spaine, they returned without any fruits of this meeting, neither was there any one of them but thought it vnreasonable to purchase a peace with so great a disadvantage to his masters service.

The king of Spaine being at peace with France, he thought him much wronged, & the treatie infringed, that the French went to serue the vniued Estates: wherefore he gaue commandment to his embassador in France, to make complaint vnto the French king, That contrarie to the conditions of the treatie of Veruins, and contrarie to the publike faith, the French went to serue prince Maurice, and by the fauor of their arms did countenance the vniued provinces of the Netherlands in their rebellion: that a friendship in words without effect, was more prejudiciall, a peace which doth not obserue the conditions, was more hurtfull vnto him, than the acts of open war. The French king desiring to obserue the articles of the treatie sincerely, & without any just exception, disauowed all his subiects which caried armes in that qualitie, commanding them to returne home within six weeks, vpon paine of confiscation of body and goods, forbidding all others to goe thither to that intent: yet hee grew jealous, for that there was an armie newly imbarke in Portugal, which made him suspect some designe either against France or England: whereupon he commanded his seruants to stand vpon their gard.

This yere the marquisat of Saluces was in question betwixt the French K. and the duke of Sauoy, who in his proceedings seemed so discontented with the Spaniards, for sundrie reasons, and made them so jealous of him, as the Councell of Spaine demanded vp after a prince his eldest son, and his eldest daughter, vnder a colour of bringing them vp after a royall manner, in the Court of Spaine, whereas they might one day hope to raigne. The duke was much discontented herewith, seeing that it proceeded rather from suspicion than affection; yet by the aduice of his Councell; hee gaue the king of Spaine to vnderstand, That hee could not lodge his children better, being the true cymment of per-

Archduke
pass for Flan-derr.

Treaty at Bou-llon betwixt the deputies of England and
Spaine.

King of Spaine complains that the French
serue his enemies.

King of Spaine demands the Duke of Sauoy
children.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A fe& friendship, yet he resolved to send one to make his excuse, pretending, That the estate of his affairs would not suffer him to send them at that instant, nor to provide them a train and things necessary for their voyage. But the king of Spaine, to prevent all excuses, gaue order that money should be provided at Milan, perswading the duke to send the count de Masie as gouernour to the prince. But hauing the money, he kept his children still, saying, That the ayre of Spaine would not agree with his children, and that their indisposition and young yeares, would not suffer him to expose them to so long and dangerous a voyage. At which refusal the king of Spaine was much discontented.

The Estates of the vniued Prouinces not content to make head against the forces of B Spaine within their countrey, they sent forth a goodlie fleet, in the which were about 8000 souldiers and mariners, with all other necessary prouisions for such a preparation. They set saile on the 25 day of May, hauing for Generall Peter vander Does, and went to affront the Spaniards at their owne doores. On the eleuenth of Iune comming neere the Groine, they met with two small boats, which were sent forth to discover them: in one of them they found a Spaniard, by whom they vnderstood, that they had bene aduertised of their comming vpon that coast, where they stood vpon their gard, and that in the Groine there were foure thousand foot, and some horse: which made the Generall (hauing called all the capitaines to counsell) to thinke it not expedient to attempt any thing in those parts. Which made them to hoise saile, and to bend their course towards Cap S.

C Vincent: to passing the islands of Lancerote, Allegance, and Forre-aventure, they disco- uered the great island of the Canaries, whereas the Generall vander Does came with his whole fleet before the towne of Alegoena, the 26 day of Iune, where he cast anker vnder the great castle, which is on the North-west part of the towne; and causing those ships to approach which had the greatest ordnance, he began in like maner to batter the castle of Gratiofa. The Spaniards and islanders hauing three peeces of ordnance, resolved to hinder their landing, after some great shot from the castle, which did much annoy the Hollanders. In the meane time the Generall put part of his armie into boats, to row to land, but not able to come vnto the shore, for want of water, he leapt first into the sea vp to the girdle, being followed by all the rest, who marched resolutely to land, notwithstanding all the attempts of the Spaniards and islanders, who kept their ground, and defended the landing verie valiantly: yet the Hollanders forced them, not without some losse of their men. At this charge the Spaniards lost some fortie men, before they would quit the place: among others the gouernour (being on horsebacke) had a leg shot off with a great peece. The Generall of the Hollanders was hurt in the leg with a pike, and had three light hurts on the bodie, and if one of his souldiers had not laine the Spaniard which in- counted him, he had bene in danger of his life. The islanders leauing their artillerie fled to the towne with their lame gouernour, and the Hollanders landed at their ease. They of the castle of Gratiofa seeing foure and twentie companies of Hollanders lan- ded, and put in battell, and their colours flying, there came three mariners running from towards the castle, who told the Generall, That they of the castle would yeeld, if they might haue their liues and goods saued: whither hee presently went with some cap- taines, to whose mercie the place was yeelded, they leauing their armes, nine peeces of brasse ordnance, and six of yron, with all the prouision and munition. There were eight and fiftie prisoners, all the rest hauing bene slaine by the canon, all which he sent home in a Spanish ship which the fleet had taken, reseruing only three of the chiefe for his better instruction.

The Hollanders meaning the next day to besiege Alegoena, they were much annoyed by the canon of another castle which was neere vnto the towne, so as being forced to fetch their canon to batter it, they spent foure houres, the great ordnance playing of either side: in the end they within the castle being beaten from their defences, their ordnance dismounted, and their men slaine, the Generall hauing also set one of the towne gates on fire, which they of the towne, castle, and a mountaine which shot with some great ordnance, seeing they abandoned both towne, castle, hill, and artillerie, and fled to rockes and caues in the mountaines, carrying their plate, jewels, and the richest of their mouables with them, with their wiues and children.

Success of the Estates army at the Canaries.

Castle of Grati-of yeelded to the Hollanders.

Towne and castle of Alegoena abandoned.

1599

After this the Generall caused some ladders to bee brought, with the which they entered the towne, finding no opposition. His men ran directly to the castle, where the Spaniards, at their retreat, had left a mine, with a match burning, the which tooke fire before the Hollanders were entred, so as it did them no harme. They found five peeces of ordnance in the place, the which, with all the rest of the bootie which they found, was carried into the Admirals ship, as the Estates had commaunded. The towne and castle being taken, the Generall put his men in battell, as if hee would muster them, in a plaine within the towne. The souldiers brought a Flestinguer vnto him, whom they had drawne out of prison: whereupon the Generall went vnto the prisons, and freed some six and thirtie persons, who told him, that the inhabitants flying away, they had been quartered, and lodged within the towne, except such as were appointed to bee in gard towards the mountaines, whereas the islanders did sometimes shew themselves in great troupes. The towne was spoyle of all that remained, the best being carried away; and then the Generall caused a proclamation to bee made, That no man should appropriate any goods vnto himselfe, for such was the will of the Estates.

Estates men slaine in the mountaines.

On the nine and twentieth of Iune some mariners went vp into the mountaines to get some bootie, but the islanders intercepted them, and slue some twentie. Towards euening the Generall sent three hundred men to a small castle; halfe a league from the towne, but the garrison seeing them approach abandoned it presently, and fled to the mountaines; whereas the Estates men found three peeces of ordnance, and leauing a Squadron there, the rest returned to the towne. The last of Iune the Generall commaunded that the wine, oyle, and all other goods, should bee imbarked. The Spaniards that were in the mountaines did often make offer to treat, but the Generall hearing their first demands, which hee held impertinent, dismissed them, and would giue them no more audience. The Hollanders being master of the towne, the Generall caused the bells, artillerie, munition, and all other commodities which the islanders had left behind them, to be shipped, and then he sent two thousand to charge them that were fled into the mountaines, who at the first made head, and fought valiantly; where, although the Spaniards had great aduantage, yet they retired into the mountaines, where the Hollanders not knowing the passages, durst not pursue them, but returned to the towne with the losse of seuentie men, and one sea captain.

Alcogena burnt
by the Hollanders.

The next day the Generall blew vp the castle of the towne, and burnt all the churches and religious houses, both within and without it: then, being readie to make his retreat, he drew forth his men in battell, and caused the towne to be fired: Then they marcht to Gratiofa, some halfe mile from the towne (which castle they also blew vp) where their boats attended them to carrie them aboard. They were no sooner imbarked, but the islanders came running from the mountaines to quench the fire. The Generall being at sea, hee called all the captaines to counsell, asking their aduice what was to bee done, and to informe himselfe of the situation of other islands in those parts. At this time there came certaine Spaniards to the shore, which desired a parley. Whereupon the Generall sent forth a boat to fetch them: Their comming was onely for those prisoners which had beene taken in the castle of Gratiofa; whose ransomes being payed, they were let goe.

Gomora taken
by the Hollanders.

Leauing this island, within few daies after the fleet discovered the island of Gomora, one of the Canaries, whereas they landed without any resistance, the Spaniards and islanders being fled to the mountaines and caues, as they had done from Alegoena. The Hollanders hauing taken Gomora, and seeing the islanders flee to the mountaines, there were foure companies, which landed first, pursued them, to cut off their passage: but being ignorant of the passages, they were charged by the Spaniards, who slue 80 of their men. The Generall hauing caused the ordnance, bells, wine, and such other commodities as he found there, to be imbarked, hee set fire to the towne, which the islanders came running downe to quench, as they had done at Alegoena.

Behold

1599

A Behold how these two Ilands of the great Canarie and Gomora, which in a hundred yeares had not seene any enemies, were spoyle and burnt by the States armie, the which diuided it selfe into two parts; and twenty ships were sent homeward with the spoile they had taken, vnder the command of the Admirall John Ghesbrantsen, who arrived scatteringly about the middest of September. The Generall Vander Does bent his course with thirty and sixe ships towards the Iland of Saint Thome, which is vpon the coast of Guinee, directly vnder the Equinoctiall line. This Iland is inhabited with naturall Portugals, and abounds with Sugars, which is their greatest trade: whereof they became Masters vpon their first approach, without any resistance or losse. But the Hollanders B being more accustomed to the cold blasts of the Northerne Region, than to the violent heat of the burning Zone, they were not long Masters thereof, but there fell a conragious sicknesse among them, wherof they died in very great torments. The Generall seeing this, caused them to imbarke the spoile with Francisco de Meneses, Gouvernour of the said Iland, his prisoner: but this infection did not leaue them being at sea, for they died in so great numbers, as the Generall Vander Does, and all the Captains but two or three, with three parts of the Mariners & Souldiers had no other Sepulchres but the Sea, so as they had scarce men to gouerne their ships, yet in the end they got home safely by one and one.

Saint Thome taken by the Hollanders.

In the beginning of this yeare began the Iubile at Rome, which although it doth not directly concerne this Historie of Spaine, yet haue I presumed to make a litle digression to relate the maner of this ceremony. This action of Iubile was in old time so rare, as few men might see it twice in their times. Bonifacius 8 ordained first of all that it should be celebrated at Rome euerie hundred yeares, and made it to be past in forme of a law, which before was done but by deuotion. Clement 6 abridged it to fiftie, to reduce it to the prefixed time of the ceremoniall law, which yeare all debts and iniuries were abolished, and the trumpets and cornets did sound lower than of custome. Vrbane 6 had another consideration: Our Sauour had liued thirty and three yeres in the world, and therefore he wold that men reuerencing the yeare which fell out at the end of that space, should sanctifie it with the celebratio of the Iubile. Paul 2 finding the time yet too long, diuided the hundred into foure parts, that as the Bulls are proclaimed at the foure corners of Rome, and bind the that pretend to obtaine the pardons which are granted in this reuolution of yeres, to visit the foure principall Churches, so the foure parts of the world should be inuited to frequent this Iubile, so called of the Hebrew word Iobel, which signifies a Rammes home, for that it was published that yeare by the found of the Cornet with reioicing. It doth commonly begin on New yeares eue, with a solenne procession, in the which the Pope, the Cardinals, the Embassadors of Christian Princes, the Prelates, Clergie and Officers of the citie of Rome, march according to their ranks, with a world of people, vnto the doore called Holy, which finding walled vp, and neuer open but the yeare of Iubile, they put a candle into one of the Popes hands, and a little sluer hammer into the other, with the which hauing strooke thrice vpon the wall, it is presently beaten downe by men appointed to that purpose, whereupon the people carrie away the peeces with great ptease and deuotion.

1600
Iubile at Rome.

Clement had preidents for the deferring of this day Iulio 3 began his Iubile in the yeare 1550, on S. Mathias day, for that the Sea had been void vntill then. The importune paine of the gout should haue made Clement delay this ceremony: but the concourse of people was greater at Rome than had bin in the memory of man: the Pilgrimes were exceeding poore, and a longer stay wold haue bin very hurtfull vnto them. Which inuited the Pope not to frustrate their expectation: wherefore hee was carried in a chaire according to the custome, and gaue his first blessing to this worke the first day of the yeare.

F The French king hauing long expected restitution of the Marquise of Salusses, which the duke of Sauoy detained from him, or some recompence, was forced to seek it by arms: whereupon he came in person with an army into Sauoy, and tooke the chiefe places of strength. The earle of Fuentes Gouvernour of Milan fortified the duke with foure thousand Spaniards. The Ministers of Spaine murmured much at the French kings approaching so neare Italie, saying, that the Marquise of Salusses was the pretext, but Milan

Spaniard apprehends
the French kings taking of Sauoy or

or Naples was the true cause of this warre. Italie was in alarme, who thought that the idleness of the French at home would make them trouble their neighbours: The Pope feares that these first sparkles will set all their neighbours on fire: The duke of Sicilia, king Philips ambassador at Rome presses him; hee cries out of the miseries & calamities which the continuance of this warre would cause; hee doth intreat, beseech, and coniure the Pope to send Cardinall Aldobrandin his nephew to the most Christian king to quench the fire of this great diuision, and to exhort them to come vnto the effects of the treatie of Paris: which the Pope did willingly yeeld vnto.

Spanish forces keep Christen-dome in alarme

After an accord made betwixt the French king and the duke of Sauoy, all things seemed quiet, but suddenly both Italie and France were in alarme, hauing intelligence that both the duke of Sauoy, and the Earle of Fuentes, kept their forces together, and increased them daily, and that they had some great designe which could not be yet discovered, they threatened many, to strike but one, but no man knew where the chance would fall: that all the Princes of Christendome had cause to doubt him, and that the king of Spaine would make himselfe fearefull by armes in the beginning of his reign: but they knew not whether his designe was against Asia, Afrike or Europe. Men spake diuinely of this preparation; In France some said that the king of Spaine would reuine the pretensions of his Grand-father, Charles the first, against the Venetians: others said, and with some reason, as the issue will verifie, that hee threatened to enter the estates of the great duke of Tuscany, with this mightie army, if he deliuered not into his hands that man which for some yeares had qualified himselfe, D Sebastian the true and lawfull king of Portugall, who being banished from Venice vpon this occasion, had bene staied at Florence as hee past, thinking to imbarke at Liouorne to get to Marceilles, and so come vnto the king during the warre of Sauoy. The Venetians gaue order for their Gulphe, and did thinke to demand Frances de Bonnes Lord of Des Digueres from the French king, to be their leader, if they were invaded; to the end that as France had lately furnished the Emperour with a Lieutenant General, and Malta with a great Master against the Infidels, it might also supply them with a great Capitaine against the Spaniards, if hee did attempt to trouble the quiet of their estate.

At Rome it was bruted that Geneva was in danger, and that the Marquess of Aix was sent thither to intreat the Pope to blesse the enterprise, and to fortifie it with his meanes. In England they thought that some great men had some practises in Castille; and the yeares following will shew that their jealousie was not vaine. The Flemings said that it was to make king Philip to be declared king of Romans: but it were not conuenient to breed new factions among the Princes of Germany, when as the Turke was so powerfull in Hungarie.

All these erred in their iudgements, time had discovered that this great armie which so troubled mens affections, was entertained for an enterprise which they had vpon Marceilles, but one of them which should haue deliuered the Towne to the Earle of Fuentes, discovered it to the duke of Guise, and so they were disappointed.

Gentleman of Venice enter-tied.

During the stay of this army in Italie, a Venetian Gentleman of the house of Donati, appointed to be gouernour of Crete, was conuicted to haue intelligence with the Spaniard, and publicly executed; hee testified that this army had many and diuers delignes at one instant, of the which if any one had succeeded it may be they had not lost their time and paines at sea, as they did at land. But seeing all their designes proue vaine both in Italie and Prouence, the army imbarked at Vada, in the State of Genoua, in two troupes, the one vnder the command of D. John Andrew Doria, and the other vnder Charles Doria his Son, and so they bent their course towards the Turkes, being in all seuentie galleies, to the which the Pope, the king of Spaine, the great duke of Tuscany, the duke of Sauoy, and the great Master of Malta had contributed. The Venetians would not infringe the peace they had with the great Turke, and yet they provided for all things necessarie for their defence, both by sea and land, if any did quarrell with them.

Enterprise iust
but not blest of heauen.

The enterprise was iust and worthy of the first stratagems of a Prince, who desires to begin his raigne by some worthy act; the opportunity of doing well being so fauorable, as if Christendome could haue made her profit by the diuision which was then in

A in Mahomet estate, by the mutinies of the Ianisaries, and the reuolts in Asia, they might in shew haue aduanced the accomplishment of that prophesie, whereof the Turkes doe not speake but with sighes, That by the common armes of the Christians they shall be rooted from the face of the earth.

This armie being imbarked they came, in the beginning of Iuly, to Naples to make prouision of great store of armes, and a good number of Petards, which made the world thinke that hee would both arme some of the Turkes subiects, which were ready to reuolt, and that hee had intelligence in some place to surpris it suddenly. And for that footmen are alwaies weake if they bee not seconded by some horse, they made prouision also of fiftene hundred, or two thousand armors for horsemen.

The Venetians seeing them bend their course towards Messina, entred into new apprehensions, that if they attempted any thing in Albania they should bee troubled in their gulse, but being come to Trepany, which is the promontarie of Sicile next to Afrike, they were freed from this feare. Hauing past the Ilands of Baleares, they then thought it was for Alger. But Cigala of Sicile was come from Constantinople with fifty galleies to crosse his delignes, and to watch him vpon his retreat, being loth to fight at one instant against the Christians and against the Moores, their slaues and rebels; for it was giuen out that the Christian army should be assisted with eight or ten thousand Moores, and some Christians. Wherefore Cigala had drawne all them that dwelt along the Seacoast, and might fauour this army into the Towne, and did shut vp aboute tenn thousand slaues in caues, tyed with double chaines, and straitly garded.

There was great hope of good successe of this enterprise; and the Spaniards said, that the King would giue good testimony of his affection to Christendome. Prince Doria the better to fauour this designe, had intreated the great Master of Malta, in the king of Spaines name, to send some galleies to spoile in the Levant seas, and to make a diuersion of the Turkes forces, and to aduertise him of their course. They were verie fortunate in the designe, for passing into Morea with sixe galleies, Beau-regard a French knight had commandement to set a Petard to the gate of Chasteau-neuf, which the Turkes call Passana; and in the meantime some other knights should attempt by Scalado on the other side. As nothing is easie to cowards, so the valiant find nothing difficult: where they entred with such furie, as they forced the second Port, and yet it was valiantly defended by seuen or eight hundred Turkes, where they tooke many slaues, cloyed their ordnance, spoiled and burnt the Town and countrie about it, and returned with speed.

Chasteaufort in Morea taken by the knights of Malta.

The Sea armie of Spaine recovered the coast of Afrike, but both men at land, and windes at Sea were banded against it. God would not blesse this enterprise although it were iust and holie, the reasons remaine in the Register of his iustice and infinit wisdom: against the which wee may not murmure, as the Romanes did against the conduct and gouernment of their gods, when as they saw that Pompey, doing nothing according vnto iustice, was fauoured with their assistance; and when as hee fought for their laws and countrie, yea for the gods themselves, he was most vnfortunate. Prince Doria seeing that both heauen, earth, and sea did crosse his delignes, resolued to retire and not attempt anything.

The Prince of Parma did serue as a voluntarie in this army: who grieuing to see this great armie returne without any employment, desiring rather to erre in iudgement than in the greatnesse of his courage, told Prince Doria, That hee should not suffer so goodlie an armie to returne without some attempt, the which had done nothing but incense a mightie enemy, who to bee reuenged of a dead enterprise ready for execution, would seeke to annoy the king of Spaine in all his estates. To whom the old man made this present answer: I know my charge, my head is grown white in learning this experience. Your excellencie is accountable vnto the king my lord but for your pike onely, and I for a whole army, wherein although I haue bene vnfortunate, yet will I not that other parts belonging to my charge, as coultage, authoritie and experience shall faile thee, or that any shall obiect vnto me that I haue erred therein. A gallant and worthy answer, to teach a young Prince how great

Prince of Parma speech to Prince Doria.

Prince Doria
his answer

his answer

his answer

his answer

great fouer hee bee in an armie) that hee must onely studie to obey, and not to lead and command which was the Generalls charge.

So Prince Doria hauing discharged his armie went towards Genoua, chosing rather to giue them cause to speake disgracefully of his retreat, than to haue attempted an impossible enterprise in vaine. The Popes Gallies attended the Prince of Parma at Barcelona, who was gone into Spaine to kisse the king of Spaines hands. Those of the great duke of Tuscany went to Genoua, and from thence to Li- uorne.

Policy of the corte of France.

Most of the Souldiers came and lodged in the duchie of Milan, to the vtter ruine of the Countrie. But the Earle of Fuentes, who neuer forceth the people when hee can persuade them, found an inuention to make this burthen sweet and supporta- ble. Hee fought to drawe their commerce by water from Milan to Paui, and cau- sed them to digge Trenches, to bring the Riuer together which are betwixt those Townes.

The people seeing commodities that might well recompence their losses with aduantage, seasoned the remembrance of their present harme, with the hope of so great a good. Many haue attempted the like, but in vaine, who in the end haue bene forced to giue ouer the worke, and to leaue the world as it was made.

The Emperour Charlesmaigne, sought to ioyne the Riuer of Rhin to the Danowe, and the Morelle to the Rhin, to the end the French might traffike by water through- out all Europe, and to this end hee caused great and deepe Trenches to bee made, but finding lesse, not fore-seene nor thought off, they remained vnprofitable and filled of themselves.

And the Earle of Fuentes encounters great difficulties in this designe, which did frustrate their worke, and renewed the peoples complaints, when as they sawe themselves furcharged with the ruines of this last Ship-wracke, and that the Souldiers which came from the armie of Alger, liued in Lombardie at discretion and with- out discretion: wherefore to giue the Millanois some ease, hee entreated the duke of Sauoy to lodge the Regiment of Barbo, in the Marquisate of Salusses, burknow- ing how difficult a thing it is to make the Spaniard leaue his lodging, he excused him- selfe vpon the ruine and miserie of his estates.

Ten billings flaring.

In the end the king of Spaines Commisaries cast those companies of Italians that were in Alexandria, they wrapt vp their colours, disarmed them, and left them in a manner naked, giuing to euerie one but five liuers of that Countrie money; the King of Spaine hauing no meanes to doe better, his Treasurie being much wasted in the charges of this last sea armie, being also to furnish money for the Swisses and Germanes.

Infanta of Spain borne.

This yeare the Queene of Spaine was brought in bed of her first Childe, the which although it were a Daughter, yet were the Spaniard as full of ioy as the French were for their new borne Dauphin, saying they had rather their Queene should beginne with a Daughter than with a Sonne, least they should fall into those difficulties which ielousie and ambition doe breede, when as the Sonne grows vp so soone and sollicit his father to be gone, when as their ages are in a manner confounded, the one being in the flower, the other in the season of frutes, the which is fittest for gouernement; and that the desire to succede may not trouble the order of Nature, which makes the one repeat that they are fathers, and shewes the other unworthy to be children.

This Daughter was borne on Saint Maurice day, the second of September, and was after wards Christned Anna Maria Mauricetta.

Outrage done
vnto Rochepot, embassadour in
Spaine.

There fell out an accident this Summer, which had like to haue drawne the two great Monarchs of Christendome into armes. The Maiestie of kings is so inter- cessed in the wrong which is done vnto their Embassadours, as there is nothing more sensible, nor a iuster subiect to quarrell with them that doe the wrong: And this pretext is so nice, as the Prince which suffers the wrong vnpunished, is no lesse cul- pable than they that doe it.

This

A This accident did trouble the mindes of many, and transported their imaginati- ons beyond the Pyrenees, if hee who quencheth the last combustions of France; had not speedily cast water vpon this new fire which began to kindle. A nephew of the earle of Rochepots, embassadour in Spaine for the French king, bathing himselfe at night with some other Gentlemen after the manner of the French: certaine Spani- ards looking on them, vsed some iesting speeches, which were as suddenly answered, wherewith the Spaniards being moued: cast the French mens clothes into the wa- ter, the French attired themselves with all speed, and from words they fell to swords, in which conflict there were some Spanish Gentlemen slaine, and some hurt. The kinsmen of the dead made complaint vnto the king of Spaine, who commanded his officers to doe justice as the cause required. And they, not remembering that the name of an embassadour is inuiolable, even among enemies, forced the doores of his lodging without any respect, and drew forth his Nephew, and some other Gentlemen to pri- son.

The French king, being aduertised of this affront, was much offended, and deman- ded satisfaction from the king of Spaine, else hee should not take him for his friend, and withall hee called home his embassadour, forbidding all his subiects to traffike into Spaine and Portugall, vpon paine of corporall punishment, and the losse of goods, protesting to be reuenged if reason were not done him by some mild course:

Traffike forbidden into Spaine

C whereupon hee went presently towards the frontiers and came to Calais. The iniury done vnto Rochepot, the defence of traffike, and the kings approach, made all men thinke that this goodlie Sunne of peace, which began but to spread his beames over both realmes, would be soone eclipsed, at the least it would bee ouer-cast with clouds, from whence would grow many great and ruinous stormes.

The Archduke tooke an alarme at the kings approach, being then at the sege of Ostend: wherefore hee sent the Earle of Sora to beseech his Majestie not to suffer his enemies to preuaile against him, and presume to find a support in him, which would be of dangerous consequence for all other people that would shake off the yoke of obedience, and an odious example to princes from whome they should receiue alaw.

Archduke in-uolous of the French king.

D And for that many thought the king would embrace this occasion of the sege of Ostend, whereby it seemed he should haue good meanes to enter into Artois, with- out any opposition, he sent the duke of Esiguillon to assure the archduke that he had no other designe but to maintaine peace with all his neighbours; that his coming to Calais, was to view and to provide for that which should bee necessarie to assure the frontiers against all dangers. That he desired peace, yet would not endure a wrong: And as he did hope, the king of Spain would do him reason for the affront done vnto his em- bassadour, so he would not seeke any reuenge vntill it were denied him. But the Pope fear- ing that this violence offered to the French embassadour, would not passe without some reuenge, and that it might kindle a warre betwixt these two great kings, hee sent into Spaine for the prisoners, the which were sent vnto him, and hee presently deliuered them into the hands of Monsieur de Bethunes, embassadour for the French king at Rome: and so the peace was continued.

French king sends to the Archduke.

Impost now make some mention of a wonder or miracle in Spain, wherof the Spaniards brag much, but I leaue it to the iudicious Reader to beleue what he please: it is a bell in Arragon, which they say, doth sometimes ring without any mans help, and therefore they call it, The miraculous bell.

Bell in Arragon miraculous.

Neere vnto the riuer of Ebro, whereas in old time was a colony of Romans, called Curia Celsa, from whence they brought goodly vessels of Alabastrer, as Titus Lin- ius and others doe witnesse, there is a place, the ruines wherof shew that there hath been a great town which is now demanteled, and did stretch from Villila vnto a place cal- led Celsa, which keeps stil the old name though it bee corrupted.

Neere Villila there is a little hil, on the top wherof there is a little church dedicated to S. Nicholas, where among other things there is a square stone of alabastrer, very ancient, on the the which there are many personages cut in stone, kneeling before a Bell, which hangs in a Tower of that steeple. But now the Church hath a Tower vnderpropt with three pillars, in the which there hangs two bells, one a little one, which calls the neighbours daily to diuine seruice, and the greater is commonly called by them the miraculouse Bell, the which is ten spannes about, and there is printed on it on two places: The picture of Christ crucified, with that of the Virgin Mary and Saint Iohn, the one towards the East and the other towards the West; and in like manner two crosses, one towards the South, and the other towards the North, and about it there are Letters grauen which containe this Sibilline propheticke: Christum Rex venit in pace, Deus homo factus est. This bell by ancient tradition, as they affirme, hath often founded of it selfe, and hath foretold strange H and v unexpected events.

This yeare one thousand sixe hundred and one, on the thirteenth day of Iune, this bell did found without the helpe of man, and without any shaking, the knepple striking sometimes on one side alone, and sometimes on both sides of the bell; at the first it gaue fixe stroakes, then nine, and afterwards twelve, fiftene, and in the end thirty stroakes, continuing striking after this manner for the space of two houres; and the greatest blowes were for the most part giuen towards the East, and towards the South: and diuers daies following it strooke sundrie times in the presence of the Curate of the place, and of an infinite number of people, vntill Saturday the sixteenth of that moneth: So as the bruit of this noueltie was spred ouer the whole Countre, and in the end it came vnto Sarragossa the chiefe Towne of the Realme of Arragon, whereas D. Garcia of Villiapando, Lord of Quinto and Villila, was at that time, who hearing these newes went with his wife, and daughters, and many others of good accompt, presently to Villila, being desirous to see that with their eyes which had bene reported: and for that after their arrivall the bell found still some daies, they held themselves very vnfortunate, that they came not in time, fearing it would found no more.

But the next day which was Thursday, being Corpus Christi day, about fixe of the clocke in the morning, when they were ready to goe in procession, it beganne to found very lowd, and so continued diuers times, vntill the day after Saint Iohn Baptists day, that it stayed for a time, and afterwards as if the clapper had bene guided by ones hand, it gaue twenty great stroakes towards the East verie melodiously, and so it ceased.

They say that they haue autentike testimonies in their Annales, that this bell did found of it selfe, when as Afonso the first, king of Arragon, went into Italie, to take possession of the Realme of Naples; and when as the Emperour Charles the first, died: In like maner when as D. Sebastian king of Portugall went into Afrike; and when as king Philip the second was extremely sicke at Badajos, at which time his wife Queene Anne dyed; from which time vntill now it had neuer founded. This Bell did found (as I haue said) when as D. Sebastian went into Afrike, and the Portugals (who alwaies produce some Prophecies, assure that this bell did found this yeare for the retorne of their king D. Sebastian.

The accident of a man which termed himselfe D. Sebastian, sometime king of Portugall, is so common throughout all Christendome, as there is not any Nation but talks of him, yet diuerly: The verification thereof would not onely giue pleasure and profit, but would rauish many of them with admiration, who beleue him to be so, as well as the others, who hold him to bee an Impostor, or a Magitian: And with all it might serue for an example, as well to those that are now or shall come hereafter, in matter of willfull and malicious incredulitie, as well as in too indiscreet and light beleefe.

The Spaniards in this beleefe are contrarie to the Portugalls, for they hold him for an Impostor. Some among them say, that he is a Calabrois, borne at Taurne: others maintaine that he is Monke, which had renounced his order: And others hold that it is one Mark Tulle Catizian, born in a town of Apulia, & that he hath a wife liuing at Messina, being induced by some Portugalls enemies to the Spaniards, who by this pretext

D. Sebastian
king of Portu-
gall.

Opinion of the Spaniards of D.
Sebastian.

A text would seeke the deliuerie of the realm of Portugall; which they say, is held by the violence of the Kings of Castille: That in most certaine the king D. Sebastian was slaine at the battell in Afrike: That he being dead, his bodie was knowen and deemed by king Philip the second for a hundred thousand etrowes. Others say, that the Moores deliuered it without any money, by reason of the accord made betwixt Malley Moab, and king Philip: it is true that king Philip did sollicite them for it by reason of his pretensions. That hee was honourably interred at Belem by Lisboners: That foure kings, accompting the election of D. Antonio, haue raigned since his death. That it is not likely that king Sebastian should haue continued two and twenty yeeres a prisoner, and a wanderer about the world, and not haue a desire, nor find any means to make himselfe to be knowen for him who this Impostor saies he is. Moreover, the miserable estate wherein this afforther hath long liued among poore people, and in the end was scene in Italie before hee sailed who hee was, hauing not written vnto any of the Princes of Christendome: That hee could not answer pertinently to all the demands made vnto him by the Seigniorie of Venice, who had deliberately examined him both in prison and at liberty. And that he had not all the markes which the deceased king D. Sebastian had. That the king D. Sebastian was flaxen haired, and this Impostor is blacke. That he doth not speake good Portugall. That in all Ages there haue bene some seene to resemble one another in countenance, to be of the like stature, and to haue like markes. That it is not now alone that there haue bene such Impostors which said they were the king D. Sebastian; yea a Mason borne in the Island of Tercere, was so impudent as to assume himselfe to be the same, who was followed by some Portugalls armed, and if he had entred into Lisbon on Affention day, as he had resolved, and had written vnto the Gouernour, he had bene receiued by all the Portugalls for their king D. Sebastian: but others say, that onely some peasants of the countrey followed him, and that he had written vnto the cardinall Albert to leaue Portugall; but being taken and knowen for an Impostor, he was hanged. That also in a Prouince of Portugall called Beira, a certain Portugall of bale condition maintaine himselfe to be the king D. Sebastian: the which was giuen out to be so true, as Albert Cardinall of Austria then Viceroy of Portugall, was resolved (as the Portugalls themselves say) to retire himselfe into Castille, yet by the aduice of the five Gouernours of Portugall, which gouerned the realme ioyntly with him, he sent to capitaine Gil de Mesa (who at this day is one of the French Kings chamber) to go and apprehend him with his companion of two hundred men, and to bring him with honour and respect: for if haply hee were the same whom he vaunted himselfe to be, hee would deliuer vp into his hands the scepter and crowne of the kings of Portugall, with his realmes. Gil de Mesa went into the prouince of Beira, and came to the towne of Pena macor, where he tooke him easily, and carried him to Lisbon, who being knowen for an impostor, he was publickely whipt and sent to the gallies; which Impostor liued of late yeeres, and was called Sebastian in derision, who was not hanged notwithstanding, for that in his processe hee was not found charged with any other crimes than with that of his intention: But one who termed himselfe Bishop of La gard was hanged, for that hee had perswaded this man: And as for the cardinall Albert, he would not retire, but whenas the King D. Antonio came into Portugall with his sea armie. That there haue not onely bene such Impostors, who termed themselves to be the king D. Sebastian; but that lately in Castille, there was a pie baker at Madrigal, who gaue it out secretly, that he was D. Charles prince of Spain, whom king Philip his father had put to death twenty yeeres before, who being knowen for an abuser was hanged: Others say, that this pie baker termed himselfe king Sebastian, being incited thereunto by Michel delos Sanctos an Augustine Frier, Preacher to Queene Katherine, who was hanged in his religious habite: That in like maner other ages had furnished the like Impostors which had taken vpon them the name of Kings and Princes. The Portugalls on the other side maintaine, that this is their true king by many and sundry great markes, which he carries like vnto those of the true Sebastian, wherein they are the better confirmed, for that the Spaniards (say they) ground onely vpon simple common, and light presumptions, the which doe in no sort ballance for many marks and

D d d d d

Portugalls opinion touching
D. Sebastian.

reasons

1801

reason which iustifie this to be the true king: And moreover, that the Spaniards, who say that he is a Calabrois, a Monke, or Marc Tullio Catizoni of Apulia, have not yet produced any apparent proofes of his life and means whom they call an Impostor. The which they may lo easily doe; by the authoritie and absolute power which they haue in those Prouinces, as the Portugalls doe not receiue their negatiue, but for a meere slander: but on the other side they repeat the life of D. Sebastian from his birth, vnto his coming to Saint Lucar of Barameda, with many prophesies, signes, and predictions: the which we haue added, that it may serue as an example to posteritie.

Birth of D. Sebastian king of Portugall.

D. Sebastian (as you haue heard) was the onely sonne and after-birth of the Prince D. John sonne to this king D. John the third, who died young, leaving D. Ioane of Austria, princeesse of Castille, and daughter to the Emperour Charles the first with child, who was deliuered of D. Sebastian on Saint Sebastians day, eightene dayes after the fathers death, who as it seemes was in a manner writed out of the hands of God, by the great prayers which were made generally throughout the realme of Portugall, to the end the crowne should not be left without lawfull heires males: in the succesion of great Alphonso the first king of Portugall. They were induced hereunto by the predictions and reuelations which had beene giuen to the said Alphonso the first founder of the said realme: by the which it was promised them of God, To warrant his posteritie in such sort as it should not faile upon the earth, yet, at the sixteenth descent from him, it should haue great tribulations and afflictions.

By this Oracle it appeareth it was spoken of his birth, for the which also the Portugalls made such praier, and shewed such deuotion, for that they feared to fall vnder the Spaniards yoke, who are their natural enemies: either for that the Portugalls had in olde time their beginning from the French, as the name doth shew, for that the French coming into those parts did inhabit that country, and gaue it their name; or else for that the Spaniards being enuious of their prosperities, seeking alwayes to raigene ouer them, are become their enemies without cause.

The king D. Sebastian being ouerthrowne at the battell of Alcaferquibir in Africke, the Spaniards say that some noblemen of Portugall which followed him, seeing all lost, aduised him to reite, but he answered that he had rather die, and so thrust into the midst of his enemies, where some noblemen entred with him, where they beleue he died, whose bodie they say was buried at Belem.

But the Portugalls say, that they did neuer beleue that it was D. Sebastians bodie, or that he was dead, but that he imbarqued (as you shall heare) and that he went into Algarue, and put himselfe into a monastrie of Ieronimits, or according vnto some, of S. Francis, whom they called los Descalcos, or the bare footed, and there hee caused his wounds to bee cured; the which they say had beene verified by a seruant to Cardinall Henric the Kings vnckle, who was a Church-man and trusty to his master, and brought an Act signed by the Gardian and monks of the said monastrie of Ieronimits: this seruants name was Mmanuel Antonex: But cardinall Henric, who was acknowledged king, did not then speake neither did the said Mmanuel Antonex: the which (as they say) was afterwards the cause of great miseries in Portugall: for the cardinall dying notwithstanding that the Portugalls did after him chooſe D. Antonio a prince of Portugall for their lawfull king, yet the king of Castille seized vpon the Realme, and held it by force. Afterwards the said Mmanuel Antonex revealed this Act, seeing that in the yeere 1598, it was said that D. Sebastian was recovered; who being sent for by king Philip, hee went vnto him, but no man knew what was become of him, some said he was dead.

How the Portugalls beleue that D. Sebastian rescued himselfe from the battell.

The Portugalls beleue, that the king D. Sebastian (seeing the battell lost, that hee was in daunger to be taken, but that defending himselfe valiantly, hee slew some which fought to take him, and hid himselfe amongst the dead carcases vntill night, at which time hee went towards the sea, where the rest of his armie lay in the roade. There hee met with the Duke of Auero Christopher de Tanora his great fauourite, the Erie of Redonde, and other noblemen, with whom he imbarqued, and went into Algarue, as you haue heard, sending his shippes away: where hee resolved with the said noblemen to wander ouer all Europe, Aſiacke, and Asia, into Ethiopia to Pete Ian, and into Persia, where hee was in battells against the Turke, and receiued many wounds.

Being

1601

A Being wearie of running, and tired with the vanitie of the world, hee came vnto an Hermitage, where hee continued vntill hee had viſions and reuelations both to himselfe, and to an Hermit with whom hee liued: so as after many delays he left him: which was in the yeere 1597. And that being in Sicilie he sent letters into Portugall, by Marc Tullio Catizoni a Sicilian, who neuer returned, and was neuer seen since. That king Sebastian after hee had attended him long, parted from Sicilie, with an intent to manifest himselfe vnto the Pope. But there fell out an other accident, his seruants robbed him, and ranne awdy, so as he remained naked and without meanes, being forced to begge vp and downe Italie: and in the end hee came to Venice in Iune 1598, having but one gazette, which is not a peny of our English mony: being there, he got into a Cooks house, and lodged in a poore cockloft or garret, the Cookes name was Francisco, borne in Cyprus, who (being but a poore man and charged with wife and many children) entertained him as well as he could, for the vertues and good parts which he seemed to haue, being continually at his prayers.

Within few dayes he was discouered by the Portugalls to be D. Sebastian king of Portugall, whereupon some of them carried him to Padoua, whether it were vpon hope to be aduanced by him, or otherwise, so as there was a great broue of him. The Embassador of Spaine made his complaints, and the Seigniorie sent to the gouernors of Padoua to chase away this man, who called himselfe D. Sebastian king of Portugall, within 3 daies out of their towne. This sentence being signified vnto him, touched him so neere as hee felt sicke. Being recovered, he resolved to go in person to Venice to yeeld an accompt of himselfe. He presents himselfe vnto the Senate, relates the historie of his life, his rout in Africke, his retreat into Calabria, his resolution neuer to haue shewed himselfe in anie place of knowledge for the shame of his disgrace, and the punishment of his rashnesse, if the Spirit of God had not inspired him with another will, and giuen him a certaine assurance to make him known for him that he was borne. He added moreover, that among all the soueraigne Estates of Europe, he would not haue recourse to any, but to the common weale of Venice, to iudge the truth of his condition. And for a proofe, hee remembered vnto them with all circumstances, the Embassadors which they had in former times sent vnto him, the answers and dispatches which they had brought backe from him, and the difficulties that were of either side. The Senate caused their records to be searched, and found them conformable to his words. They questioned with him, with great wisdom and iudgement, of many other matters of importance; whereunto hee answered so pertinently, as many held him to be the true king D. Sebastian, and others tooke him to be a magitian, for that no other but himselfe could be informed of such secret matters, without the spirit of Pithon.

Then grew there a great rumour in Venice, the people fauoured him with their wishes and praers, euery man desired to see him seated againe in his throne. But hee had a violent enemy, the Embassadour of Spaine, who maintained for his master, that hee was an impostor, charging him moreover, with many horrible and detestable crimes (which being proued could not haue deserved lesse than fire) he made himselfe partie against him, and got him to be committed. Being in prison, the Senat deputed Iudges to make his proceſſe, who used all diligence to informe vpon the crimes imputed vnto him by his aduerser partie, but they found him innocent. They examined him eight and twentie times, at all the which he shewed such an vndaunted courage and countenance, as he seemed rather capable to iudge the Iudges, than to vndergoe their censures. In the end, imagining that their demands were more curious than iust, and that they fauoured the greedinesse of the Spaniard more than the truth of his cause, hee would not answer any more, but did insilt vpon his first request, That they would let him be seene vnto the Portugalls, and to such strangers as had knowne him before hee past into Africke, and if he were a counterfeit, hee was in their hands to doe that iustice on him which an impostor deserved.

This Seducitor (said the Embassadour of Spaine) is borne in Apulia, and married at Messina, we haue the depositions of his wife, that his name Marcus Tullio Catizoni; that he had beene procured & instructed by certain Portugalls, enemies to the Estate of Spaine,

D d d d d j who

D. Sebastian was prisoned at Venice.

Reasons of the Embassadors
accusing D. Sebastian.

who vnder this pretext would stirre vp a rebellion, which they call a deliuerie or restoring G of the realme of Portugall: what Prince of Christendome would deale in the affaires of this affront? The qualitie of those persons whom hee hath followed since the time that he hath wickedly taken vpon him the name of D. Sebastian, doth it not sufficiently shew that he is a man of a bad life? Hee hath some markes which D. Sebastian had on prooue that he is a man of a bad life? Hee hath some markes which D. Sebastian had on his bodie when he liued, but most of them are counterfeited by art. The King Sebastian was flaxen haired, and this impostor is blacke; neither doth he speake good Portugall. By these and many other reasons he concluded, that the prisoner should vndergoe the same punishment which they had suffered which were culpable of the same crime, during the reignes of the last king and gouernours of Portugall.

Portugals defend him.

The Portugals defended him with as great animosities as the Spaniards accused him H with passion: they maintained that their king D. Sebastian being grieued, that through the violence of his courage he had made as like the sepulchre of so many thousands of men, who might haue done more profitable seruice vnto Christendome; and being ashamed after so great a losse, had wandered vp and downe the world, vntill that the diuine providence had forced him to manifest himselfe. His aduenture was no stranger, nor more incredible than that of William 5 duke of Aquitaine, who hauing maintained the Antipope Leon surnamed Anacle, against Innocent 2, who was lawfull Pope; notwithstanding that Saint Bernard had exhorted him not to countenance a Schisme in the Church, I and against the seruice of God: the said duke hauing displaced the Bishops of Poictiers and Lynogues, and aduanced others, of his owne authoritie, being toucht with remorse, and a desire of penance, he left his Estates, to lead a solitarie life like some poore man: with this desire he reconciled himselfe vnto the Pope, and by his aduice went to Ierusalem, with a Secretarie of his called Albert; there he liued nine yeares in great abstinence. At his returne to Rome, he thought to haue taken partie in the warres which were then in Italie, but knowing that this aduice was a temptation of the deuill, he returned to Ierusalem, and afterwards came backe into Italie, where he built diuers monasteries, and in the end died, in the yeare 1154.

If this prince had had a meaning to returne and take possession of his Estates, should he haue found the like inhumanitie among the princes and common weales of Christendome? should he haue had such toyle to verifie the true qualitie of his person K as the Portugals did neuer beleue that their king D. Sebastian was slaine at the Battle of Alcasar. If they would haue the people beleue it, they should haue caused his body to be viewed by such as were interest, and that knew him, for that they had bene brought vp with him, and the markes which he carries on his person: and not to poore prisoners taken in the warres, to whom vnder promise of libertie, they might drawe what depositions they pleased. There is nothing more easie than to suppose a bodie, to put it into a beere, to interre it royally, and to proclaim, This is the body of the deceased D. Sebastian king of Portugall.

As for impostors which haue qualified themselves with his name, haue they found any beleefe, but with the simple and people of no sort? Haue we not abandoned them as I soone as euer their falshood was discouered? The Mason of Tercere, was he not hanged by a publike consent? That other raskall of Pegnamacor, who did for a time trouble Cardinal Albert, and the five gouernours of Portugall, was hee not declared a seducer, publicly whipt, and sent to the galleys.

But what credit may be giuen to the depositions of a silly woman, who for a peece of money will sing any note you please? we haue witnesses to whom shee voluntarily declared, that shee came to Venice against her will: That shee is the wife of Marco Tullio Catizani, but had not seene him since hee parted, with many letters to goe into Portugall. Wee knowe moreover, that hee distributed the greatest part of them, and that hee died at Lisbon, attending the returne of some that were absent, to deliuer them M to their owne hands. The king D. Sebastian had during his raigne more intelligence with this Seigniorie, than with all the other Estates of Christendome: and therefore he had rather address himselfe vnto them to be relieved in the iustice of his cause. The afflictions and miseries which haue oppressed him since hee began to discouer himselfe, haue

A haue forced him to accept of that which is allowed the most infortunate in a strange country: to receiue courtesies, and to bind himselfe indifferently to all men for their good deeds. They haue examined his life exactly, and theirs whom he hath frequented: could they conuict him of any crime? of any vice? if it be not a crime or vice to spend many daies of the weeke in fasting with bread and water, in continual prayers, and in giuing vnto the poore the remainder of the almes which had bene giuen him. The Spaniards which say that he is a Calabrois, a Monke which hath quit his Order, and which call him Marco Tullio Catizani, should they not rather desire that he should be brought forth vnto vs, to examine him, to see him, to heare him, and to know him? If hee bee a seducer, B and if we be impostors, what meanes shall wee haue with him to auoyd the punishment which the Lawes inflict in such cases? Wee know the markes and characters which Nature, not without some great misterie, hath set vpon the bodie of the king D. Sebastian, Let vs see this prisoner, if he carries them, it is a great presumption for many other signes which we haue: if there be art, we will be the first that shall crie out against the abuser. And vntill this be done we cannot take the Spaniards negative, who are the vsurpers of Portugall, but for a meere slander.

If the king Don Sebastian hath changed the colour of his haire since his youth, what miracle is it? Is it not ordinarie, that a flaxen haire turnes blacke with age? But moreover, doe not wee know, that if any one that is as white as snowe, passe the Equinoctiall line, if he make a voyage to Guiney, to Saint Thome, or to some other part of Ethiopia; if hee stay some yeares in Barbarie, hee will become blacke as pitch, and the whiter a man is, the sooner he growes blacke. Wee haue a familiar example in the person of Don Christopher Prince of Portugall: From his youth vntill the age of eightene, that hee past out of England into Barbarie; wee haue seene him white as milke, faire, and of a cleere complexion; but hauing liued at Marroc little above three yeares, hee grew so blacke, as at his returne we did not know him. Hee is yet liuing, and no whiter than when hee returned out of Barbarie. If little above three yeares had such power to breed so strange an alteration in Don Christopher, what might aboute twentie yeares doe in the king Don Sebastian? Neither may we find it D strange, if conuersing with so many Nations, differing in language, he hath forgotten something of the true and naturall pronounciation of ours. Thus our enemies grounding onely vpon simple and light presumptions, cannot ouerthrowe so many certaine markes and reasons which iustifie this man to bee the true and lawfull Don Sebastian king of Portugall.

The Venetians would gladly their prisoner were gone to seeke iustice elsewhere, for they found no lawfull subiect to condemne him, and they could not openly giue him meanes to escape, but they must incense the king of Spaine. The greatest part of their Senat found great likelihoods that he should be the same, others knew not what to say, neither durst they intreat him as a king. They therefore gaue the Portugals to vnderstand by the Archbishop of Spalato, who knew him particularly, and had kept him E sometime in his house, That they should bring vnto them the true and naturall markes of the king Don Sebastian well verified, without the which they might not see him; for that hauing so great a desire to free themselves from the Castilians command, if need were they would maintaine a Negro to be the king Don Sebastian.

Doctor Sampayo a Iacobin goes to Lisbon, from whence he returnes to Venice with a Chanon, and brings an instrument made by an Apostolicke Notarie, containing all the markes testified by many others, and beseecheth the Seigniorie to confront them, and to vnderstand the truth. They answered, that the reason of Estate did not allow them to enquire whether he were a king, or not, vntill they were required in his fauour by the kings and princes of Christendome. After this the Portugals went to begge fauour in France, Germanie, England, with the Estates of the vnited Provinces, and else-where. In the end Don Christopher younger sonne to the deceased Don Aluonius king of Portugal by Election, who died at Paris, being come to Venice with letters from the Estates and prince Maurice, obtained audience, and deliuered that which hee pretended in writing. The Counsell assembled foure severall daies for the prisoners af- D d d d d iij faires, Venitians did

mand an article flaxen of the Portugals.

Tobz

saies, and conclusions being taken the 16 of December, 1600, he was called vnto the Senat at ten of the clocke at night, where there did assist about 200 of the chiefe men of that State; where the same inuincion which had bene made vnto him by the Podesta of Padoua, in the year 1598, was againe intimated vnto him by foure Deputies of the Seigniorie, all standing vp bare headed, with great respect: where they pronounced this sentence vnto him, and he still couered, if we shall beleue the Portugals.

Going forth of the Senat many presented themselves to accompanie him to his lodging, but he would not suffer them. The Portugals which were at Venice, D. Christopher, D. John de Castro, Diego Manuel, Rodrigo Marques, Sebastian Figueroa, Francisco Antonio, Sampayo and Chrysostome Monkes, with many others, whereof some had seene him often in Portugal, and since in Barbarie after the defeat, protest that at the first sight of him they were much amazed, for that they saw him differ so much in age and haire; but hauing well obserued his countenance, his forehead, his eyes, his nose, his lippe of Austria, that is well obserued his countenance, which most of the Princes of that house haue (from to say, greater than the ordinarie, the which most of the Emperours Charles when he was defended by his grandmother Catherine, sister to the Emperour Charles the first, and by his mother Joane daughter to the said Emperour) his stature, his speech, his writing, all the visible markes of his bodie, whereby they did know him infallibly; the left parts, as his arme, hand, leg, and foot, shorter than the right; his wart vpon the little toe of the right foot, which was almost like vnto a sextoo; the moles of his face and hands, his hurt vpon his right brow & head, the place where he wanted a tooth in his right iawe beneath, the which Sebastian Nero his Chirurgion had once pulled out: all which markes, with many other, did rauish them with wonderful admiration, & forced them to confesse that he was their true & naturall king, who was miraculously preferred for the restoring of Portugal, and for the benefit of Christendome, and they lue yet in this expectation.

Sampayo a Doctor and professor of Diuinitie at Tolouza, and a Iacobin by profession, to giue an indubitable beleefe to this new manifestation, and to make the world thinke that it were Atheisme not to beleue it; writing to Paris, presumed to deliuer these words: I assure you that Iesus Christ is no more the sonne of the true and eternall God, whom I call to witnesse, than this is D. Sebastian our true and naturall king and Lord. A bold speech, although it were an vndoubted truth, confest by all the world; the comparison is vnlawfull, the which I doubt cannot be made without blasphemie, seeing there is no proportion betwixt the Creator and the Creature.

Being at libertie, the Portugals which were at Venice besought him to speake vnto them, to the end they might see if his speech would giue them as much knowledge of his qualitie as his countenance had done, not being able to iudge of the inward man by the outward parts: whereupon he spake vnto them after the Portugal manner, proudly & royally, telling the what he was, & what his life had bin since his ouerthrow in Afrike, which forced teares from him in speaking, and from them in hearing. Being thus resolved, they were much troubled how they should saue him from the ambushes of the Spaniards, for they were aduertised that the Embassadour of Castille laid wait for him at euery passage. The duke of Sauoy & the Earle of Fuentes had the like charge. The Archbishop of Spalato offred to conduct him safely in his Carouage vnto the frontiers of Germany, but they would not trust him, & yet they knew not what to resolve: some would carry him to Lions, where they treated of a peace with the duke of Sauoy: whereas when they saw any troupe of horse a far off, they ran to meet them, with acclamations, hoping to see D. Sebastian rather passe by Florence, to imbarke at Liouorne, & so get to Marfeilles. But as euery one in particular fought to haue the honour to preserve the king, their obstinate disagreement spoiled all. They made choice of the worst, & followed the aduice of Sampayo, who was a turbulent & cholericke man: they attire him like a monke of the Order of S. Dominike, & imbarke him in a gondole in the night, from whence he goes to Padoua: there he changed his habit for a cloake and a rapier, & so went to Florence, whereas the duke caught him to be stayed, by the aduice of the Archbishop of Pisa, where he kept him vntil the 23 of Aprill.

The king of Spaine being aduertised that hee was at Florence, prest the great duke

Prefumption of Doubt Sampoy.

D. Sebastian
Baird prisoner at Florence.

1601

A to deliuer him vnto the Viceroy of Naples, and to his entreaties he adds threats. But why should he deliuer him, seeing that the Venetians seeme rather by their sentence to giue their prisoner means to seeke justice elsewhere, than to take knowledge of his cause? Shall he violate the law of nations, in deliueing him that trusted vnto his protection? Being thus in suspense betwixt the feare of threats, and the reason of demaill, they represented vnto him a great armie, at the king of Spaines deuotion, the which affright all Italie, and threatens his estates. He desires rather to auoid the storme, than to incense a mightie Prince, and to draw a warre vpon him, the end whereof must needs be ruinous: Whereupon he sent him to Orbitello, where some, appointed by the Viceroy, receiued him, and conducted him safely to Naples.

B Seeing himselfe in the Castillans power, and that he had nothing free but theare and his tongue, he poured forth all that might be spoken against one that may be taxed of treason, inhospitalitie, and treacherie, as the violence of choler thrust him on to strange imprecations against them that do so deliuer vp the poore, vnjustly afflicted, which commit themselves to the safegard of another. Notwithstanding these violent humors, he presented himselfe before the earle of Lemos, Viceroy of Naples, with as setled a countenance as he had done to the Senat of Venice, and the great Duke; yea (the Portugals say) with as great maiestie, as if he had bene sitting in his royall throne at Lisbon: For at his coming in, to a great hall, seeing the Viceroy bare headed, whether it were to respect the title of a king, which he did attribute vnto himselfe, or by reason of the heat, Copier vnto Earle of Lemos, said he, with such a hardie grauitie, as it amazed the whole companie.

C The Viceroy demanded of him, whence comes this authoritie to commaund me? To whom he answered, It is borne with me. You seeme not to know me, I know who you are: doe you not remember that the deceased king Philip mine vnclie sent you twice vnto me when I reigned in Portugal? Declaring vnto him euery particular so precisely, as it bred some scruple in the minds of the hearers, and did much distemper the Viceroyes thoughts: who dying some moneths after, charged his sonne and succellor to carrie himselfe discreetly and moderately to this prisoner, as indeed he had intreated him (as the Portugals say) with little rigour and much courtesie. But this new keeper, whether that he had a contrarie commandement from his Soueraigne, or to insinuate more into his fauor, or else fearing the corruption of some Portugals, who followed him no more libertie than to many others, to goe out on Sundayes and festiual daies to heare Masse in a chappell within the castle. Yet the Viceroy, who would not publicly seeme to consent to the affliction of this vnforgotten man, dispensed with himselfe to call him Impostor: who finding himselfe much toucht with this reproch, fell to those armes which his condition did furnish him, which were as bitter words as might be giuen to any one that would not respect his qualitie. These violent words did not free him from a hard prison in the castle d'Ouo, in the which he did not find any thing (according to the report of the Portugals) but a cord, and a long knife, fit instruments for some desperat malefactor, who would free himselfe from some exemplarie punishment. There he continued three daies without bread, wine, water, or bed.

E On the fourth the Auditor generall being followed by two Registers, came to visit him, and finding him safe and well (for there was no great likelihood that with such cruell usage he should seeke to prolong his life, especially hauing such fit instruments to end his miseries, and to free himselfe from a more sensible ignominie before men) he said vnto him, That if he did not forbear to say and maintaine himselfe to be D. Sebastian king of Portugal, they had not any thing to sustaine his hunger nor thirst, nor to giue him rest. Doe what you please, said the prisoner, for I am D. Sebastian, the true king of Portugal, and no other. God forbid that I should fall into so great a mischief, and so contrarie to my soules health, that for feare of men I should denie the truth, and confesse that which is not. I am that D. Sebastian king of Portugal, who in the year 1578 past into Africke against the Infidels: he who to augment the number and power of Christians, put his life in hazard: that vnforgotten man who for his sinnes lost a battell, which was the cause of so great alterations in Christendome. This is the very truth, and I can say no other.

The

King of Spaine denies D. Sebastian.

D. Sebastian in the castle d'Ouo.

The Auditor and the Registers departed with this answer: from which time they G gave him bread and water for his diet; but some dayes after he had five crownes a moneth given him, and a man to serve him, without any further proceeding in his cause, vntill the seuenteenth of Aprill 1602. Vpon which day the Viceroy sent to know if he persisted in his first deposition, and that he should be now well aduised to answere pertinently. This is not (said he) the right course they should take to examine and judge my proceffe: present me vnto the Portugals, who haue bred me, knowne me, and serued me; vpon whose saying and testimonie the whole profe and verifika-tion of my cause doth depend. If I should liue a thousand yeares, yea more, I would neuer answere otherwise. If you be resolu'd to put me to death without any other profe, I take God for my onely judge, who knowes the truth of my cause. I am H D. Sebastian the true king of Portugall: you may now deale with me as you haue heretofore pretended. After which he disposed himselfe to die, made a generall confession, and receiued the Sacrament, still maintaining, that he was as he had said.

Whilest that he attended the houre of his death, they sent againe vnto him to make his last answer; that is to say, he should sing a new song, and recant the former: but he made the same answer: And vpon this last answer he was at the instance of the Castilians exorcised by the Bishop of Rhegium, as a Magitian, for that he had answered very pertinently to all they had demanded of him. During which adion hee shewed vnto the Bishop with a cheerefull countenance a Crucifixe, which he carried at his breast: Behold (said he) the Image of the Master in whom I trust, and for whom I would die. Wherevnto the Bishop went away, confounded with his conjurations, as some report, who say they were then present. After which he was set vpon an Ass, the last day of Aprill, and carried publickly through the streets, hauing three trumpets going before him, and proclaiming his sentence, by the which he was condemned to be led ignominiously through the streets of Naples, and then put into the galleyes, for that he had called himselfe D. Sebastian king of Portugall, being but a Calabrois. At this crie when he pronounced this word King, he answered with a loud voice, So am I; and when he added, being but a Calabrois, he said, That is false. Neither did any of the officers or people hinder him, or once moue: Euerie man heard him with admiration crying at the corners of the streets: I am in my enemies hands; let them doe with my bodie what they please, I recommend my soule vnto God, who hath created it, and knowes the truth, that I am as I say.

Hauing thus led him through the citie, they put him into the royall Galley, where they attired him like a slaue, and cut off the haire both of his head and beard, which some gathered vp, either through reuerence or superstition, as a matter of great esteeme, and then they fastened him to the chaine, yet aduising them that they should not force him to rowe.

The galleyes passing from Naples to Barcelona, arrived in August 1602, at the port of S. Lucar of Barameda, whereas the Duke of Medina Sydonia and his wife were desirous to see him: who hauing deuised long with him, he demanded of the Duke if he had the sword which he had ginen him, when he embarked to goe into Barbarie. The Duke answered, It is true Don Sebastian king of Portugall presented me with a sword, which I keepe among others. Seeing you haue it yet, said the Gallerien, I pray you let me see it: for although it be foule and twentie yeares since I gaue it you, yet will I know it. Wherevpon the Duke caused a dozen to be brought, but it being not among them, he sent for others. The Gallerien seeing it in the bringers hand: behold (said he vnto the Duke) the sword which I gaue you when as I vnderooke my voyage into Afrike. Then, turning vnto the Duchesse, who was Anna de Silva, daughter to the prince of Eboli; Cousin, said he (after that he had told her what secrets had passed betwixt them when he tooke his leaue of her at Cadis) I remember that I gaue you a jewell, haue you it also? The Duchesse made the like answer vnto the Duke her husband, That
the

D. Sebastian led ignominiously through the street.

He is put into a Galley.

His discourse with the Duke of Medina Sidonia and the Duchesse.

A the king D. Sebastian had ginen her a jewell: he then replied, Shew it me; I shall know it well, and shall tell you of a secret which it may be you know not: then hauing chosen it out from among many, he said vnto her, That to proue his saying true, he should cause the stone to be taken out, vnder which she should find his name and cypher grauen.
There was a Negro in the Duchesse's companie, whom he knew, saying, that he had serued him for the washing of his linnen, when he raign'd in Portugall. The Duke and Duchesse seeing these apparent things, and so conformable to truth, went away with heauie countenances, and as it were weeping for compassion to see this miserable prince in so wretched an estate. Many old Portugals saw him, knew him, and did aduow him to be the true D. Sebastian, king of Portugall. Finally, the Portugals (if wee may beleue them) report so many particularities touching this man, as it would require a whole volume to relate them all: adding, that they that haue seene him, and knowne him, haue ginen this testimonie, that he is the same, or a deuill incarnate.

But besides these probabilities, which they take for truth, they arme themselves with certaine predictions or prophecies, which they say must needs haue relation to the adventures of this poore Gallerien, whom they maintaine with an obstinate constancie to be their lawfull king. S. Isidore, sonne to Suerian, the sonne of Thierry, king of the East Gothes, and of Italie, did leaue in writing about a thousand yeares since,
That a hidden king, twice ginen by prayers and deuotions, shall come into Spaine vpon a horse of wood, whom many seeing, shall not beleuee that it is he, &c. And for the vnder-standing of this prophecie, which they attribute particularly vnto king D. Sebastian, they say, that he was twice ginen; first, by the intercession of the people of Portugall for his birth, when they saw his father die, leauing no other issue but what might be hoped for from a woman with child: the second by the acknowledgement they haue made of him at Venice, after that he had wandered twentie yeares yknowne throughout the world: That the wooden horse is the galley vpon the which he came from Naples into Spaine.

Sampayo sweares, that he found this other prophecie at S. Vitor's Librarie at Paris:
That the king D. Sebastian shall goe out of Naples vpon a horse of wood: that out of the Mediterranean sea he shall enter into the Ocean, and that his horse shall stay at S. Lucar of Ba-rameda. The which is accomplished, when as the galley passing from Naples to Barcelona, entered into the Ocean sea.

This other was found in a Castilian Author, in his language: The yknowne shall come, yea without doubt he shall come: he shall enter into the garden by the gate which is most on this side the wall: and that which seemes obscure, shall be seene clearly and plainely. By this garden they vnderstand the countrey which is on this side Mont Calpe vnto the riuer of Guadalquivir, which they call the garden of Spaine, for that it is pleasant and fruitfull: the wall is Cadiz, the gate S. Lucar of Barameda.

That the labourers of Portugall did hold for a most ancient tradition, That a time will come, when as a King, whose name shall be as Bysia, shall vanishe out of sight, and that after he and his realme haue suffered many great afflictions and miseries, the same king, whom all the world held for dead, shall rise againe, and recover his throne with incredible prosperitie. Which they say must needs be applied to their king D. Sebastian, for that the peasants in Portugall, in stead of Sebastian, say Be-sistam.

And as they hold these predictions to be accomplished in the person of this prisoner, so it is not possible to root out this beleefe. That he is the true and naturall D.
Sebastian, king of Portugall. Sampayo after he had proclaimed this miraculous adventure ouer all Christendome, and runne into a thousand dangers for his sake, he went again into Portugall with Frier Bonauenture, a Franciscan: where publishing this opinion as a most certaine truth, they bred such a mutinie among the people, as they were ready to make a generall revolt, if they had found any assistance with strangers: but being in the end discouered at S. Lucar, they were degraded of their Orders, and hanged at Lis-bone, with horrible tormentes, the which notwithstanding could not stop their mouths, but Predictions alledged by the Distinguisht

Iuror of D. Sebastian.

Sampayo and Bonauenture hung for this Gallerien.

but they tooke earth, heaven, and all heauenly creatures, yea and God himselfe, to whom the most hidden secrets are knowne, to winnesse of their innocencies and words, the which they maintained vnto the last gaspe to be as true as the Gospel; so as through compassion of their cruell tortures, and the firme beleefe which they had setled in the hearts of their countreymen, they drew many thousands into danger. Some retired themselves vnto their friends, to escape the search which was made for the adherents of this noueltie: some got them away disguised, and escaped into diuers provinces here and there. Some comming to Paris presented a petition vnto the king in the name of the Portugals oppressed by the tyrannie of the Castilian, beseeching his Maiestie to succour them onely with two thousand men, commanded by a Prince, or some great man of Fraunce, such as he should please to name, and some store of armes to disperse among the people at their arriual, being assured (said they) of money for their entertainment, and other munition of warre both by sea and land, which the Queene of England and the Estates should furnish them, to restore their lawfull king, and free them from the command of strangers. Moreouer, they gaue hope, in case they might recover their king D. Sebastian, vniually detained prisoner, whenas they should cause him to be duely acknowledged, and restore vnto him his inheritance, to marrie the duke of Vendosme with the daughter of D. Catherine duchesse of Braganca, who had right to the succession of the realme of Portugal, and to crowne him king of Portugal, if it should so please the most Christian king his naturall father. But God hath not blest the voyages made into Portugal, with a designe to drawe it from the Spaniard, who hath enioyed it quietly for many yeares; and a wise man will not prouoke the wrath of a mightie prince, by drawing him into warre, the end whereof must needs be doubtfull and ruinous.

The Spaniard considering the attempts of the Portugals, who would willingly trouble heauen, earth, yea and hell it selfe, to free themselves from his subiection, hee caused their pretended king to be taken out of the royall galley of Naples, and to be brought to Seuille in the galley of D. Pedro de Toledo the Generall, there to be more safely kept. But afterwards, to take all knowledge from the world, hee caused him to be shut vp in the castle of S. Lucar. The Portugals hope that hee shall come forth in despite of all his enemies, and fulfill all the prophecies that are made of him, and recover possession of his realmes. It is in the power of the king of Spaine, but it is not likely that hee will seeke to verifie the qualitie of this person by any other meanes: for if hee causeth him to be declared an impostor, and to be punished, the Portugals who had procured him to maintaine himselfe to be their king, might hereafter suborne another to the same end; whereas so long as they shall seeue this man is aliue, they will not attempt any thing in fauour of another, and this man being detained perpetually in prison, or in the galleys, shall daily feele the paines of death, without dying. And if he were duely proued to be such as hee qualifieth himselfe, reason and equitie would require that he should be restored to the iust and lawfull possession of his Estates, which is the fairest rofle of the Spaniards ground, and the rarest peeple of his cabinet.

Whatsoever hee bee, Donatus and Delphinus Procurators of Saint Marc at Venice, being sent to congratulate the French kings victories, and his marriage, they were demanded by the Prince of Conde, what iudgement the seigniorie of Venice made of him who called himselfe king of Portugal; to whom they made no other answer, but that the State had done what it might in his cause, and that he had bene ill counselled and conducted.

This yeare the Queene of England was much troubled with her rebels in Ireland, by reason of the aide and support they received from Spaine: the king sending D. John d. Aguilar vnto them, with about two thousand old souldiers in sixe ships: they came to Castel-hauen, Balmemoore, and Beer-hauen; all three important places; here they landed their men, with an intent to fortifie them, being then about the end of September. Sir Richard Lewison, who was Admiral of some of the Queens ships, lying then in the haven of Kinfale, & hearing of the Spaniards comming into the aboue named ports, he drew forth his ships both against wind and weather, & went & fought with the Spaniards within Castel-hauen, where he did so batter them, as he made 5 of their 6 shippes vnseruiceable,

Gallies sent in the Castle of
S. Lucar.

Policy of the Counsell of Spaine.

Spaniards sent into Ireland.

A seruiceable, most of their men were landed before he came, by reason of the weather, who played dangerously vpon him with their ordnance from the land, whereof they were well furnished with great store of munition. Presently after D. John d. Aguilar put himselfe into Kinfale with most of his Spaniards, where he fortified himselfe: whither in October after, the Lord Montjoy, Lord Deputie of Ireland; and Generall of her Maiesties forces in that kingdom, came with an armie to besiege him; the which continued long in a very vnseasonable time, and was in shew very dangerous for the English: for they within the towne were for the most part old souldiers, well armed, and in no want, as was supposed, and without the rebels were all in armes, and had drawne their forces together, which were the greatest that euer had bin seene together in Ireland, being fixe thousand foot (whereof there were fixe companies of the new arriued Spaniards) and five hundred horse, and began to march towards Kinfale, with an assured hope to releue the towne, raise the siege, and defeat the English, if they of the towne did fallie forth when as Tyrone and Odonell should giue charge vnto the campe: they had great reason to hope for good successe, for the English were scarce so many in number, all in a manner tyred with the miseries of a long winters siege, their horses weake and decayed, and likely to want victuals. Notwithstanding, continuing their approaches still towards the towne, as if they regarded not the rebels, on the twentieth of Decenber at night, the Lord Deputie had intelligence that Tyrone and the rebels would campe the next night within a mile and a halfe of them, with all their forces; and so on the 21 day at night he shewed himselfe, with most of his horse and foot, vpon the toppe of a hill, within a mile of the English campe. I must craue pardon if I make a relation of this battell, and the overthrow of the rebels armie in this historie of Spaine, both for that they were then relieved by the king of Spaine, with money, men, and munition, and supported in their rebellion; and also for that the yeelding vp of Kinfale by the Spaniards, depended wholly vpon this action.

Tyrone (hearing himselfe (as I said before) and seeing two regiments of foot, with some horse, drawne out of the campe, and marching towards him, he retired to the other side of the hill, where he camped that night, being fortified both with woods and water. One the three and twentieth day the Lord Deputie was aduertised, and had also intercepted letters, written from D. John d. Aguilar General of the Spaniards, and commaunded him within the towne, by which he did presse and importune Tyrone to make an attempt vpon the English campe, intimating his wants, and likelihood to be soone forced, putting the rebels in mind of their faithfull promises to succour him, and of the easinesse of the enterprise, and vndoubted successe, assuring them that the English were much decayed in numbers, and that those which remained were much weakened with that long winters siege; so as it was not possible they should be able to maintaine so much ground as they had taken when their strength was full: if they on the one side, and he on the other, charged them at one instant, which he for his part promised to doe whensoever they should giue the attempt. It seemeth that vpon this aduice they resolved to put it in execution that night, or the next following. In the meane time they gaue the English continuall alarms, and made sallies from the towne, keeping them still in action, that they might be the lesse able to make resistance when they were charged. But the Lord Deputie provided for all inconueniences, making forts, barricadoes, and trenches, and fortifying all the approaches to the towne, keeping good gards, and his armie ready vpon all occasions. On the 23 day at night hee was assured that the next day the rebels would charge his campe, whereupon he commanded the whole armie to be in readinesse.

Tyrone had an intent early in the morning to put all his Spaniards into the towne, with eight hundred of his best Irish, vnder Tyrrell; but seeing at the breake of day some of the English troupes aduance, hee made a stand, and then retired to the body of their armie. The Lord Deputy giuing the charge of the campe to Sir George Carew then L. President of Munster, to attend the Spaniards within the towne, hee drew forth part of his forces, being about foure hundred horse, and a thousand and two hundred foot, and hearing that the enemy retired disorderly, hee aduanced towards them, who still retired with feare. In the end, (omitting euery particular circumstance touching the marshalling of the English armie, to them that write that historie) they

Kinfale besieged with the Spaniards in it.

Readynesse his is injected into the history.

Letters from
D. John d. Aguilar to the L. Deputie.

English and Spaniards defended in Ireland.

they ouertooke the rebells, charged them, and put them to rout. The Spaniards (being abandoned by the Irish) were almost all slaine, D. Alonso d'Ocampo their colonell, with three Captaines, fixe Alferes, and fortie soldiers were taken prisoners. There were found (of Irish onely) twelue hundred bodies dead vpon the place, and about twelue hundred hurt, whereof many died that night. The rebells lost two thousand armes which were brought forth, all their munition, their drummes, nine ensignes, whereof fixe were Spanishe: the English had but one man slaine, and not aboute tenne hurt. Thus they got a miraculous victorie, to the great honor of the Lord Deputie, and of all that commanded vnder him.

After this glorious victorie, the Lord Deputie posted that present day vnto the camp, lest the Spaniard should haue made some fallie in his absence, but they had not attempted any thing: the next day he commanded the approaches vnto the towne should be aduanced nearer: But after fixe or fixe daies worke, D. John d'Aguilar, who commanded the forces within the towne, offered to parle, and sent a drumme with a letter sealed vp to the Lord Deputie, by the which he demanded that some men of qualitie and sufficiencie might be sent into the towne from his Lordship, to conferre with him, whom hee would acquaint with such conditions as hee then stood vpon: wherunto the Lord Deputie condescended, imploying Sir William Godolphin in that busines; the which was managed after this manner, according to the originall.

D. John d'Aguilar speaks

D. John told Sir William, that having found the Lord Deputie (whom hee termed Viceroy) although a furious and powerfull, yet an honourable enemye, and the Irish not onely weak and barbarous, but (as he feared) treacherous friends, he was so farre in his affections reconciled to the one, and distastd with the other, as it did inuite him to make an ouerture of such a composition as might be safe and profitable for the state of England with least prejudice to the Crowne of Spaine, by deliuering into the Viceroyes power the towne of Kinsale, with all other places in Ireland held by the Spanishe, so as they might depart vpon honourable termes, fit for such men of warre, as are not enforced by necessity, to receiue conditions, but willingly induced vpon iust respects, to disengage themselves, and to leave a people, by whom their king and master had bin so notoriously abused, if not betrayed. That if the Viceroy liked to entertaine further parley touching this point, he would first be pleased to vnderstand them rightly, and to make his Propositions such as might be futable to men throughly resolved, rather to bury themselves alive, and to indure a thousand deaths, than to giue way to one article, that should taste of baseness or dishonor, being so confident of their present strength, and the royall succors of Spaine, as they should make no doubt of yielding a good accompt of themselves, and of their interest in this kingdome, but that a just disdain and spleene conceiued against the nation, dissuaded them from being farther ingaged for it, than of necessity they must.

Sir William Godolphin having charge from the Lord Deputie, only to receiue D. Johns propositions and demands, hauing made this relation to his Lordship, and the Council, he was sent backe by them with this answer following.

Answer from the Lord Deputie to D. John

That although the Lord Deputie hauing lately defeated their succours, did so well vnderstand his owne strength and their weaknesse, as it made him nothing doubt offering them within a short time, whom hee knew to be prest with vnresistible difficulties, how much soeuer they laboured to couer and conceale them: yet knowing that her sacred Maestie out of her gracious and mercifull disposition, would think the glorie of her victorie blemished, by a voluntary effusion and oblitinate expence of blood, was content to entertaine this offer of agreement, so as it might be concluded vnder such honourable Articles for her Highnesse, as the aduantage he had against them gaue reason to demand. The which were the same that are set downe in the Articles of Agreement following, signed by the Lord Deputie, D. John and others: sauing that there was an Article more in them, for the leasing of his treasure, munition, ordnance, and the Queens naturall subiects to her disposition; all which points he did peremptorily refuse: Protesting that both he and all his would rather indure the last of miseries, than be found guilty of so foule a treason against the honor of his prince, and the reputation of his profession, although

A although hee should find himselfe vnable to subsist, much more now when as hee might not onely hope to sustaine the burthen of the warre for a time, but with patience and constancy in the end overcome it. That heeooke it so ill to be misunderstood in having articles of that nature propounded vnto him, as were they but once againe remembered in the capitulation, the Viceroy should from thenceforth vse the aduantage of his sword, and not the benefite of his former offer: adding, that the Viceroy might rather thinke to haue made a good and profitable purchase for the realme of England, if with the expence of two hundred thousand ducats hee had procured D. John to quit his interest and footing but in Balmore alone, speaking nothing of Kinsale, Castell-haen, & Beerhaen: for said he, suppose that all wee with the rest of our places here had perished, yet would that Peninsula being strong of its owne nature, bettered by our art and industrie, (furnished as it is with victuals, munition, and good store of ordnance) preserve vnto the king of Spaine, a safe and commodious Port for the arrival of his fleet, and bee able to maintaine it selfe against a Land armie of tenne thousand, vntill Spaine (being so deeply ingaged) did in honour releue them: which would drawe on a more powerfull inuasion than the first, being vnder taken vpon safe groundes, at the instance of a safe and barbarous people, who in discouering their weakenesse and want of power, haue armed the king my master to relie vpon his owne strength, being bound in honour to relieue his people which are ingaged, and to cancel the memorie of our former misfortunes. But this is spoken, said he, in case the Viceroy be able to force this towne, as I assure my selfe hee cannot, hauing vpon mine honour, within three wales at this instant, about two thousand fighting men, which are strong and able, besides which some hauing been sicke and hurt recover daily, the greatest part of these consisting of old Soldiers, which shal not but by the sword, and those that were new, being now both trained to their arms, and acquainted with the clymate, are more able to endure than at the first: our means as good as they haue bene any time these two moneths, such as Spaniards can wel indure, and able to suffice vs three moneths more: we lodge in good warme houses, haue store of munition, and (which is best of all) stand well assured, that our succour will be here shortly. To bee plaine, wee preserve our men, and reserve our strength the best we may, hoping to front you in a breach, which (if our hearts faile vs not) wee haue hands and breks enow to stop, against treble your forces: but I wil giue the Viceroy this right, that his men are passing good, yet spent and tyred with the miseries of a Winter seage, which hee hath obstinately maintained beyond my expectation, but with such caution, and vpon so good gard, as hauing nicely watched all aduantages, I could neuer fasten a falley yet vpon him, but with losse to my selfe: wherein I must confesse my hopes were deceived, that grounding vpon some error in his approaches, I promised vnto my selfe the defeat of at least a thousand men at one blow. But when wee meet vpon a breach, I am confident vpon good reasons, to lay fixe hundred of your best men on the ground, and rest hopefull that the losse of those will make a great hole in an army, which hath already suffered so much extremity.

B But to conclude our businesse: the king my master sent me to assist the Condees, Onesale and Odonnell, presuming on their promise, that I should within few daies after the arrival of our forces haue ioyned with them: I expected them long in vaine, sustained the Viceroyes armie, saw them drawne to the greatest head they could possibly make, lodged within two miles of Kinsale, fortified with certaine companies of Spaniards, euerie hour promising to releue vs, and being ioyned together to force your campe: At last we saw them broken with a handfull of men, and dispersed into diuers parts of the world, Odonnell into Spain, Onesale into the farthest parts of the North: so as now I finde no such Condees in vicinam natura, as I came to ioin with: and therefore haue moued this accord the rather to disengage the king my master from assisting a people so vnable in themselves, as the whole burthen of the warre must lie vpon him, and so perfidious, as perhaps they might be drawne in the end to betray him.

F Vpon relation made, by Sir William Godolphin, to the Lord deputy & Council, of these offers made by D. John, it was thought good, for many important reason to proceed roundly to an accord, there being nothing propounded by him that admitted any exception,

E e e e e

but

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

Articles of the accord as Kin-sale.

but that he demanded to carrie away his ordnance, munition & treasure, which did not for much import, as it should breake off the treatie which concerned the common good and safety of the kingdom: whereupon a composition was made vpon these articles following.

1 That said D. John d' Aguilar shall quit the places which are held by the Spaniards, or other souldiers vnder his command in Castell-hauen, Baltemore, and in the Castell of Beerhanen; or other places, to the Lord deputy, or to whom he shall appoint, giuing him safe transportation & sufficient shipping and victuals for his said Souldiers, with the which the said D. John may passe with them into Spaine, if he may, at one time, if not at two shippings.

2 That the Souldiers which are at this present vnder the command of the said D. John in this kingdom, shall not beare armes against the Queenes Maiesty of England, wherefoer supplies shall come from Spaine, vntill the said Souldiers be vnshipped in some of the Ports of Spaine, being sent away as soone as may be by the Lord Deputy, as hee promisseth vpon his faith and honour.

3 For the accomplishment whereof, the Lord deputy offereth to giue free passport to the said D. John and his army, as well Spaniards as other nations whatsoever, that are vnder his command, and that he may depart with his armes, munition, money, ensignes displayed, artillerie, and any other prouisions for warre, or other things, both that which is in Castell-hauen, Kinfales, and other places.

4 That they shall haue ships and victuals sufficient for their money, after such rates as they vse here to pay. That all the Souldiers and the said things may be shipped if it bee possible at one time, if not at two, and that to bee within the time aboue mentioned.

5 That if by contrarie winds, or any other accidents, there shall come into any of the ports of Ireland or England, any of those ships wherein the said Souldiers shall passe, they shall bee intreated as friends, and may ride safely in the harbour, & be victualled for their money, & shall moreover haue such things as shall be needfull to furnish them for their voiage.

6 That during the time they shall stay for shipping, victuals shall be giuen to D. Johns people, at reasonable rates.

7 That there shall be cessation of armes of either side, & security giuen that no wrong be offered to any one.

8 That the ships wherein the said Souldiers shall be transported for Spaine, may passe safely by any of the queenes Maiesties ships, of England, and so shall the said Queenes and her subiects by those that shall go from hence: and the said ships being arrived in Spaine, shall return as soone as they haue vnshipped their men without any impediment giuen them by his Maiestie, or any other person in his name, but rather they shall shew them fauour, and help them if they need any thing: and for securitie thereof they shall deliuer into the Lord deputies hands three Captaines, such as he shall chofe.

9 For assurance of the performance of these articles D. John promisseth that hee will confirme and sweare to accomplish this agreement, whereunto some of the captaines vnder his charge shall in like manner sweare.

10 That the said D. John shall remain within the realme of Ireland, where the Lord deputy shall appoint, vntill the last shipping, vpon his Lordships word, & if it happen that his souldiers be shipped all at once, the said D. John may go in the same fleet without any let, but rather the Lord deputy shall giue him a good ship wherein he may passe, and if his men go in two shippings, then he shall go in the last.

11 And in like manner the said Lord deputy shall confirme & sweare the same, & giue his word in the Q. Maiesties behalf & his own to keep & accomplish this accord, & that the chiefe officers of the camp, with the council of state, & some nobles shold sweare the like.

These were the articles of the accord made before Kinfales, for the sending the Spaniards out of Ireland, & freeing this kingdome from an imminent danger. They were signed & sworn accordingly on both parts the 2 of Ianuary, and the towne yielded vpon the ninth.

At such time as the duke of Biron's treasons were discovered in France, the king of Spain had an army ready to passe at Pont de Grefin, vpon the frontiers of Bourgundy vnder command of passing into Flanders: but the passages being kept by the marshal Lauerdin, Taxis his ambassador for Spain demaied passage of the king, beseeching him to think that the king

Answer made
by the French king to the em-bassador of Spain.

Lib. 31.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

1319

1602

A his master had not fought to draw the duke of Biron from his obedience. To whom the king answered, you would haue me believe that the king your master was not acquainted with the praefises which the marshal of Biron had with the Cont Fuenter, & I tel you that it is impossible his treasure shold haue bin so freely distributed, without the consent of his council: I haue no reason to leaue my frontiers disarmed vntill that all the marshals conspiracy be discovered by his process. In the mean time I do not mean to hinder the commerce according to the treaty.

The Cont of Fuentes not able to dissemble his discontent, to see matters fall out so contrary to his desires, he discharged his rage vpon the marquisse of Final, sometimes pretending a donation of the said Marquisate to the king of Spaine, when as the Marquisse was verie sicke: and sometimes that he should haue a principality in the realm of Naples in exchange, but he first seized vpon the place, and then published his pretensions: Hee sent D. Diego Pimentel his nephue, & D. Sancho d' Luna with some troups of souldiers, who surprised Final, hauing corrupted the Lads knits which were there in garrison with a promise of 16 moneths pay, assuring himselfe both of the countrey and Port by a garrison of 200 Spaniards vnder the command of D. Pedro de Toledo. Milefimo a place nere vnto it was by the same right purchased by the king of Spaine. The Marques of Final, who is vassall to the emperor, made his complaints vnto the pope, & vnto his imperial maiesty, but they had no other effect, but that he had a pension giue him during his life, & so was forced to yeeld vnto the stranger. By this prize the Genouois did hereafter reap no profit by their Commerce with Spain, but what pleased the governor of Final. Doubtlesse that seruant loues his masters greatnes with passion, which doth raish another mans inheritance without any lawfull cause, or precedent wrong, neither respecting reason nor equitie, nor considering that God is offended with such violences. But king Philip did not limit and bound his hopes with so small a purchase. That great leuie which was made at Naples, in Sicile, in the dutchie of Milan, and in many estates of Italy, witnessed that his desires flue a higher pitch. It was thought they would either renew the enterprise of Alger, or make head against Cigala, who they said was coming out of Constantinople with a fleet of 100 faile. As the designe was secret, so was it not known who should be generall. Andrew Doria had demanded leaue to retire himselfe, he had been vnfortunat the year before, & therefore he thought the Spaniards would not willingly employ him againe. The duke of Sauoy seemed willing to accept of this charge, if it were offered: but it was giuen to D. John de Cordona, who shall be no more fortunate in his enterprises than Doria. The chief designs of this army were rather against the Christians than the Turks & Moors, although it were giuen out that the king of Fez had intelligences vpon Alger, & that he had promised the K. of Spain to make him master thereof: yet this army did not forsake the sight of Europe, & some thought it lay howering to see what would become of the treasons which were praefised in France. But want of money & some other difcommodities made them to giue ouer al attempts for this yere against the Turks. These were the opinions of the king of Spains designs, & withall they added that d' Albigny was gone to Milan to the earle of Fuentes, that the marques of Aix had past into Spaine, and that the duke of Sauoy was ready to intange himself wholly to the will of the coucel of Spain, to whom he did consign his 3 Sons. That he had made them knights of his order, to prepare the for the voyage, & had sent an extraordinary ambassador to Rome to beseech the Pope to send them his blessing.

There were 8 great gallies made ready this yere at Scuile, the which were appointed to be sent into Flanders to the Archduke, vnder the command of Frederic Spinola, to annoy the coast of England, Holland & Zeland. There were 400 men in either of these gallies, besides the slaues, and 800 souldiers more which they tooke in passing by Lisbon. Two of these gallies called the Trinity & the Ocean were sunk by sir Rich. Lewis vpon the coast of Portugal, the rest a while after went on their course towards the low-countries. Commensel bewixt England & France, they were first discovered & pursued by sir Robert Mansel, being then admiral of the queenes maiesties ships in those seas, who lay there of purpose to attend them, he hauing them in chase, the States ships which lay in the downs vpon his aduertisement came in, & in the end the said gallies were defeated, some were sunk and the rest made vnersuiciable. This great seruice was diuersly reported according to the humors & passions of men. The Hollanders did challenge all the honor of this action, & did publish

Earle of Fuentes takes the Marquisate of Final.Arms of Spaniards at Sea.Duke of Sauoy refuses to send his sonnes into Spain.Gallies sent out of Spain into the Low countries.

Eeecccej luff

lish in print in diuers languages. Sir Rob. Mansel finding the state interessed, & his reputation somewhat blemished by their pamphlets, made a true relation of the whole seruice, the which he presented vnto the lord admirall, vnder whose comand he was, & published it to the view of the world, with an offer to maintaine it by any course fit for a gentleman that professed arms. And for that the Statesmen haue left their assertions recorded in their history, & haue made the French to write it after the same maner, I haue thought good for the better satisfaction of posterity, to insert in this history, in the same words and phrase as hee himselfe hath set it down, speaking in his own person as followeth.

On the 23 day of September, being in the Hope, & hauing in my company, the Advantage only of the Q. ships, which captain Jones commanded, & two other Dutchmen of war I had more the half channell over, towards the coast of France, vpon a northwest & southeast line, my self being next that coast, captain Jones next vnto me, & the Dutch men of war a sea-board, & to the Westward of him. The final force at that time present & with me remaining, thus disposed for the intercepting of the gallies, hauing dismissed the Dutch men of war that serued vnder me, vpon their own intreaty to rescindual & trim: & hauing employed the rest of the Q. ships vpon especial seruices, I desired from my top mast heads, 6 low sailes, which some made for ground from Diep towards the Downes. To which opinion (though their top-sailes, being bound from Diep towards the Downes. To which opinion (though I inclined most) yet caused I the matter to waite and to stand with them, that I might leame some news of the gallies, which by your Lordships aduertisement sent me, I knew had either past me that night, or were nere at hand, vnlesse the sea had swallowed them vp in the stormes which had raged 3 daies before. Hauing set my selfe vnder saile, the weather waxt thick, which caused me to lask some two points fro the wind, towards the English coast, least the continuance of that dark weather might giue them power to runne out ahead of me. About 11 of the clock the weather cleared, when I discoursed them plainly to be the Spanish gallies so long time expected; at which time with the rest, I plied to receiue them by crossing their forefoot as they stood alongst the Channell: which they endeououred, till they perceived that by the continuance of that course, they could not escape the power of my Ordnance.

All this time these two Fly-boats were betwixt them and me, and as the slaues report that swamme ashore at Douer, they determined with three gallies to haue boarded each of those ships, and would haue executed that resolution, but for the feare of her Maiesties great Gallion (as they rearmend the Hope) whose force that they shunned in that kind (considering the disadvantage that twice fixe of the best gallies that euer I saw, hath by fighting against one ship of her force) I doe as much commend, as otherwise I doe detest their shamefull working, in that, full of cowardlinesse and weakness, they rowed backe to the Westward, and spent the day by running away, in hope that the darknesse of the night would giue them liberty sufficient to shun the onely ship they feared, or that was indeed in the sea at that time, to giue them cause of feare, I meane betwixt them & Dunkerke or Newport. This error only of theirs bred their confusion, as you may perceiue by the sequel. For they no sooner began that course of rowing backe again; but I instantly made signes for Captaine Jones in the Advantage of the Queenes, to come vnto me whom I presently directed to repaire to Calais road, & thence to send the alarm vnto the States army prepared before Sluce: and to aduise such men of warre as kept on the coast of Flanders, vpon any other occasion, to stand off to the sea, to meet with the gallies in the night, which shold be chased by me with my lights in my top-mast heads & a continual discharging of my ordnance. Captain Jones hauing shap't his course according to my directions, I gave order for hoysing & trimming of my sailes by the wind, to keep fight of the gallies: the two Fly-boats being still aweather of me, did the like. Which chase we held till sunne-setting, obseruing this course following all the day. They being a weather of me, kept their continuall boards, that the gallies were alwaies betwixt them. And my self being to leeward, made such short turns, as I kept all the afternoon in a manner, even in the verie eye of their course, betwixt them & the place of their design: euer discharging my best ordnance to warn the Answer of her Maiesties, that rid by my directions at the Downes, vpon important seruice as your Lordship knoweth; and the Flemings that were there, hauing left the Sea vpon yknowne groundes to mee (yet sent from

Portsmouth

A Portsmouth, by the most prouident direction of her sacred Maiestie, to awaite the comming of the Gallies, vpon aduertisements that her Highnesse receiued of their being put to sea, to set saile, who else had receiued no vnderstanding of the Gallies, neither came they within shot of them, till after night, how soeuer the reputation of the seruice is wholly challenged by them.

Hauing giuen your Lordship an accompt how this day was thus spent by me, from eight of the clocke vntill the euening, and with these onely helps: I beseech your Lordship to be pleased to vnderstand, that with the setting of the Sunne, I could both discern the ships last mentioned vnder saile at the downes, and the Gallies to haue set their sailes: directing their course close aboard our shoare, each of them beeing out of sight of the other, and my Dutch consorts by this time to haue beene left by the Gallies to a sterne chase. When I perceived them to hold that course, which would bring them within shot of the Answer, and the rest that were in the Downes: I held a cleane contrarie course from them towards the coast of France, to confirme the fewe passage they thought to find on our coast, which I continued, vntill the report of their battery gaue me assurance of the Gallies being engaged vnto them.

How the batterie began, who began it, how it was continued, how ended, and to whom the reputation of the seruice is due, I leaue to be considered by your Lordship, by the perusal of the true discourse following. The Answer of the Queenes, which Captaine Bredgate commanded, as she rid most Southerly aeth the Downes than the Flemings, so came the first to the Gallies, and bestowed 28 peeces of Ordnance on them before the Flemings came in, who at length seconded him with verie many shot.

During this batterie of ours vpon the gallies (which I so terme, because they neuer exchanged one shot) at the very first report of the Answeres ordnance, I directed the master of my ship to bear vp with the south end of the Goodwin, with which direction I deliuered my reasons publicly, as I stood on the poope of my ship, viz. That if I stood directly into them, the gallies, before I could recouer the place, would either be driuen a shoare or sunk and so would there proue no need of my force; or else by their nimble sailing they would escape the ships, of whom (once getting ahead) they could receiue no impediment: for there was no one ship but the Advantage in the sea that could hinder them to recouer any port in Flanders or the East countries (Sluce onely excepted) vnlesse I staid them at that sand head. Hauing recovered as neere that place as I desired, I staid at least a quarter of an houre, before I could either see galley, heate or see any of those ships, their lights or report of their ordnance, which made me and all my company hold opinion that they had outsailed the Answer, and the rest of the Flemings, and shunned sight of mee by going afeaboard of my ship: which I so verily beleueed, as I once directly determined to saile for Sluce, with hope onely that the preparation which I knew the States had there, would be able to prevent their entrance into that place. Whilst I remained thus doubtfull, or rather hopelesse to hinder their recouerie of Dunkerke or Newport, in case they had bin afeaboard of me, some of my company desired a single galley plying from the shoar to get ahead of my ship. When she approached within caluer shot, I discharged about 30 peeces of ordnance of my lower and vpper tire at her alone, my selfe with many other in my ship saie when her maineyard was shot afinder, heard the report of many shot that hit her hull, heard many their most pittifull outcries, which when I perceived to continue, & instead of making way from me, to neer me what she could, I forbore shooting, & commanded one that spake the Portugall language, to tel them that I was contented to receiue them to mercy: which I would accordingly haue performed, had not the other 5 gallies offered to stand out ahead of me at that very instant, & thereby would haue left me as they had both the first two Dutch ships, and afterwards the Answer with the rest of the Flemings, had I omitted any small time of executing the advantage I had of their being on my broad side, which as appares was so effectually employed (howsoeuer the might wherein this seruice was performed, might hinder the particular mention of their hurts) as none can deny but that God pleased thereby onely to worke their confusion. For since that time none hath said or can speake of any one shot made towards them: yet foure of them are sunke and wrecked, the fift past doing the enemy seruice,

Eccccij

and

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

and the sixt they are forced to new build at Dunkerke, where (if I be not much deceived) G she will proue more chargeable than profitable, if the default rest not in our selues.

The disagreement between the Dutch captaines themselves touching the stemming and sinking of the gallies (whereof one challenged before your Lordship, and in many other publicke places, to haue stemmed and sunke two himselfe) and the printed Pamphlet containing the stemming and sinking of three Gallies, giueth the reputation thereof to three severall Captaines, amongst whom no mention is made of the first; and whereas there are but two in all sunke; I leaue to bee reconciled amongst themselves, and to your Lordship, whether that the same of right appertaineth not to her Maiesties ship the Hope, in respect of the allegations before mentioned, euerie particular whereof being to bee proued by the oathes of my whole company and maintained with the hazard of my life with that which followeth.

1 As the shooting of the single Gallies mainyard asunder, my bestowing about thirtie peeces of ordnance vpon that one Gallie, within lesse then Caluier shot.

2 That they in the Gallie made many lamentable outcries for my receiving them vnto mercie.

3 That I would accordingly haue received them, but for giuing them out to encounter with the other five Gallies, which else had left me to a steme chase.

To these reasons I adde the assertions of the Viceadmiral himselfe, who told me (whatsoever he spake in other places) that one of the Gallies, which he stemmed, had her mainyard shot asunder before his coming aboard her: by whom sooner (she was then stemmed, your Lordship may iudge, who ruind her, considering she made no resistance, by his owne report, but by crying to him for mercie).

Touching the other galley stemmed and sunke, I haue already proued how free (as all the rest) had got ahead the Answer of the Queenes not named, and the rest of the States men of warre with her, who challenge the whole credit of this seruice. They (as all other Sea-men) cannot deny but that the gallies will outsaile all ships, in such a loome gale of wind and smooth sea, as we had that night.

The Gallies being then faster offshale than they, how could they by any means possible fetch them vp, but by some impediment? impediment they received none, but by my ordnance: which amounted to fiftie great shot at those five which came last from the shoare, when all the ships were about a mile assteme.

Some notwithstanding out of their detracting dispositions may perchance say, that the two which were wrecked at Newport would haue perished by storme, though they had not bene battered. Whereunto I haue sufficiently answered, first in shewing that they might haue recovered any of the places thereabouts before eight of the clocke that night but for mee; and then the second time before the morning, had they not bene encountered by me alone, at the South-sand head: Yet for further proofe that they miscaried by our batterie onely, I say that if one of the gallies which received least damage by our ordnance did our liue Fridaies storme, continuing till L Saturday noone, being driven among the llands of Zealand to recouer Calais; then surely those two (vntill they had bene exceedingly torne) would haue made shift to haue recovered the ports of Newport, Graueling or Dunkerke; especially fith from the place where I battered them, they might haue bene at the remotest of those places about foure houres before any storme beganne. But such seemed their hast to saue their liues, as their thought ran of a shoare, and not of a harbour.

Now that I haue deliuered vnto your Lordship the whole & true discourse of this business, I shall forbear to trouble your patience with any further relation of that night & next daies spending my time (though the same in their chase had like to haue cost her Maiestie her ship, and the liues of as many as were in her) and conclude with admiration of their not holding her Maiesties ship, nor I (her vnworthie fith seruant) and then and yet by her Highnesse grace and your Lordships fauour, Admirall of the forces in that place, are not once mentioned: especially fith the fixe Gallies might safely haue arrived before seven of the clock that night at any of the Ports of Flanders to the Westward of Ostend. And that the Dutch ships had not come fro an anchor in the Downes, but for the

Lib. 31.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A the signes they receiued from me. Then that the force of her Majesties ship, wherein I was, enforced them to keepe close aboard the English shore, whereby those ships in the Downes had power giuen them to come to fight, which fight was begun by the Answer of the queenes.

And lastly, fith the gallies escaped their batterie, and had gotten ahead those ships, about a mile at least, and neuer receiued any impediment after, but onely by me, who lingered them (as you haue heard) vntill the coming vp of those ships that challenge to stemme them: which being granted, I cannot see how any other credit can rightly be giuen them (for that steme I meane) than to a lackey for pillaging of that dead bovie

B which his master had slaine.

Thus much I haue set downe out of his owne mouth, touching the seruice that was done vpon those six gallies of Spaine.

This year there was a new fleet made readie in Spaine, the which bred a ieaousie in the French, and made them to stand vpon their gard in Languedoc and Prouence. This fleet was readie to set saile, the which vnder colour of renewing the enterprise of Alger in Africke, might frame some designe vpon that coast. Prince Doris, and D. John de Cordoas, had bene both vnfortuned in their charges. The honour of Christendome made all men wish, that this execution might proue more successfull than the rest. But as bad designes do manie times prosper better than good, the successe depending commonly on the blindness of fortune, this enterprise of Alger was no more successfull than the two former.

C It was managed by a Franciscan Frier, called Father Mathew, who promised as great glorie vnto himselfe, in chasing away those petie kings of Africke, as Aratus had of freeing Sicyonia of tyrans. He had negotiated with the king of Cycco, who promised (that for a certaine summe of money, whereof he should receiue fortie thousand crowns in hand) not onely to fauour any designe, but to declare himselfe openly against the king of Alger, and to reduce the towne to what condition they would: but there is a great difference betwixt saying and doing: And it is a great simplicitie to giue credit to an Infidell, seeing that treacherie is inseparable from his soule. The Viceroy of Majorca, who was General in this action, and with whom the king of Cycco had promised to

D joyne, approached with foure gallies vpon this assurance, and landed about an hundred men, to deliuer fortie thousand crownes vnto the Moores, who received the money, and deliuered the men into the hands of the Viceroy of Alger, where the Frier was slain, and the Viceroy retiring, freed their neighbours from ieaousie. They of Barcelona (who are subiect to the king of Spaine) did no lesse apprehend this armie than the Moores: they feared that the Catholike king would rake their priuiledges from them, as hee had done from them of Arragon; yet the passage of the three princes of Sauoy into Spaine, renewed their ieaousie in France. The duke came with them to Nice, where they attended the commoditie of their imbarcking, the princeesse Marguerite, his eldest daughter, commanding in Piedmont; and from thence they past to Barcelona, where they attended the kings pleasure, and were entertained with all the honours that might be done vnto princes of that alliance.

E The king of Spaine rejoyced at the dukes resolution, and seemed to haue a great desire to see them. He sent D. Henriques de Guzman to congratulate their arrivall, and to commaund them to take small journeyes, by reason of the heat of the season. Being come to Court, he made prince Filor, the dukes second sonne, Viceroy of Portugal: the which did much content the Portugals, to see the fruits of D. Beatrice, his great grandmother, who was daughter to D. Emanuel king of Portugall and married to Charles duke of Sauoy. The third sonne was afterwards made Archbishop of Toledo, and then cardinal.

The queene of England being dead this year, and the king of Scotland come to the succession of that Crowne, the king of Spaine sent D. John Baptista Taxis, earle of Villa Mediana, his embassadour into England, to witness vnto the king the great contentment hee receiued by his happie coming to the Crowne, who after his first audience of congratulations and ordinarie complements, made a speech vnto the king to this effect.

The king of Spaine, my master, assuring himselfe to find the same effects and affection

1603 Armie of Spaine
at sea.Moores treacherous.Passage of the prince of Piedmont into SpainKing of Spaine sends an embas-sador into England.

1603 Speech of the ambassador of Spaine to the king of England. "ons of friendship in you, being king of England, which you have alwayes made shew of G vnto him being king of Scotland, hath sent me vnto your Maiestie, to confirme the sincer-
" itie, to desire the continuance, and to preferre it by all the proofes of friendship and affir-
" stance which he offers you, which is the same that many great princes haue desired, and " could not obtaine, and for that it is offered is no lesse necessarie, and to be wished for of " your Maiestie. If the king D. Philip the second, of glorious memorie, hath attempted " any thing against England, and queene Elizabeth against the Estates of Spaine, it was " more vpon some priuat spleene, than for any reason of State. But one tombe should " interre both their bodies and their passions. The successours doe inherit the great-
" nesse and power of their predecessors, but they are not tied to their designses, which haue H
" no end but the ruine one of another.

" The Catholike king hath such rich and goodlie Crownes in Europe, Asia, and A-" fricke, and at the East and West Indies, as they are sufficient to settle the desire of his am" bition within the bounds of his owne greatesse. If hee hath dealt in the affaires of a" ny other princes, it was to support them and keepe them from ruine, time hauing disco-
" uered how many things were readie to fall, if they had not bene vnderpropt by the " hand of D. Philip. The enemies of the house of Spaine haue published, That the am" bition of this prince was to make himselfe Monarch of all Christendome, and that hee
" had left these designses hereditarie to his posteritie. But the wiser sort may easily judge, I
" that if hee had bene so affected, he would haue carried himselfe otherwise, and begun
" the execution of the enterprise by Italie, in the which hee is the stronger, the conquest
" whereof would be easie, hauing such advantages.

" But as hee is contented to preferre his owne, and desires no lesse to raigne justly,
" than long and happily; so hee grieued to see his friends crosse him in a thing that is " so iust and reasonable. Complaints are free for all men, but they are more affection" ate among neighbours. My master, who holds you in this qualitie of a friend, and " will doe what possibly hee may that you be neuer other, complains to you of your " selfe. Hee cannot dissemble how much hee thinks himselfe wronged, for that your
" Maiestie doth affect the defence and protection of the rebels of the Low Countries,
" against their lawfull Lord, and that you haue larely granted them a great leuie of Scot- K
" tish men. Hee assures himselfe of all friendship and justice from you, and hee in-" treats you, that in calling home these Scottish men you will punish them as they
" haue deserved. Hee desires to treat sincerely with you, and beleues that your Maiestie " (considering how much the friendship of so mightie a prince should bee deere vnto you,
" and will be profitable) will seeke and imbrace it, and will neuer be so carelesse of his good,
" as to wish him ill.

King of Eng-lands answer to the Spanish am- bassador. "The king returned him many good words, to witnesse the alliance which hee de" sired to entertaine with the king of Spaine, vpon the like termes hee had with him asking
" of Scotland. But aduowning the Scottish troups which were sent to the generall Estates " of the vnited Provinces, to be leuied by his commendement, he said they had not pleased L
" any punishment; giuing leaue to king Philip to make vse of Scottishmen, if he de" sired; and letting him know, that he had not transgressed the lawes of neutralitie. And as for " their protection, he desired he should vnderstand, That the great interresse which En" gland hath with the vnited Provinces, as well in regard of their townes which they haue
" ingaged, as for the succours which they haue receiued from thence, did bind him to af-
" sist them, and to haue a care of their preferuation, and to second the intentions of the de" ceased queene, and to build vpon the foundations which she had laied; yet he desired to " see them all well reconciled with the king of Spaine.

Spaniards think vaine so power- full as their own king. "The ambassador (as my Author sayes) answered, That whosoever knew the power of " the king of Spaine, were not ignorant that he can easily bring the rebelled Provinces vn-
" der the yoke of his obedience, when hee shall please to make an enterprise equal to his " power: That no man should doubt, that hee that had passed the Hellespont, will easily
" passe the riuer of Granique; and that a prince which triumphs ouer so many nations,
" so many islands, so many seas, and so much firme land at the new-found world, will " not adde the islands of Holland and Zeland to his triumphant chariot: the wise will " alwayes

A alwaies giue the counsell which Phocion gaue vnto the Athenians, either to make them
" felues the strongest, or to be obedient vnto them that were so. He then desired leaue to en" ter into conference with some of his Maiesties Councill, and to consult of the meanes of " some treatie; which would be no lesse profitable and honourable to England, than to " Spaine: the which was granted him. After some meetings, the lords finding that he had " no power to treat, they attended other deputies, who came the next yeare with an ample " Commission, as you shall heare.

" There fell out two accidents, which had like to haue troubled the quiet of those two " great Monarchs of France and Spaine. The yeare before king Philip and the Archdukes " had imposed thirtie in the hundred vpon all marchandise which came in or went out of " the countries that were vnder their obedience: the which did seeme directly to infringe
" the treatie of Veruins. The French king commanded his ambassadors to deale with those " princes touching this imposition, and to aduertise him of their resolutions. But their an" swers, and the force they vsed afterwards to the kings subiects, to make them pay the im" position, did witnesse sufficiently, that they had no will to exempt them. Whereupon the " French king made a defence, That no marchandise should be carried out of France into " Spaine, or the Low Countries, that were vnder the Archdukes obedience, nor any bee " brought from thence into France, vpon corporall punishment, and losse of goods. But " this did not alter the peace, onely there were complaints made by the two kings one of " another. King Philip began: Hee tooke it ill that the French going voluntarily to serue
" the Estates, did prolong their rebellion, and did hinder the reduction of Ostend: that " the king did succour them with men and money; and that hee had forbidden his subiects to " traffique into Spaine and Flanders. But the king disauowed them that went to serue
" the Estates: If hee sent them money, it was (sayed he) but to pay that which hee had " borrowed: And the defence of traffique tended to no other end, but to force the king
" of Spaine and the Archduke to take away that intollerable imposition, and to let him " know, that France can liue better without the commodities of Spaine, than Spain with" out those of France.

" The second accident, or cause of jarre betwixt these two princes grew also from
" D Spaine; the French king complaining, and justly, That the secrets of his cabinet were " discovered to his enemies. Will the king of Spaine neuer cease (said he) to withdraw " my subiects from their due tie and loyalties? Will hee still entertaine some traitor " within my realme? My embassadour complains vnto me by his letters, that hee is so " slowly aduertised of our affaires, as the king of Spaines ministers know them before " him.

" The king being much troubled to find out the spring from whence this pestilent li" quor of Infidelitie did flow, behold God discovered the treacherie of Indus, by such " means as the wisdom of man could not find out. Villeroi, the chiefe Secretarie
" of State, who managed the greatest secrets of the kindome, had an vnder clerke,
" called Nicholas Lost, in whom hee reposed much trust, and the rather, for that his fa" ther had serued him long. This young man hauing attended on Monsieur de la Roche-
" fort, being embassadour in Spaine, there laied the plot of this treason, whereof you may
" read the whole discourse at large in the historie of France.

" There was some likelihood of a new enterprise this yeare vpon Africke. The king " of Culco, who had promised the last yeare to ioyne with the Spaniards against Alger,
" had receiued fortie thousand crownes vpon the bargain, and treacherously betrayed them
" that brought the money vnto their enemies, this yeare hee sent an embassa-
" dour vnto the king, who gaue him audience at Valencia: Which made many " thinke, that hee would make another attempt vpon Alger, for that he caused him
" F be conducted home by a Master of the campe, and an Engineer, giuing him great store of " munition, and fire-works, laden in three fregats.

" The king of Spaine being aduertise out of England, from his embassadour Taxis,
" of the successe of his embassage, and of the expectation of a treatie, hee appoint" ed the Constable of Castille to vndertake this charge, giuing him an ample " Commission, to treat and conclude a Peace betwixt England and Spaine: hee " past

1604 Imposition exacted by the Spaniard.

Treason of Lost.

Embassadors
from the king of Culco as Palencia.

Constable of Ca-stille sent into England.

pass through France, where he was verie honourably received, and so came into Flanders to the Archdukes, from whence he went into England, for the conclusion of the peace.

There were Commissioners appointed on either side: For the king of great Britaine were named, the earle of Dorset, high Treasurer of England, the earle of Nottingham, high Admirall of England, the earle of Deuonshire, Lieutenant of the kingdom of Ireland, the earle of Northampton, and the lord Vicomte Cranborne, principall Secretarie, and now earle of Salisbury, and high Treasurer of England; being all of his Majesties priuie Councell.

For the king of Spaine there were deputed D. John de Velasco, Constable of Castille and Leon, Duke of Frias, Earle of Haro, &c. D. John Baptista Taxis, Earle of Villa Mediana &c. and Alexander Rowidius a Lawyer, and Senator of Milan. The Archdukes sent for their Commissioners, Charles Earle of Aremberg, Counsellor of State, and Admirall to the said Archdukes, John Richardus Knight, President of the priuie Councell, and Counsellor of State, and Lodowike Verreiken, Knight their principal Secretarie. All these Commissioners, after many consultations and conferences, in the end concluded a peace, on the 18 of August, betwixt the two kings, their Estates and subiects, vpon certain articles, whereof I haue set downe the contents.

Articles of the peace betwixt England and
Spaine.

1 First it was concluded, That from thenceforth there should be a sincere and firme league and peace inuolubly obserued for euer, and in all places, betwixt the most renowned king of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, &c. and the most renowned king of Spaine &c. and the most renowned Archdukes of Austria, Dukes of Bourgondie, their heires and successors, their countries, dominions, and subiects, of what condition or degree soeuer they be, or may be.

2 That all acts of hostilitie should cease, and all wrongs and injuries done, during the troubles, be forgotten, so as there should be no action pretended for any depredations or spoiles committed, but all should be freely abolished, except such depredations as had bene committed since the 24 of April 1603: and that from thenceforth they and their subiects should forbear from all depredations and spoiles, and cause restitution to be made of any that should be after that time committed.

3 That neither of the aboue named princes, their heirs or successors, by himselfe or any other, should do, treat, or attempt any thing against the other, or against their kingdomes or dominions, vpon any pretence, nor assult or consent vnto any warre, attempt, or treatie, to the prejudice one of another.

4 That they should neither themselves giue, nor consent to be giuen by any of their vassals, subiects, or inhabitants, any aid, fauour, or supplie, vnto the enemies or rebels of either part, (whether they shall invade their countries, or withdraw themselves from their obedience and subiection) of souldiers, victuals, money, ordnance, and munition, or any other aid to maintaine warre.

5 That the said princes should, and did, renounce all leagues, confederations, and intelligence, made to the prejudice one of another, which did or might impugne this peace, & the contents thereof: all which they shall disannull, and declare to be of no force.

6 That the said kings and Archdukes should restraîne their subiects from doing any wrong, and should reuoke all Commissions and letters of Reprisall and Mart, of what nature soeuer, being to the prejudice of the said princes, or of their subiects, to whomsoever they haue bene granted: the which they shall declare to be void and of no force. And that whosoever should do to the contrary, should be punished criminally, and compelled to make restitution to the parties damaged.

7 That as concerning the townes of Fleissingue, Brill, Ramekins, and other forts thereunto belonging, in the which the souldiers of the king of England did remaine in Garrison, forasmuch as the said king affirmed, that by contracts formerly made betwene queene Elizabeth, of famous memorie (vnto whom his Maiestie did succceed) and the Estates of the vnited Prouinces, hee stood bound not to redeliuer the said townes and forts to any, but to such as had deliuered the same for caution; so as by the said contracts his Maiesties faith & honor (which he resolved to keep religiously towards all men) being inga-

A ingaged, he might not then restore those places vnto the Archdukes; yet hee promised to enter into treatie with the said Estates, wherein his Maiestie would assigne them a conuenient time to accept of conditions conformable to iustice and equitie, for a pacification with the renowned princes, his deere brethren: which if the Estates should refuse to accept, then his Maiestie, as being freed from the former conuention, would determine of those townes as hee should thinke most iust and honourable, wherein hee would doe all good offices for the said Princes, his louing brethren.

8 That the renowned king of England &c. would commaund the garrison souldiers not to serue the Hollanders, nor to succour them with victuals, armes, or any munition for warre, or other the king of Spaines or the Archdukes enemies, vpon any colour or pretext soeuer, nor doe any act of hostilitie against the king of Spaine, the Archdukes, or their subiects: And in like manner the king of Spaine and the Archdukes did promise, that no act of hostilitie should be done against the said garrison souldiers, nor against the king of England &c. or his subiects.

9 That betwene the said kings, their kingdomes, vassals, inhabitants, and subiects, there should be free commerce in all places where it hath bene formerly vsed before the warres, according to the auncient leagues and treaties, so as the subiects of either partie might goe and enter freely into the others countries and dominions both by sea and land, without any Safeconduct, or other licence, and depart from thence with their goods, and marchandises, paying the ordinarie customes and imposts.

10 That it should be lawfull to haue access vnto the ports of the said princes, there to make stay, and with the like libertie to depart, not onely with ships for merchandise, but also for warre, whether they come thither being forced by foule weather, or for the repairing of their ships, or for prouision of victuals, so as they exceed not the number of six or eight ships, when they come in voluntarily, nor stay longer in the hauens than they shall haue cause, for the repairing of their ships, or to make prouision of necessaries, least it should cause an interruption of free traffique with other nations in amitie. And if any greater number of ships of warre than is aboue mentioned, shall happen to haue access into those ports, then it shall not be lawfull for them to enter without the priuie and consent of the prince. Provided, that they should not commit any act of hostilitie within the said ports, to the prejudice of the princes: and that there should be an especiall care had, that vnder the pretext of traffique there should be no victuals, armes, or munition for warre, carried by the subiects of those kingdomes, to the enemies of the one or other king. And whosoever should attempt the contrarie, should be punished as seditious persons, and breakers of the peace. It was also provided, That the subiects of the one should not be worse intreated in anothers dominions in his sales and contracts of merchandise, than his owne naturall subiects.

11 That the king of England &c. after the conclusion of these articles, should forbid by proclamation, That none of his subiects, or any inhabiting within his realme, should carrie ouer in his owne name, directly or indirectly, or colour any ships, merchandise, or any other thing going out of Holland and Zeland into Spaine, nor any Holland or Zeland marchant, vnto the said ports, vpon paine of punishment. And to auoyd fraud, all merchandise to be sent out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the dominions of the king of Spaine and Archdukes, was to be sealed with the Towne or Cittie Seale from whence they should be laden: and that which was not so sealed, should be taken for good prize, and confiscated, and all Hollanders and Zelanders found in the said ships, should be also taken.

12 That all English, Scottish, and Irish merchandise, might be transported out of those countries into the dominions of the king of Spaine, without paying the imposition of thirtie in the hundred, lately imposed, but onely the customes and tolls usually demanded before the said imposition of thirtie in the hundred.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

13 That for such marchandise as the English, Scottish, or Irish marchants should buy in Spaine, or other the king of Spaines dominions, and should carrie in their owne ships, or in ships hired or lent them (except they be of Holland Zeland) they should onely pay such customes as were accustomed to be paid before the imposition of thirtie in the hundred: provided, that they should carrie the said marchandise to the realmes of the king of England &c. or to the ports of those provinces which obey the Archdukes. And to prevent the transportation of the said marchandise to any other places, and especially to Holland and Zeland, it was agreed, That the marchants should enter bond at such time as they did lade their ships in Spaine, or in any of the king of Spaines dominions, before the magistrat of the place where they should lade, to pay the said imposition of 30 in the hundred, in case they carrie the said marchandise to any other countries: and that they should bring a certificat, within one yeare, from the magistrat of the place where they should vnlade the said goods, testifying that they haue discharged in the king of Englands dominions, or in those provinces which are vnder the Archdukes obedience; exhibiting of which certificats their bonds should be deliuered vp.

14 That the king of England &c. soone after the confirmation of this accord, should forbid his subiects to export any marchandise out of the K. of Spaines dominions, to any other places but to his Majesties kingdoms, and the said ports of Flanders, vpon paine of confiscation of all their marchandise, to the vse of the king of England &c. whereof the Informer is to haue the one halfe, the imposition of thirtie in the hundred being first deducted, the which shall be payed to the king of Spaines officers: the proofes being lawfully receiued in Spaine, and sent into England in authentical forme, should be credited.

15 That the magistrats of any townes or cities within his Majesties kingdoms, which should make certificats of the vnlading of ships, and giue testimonie of the registring of marchandise, should not commit any fraud therein, vpon paine of the losse of their offices, and the kings displeasure: With this prouiſo, That when as the king of Spaine and the Archdukes shall agree with the French king, or any other, touching the last Edict of thirtie in the hundred, and the commerce betwixt them be restored, then it should be lawful for the subiects of the said king of England &c. to transport their marchandise into his or their dominions vnto whom the commerce shall be restored, without the payment of thirtie in the hundred, paying onely the former vsual customes.

16 That there should be free commerce betwixt the subiects of the king of England &c. and the Archdukes, in all places where they had beene formerly accustomed to trade, both by water and land, hauing free libertie to enter into the dominions, townes, and ports one of another, and to buy, sell, carrie and recarrie their marchandise, repaire their ships, provide victuals, and all things necessarie, at reasonable prices, and should depart with the like libertie with their goods and marchandise, paying the vsual customes. Provided, that the subiects of the king of England &c. should not vse the shipping of the Hollanders, or the vnited Provinces, nor bring any of their manufactures into the Archdukes countries, nor any other thing for the which any tribute was payed in Holland, neither should they transport any thing from the Archdukes Provinces, vnto the vnited Provinces, vntill a pacification were made; neither should they receiue any goods belonging to the vnited Provinces, into their ships, nor put any of them into the vnited Estates ships, nor fraudulently colour the goods of any one of the vnited Provinces: the which being found, it should be held to be good and lawfull prize.

17 That the former Prouisoes should not onely be vnderstood of ships laden for marchandise, but also of ships of warre, which the said princes should send forth to prevent the attempts of their enemies: which ships of warre, not exceeding the number aboue mentioned, might freely enter into one anothers ports, being driuen by tempest, or to repaire their ships, or buy necessities, and there stay, so as they committed no act of hostilitie, with the like cautions and exceptions as is contained in the tenth article.

18 As the said kings and Archdukes did religiously promise, not to giue any warlike succours to any of the others enemies, so it was provided, that the subiects or the inhabitants

Lib. 31.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

1329

1604

A tants of their realmes, of what nation or qualitie soeuer, should not vnder colour of commerce, nor vpon any other pretext, giue any aid to the enemies of the said princes, or supply them with money, victuals, armour, munition, ordnance, or other warlike prouiſion: and those which should do the contrarie should be seuerely punished, as breakers of the league, and seditious persons.

19 And for the greater benefit and good of their subiects, it was agreed, that the king of England &c. and the Archdukes, should do their endeavors, that their subiects should haue the passages open vnto their ports and dominions, so as they might freely come and go with their ships, marchandise and carriages (paying the ordinarie customes) to all the said ports, kingdoms and dominions, & depart when they please with the like libertie.

20 As touching the ancient treaties of commerce and traffique betwixt the realms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the dominions of the dukes of Bourgonie, and princes of the Low Countries, the which during the late troubles had beene intermitted, and it may be in some parts impaired: It was concluded by way of prouiſion, That they should remaine in their auncient force, and be vied on either side, as they had beene before the warre. And if it happen, that by both parts, or by any one, any breach thereof be pretended: or that the subiects shall complaine, that the conuentions were not observed, or that more grieuous burthens than were accustomed were imposed on them, then there should be deputies appointed on either part, which should meet, and treat friendly, and restore such things as should be found out of course, or to haue beene altered by the iniurie of time, or by corrupt custome.

21 And to make this peace fruitfull to the subiects of the king of England &c. it was concluded, That such as had recourse to and from the realmes and dominions of the king of Spaine and Archdukes, and should remaine there for trade, should not be molested in the cause of conscience: wherefore to the intent their traffique might be safe and without danger both by land and sea, the said king of Spaine and Archdukes should prouide, that vsing their trade and commerce, they should not be called in question nor molested for their consciences, so as they gaue no scandall.

22 If any goods or marchandise prohibited to be carried, should be conueyed out of the realmes and dominions of the said kings and Archdukes, by the subiects of the one or the other, that in such case the person offending shall onely incurre punishment, and only the goods prohibited shall be confiscated.

23 That the goods of subiects dying within the realmes and dominions of either, should be preferred for the right heires and successors of the deceased, alwaies reseruing the right of any third person.

24 That graunts and priuiledges giuen by the princes to marchants of either of the kingdoms, comming to their realmes, which priuiledges, by reason of the warres, haue ceased, should from thenceforth be reuiued, and stand in their full force and vertue.

25 And if hereafter any vnkindnesse should grow betwixt the king of England &c. and the king of Spaine, or the Archdukes, whereby there might grow any interruption of entercourse and traffique, the subiects of either prince should be so aduertised thereof, as they might haue six monethes from the time of the admonition, to transport their marchandise, without any arrest, disturbance, or molestation in the meane season, to be offered or done them either in their persons or goods.

26 That neither of the said princes should imbarre or stay for their prouiſion in war, or for any other seruice, to the prejudice of the owners, the ships of the others subiects, lying in their ports or roads, vnlesse one of those parties to whom the ships do belong, bee first aduertised thereof, and yeeld his consent thereunto.

27 It was also accorded, That if during this peace and league of friendship, any thing should happen to be attempted, or done, against the force and effect thereof, either by water or by land, by any of the said princes, their heires and successors, their vassals and subiects, or by their allies comprehended in this league, or by the heires & successors of any of those allies, their subiects or vassals, yet notwithstanding this peace and amitie, should remaine in his full strength and vertue, and the attempters and such as doe offend onely that be punished for their attempts.

F fffff

28 That

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

28 That all prisoners taken in the warres, or condemned to the galleys, should be released and set free, the charges of diet, of such as were not in the galleys, being first paid, and the ranfomes of such as had before compounded for the same, being discharged.

29 It was concluded, That all ciuile aditions which were in force at such time as the last warre begun, should be continued and pursued, notwithstanding any lapse of time during the same warre, so as they should not be any way prejudiced by the continuance of the warre: those onely were excepted which were already come to the princes treasure or Exchequer.

30 If any action should be commenced in the realmes and dominions of any of these princes, by any person not being subject to the same prince, touching any depredations or spoiles, the cause should be remitted to the Iudge of the jurisdiction vnder that prince, against whose subject or subjects the suit is commenced.

31 If the Hollanders and the other confederat Estates, would accept of conditions of pacification with the Archdukes, or their successours, by the means of the king of England &c. the said Archdukes and their successours would always willingly hearken vnto that which should be propounded therein, and would desire, that by the helpe of the king of England &c. they might be brought to imbrace equall conditions; wherein they should well vnderstand how much the said Archdukes did attribute vnto the king of England.

The last three articles were for the comprehending of the allies, friends, and confederats of the said princes in this present treatie, the which they did feuerally and particularly name: and for the ratification, confirmation, and due obseruation of the said treatie.

There was also an order set down touching marchandise of high Germanie to be transported into Spaine, and free from the imposition of thirtie in the hundred, whereby the Constable of Castille, hauing speciall procuration from the Catholike king, did promise that it should be lawfull for the subjects of the king of England &c. to conuey marchandise out of high Germanie, being subject to the imposition of thirtie in the hundred, and could not without payment thereof, be carried into Spaine, the same marchandise being first conueyed into England, and there discharged and customed, and from thence to bee afterwards transported into Spaine, or any other of the king of Spaines dominions, without payment of thirtie in the hundred, so as the said marchandise had not paid any thing to the Hollanders and Zelanders, or other enemies of the king of Spain and the Archdukes: which marchandise they should conuey in their owne ships, and not in any belonging to any other prince or nation. And, to avoid fraud, the marchandise of high Germany, which should be transported out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, into the dominions of the king of Spaine and the Archdukes, should be registred and marked with the seale of the towne from whence it came, and a certificate sent from the magistrat of the said towne, testifying, that the said marchandise were discharged in England, Scotland, or Ireland, and that they had paid custome there; vpon paine of the kings displeasure, & the losse of their offices, and other punishments, to bee inflicted at the kings pleasure vpon the magistrats of townes vnder the obedience of the king of England &c. which are to certifye the vloading of ships, and the registring thereof, if they shall herein commit any fraud. And what marchandise fouer of high Germanie, shall not be discharged in England, Scotland, or Ireland, and yet to be transported into Spaine, and other the dominions of the king of Spaine, all such marchandise shall be confiscated, and reputed good prize.

There were also three articles concluded, concerning a moderation to be had in the proceedings in the Inquisition in Spaine, against the king of Englands subjects.

First, If they exceeded in any thing before their entrance into Spaine, they should not be called into the Inquisition for the same, neither should they bee molested for any of those things so committed out of Spaine, neither should any account be demanded of them for the same.

2 That no man should compell them to enter into churches, vnlesse they would, but if they did enter, they should performe those duties and reuerence which are vied towards the holy Sacrament of the Altar, being there; and if they should see the Sacrament comming towards them in any street, they shall doe reuerence by bowing their knees

Lib. 31.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

A knees, or else they shall passe aside by some other street, or turne into some house.

3 If any of the said persons being masters or masters mates, or any other officers of ships which be not their owne, doe exceed in any of these things, the Inquisition proceeding against them by office, is onely to sequester their own proper goods, and are to leave the ships and all other goods, not belonging to the offenders, free: and the same was to be vnderstood for all traders and factors.

During this treatie betwixt England and Spaine, the defence of traffique betwixt France and the dominions of the king of Spaine and the Archdukes, was verie troublesome. The French suffered great discommodities, and the Spaniards found this restraint heauie and insupportable, for that all things grew exceeding deere, and the tradesmen murmured, and grew almost desperat. The Pope commaunded his Nuntio to deale in this businesse, and to reconcile these princes; but the French king would not yeeld to anything, vntill that the Spaniards, who had first troubled the water, had cleared it againe, in reuoking the imposition of thirtie in the hundred, which made the libertie of traffique a meere seruitude, and the profit an assured losse. This was verie seuer and rigorous. It is in euery kind bitter vnto the marchant, couetousnesse hauing changed the first cause, as well as the quantitie of customes and imposts. At the first they were paid onely to haue free libertie and assurance of passage from one place vnto another; and for that princes haue vnder their protection the highwayes (for the which they are called Royall)

C they did acknowledge this right of protection with some dutie. Such impositions for so necessarie causes are just, others are not, and yet they must be borne, being not lawfull for the subject to murmure against the customes and imposts wherewith the prince doth charge him. They said, That the Spaniards, which are long in their consultations, and constant in their resolutions, would neuer reuoke this imposition, for that they would not loose the reputation of constancie in their lawes, and bee noted of inconstancie and lightnesse, by applying themselves to the time and affaires. But there was no remedie, the deputies of the two kings and Archdukes meeting, tooke off the imposition, and set the commerce free.

The peace being fully concluded betwixt England and Spaine, and sworn by the king of England in the presence of the king of Spaines Commissioners, the Constable of Castille hauing receiued great honour in England, both in his entertainment and presents giuen him from the king; returned into Flanders, much satisfied in himselfe, to carrie home with him such joyfull tidings. From thence hee past into France, where the French king vsed him so royally, as hee afterwards said, That hee had entertained him as a king, and intreated him as a kinsman.

In the yeare a thousand six hundred and foure the king of Great Britaine sent the earle of Nottingham, high Admirall of England, into Spaine; to take the Catholike kings oath, for the confirmation of the peace, as hee did the earle of Hartford vnto the Archdukes, to the same end. The sayd earle of Nottingham, being attended on by a gallant traine of noblemen, knights, and gentlemen, arrived at the 'Groine', where hee was no sooner discovered from the land, but D. Lewis de Carilla de Toledo, marquisse of Carascena, Gouverneur both of the towne and of the countrey of Galicia ygaue order for his entertainment, the which was verie royally performed.

At his comming into the harbour, a fort vpon the North side of the towne, did salute him with twentie peeces of ordnance: then a fort lately built vpon a rocke, with six and thirtie peeces; and lastly from the towne and castle with about thirtie peeces of ordnance. And the earles ship, with the whole fleet, being at an anchor, requited them with all their ordnance. Presently after the Gouverneur sent foure chiefe officers of the towne, with D. John de Pacheco, his brother, and D. Lewis de Carilla de Toledo his onely sonne, to welcome the earle: After some time spent in complements, the Gouverneur himselfe came aboard the earles ship in a barge, the matings and rowers being in blew silke cassocks and capps, and the barge couered with blew velvet. After hee had saluted the earle, he told him, That the king his master had giuen vnto him an especiall charge to haue a respect

Ffffff ij

who Discomodities for the restraint of traffique.Commerce set at liberty in France.Constable of Ca-stille returns into Spaine.1605

Earle of Nottingham sent into Spaine.

He lands at the Groine.

who he was that came embassadour, from whom hee came, and to whom hee was sent: and that he should doe euerie thing for the honour of these three persons, not sparing any thing that might be fit for his Lordships entertainment. Wherefore hee did intreat the earle to goe to land, the which he did forbear vntill the next day; so as that night hee sent vnto his Lordship a present of fish, fruits, bread, and such commodities as the country yielded.

On Tuesday, the sixteenth of Aprill, the earle of Nottingham prepared to goe to shore, to his lodging, which was appointed in the gouernours house. The gouernour hauing taken care to receiue his Lordship in most honourable manner, had (vpon notice of his comming to the Groine) caused a bridge of timber, being aboute fortie yards long, to be built and painted, the which was garnished with many penciles of silke of diuers colours. The way into the towne was set on either side with boughes of bayes and Orange trees, and strewed with rushes and flowers. The whole garison of the towne, and other companies that were drawne out of the country, were there readie to make a gard for him.

His Lordship being readie to land, the gouernour sent diuers of the Commanders to let him vnderstand, that he and the magistrats of the towne would attend him on the bridge. Whereupon the earle tooke his barge, and (being followed by his whole traine) went vnto the bridge, where the Spaniards entertained the English as they landed, the haultboyes and shagbotts playing all the while. Being all landed, they entred into the towne an English man and a Spaniard marching together in verie good order. At their entrance into the towne they were saluted with a great volley of shot, both great and small; and so they went on foot to the gouernours house, where, when the earle entred, there were many chambers shot off.

During the earle of Nottingham's stay at the Groine, hee solemnized Saint Georges feast, the which was performed with the greater state, for that the people came thither in troups to see that ceremonie; and it was thought the gouernour (being inuited) would haue dined with his Lordship, but hee fearing to heare something that might touch the king, his master, excused himselfe, and so retired, hauing seene his Lordship set downe: But hearing, after dinner, by his owne brother, that there was not any thing that might giue cause of offence, or exception, hee was forie, and did accompanie his Lordship at supper, whither many ladies and gentlewomen came to see the order of that State.

On the foure and twentieth of Aprill D. Blasco d'Arragon, nephew to the duke of Terranova, who had bene in England the yeare before with the Constable of Castille, came from Court, being sent from the king his master, to salute his Lordship, and to acquaint him with such preparations as were made for him and his traine for that journey. There was also D. Gaspar de Bullion, the kings chiefe Harbinger, who came with commission from the king, to provide all things necessarie for his Lordships journey. After some conference (notwithstanding they had promised there should be no want of any thing) they found, that the whole country would not furnish mules ynow, there being six hundred and fiftie persons, besides the carriages, which were verie many. Whereupon his Lordship resolved to leaue some of his owne companie aboard his ships vntill his returne. There were foure coaches and foure litters attended them at Villafraanca, besides their riding mules, whereof there was a coach and a litter for his Lordships owne vse, another coach and a litter for six Charles Cornwallis, who was then sent to be embassador leager in Spaine, and the rest for the knights and gentlemen which should be sicke.

During his Lordships stay at the Groine, hee was entertained with sundrie sports, the which were performed in a square made of purpose on the market place; as assaulting of a castle by armed knights, and freeing a ladie from foure monsters which defended it, fighting at barriers, and in the end verie rare fire-works, the which were generally commended for their strangeness. After which his Lordship, hauing all his traine furnished with mules, began his journey towards the Court the 3 of May; the gouernour and magistrats bringing him out of the town with musick & shot. He was accompanied by D. Blasco d'Arragon, & D. Gaspar de Bullion, chiefe harbinger to the K. who had the charge of the conduct.

His

Earle of Nottingham goes from the Groine

A His Lordship pass from the Groyne to Bytance, to Villa Alua Lugo, Terra Castella; Cebrera, Villa Franca, Bubibre, Altorga (where his Lordship saw a fayre castle belonging to the marquisse of Altorga) Banca, Benauent, Villa Garcia: and from thence hee had order to goe to Simancas, which was as farre as Vailledolit: To which towne his Lordship came in twelue dayes, hauing bene honourably receiued in all places where hee past. His Lordship comming to Simancas on Tuesday the 14 of May, he had order from the king, not to come to Court till Thursday. On the Wednesday after dinner there came D. Pedro de Suniga, or Estuniga, newly appointed embassadour for England, and D. John de Taxis, sonne to the earle of Villa Mediana, then embassador in England; B who hauing saluted his Lordship, departed againe.

On Thursday, his Lordship being appointed to goe to Court, there came to attend him the marquisse of Camerla, D. Pedro de Suniga, D. John de Taxis, D. Blasco d'Arragon; with diuers other knights and gentlemen of the kings house and chamber, bringing diuers coaches with them. Simancas was not aboute six English miles from Court. Vpon the way the earle of Nottingham was perswaded to go into a banqueting house which stood vpon the highway, and to see the delicacie of their orchards and gardens, and to tast of the fruits: but it was rather to stay for the noblemen which were appointed by the king to meet him. During his stay in this garden, there was a horse presented vnto him from the king, which he did vsually ride on. After an houres stay, there came diuers

He goes to Court.

C Grandoes and other noblemen, the chiefe whereof were, the duke of Frias Constable of Castille (lately embassadour in England) the duke of Infantago, the duke of Albuquerque, the duke of Cea, the duke of Sessa, the duke of Pastrana, the marquisse of S. German, the earle of Chinchon, the earle of Punno en Rostro, the marquisse of Baneza, the earle of Aguilar, the earle of Berofa, the earle of Nieua, the earle of Corunna, the earle of Paredes, the marquisse of Carpio, the marquisse of Taura, the marquisse of Villanoua, the earle of Salinas, the marquisse of Seralua, the marquisse de Fuentes, the marquisse of Alcanices, the earle of Galues, the Admirall of Arragon, with many other lords and knights. The earle with all these nobles, and his whole traine, being vpon the way, the weather being exceeding hot, there fell a verie great shoure, which continued vntill they came into the towne, where his lodging was appointed in the house of the earle of Salinas, not farre from Court. There was a multitude of people, and eight hundred coaches (as it was thought) full of ladies and gentlewomen, gotten out of the towne to see the earle and his companie. I omit the manner of their marshalling with the Spanish knights and lords. They entred by a gate called Puerta del Campo, and passed through the chiefe parts of the towne, by the Court gate, the king, queene, and ladies, standing (as they said) at certaine windows, to take view of the companie. That night there came diuers noblemen, and the queene sent her Major Domo to visit his Lordship: which caused some admiration in the Spaniards, who saied, they neuer knew the like fauour done to any embassador.

Noblemen that met the Earle of Nottingham.

E The day after, his Lordship comming to Vailledolit, D. Francisco Gomes de Sandomal, duke of Lerma, the kings great fauourite, being accompanied by many dukes and earles, came to visit him, and so consequently all embassadours, and most of the Grandoes and noblemen of the Court, came to visit him, and congratulate his comming. He had his first audience on Saturday the eighteenth of May. In the morning the king sent the earle of Galues, and diuers of his priue chamber, to visit his Lordship. In the afternoone the Constable came accompanied with aboute twentie noblemen, whereof three or foure were of the Grandoes, bringing many coaches with them, to conduct his Lordship and his companie to Court. The kings gard made a way for them to the prefence chamber doore, they being three hundred in number, Suisses, Spaniards, and Wallons, attired in red and yellow veluet, but of severall fashions. At the palace gate stood the duke of Infantago, and the marquisse of Vellada, with diuers noblemen, knights, and gentlemen, to receiue his Lordship, & to conduct the companie into the prefence, where the king sat vnder a rich cloth of Estate, and by him eight Grandoes of Spaine covered. His Lordship hauing delivered his message by his interpreter, & his letters into the kings own hands, coming from his chaire, he gaue his Lordship a very kind & honorable entertainment.

The Earle goes to Court.

His Audience.

Ffffff ij

1334
1605

The general Historie of Spaine

Lib. 31.

tainment, causing him to sit neere vnto him: which fauour was much obserued, as a thing G (sayd the Spaniards) neuer vied to any embassador before that time. After some conference, the noblemen and gentlemen hauing kist the kings hand, his Lordship was conducted by the Constable and others, to the queenes presence, where shee sat vnder a rich cloth of Estate, and the Infanta by her: hee was receiued by the Major Domo to the queene, and conducted to her presence: where hauing ended his complements, being somewhat late, he tooke his leave, and returned with those dukes and lords vnto his lodging.

King of Spaine
goes in procession.

On the nineteenth of May, being Sunday, the king went in procession, going first to S. Pauls church neere the Court, and then through the town to S. Maries, after this manner. H
First went the Monkes and religious Orders singing, and bearing crosses, banners, and other church reliques, the Sacrament being also carried by foure officers of the Church. Then followed diuers noblemen in their ranks, according to their degrees. And next before the kings owne person went the younger of the princes of Sauoy. After king followed the cardinal, being Archbishop of Toledo, and with him the prince of Sauoy his elder brother. Then followed the prince of Maroc, with the Emperours embassador, the embassador of France, and he of Venice: after whom followed diuers gentlemen of the kings chamber, and the rest of the traine.

Christening of the prince of
Spaine.

After dinner the same day there was preparation made for the Christening of the prince. There was a large scaffold made for their passage at the end of a long gallerie, I and joyned to the church: the timber of which scaffold was covered with rich cloth of gold. They came vnto the church after this manner. The trumpets were set in seuerall companies neere vnto the church, still sounding, and answering one another. About foure of the clocke there past by this scaffold, to go into Saint Pauls church, the Knights, Lords, and Grandees going before, and some Dukes of especiall name bearing sundrie ceremonies, as the salt carried by one, a wax taper by another: then came the Constable, who carried the Crowne, before whom went the king at Armes. The duke of Lerma bare the prince in his armes, being tied vnto him with a rich scarf; he was assisted by the prince of Sauoy, and the earle of Miranda. Then followed the Infanta in a chaire, the which diuers gentlemen of the kings bed-chamber, and priuie chamber, carried on their K shoulders, the younger prince of Sauoy going by. At the church doore the cardinall attended them in his pontificall robes, hauing three bishops, and other officers of the Church with him; and so they conducted them with singing vnto the Font, the which was richly covered with a canopie of cloth of gold. The cardinall performed the ceremony; the which ended with church musicke, sounding of trumpets, and other wind instruments: and so they returned as they came, being accompanied by most of the great Ladies of the Court and kingdom. The prince was Christened by the name of Philip Domingo Victor. The elder prince of Sauoy was his godfather, of whom he tooke the name of Victor, and the Infanta, his sister, was his godmother. The Lord embassador of England was placed in the earle of Ribadauias house, both to see the procession in the morning, and the prince going to the Christening: after which he was conducted by a priuat way into the church, to see the ceremonie.

Churching of the queene of Spaine.

The next day, being Monday, the embassador leger was presented to the king, and graciously allowed of by him. On Tuesday the Lord embassador was conducted to S. Maries church by D. Blasco d'Arragon, to see the ceremonie of the queenes Churching, whither the king and queene came together, the king being on horsebacke, and the queene in a verie rich carroch of cloth of gold, drawne with foure horses, hauing their furnitures of cloth of gold, with whom the Infanta sat. After which, in another carroch, came the young prince, in the armes of an auncient ladie: and then followed two other carroches of blacke velvet, with diuers duchesses, countesses, and other great personages, widowes. M
Then came foure other carroches, all of one fashion, with diuers ladies, the queenes maides. This was the first day of the queenes going abroad, and as it was held, her Churching day.

Earle of Nottingham suffered by the Constable

That day the Lord embassador was invited to dine with the Constable, where he was accompanied by the dukes of Albuquerque, & of Sessa, & others: where there wanted not any

Lib. 31.

The general Historie of Spaine.

1335

A any thing that the countrie could yeld for his entertainment. On Friday being the 20 of May there were certaine presents, sent by the king of England, deliuered, the king and Queene comming themselves into a priuat garden to receiue them. They were fixe horses, three for the king, and three for the Queene, with saddles and clothes verie richly imbrodered, two Crosse-bowes with sheafes of arrowes, foure fowling peeces, with their furnitures, all verie richly garnished and inlaid with plates of gold, and a couple of limehounds: which presents were kindly receiued, the king and Queene admiring the faith- on and richnesse thereof.

1605 Presents sent to the king and Queen of Spaine

On Tuesday the eight & twentieth of May, the Lord embassador, with all the English B were invited to dine with the duke of Lerma, where they were verie honorably entertained to their great contentment: he was accompanied at the table by the duke of Lerma, the duke of infantado, and the duke of Albuquerque. They were attended on at the table by Marqueses, Earles, Knights, and gentlemen of the kings priuy-chamber, and few others.

Embassador suffered by the duke of Lerma.

Hauing receiued what pleasure could be deuised at the table, they were afterwards carried down into a faire Court, paved with square stone, in the midst whereof was a fontaine of cleere water; the whole Court was covered with canuas to keep them from the heat of the Sunne: There was a stage set vp in this Court with all things fitting for a play, which the embassadour and the rest were invited to see. The king and Queene were also C in priuat to see this Comedie.

The day appointed for the taking of the kings Othe, was vpon Thursday the thirtieth of May, being Corpus Christi day, on the which the king went in procession: and for that hee would bee seene by the English, hee appointed to passe by the gate where the embassador was lodged, after this manner.

King of Spaine
goes in procession.

First there came eight great Giants, three men, three women, and two Moores, with a Taber and pipe playing, and they dauncing: Then followed certaine Pilgrimes clad in blew: After whom came twenty or fixe and twenty crosses, belonging to seuerall Churches, with many pictures and holy reliques, Monkes, Morris dancers like Gipsies, Beastes with fire workes, wild men, and such like vanities, as it should seeme, to draw the D people more readily to admiration: After these followed diuers other Church-reliques, with certaine Augustine and Franciscane Friars, with their reliques. Many Church-men had Tapers in their hands: the kings Pages bare Torches: Then followed the Sacrament carried by foure Church-men in rich Copes; after whom came the Noble men, and Grandees of Spaine; and then followed the king with a Taper light in his hand, of white Virgin waxe: after whom came the Cardinals, the embassadors to the emperor, French, and Venetians, the Prince of Sauoy, the Prince of Maroc, with others, euerie one carrying a Taper light.

The same day D. Blasco de Arragon brought word vnto the Lord embassador that the king expected his coming presently vnto the Court for the taking of the othe: wherefore there was order taken that the Noblemen and Gentlemen which should attend him thither, should be furnished with Genets out of the kings stable. Being all mounted, the Constable D. Pedro de Saniga, with many other Lords and Knights, were sent to accompany him: And at the court gate the duke of Lerma and some other of the Grandees staid to receiue him; by whom hee was conueied through a long gallerie into a presence, and so into an inner chamber, where the king staid his coming, and receiued him with a kind salutation, and so took him along with him. The kings Sergeants at armes going first, then followed the Noblemen and Grandees of Spain, then the foure kings at arms, in their coats of armes; after whom came the duke of Lerma, bearing the sword naked, nor vpright, as the custome is in England, but lying vpon his left shoulder; and in this order the king marcht to a verie faire banqueting house, newly built, the embassadour, Leeger, the Lords, and diuers others following.

King of Spaine
takes the othe.

The king being set in his estate, the Lord embassadour & the Leeger were placed vpon his right hand, the Grandees and other Noblemen of Spaine, being on the right, but two degrees lower. There was a little table set before the king, whereon lay the Bible and a Crucifix vpon it. The Archbishop of Toledo read the othe: at one part of the othe the embassador 1336.

1605

The generall Historie of Spaine.

Lib. 31.

Juego de Toro and Juego de Cane.

baſſadour held the kings hands betwene his, to which othe the king ſwore kneeling and G laying his hand vpon the booke, and afterwards ſubſcribed the articles concluded by both kings.

On the laſt of May there was preparation made for certaine ſports, as Juego de Tora, & Juego de Cane, where there was a careful order taken that al the English ſhould be placed to ſee thoſe fights. About noone the king and Queene came on Horſebacke after the Spaniſh manner, being attended on by many Lords and Ladies. The Lord embaffador was in one roome with the king and Queene, and the other Lords not farre off. Theſe ſports were performed in the market place, being built round about with ſcaffolds, & the ground covered with ſand. There were fourteen bulſlaine that day, not without danger to ma- H ny that were actors, and the loſſe of ſome of their liues. Which being ended began their ſports of Juego de Cane, wherein the king himſelfe was an actor: Firſt there came in twelve Atabales or kettle drums; then followed thirty Trumpets, al clad in Caſſaks of red and white taſata; then followed twelve great mules, called Aſtemulaes with coverings of crimſon velvet, bearing bundles of canes, chained together with great hooks of ſiluer;
then followed the kings Gentlemen and Pages richly ſuited, being 32 in number.

For the two Princes of Sauoy, there came two Pages riding, bearing white targuets on their armes: after whome were led three horſes, with capariſons of blacke velvet, richly imbrodered with pearle: then followed twelve other horſes, their capariſons of blacke I velvet, but imbrodered with ſiluer. For the duke of Lerma were led ſix horſes with capariſons of white and red; his Groomes and Pages attending were ſureable. For the Con-ſtable were led foure and twenty horſes of ſeuice in white and greene, his Pages and groomes al ſuited alike. There were eighty horſemen which were actors that day in thoſe ſports, being diuided into eight bands or companies: beſides the king and the reſt aboue named, there were many of the Grandees, and they were all men of ſpeciall note in the Court of Spaine: whole names for breuities ſake I omit: At the firſt they came riding in ſwiftly by couples, with their targuets on their ſhoulders, and ſhaking their flaves after the manner of the Moores and Arabians. Being all come in, they diuided themſelues into two parts, either ſide hauing foure ſquadrons, and euerie ſquadron ten in number: Being al ready, the kings ſide firſt gaue the charge, and the others answered them, & ſo they co- K ntinued chafing one another, ſquadron after ſquadron, and caſting their canes one after another, for the ſpace of an houre, and ſo the ſport ended.

Show of the kings horſemen

On the firſt of Iune, the Lord embaffador was invited to ſee the kings horſemen in arms in a ſpaciouſ place called El Campo, conſiſting of launces, light horſemen and Carbines, to the number of two thouſand, of the which the duke of Lerma was generall: theſe troups after ſome ſallies one vpon another, and certaine ſkirmiſhes, drew themſelues into a ring, and ſo marching vnder the window whereas the king, Queene and embaffador ſtood, went their way.

Maſke at Court.

On the fixt of Iune he was requested to ſee a maſke, & about fix of the clock in the euening D. Blaſco d' Aragon came to condux his Lordſhip, and the reſt through a priuate L gallery of the kings, to the appointed place which was the new built banquetting houſe, where his Lordſhip and his followers were conueniently appointed. The roome was ſurniſhed with 320 wax lights, all ſet in ſtandards of ſiluer of diuers faſhions. Where after ſome ſongs and muſicke, the maſke appeared after this manner.

There came firſt of al 30 muſitions, in long robes of crimſon taſata, wel ſet out to ſhew, playing on ſeueral inſtruments. After whome followed ſix Virgins dancing, one bearing in her hand a ſun, another a branch of an Oliue tree, another an anchor, another a ſword with two points, on either point a bunch of flowers.

Then followed a Chariot of an antick faſhion, drawn by two liued horſes, being exceeding little: In the vpper part whereoff ſat the Infanta, with a Scepter of gold in her hand, M hauing the picture of a Doue at the vpper end of it: at her feet ſat two other Virgins, who attended her, and on either ſide went diuers pages bearing torches of white waxe.

At the vpper end of the hal there was a rich State built all of Maſons work aſcending vp by degrees, richly gild, and garniſhed with ſundrie ſtatues gild alſo; in which ſtate there were three chaires ſet, two great, & one leſſer, which was betwixt the other two. In which

Lib. 31.

The generall Historie of Spaine.

1337.
1605

A which middle chaire the Infanta being taken out of her Chariot was placed, the two vir-gins neere her, and the other ſix vpon the degrees at the foot of the eſtate. At the nether end of the Hall ſtood the maskers in a gallerie, made of purpoſe, who vpon drawing of a curtaine, appeared as it were in clouds: They were eight and twentie Knights & Ladies beſides torch-bearers, whereof the king and Queene made two, the reſt were all Grandoes, and men of great honour; the Ladies were the Queens Maides. The gallerie being built in manner of an arch, and ſet full with looking glaſſes, did with the light of torches ſhine as if it had bene full of Starres. The muſick playing, the maskers deſcended by foure and foure at a time, vpon a ſtage made in faſhion of a cloud vntill the whole number was come forth dancing together in good forme and meaſure. Having danced awhile, they all vnmasked themſelues, the king and Queene ſitting in the chaires aboue mentioned, where after ſome other dances the ſport ended.

On the ſeuenth of Iune the Lord embaffador was appointed to take his leaue of the king, and returne for England. Before his coming to Audience, the king ſent by D. Pedro de Sangua, and ſome others, to the number of ſouretene chaines of gold, or thereabouts, for ſome of the kings Seruants, and his lordſhips chiefe officers: hauing likewiſe ſent before by the ſaid D. Pedro, vnto the Lords, and to many knights, and other eſpecial men of his Lordſhips companie, ſeueral Jewels and chaines which were verie rich. In the aftermoone the king ſent vnto the embaffador a verie rich preſent of Jewels, both for C himſelf and his Lady, the which were preſented vnto him by D. Blaſco, and brought by the maſters and officers of the jewel houſe, whome he rewarded honorably.

Not long after the Conſtable came with ſome others to condux him to his Audience, where, after ſome priuate conference with the king, hee tooke his leaue, hauing receiued many gracious words from his Maieſtie, as alſo a ring with a Diamond, which ſome valued at three thouſand pounds, the which the king put vpon his finger, in token (as hee ſaid) of wedding him perpetually in true loue. After which the king commanded the duke of Infantazgo, to condux him vnto the Queene, where hauing performed all due complements hee tooke his leaue alſo of her Highneſſe. And the ſame day (being accompanied, a mile out of the Towne, by the Conſtable and ſome other Noblemen) he began his jour-ny towards England, and on the fifteenth day came to Saint Andreas where his ſhips attended him. Where being arriued, and all things ready for his imbarcking, hee ſhewed his bountie in rewarding D. Blaſco, the Apotentador or chiefe Harbinger, and al the kings officers & ſeruants that attended him, with great chains of gold, faire Jewels of good value, and large ſums of money, to their generall content. After which hauing feaſted them on ſhipboard, hee put to ſea on the 25 day of Iune.

Thus haue I ſummarily ſet downe the ſubſtance of the Earle of Nottinghams honorable entertainment at the Court of Spaine, when as he was ſent thither embaffador for the ſwearing of the othe iwith which I will end this Hiſtorie, and conclude my labour with his Lordſhips ſafe returne into England.

FINIS.

Observations touching the state and government of Spaine.

Or as much as my Author in the beginning of this Historie hath made an exact description of Spaine, setting downe the number of leagues the whole continent doth containe in circuit, describing the principall rivers within the Countrey, with their Springs and courtes, setting downe the mountaines and hills, and distinguishing the Prouinces, within the countrey, as they lye at this day, and by whome they were in ancient time inhabited, with a declaration of the fertilitye, riches, and commodities of the Countrey: I haue thought good to adde something touching the government of that state, with some other observations concerning that subiect, the which I haue collected out of such as haue bene curious to see, obserue, and write thereof.

The king of Spaine, as hee is a potent Prince and Lord of many countries, so hath hee many Councils for the managing of their affaires, distinctly & apart, without any confusion, euerie Council treating only of those matters which concerne their Iurisdiction & charge, and meddle not one with anothers businesse: with which Councils and with the Presidents, being men of chiefe note, the king doth conferre touching matters belonging to the good government, preservation, & increase of his Estates, and hauing heard euerie mans opinion, he commands that to be executed that shall be held most fit and convenient. The first is,

The Council of state; wheron the rest depend. They name Viceroyes for all the king of Spaines countries, and prouide for many things for the preservation of his realms. The king himselfe is President of this Council: the Counsellours, who are the chiefe men in the court, haue no fees.

The Council of warre. It prouides for Generalls, Colonels, Captaines, the Generall of the gallee, and for whatsoeuer concerne the war, with the aduice of his Majestie, who is president of this Council. They punish all commanders and officers at warre that doe not their duties. And in like maner they dispose of the companies of men at arms appointed for the gard of the kingdom, and they giue order for the artillerie, munition, and fortifications, or any thing that is necessary for the warre. The counsellours haue no wages.

The royall Council of iustice. Here they treat of the good government of all Spaine, they determine controuersies betwixt Noblemen, and ease the grieuances of other Courts. This council is of great preeminence: the president names all Iustices of Spain, the Prouosts of the kings house, with many other Counsellours and Iustices. They take information how euerie one hath behaved himselfe in his charge, punishing and changing as they shall thinke good, but with the kings priuie. There is a President, and sixteen counsellours, who haue all wages.

The Council of Italie: which treats of matters concerning the realms of Naples and Sicile, and the Duchie of Milan. The Constable of Castille is President: there are fixe Counsellours, three Italians, and three Spaniards. In this Council they dispose of the government of Italie, and giue aduancement to the Souldiers that serue in those Countreies; they appoint Gouernours, and Iudges in cities, and giue titles to Noblemen: but they first acquaint the king with their consultations.

The

Council of state.

Council of war

Council of iustice.

Council of Italy.

A The Council of the Indies. The Presidents of greatest esteeme next vnto the Council royall: there are eight Counsellours, and haue all wages. They appoint Viceroyes, for Peru, & Noua Hispania, and a general of the army that goes into these parts, with all other Offices and Spirituall livings. In this Council they also treat of all greiuances and complaints, that come from the Indies, by way of appellation. All which things they present vnto the king. They also appoint Visitors to goe into those Prouinces, to examine how all Officers carrie themselves, and to heare the peoples greiuances; and they punish or dismisse as they shall see cause.

B The Council of Orders. It hath a President, and foure Counsellours, with wages, which must be Knights, of the Order of Saint Iames, Calatrava, or Alcantara. In this Council they treat of suits; which happen in Prouinces belonging vnto these orders, and to see that the Knights weare their habits neatly. This Council appoints two and twentie Iustices in their Prouinces, wherewith the royal Council hath not to deale. They punish the Commanders and knights which obserue not their orders: They dispose of many Benefices, Vicarages, Chappels, and other Offices, in the Prouinces of their Orders; but all with the kings priuie, and allowance.

The Council which they call de Camera. It hath a President and three Counsellours, of the most ancient of the Council Royall, which haue no wages. In this Council they provide superiour officers for the Realme, and they dispose of Bishopricks, Chanonries, and other Ecclesiastical livings, the king hauing the nomination from the Pope of Rome.

C The Council of Hacienda: where there is a President and three Counsellours, without fees, wherin they treat of the kings reuenues, and of all duties, entries & accompts, like vnto our Exchequer in England.

There is a Council of accompts: which consists of foure Counsellours; in the which two of the kings chiefe Auditours haue place, and the most ancient Counsellor presides. In this council they determine of sutes touching the subsidies and taxes, and giue order to Collectors, for recouerie thereof.

The Council of Cruzada. It hath a President, two Counsellours and three Anditours: Their charge is onely to diuide the Cruzado by the bishopricks, and to send forth Commissaries to gather it.

D The Council of Aragon, Valentia and Cattalogia. It hath a President, who is called Vicechancellour, with fixe Counsellours, which haue wages. They treat of the government of those Realmes, and of the Ilands of Maiorca, Minorca, & Sardinia: they appoint gouernors and Iudges, and determine suits from those places by way of appeale, and heare their greiuances, and to giue rewards in the kings chamber of those realmes; all with his Majesties approbation.

E The Council of the Inquisition. The President is called Inquisitor Maior, an Office of great dignitie, which most commonly the Archbishop of Toledo holdes: hee hath fixe counsellours, or Inquisitors, they appoint all the Inquisitors, Prouosts, and Secretaries in all the Inquisitions within the Realme, which are aboute twentie, in either of which are three or foure Inquisitors: who deale in matters of Heresie, & with such men as do or say any thing against the church of Rome. And before they condemne any offender they send him to this Council to determine of him.

The Council of Delcargos, treats of the paying of the old kings debts, and the execution of their last wils.

F There are two Chanceries in Spaine, one at Vailledolit, and another at Granada, either of which hath a President and twelue Counsellours. They take knowledge of all ciuill causes which come vnto them by way of appeale from other inferior courts. They also take knowledge of sutes, for the estates and inheritances of Noblemen, from the which they may appeale to the Council royall, if the matter in question exceed the value of foure thousand ducats. There are foure Alcaldes or Prouosts of the Chancery, who determine of all ciuill and criminall causes, within fixe leagues; from whome they appeale to the counsellours of the Chauncerie.

There is a Council for the realme of Nauarre, where there is a Regent, fixe Counsellours, and foure Alcaldes, or Prouosts, they take knowledge of sutes, both ciuill and criminall

The Council of the Indies.The Council of Orders.Council de Camera.Council of Hacienda.Council of Accompts.Council of the Cruzada.Council of Arragon.Council of the Inquisition.Council of Delcargos.Chanceries of Spaine.Council of Na-
uarre.

minall within that Realme, and end them there, of what qualitie soever they be without appeale, whereof they consult euerie weeke with the Viceroi, who determines what they shall doe.

Council of Gal-licia.

There is also a Regent, 4 Comcellors, and 4 Prouosts in the realm of Galicia, who end all suits within that realme, but they deale not in questions of Nobilitie and Gentrie, which goe to the Chancerie of Vailladolid.

Council of Seuille.

The Citie of Seuille with the dependances hath a Regent, 6 Councillors, and 4 Pro-uosts, who take knowledge of all ciuill and criminall matters, whereof the iudges of the said citie or realm haue given sentence. There is an appeale from them to the royal coun-cell: all questions of Nobilitie goe to the Chancerie of Granado.

Power of the President of the Council royall.

The President of the Council royall of Iustice appoints all the Councillors, Pro-uosts, Presidents, & Regents of the Chanceries, & changeth them from one to another, & draws them to be Councillors of that Court: Moreover he names sixty and sixe Go-uernors of Cities and Provinces, changing them as occasion shall require. These Gouernors or Iudges, haue commonly two or three Lieutenants in the townes of their gouernment. They or their Lieutenants gouerne the cities or provinces which are vnder their charge, with twelue or more Aldermen which hee hath in euerie citie and towne: which Aldermen doe onely deale with the maintenance of the citie, and with the publike works wherein they haue a voice, but the gouernors or their Lieutenants determine of al murders, thefts, or other misdemeanors: and punish according to the qualitie of the fact, e-uerie Gouernour hath as much power in these matters, as the king himselfe, the matter being iustifiable, and they may deale in al matters for that their Commissions are verie ample, representing the kings person, from whom they doe appeale to the Chanceries of Vailladolid or Granado.

*Reuenues of the king of
Spaine.*

I am afraid to enter into any discourse of the reuenues of this king, men write so diuersly therof: some write that he hath but 14 millions of ducats, comming in yearly others say eighteen Millions, and some bring it to 23 millions, which differences may haply with some limitations bee reconciled: But whatsoever it bee, it is most certaine, that during the warres of the Low-countries, it was too little to mainteine his charge, for although that Naples, Sicile, Milan, Sardinia, Maiorca and Minorca, Flaunders and Burgondie, yeeld him about fise Millions yearly, yet there comes little of all this to his coffers, being employed in the entertainment of Viceroys, Gouernors, Captaines, Garrisons, Officers, and other charges in those countries. The kings reuenues in Spaine, rise not from his demeanes, as in some other Countries, but from the great impositions which hee ray-seth vpon the ports of the Sea, and from his drie Ports, which bee the passages from one kingdome to another: and of all Merchandize which is sold, hee takes ten in the hundred, and how often soeuer it be sold. A great part of which Gabelles & Impositions in Spaine stands engaged vnto the Genouois & other merchants for the paiement of the kings debts.
Some hold that he hath not about fise millions of ducats comming in cleerly to mainetaine the charges of his court, and all other extraordinary expences of war, gifts, pensions, voyages and such like.

The Impositions which are raised in Spaine, are not laid equally vpon all his Countries, but they lie most heauie vpon the two Castilles, Leon and Andaluzia, for in the realmes of Valencia, Arragon, and Cartelonia, hee imposeth little, but mainteineth their priuiledges which be great, and they themselves redeiue the Gabelles and customes, & not the king: the profit which growes there by confiscations and pecuniarie fines, doth scarce entertaine his Viceroys and other officers. So as it seemes hee hath but merum im-perium in those three countries, they being also bound to serue him in his warres.

The king reapes great commoditie, by the popes fauor, from the Clergie: hee giues him Buls of Croyfadoe; he enioyes the masterships of S. James, Calatrava, Alcantara, & disposeth of the Comanderies; he hath the first fruits of Ecclesiastical liuings, and a part of the tythes, which comes yearly to three millions of ducats at the least; & he hath the nomination of all Archbishops, Abbots and Priors, yet he may not giue any benefices, but to naturall borne Spaniards, or to such as haue bene formerly naturalized,

The

The Realmes which they number in Spaine, are these:

The Realme of Seuille.
Cordoua.
Iaen.
Toledo.
Leon.
Nauarre.
Valencia.

The Realme of Gibralter.
Granado.
Murcia.
Castille.
Gallicia.
Arragon.
Cattelognia.

In these Realmes (besides Arragon, Valencia, and Cattelognia) there are some Cities, which are called to the generall Estates, and haue voices for the Provinces in which they are; the which be these:

Seuille.
Granado.
Cuenca.
Madrid.
Soria.
Auila.
Cordoua.
Iaen.
Toledo.

Guadalajara.
Segouia.
Salamanca.
Zamorra.
Vailladolid.
Burgo.
Toro.
Leon.
Murcia.

The names of all the chiefe Cities in Spaine and Portugal, and in what Provinces they are.

In Galicia.
Compostella.
Tuye.

In Asturia of Oviedo.
Mondenedo.
Leon.
Pomperado.

In Asturia S. Ellene.
S. Ellene.

In Biscaie.
Victoria.

In Naurrie.
Pampelone.

In Cattelognia.
Barcelona.
Tariagone.
Moufon.
Seguença.

In Arragon.
Saragossa.
Tarel.
Duiago.
Valencia.

In Valencia.
Cuenca.
Segonia.
Oraguella.

In Mancha.
Alacanye.
Segure.

In Granado.
Granado.
Almerie.
Cartagena.
Murcia.
Guadix.

In Andaluzia.
Seuille.
Cadix.
Medina Sidonia.
Elica.
Iaen.
Mallega.
Xeres.
Cordoua.
Vbeda.
Baeza.
Andujar.
Gggggg

In the Countie.

Aymonte.
Auyta.

In Castile.

Burgos.
Tarragone.
Guadalajara.
Segovia.
Calohorra.
Zamora.
Toro.
Medina del Campo.
In Spaine there are 57 Cities.
Salamanca.
Valencia.
Alhorgo.

In Toledo.

Cuidad Royall.
Alcala de Henares.
Toledo.

In Extremadura.

Placentia.
Auyta.
Badajos.
Merida.

In Portugall.

Lisbone.
Euora.
Coimbra.
Porto.
Braga.
Bragance.
Cuidad Rodrigo.
Beiria.
Cono.
Oliuenfa.
Eluas.
Guarda.
Settuual.
Selnes.
Leria.

In Portugall there are 15 Cities.

Some haue obserued in their late trauels, that the King of Spaine hath alwaies within that continent 16000 foot, which are mustered and enrolled, and are bound to be ready in armes at the ringing of a bell, or the sound of the drumme. The Grandos, Nobilitie, and Prelats of the Kingdome are charged with horse, and they amount to the number of 16000. Besides, the inhabitants of the sea coasts, and of diuers other Ports of his dominions within land, are bound to find horse, which come to 12000 at the least, all which must be ready at a months warning. This I had from the relation of a yong nobleman, wherein he hath shewed great industrie and judgement, but it may be there was some mistaking in the writing of these great numbers of horse.

A note of all the Hauens, Ports, and Fisher Townes vpon the coast of Spaine, from Fontarabie in Biscaye, to Barcelona in the Mediterranean sea.

In Biscaye.

Fontarabie, a bard hauen.
Passage and Rendarie, an open hauen.
S. Sebastians, a bay hauen.
Sumaye and Guittario, bard.
Montrica and Deua, fisher townes.
Mondac and Alequito, Fishers.
Vermeo and Placentia, Fishers.
Bilbao and Portugalete, bard hauen.

Castries.

Aluredo, a key hauen.
S. Ander, an open hauen.
S. Vincent de la Barkera, fisher town.
Aryba de Sella, Fishers.

Villaviciosa, Fishers.
Chynchon, a key.
Torre, Fishers.
Pena, Fishers.
Loarca, bard hauen.
Auiles, bard hauen.

Gallicia.

Ribadeo, bard hauen.
Vuiero and Sidera, Fishers.
Farrol, open hauen.
The Groyne, an open hauen.
Mongea, bard hauen.
Corcauiana, bard hauen.
Muros, bard.
Porta viedra, bard hauen.
Vigo and Bayone, open hauen.

In

In the Countie.

Aymont, a bard hauen.
Selua and Palos, Fishers.

In Andalusia.

S. Lucar de Barameda, it stands in the mouth of the riuer of Guadalquivir, which goes vp to Seuille, Fisher town.
Seuille, bard hauen.
Rota, a key.
Cadiz, an open hauen.
S. Marie Port, barred hauen.

Streits toward Barcelona.

Gibraltar, an open road and key.
Grand Malega, a key road.
Maruela, an open road.
Velez Malega, a key road.
Almerie, Fishers.
Carthagena, a hauen.

In Valencia.

Alicante, which is the Port of Valencia, a hauen.
Valencia, a Creeke.

In Castile.

Empullas.
Taragona.
Palamos.
Empurias.
Rojas.

All Fisher Townes.

Barcelona, an open hauen.

In Portugall.

Camina, a barred hauen.
Viana, barred.
Villa de Conde, barred.
Auiro, barred.
Porto de Portugall, barred.
Calsais, Fisher Townes.
Lisbone, an open hauen.
Sesambrie, barred hauen.
Sevan, an open hauen.
Lagos, a key.
Villanovas, a barred hauen.
Farouillas, barred.

Figera.
Fauilla.
Cathromarin.

Fisher Townes.

I will not trouble my selfe nor the Reader in setting downe what shippes and starks belong vnto these Ports and Hauens, as some haue done, being very variable and vncertaine: but I will onely make some mention of the king of Spaines forces at sea, as I haue learned from those that haue curiously inquired thereof, at their being in the country. The king maintaines vpon the coast of Spaine and Portugall some 40 good shippes and galleons, with 32 galleyes, besides smaller vessels. And besides all these, he hath at Naples 25 galleyes, in Sicilie 16, and they of Genoua, which he entertaines continually, but the galleyes are none of his.

Gggggg j

A

A Catalogue of the Princes which haue raigned in Spaine since the euersion of the Romane Empire, with their Alliances and Successions.

The Kings of the Gothes.

1	V	Allia, first King of the Gothes, which settled himself in Spaine about the yeare of our Lord	420	15	Ricaredo.	585
2		Theodoric the first.	440	16	Luiba the second.	601
3		Totismond.	453	17	Videtic usurper.	603
4		Theodoric the second.	458	18	Gundamir.	610
5		Henry or Euric.	471	19	Sizebuth.	612
6		Alaric.	483	20	Suintilla.	621
7		Gensularic or Gesularic.	508	21	Sizenand.	631
8		Amalaric.	511	22	Cinthilla.	637
9		Theude.	526	23	Tulca.	641
10		Theodisic.	524	24	Cindasunthe, and his sonne.	642
11		Agila.	546	25	Reccesunthe.	652
12		Aranagilde.	551	26	Bamba.	672
13		Lyba the first.	565	27	Eruinge.	681
14		Leonigilde.	567	28	Egica.	688
				29	Vitiza.	701
				30	Roderic.	711

During the raigne of Roderic, last King of the Gothes, the Arabians, Saracens, or Moores invaded or conquered Spaine; against whom did rise many Christian Potentates, whose lines and descendant follow: that is,

The Line of Ouiedo and Leon.	Fol. 1345
The Line of Castille.	1349
The Line of Nauarre.	1355
The Line of Arragon.	1362
The Line of Cattelogue.	1367
The Line of Portugall.	1369

The names of the Archbishops of Toledo. Fol. 1374

Moreover, the names of the Kings and Princes
Moores which haue raigned in Spaine, Fol. 1375.

The

The Line of Ouiedo and Leon.

I.
Pelagius first king of Ouiedo, sonne to Fafila, Gouverneur of Biscaie.
Gaudiosa his wife.
Lawfull children { Fafila.
                              Ormifinda.
II.
Fafila sonne to Pelagius, in the yere 733, raigned two yeres, and died without children.
Ormifinda his wife.
III.
Alphonso first of that name, sonne to Peter, Gouverneur of Biscaie, in the yere 737: he raigned 19 yeres.
Ormifinda, daughter to king Pelagius, his wife.
                              Froila.
                              Vimar.
                              Aurelius.
Lawfull children { Odefinda, a daughter.
                              Mauregat, a bastard.
IV.
D. Froila the first of that name, sonne to king Alphonso I. in the yere 756: he raigned 11 yeres, 6 moneths.
Mennine or Momerane, daughter to the Duke of Aquitaine, his wife.
                              D. Alphonso.
Lawfull children { D. Bermund, or Veremund.
                              D. Ximena, mother to Bernard del Carpio.
V.
D. Aurelius brother to Froila, in the yere 768: he raigned 6 yeres, and died without children.
VI.
D. Sillo husband to Odefinda, daughter to king Alphonso the first, in the yere 774: he raigned 9 yeres, and died without children.
VII.
D. Mauregat, bastard to king Alphonso the first, an Usurper, in the yere 783: he raigned five yeres and six moneths, and died without children.
VIII.
D. Bermund, or Veremund, sonne to king Froila, and first of that name, in the yere 789:
he raigned two yeres alone, and four with Alphonso his brother.
D. Imelona his wife.
Lawfull children { D. Ramir.
                              D. Garsia.
IX.
D. Alphonso second of that name, sonne to king Froila, called the chaste, in the yere 795:
he raigned 29 yeres after the death of D. Bermund.
D. Berthis his wife, with whom he had no companie, and therefore he had no children.
G g g g g iij D. Ramir

X.

D. Ramir and D. Garcia, sonnes to king Bermond, raigne together in the yere 824:
D. Ramir who furnished, held the realme six yeres.

D. Vrraca of Castille wife to D. Ramir.

Lawfull children { D. Ordogno or Fortun, D. Garcia.

XI.

D. Ordogno or Fortun, first of that name, and sonne to the king D. Ramir, in the yere 831:
he raigned 10 yeres.

D. Nugno his wife.

Lawfull children { D. Alphonso,
D. Bermond,
D. Nugno,
D. Odoaire,
D. Froila,
D. X, a daughter.

XII.

D. Alphonso third of that name, sonne to king D. Ordogno, in the yere 841: he raigned 46 yeres.

D. Amelina, or as some say, Ximena his wife.

Lawfull children { D. Garcia,
D. Ordogno or Fortun,
D. Froila,
D. Gonfal the Archdeacon.

XIII.

D. Garcia first of that name, sonne to D. Alphonso the third, in the yere 886: he raigned three yeres, and had to wife the daughter of D. Nugno Fernandes de Castille, and died without children.

XIII.

D. Ordogno or Fortun, second of that name, brother to D. Garcia, in the yere 889: he raigned eight yeres.

D. Nugno or Elaira, as some say, his first wife.

Lawfull children { D. Sancho,
D. Alphonso,
D. Ramir,
D. Garcia,
D. Ximena.

D. Arrogonde, or it may be Radegonde of Galicia, his second wife repudiated.
D. Sancho, Infanta of Navarre, third wife to this king D. Ordogno.

XV.

D. Froila second of that name, and third sonne to king Alphonso the third, an usurper, in the yere 897: he raigned one yere six monthes, surnamed the cruell.

D. Nugno or Marina his wife.

Lawfull children { D. Alphonso,
D. Ordogno, or Fortun,
D. Ramir,
D. Froila, a bastard, father to D. Pelagius the Deacon.

XVI.

D. Alphonso fourth of that name, sonne to the king D. Ordogno the second, in the yere 898: he raigned 6 yeres.

D. Vrraca Ximenes Infanta of Navarre his wife.

D. Ordogno or Fortun, called the bad.

D. Ramir,

XVII.

D. Ramir, second of that name, brother to D. Alphonso the fourth, in the yere 904: he raigned 20 yeres.

D. Theresa Infanta of Navarre, his wife.

Lawfull children { D. Bermond,
D. Ordogno,
D. Sancho,
D. Elaira, a Nun.

XVIII.

D. Ordogno 3 of that name, sonne to D. Ramir, in the yere 924: he raigned 5 yeres.
D. Vrraca, daughter to D. Fernand Gonfalez Earle of Castille, his wife repudiated.

D. Elaira his second wife, by whom he had

D. Bermond.

XIX.

D. Sancho, brother to D. Ordogno, in the yere 929: he raigned 22 yeres, the first of that name, and was surnamed the Grossie.

D. Theresa his wife, of whom was borne

D. Ramir.

XX.

D. Ramir third of that name, sonne to D. Sancho, in the yere 941, he raigned 24 yeres.
D. Vrraca his wife, by whom he had no children.

XXI.

D. Bermond second of that name, sonne to king D. Ordogno the third, in the yere 965:
he raigned 17 yeres.

D. Pelaguita his wife, of whom came

D. Christina married to D. Ordogno the blind, & had issue D. Pelagius.

D. Elaira 2 wife, mother to D. Adancia, who was wife to D. Pelagius the Deacon above named, and had by him D. Pedro Ordogno, D. Alphonso, D. Pelagius,
D. Theresa, a Nun. D. Nugno, D. Theresa.

Of two sisters Concubines, he had

D. Ordogno by the one:
D. Elaira by the other.

XXII.

D. Alphonso fifth of that name, sonne to king Bermond, in the yere 982: he raigned 46
yeres.

D. Elaira daughter to D. Melanjo Gonfalez his wife.

Lawfull children { D. Bermond,
D. Sancho married to D. Ferdinand first king of Ca-
stille.

XXIII.

D. Bermond third of that name, sonne to D. Alphonso the fifth, in the yere 1028: he raigned 9 yeres.

D. Theresa his wife, daughter to Sancho Earle of Castille, who brought him

D. Alphonso, who died an infant.

XXIII.

D. Sancho heire to the realme, sister to D. Bermond, was married to king
Ferdinand the first of Castille, and 24 of Leon, in the yere 1037: he raigned 20 yeres.
Children

Children after she came to the Succession of Leon

Children after she came to the Crowne

D. Alphonso sixth of that name, son to D. Sancha, in the year 1067 he reigned 41 years in Leon, and came to the crowne of Castille. He had many children by many wives, specified in the line of Castille, and among others,

D. Constance his fourth wife, a Spaniard, brought him
 D. Vrraca who was Queene of Leon and Castille, married first to D. Raymond of Burgundie, of whom came D. Alphonso Raymond, king.

D. Vrraca had to her second husband, D. Alphonso king of Navarre and Arragon, number of the fourth of that name among the kings of Leon in the year 1108: they had not any children.

D. Alphonso Raymond eighth of that name, sonne to D. Raymond of Burgundie, Earle of Galicia: he reigned in the place of D. Vrraca his mother 35 years, in the year 1122.

D. Berenguela daughter to D. Raymond Arnold Earle of Barcelone, by whom among other children named in the line of Castille, he had
 D. Ferdinand his second sonne, king of Leon.

D. Ferdinand second of that name, and second sonne to king D. Alphonso the eighth, in the year 1157: he reigned 31 years.

D. Vrraca of Portugal, his first wife.

D. Alphonso.

D. Theresia his second wife, of the house of Lara.

D. Vrraca Lopes his third wife, mother to

D. Sancho Ferdinand.

D. Garcia.

D. Alphonso ninth of that name, sonne to D. Ferdinand the second, in the year 1188: he reigned 42 years.

D. Theresia of Portugal his first wife.

Lawfull children { D. Ferdinand.
 D. Sancha.
 D. Dolce.

D. Berenguela Infanta of Castille, his second wife, mother to Lawfull children { D. Ferdinand, king.

 D. Alphonso, Lord of Molina.
 D. Constance, a Nunne.
 D. Berenguela, Countesse of Brenne, and Queene of Ierusalem.

Of a Concubine whose name is unknowne,
 D. Roderigo Alphonso of Leon.

D. Ferdinand the third, he reigned at Leon after his father D. Alphonso the ninth, but he first seized vpon the crowne of Castille, by the diligence of D. Berenguela his mother: in him the two realmes were vnitid, and neuer more diuided, in the year 1230.

D. Beatrice daughter to the Emperour Philip: their posteritie is in the line of Castille.

Line

Line of Castille.

D. Nugno Fernandes Earle of Castille, under the Soueraignie of Leon, father of grand-father to

D. Ximena married to D. Gonsal Inste.

D. Diego Porcello Earle also, or gouernour of Castille under the same Soueraignie.

D. Sulla married to D. Nugno Bellides.

These two gouernours were slaine by king Ordogne the second of Leon, in the prison of Leon.

D. Nugno Bellides Earle of Castille.

D. Sulla daughter to Diego Porcello his wife.

Lawfull children. { D. Nugno Rasure.
 D. Inste, Gonsales.

D. Nugno Rasure father to

D. Gonsal Nugnes.

D. Eluira or Theresia Nugnes turnamed the Faire.

D. Flamin Caluo husband to Eluira, whence comes the race of Cid Roy Dias.
 These gouerned the countrie of Castille, in qualitie of Iudges: after that it was drawn from the obedience of the kings of Leon, during the reign of D. Froila the second, about the year 896.

D. Gonsal Nugnes sonne to D. Nugno Rasure, sole gouernour of Castille.

D. Ximena daughter or grandchild to D. Nugno Fernandes, whom wee set in the first place in this Line, mother to

D. Fernand Gonsales their sonne.

First Soueraigne Earle.

D. Fernand Gonsales first Earle proprietor of Castille, in the year 910: he gouerned 32 years.

D. Vrraca his first wife, mother to

D. Vrraca.

D. Sancha Infanta of Navarre, second wife to D. Fernand, daughter to D. Sancho Abarca.

Children { D. Gonsal Fernandes.
 D. Sancho Fernandes.

D. Garci Fernandes.

D. Pedro father to two sonnes { D. Gonsal Nugnes.
 D. Fernandes Gonsales.

D. Baldwin.

It is doubtfull by which of his wives he had these three sonnes.

II.

D. Garci Fernandes the third sonne to D. Fernand Gonsales, in the year 942: hee held the Earldome 48 years.

D. Argentina his first wife, a French woman.

D. Sancha, Ogna, or Abba, his second wife, mother to Children { D. Garci Roland.

 D. Sancho Garcia.

D. Vrraca a Nun.

III.

D. Sancho Garcia the second sonne to D. Garci Fernandes, in the year 990: he gouerned Castille 38 years.

D. Vrraca his wife, mother to Children { D. Garcia.

 D. Nugna Queene of Navarre.

D. Theresia Queene of Leon.

D. Tigrida a Nunne.

D. Garcia

Castille.

III.

D. Garcia second of that name, (same at Leon before he was married, so as the Earldome fell to his sister.

D. Nunga Queene of Nauarre by the right of proximity.

V.

D. Nunga sister to D. Garcia, married to the king.

D. Sancho fourth of that name of Nauarre, in the year 1028, they held the Earldome six years, then they gaue it to D. Fernand their second sonne, with the title of a King.

D. Fernand, second sonne.

The other children of this marriage are named in the line of Nauarre.

First King of Castille.

D. Fernand, second sonne of D. Sancho, fourth of that name of Nauarre, had Castille for his portion, with the title of a king, being the inheritance of his mother D. Nunga: in the year 1034 he vniued Leon vnto it, by his wife D. Sancho, and reigned 32 years.

D. Sancho sister to D. Bermund, third king of Leon, mother, among other children, to

D. Sancho Fernandes.

D. Alphonso.

Their other children are named in the line of Leon.

II.

D. Sancho Fernandes, whom we will call the second of that name, in regard of the Earle D. Sancho Garcia, in the year 1067: he reigned 6 years, died without children, and left his realme to his brother D. Alphonso king of Leon.

III.

D. Alphonso brother to D. Sancho, first of that name in Castille, and sixth in Leon, in the year 1073: he reigned 34 years 8 moneths.

D. Inez or Agnes first wife to D. Alphonso a Spaniard.

D. Constance, second wife, a Spaniard, and mother to

D. Vrraca Queene of Castille married to D. Raimond 5 D. Sancho.

of Burgondie first, by whom shee had

D. Maria otherwise called Caida a Moore, third wife to D. Alphonso, mother to

D. Sancho.

D. Berthe fourth wife, an Italian.

D. Isabell, fifth, a Spaniard, mother to

D. Sancho.

D. Eluira Queene of Naples.

D. Beatrice a French woman, sixth wife to D. Alphonso.

By D. Ximena Nunga de Guzman a Concubine, he had

D. Eluira, Countesse of Toloufa.

Of another Concubine whose name is not knowne,

D. Therese, first Countesse of Portugall.

III.

D. Vrraca being the eldest, widow to D. Raimond Earle of Burgondie, was hereditarie Queene of Castille and Leon, shee tooke to her second husband, D. Alphonso king of Nauarre and Arragon, first of that name, from whom being divorced, and liuing loosely in her country, the Earle did choose D. Alphonso Raimond her sonne for their king, during her life: yet we will set her in the fourth place.

D. Alphonso husband to D. Vrraca, fourth king of Castille, in the year 1108, where hee reigned eight years.

V.

D. Alphonso Raimond, sonne to Raimond of Burgondie, and to D. Vrraca, in the year 1122, he reigned 35 years, and is numbered for the third of that name.

D. Berenguela

Castille.

D. Berenguela, daughter to the Earle of Barcelone called D. Raymond Arnold his wife, mother to

D. Sancho king of Castille.

D. Fernand king of Leon.

D. Isabell or Constance Queene of France.

D. Sancho or Beatrice Queene of Nauarre.

D. Garcia.

D. Rica 2 wife to D. Alphonso Raimond, aunt to the Emperour Frederic 1, mother to

D. Sancho Queene of Arragon.

D. Marie a concubine, mother to

D. Estienne, wife to D. Fernand Roderigo el Castellon, whose sonne D. Pedro Fernandes de Castro was.

D. Goutrude sister to Diego Apricio, a concubine also, mother to

D. Vrraca Queene of Nauarre.

VI.

D. Sancho sonne to D. Alphonso Raimond, in the year 1157: he reigned two years, the fourth of that name.

D. Blanche of Nauarre his wife.

D. Alphonso their sonne.

VII.

D. Alphonso sonne to D. Sancho 4 of that name, in the year 1159: he reigned 55 yerres;

D. Leonora daughter to Henrie the second king of England,

D. Blanche Queene of France.

D. Berenguela Queene of Leon.

D. Sancho died an infant.

D. Vrraca Queene of Portugall.

D. Fernand died young.

D. Malfade died a virgin.

D. Constance a Nunne.

D. Leonora Queene of Arragon.

D. Henrie King of Castille.

Two daughters which died in their infancies,

Children

VIII.

D. Henrie first of that name, sonne to D. Alphonso 4, in the year 1214: he reigned about three years.

D. Malfade of Portugall his wife.

The king D. Henrie being dead without children, his sister D. Berenguela second daughter to king D. Alphonso seized vpon the realme of Castille, to the prejudice of D. Blanche mother to Saint Lewis king of France, who was the elder, and there leised D. Fernand sonne to her, and to D. Alphonso ninth king of Leon.

IX.

D. Ferdinand third of that name, sonne to D. Alphonso ninth king of Leon, and to D. Berenguela of Castille, obtained the realme of Castille, to the prejudice of Queene Blanche, mother to Saint Lewis, in the year 1217, and reigned 35 yerres.

D. Beatrice daughter to the Emperour Philip, of whom was borne

D. Alphonso.

D. Frederic.

D. Ferdinand.

D. Henrie.

Lawfull children D. Philip.

D. Sancho.

D. Emanuel.

D. Leonora not married.

D. Berenguela a Nun.

By

Castille.

By Isabel or Adelle as some write, of the house of Poitiers, his second wife, he had

Lawfull children {
D. Ferdinand.
D. Lewis.
D. Leonora.

In this King the two Realmes of Leon and Castille were vnited, and were no more diuided.

X. King of Castille. 31. of Leon.

D. ALFONSO sonne to D. Ferdinand 3, numbred for the 5 of that name, and 10 in Leon: but they that joyne these two Lines, accompt him the 11, adding his great grandfather Alfonso 4 of Castille, who had no interest in Leon.

D. Violant of Arragon his wife, by whom he had

D. Ferdinand called de la Cerda, who married D. Blanche daughter to K. Lewis of France, and had	D. Alfonso who married the Ladie of Luner, named Maria , daughter to the Viscont of Narbonne	D. Lewis Earle of Clermont husband to D. Leonora de Guzman	D. John earl of Clermont husband to D. Leonora de Guzman
D. Sancho 3. sonne	D. Fernand, who had to wife D. Marie de Lara, and had one daughter D. Blanche married to D. John Manuell father to D. John 4. sonne to D. Alfonso	D. John Constable of France, named by some Charles	D. Isabel wife to Bernard de Foix, baird, the butler of the house of Castille
D. Pedro 3. sonne	D. John called de Lara, heire to his mother.
D. John 4. sonne to D. Alfonso	D. Alfonso the wife who married D. Maria Lopez Diaz, heire of Biscaye, and had D. John the blind, father to one Daughter married to D. John Manuell de Lara.
D. James 5. sonne.
D. Berenguela.
D. Beatrice.
D. Isabel.
D. Leonora.

D. Maier de Guzman a Concubine, mother to D. Beatrice Queene of Portugall.

XI. King of Castille. 32. of Leon.

D. SANCHE second sonne to the King D. Alfonso, seized vpon the realme in his fathers life time, to frustrat the children of his elder brother D. Ferdinand deceased in the year 1284, and reigned about 11 years: wee number him for the 4 of that name in Castille.

D. MARIA of Castille, daughter to D. Alfonso Lord of Molina, his wife.

Lawfull children {
D. Isabelle Duchesse of Britaine.
D. Ferdinand.
D. Alfonso son Philip.
D. Henry.
D. Peter.
D. Beatrice.

XII. King of Castille. 33. of Leon.

D. FERDINAND sonne to D. Sancho the 4 of that name, in the year 1295: hee reigned 17 years.

D. Constance of Portugall his wife.

Children {
D. Alfonso.
D. Leonora.

D. Alfonso

Castille and Leon.

XIII. King of Castille. 34. of Leon.

D. Alfonso 11 of that name, sonne to D. Ferdinand in the year 1312: he reigned 38 years.

D. Maria of Portugall his wife.

Lawfull children {
D. Ferdinand died in his infancie.
D. Pedro King.

By Leonora de Guzman a Concubine he had

Bastards {
D. Pedro.
D. Sancho.
D. Henry.
D. Frederic } Twins.
D. Ferdinand.
D. Tello.
D. John.
D. Joane, who was wife to Ferdinand de Castro.

XIII. King of Castille. 35. of Leon.

D. Pedro the cruell, in the year 1350: he was lawfull sonne to D. Alfonso, or as some hold, suppoed by the Queene D. Maria, who was cruel of the fruitfulness of D. Leonora de Guzman: he reigned tyrannously 18 years.

D. Blanche of Bourbon his wife.

D. Maria de Padilla his Concubine.

Bastards {
D. Beatrice.
D. Constance Duchesse of Lancaster.
D. Alfonso.
D. Isabel Countesse of Cambridge.

D. Joane de Castro, whom he married in the life of Queene Blanche, mother to D. John.
D. Isabella an other Concubine, mother to Bastards {

D. Sancho.
D. Diego.

D. Theresa of Ayala, vpon promise of marriage, brought him D. Maria.

XV. King of Castille. 36. of Leon.

D. Henry 2 of that name, baird sonne to Alfonso 11: being persecuted by the king D. Pedro, he had recourse vnto the French, by whose ayde he conquered the Realme of Castille, and slew the king D. Pedro in the year 1368, and reigned 11 years.

D. Joane Manuell his wife, mother to

Lawfull children {
D. John king of Castille.
D. Leonora Queene of Navarre.

D. Leonora Ponce, some call her Beatrice, a Concubine: by her he had

D. Frederic duke of Benauent.

D. Elvira Iniguez an other Concubine, mother to

D. Joane married to D. Alfonso sonne to the Marquesse of Villena.

Of vncertaine mothers were borne

D. Alfonso Earle of Gijon.

An other daughter married to D. Pedro sonne to the marquesse of Villena.

XVI. King of Castille. 37. of Leon.

D. John 1 of that name, sonne to D. Henry the second, in the year 1379: hee reigned 11 years.

D. Leonora of Arragon his wife, mother to Lawfull children {

D. Henry.
D. Ferdinand.

A daughter which died young.
D. Beatrice of Portugall, his second wife.

H h h h h

XVII.

Castille and Leon.

XVII. King of Castile. 38 of Leon.

D. HENRY third of that name, sonneto D. John the first, in the yere 1390: he reigned 16 yeres.

D. KATHERINE of Lancaster his wife.

Lawfull children } D. Marie, Queene of Arragon.
D. John, King of Castille.
D. Katherine.

XVIII. King of Castile. 39 of Leon.

D. JOHN sonneto D. Henry the third, in the yere 1406: he reigned 48 yeres.
D. MARIA of Arragon, daughter to D. Ferdinand his vncl, his wife.

Lawfull children } D. Katherine, died yong.
D. Leonora.
D. Henry king of Castille.

D. ISABELL of Portugall his second wife, daughter to the infant D. John, Master of S. James.

D. Isabel, Queene of Castille.
D. Alfonso.

XIX. King of Castille. 40 of Leon.

D. HENRY fourth of that name, called the vnble, in the yere 1454: he reigned 21 yeres.

D. BLANCHE of Nauarre, daughter to the king D. John, his first wife, put away.
D. IOANE of Portugall his second wife, mother to

D. Ioane, a supposid child.

XX. King of Castile. 41 of Leon.

D. ISABELL of Castille, sister to king Henry the fourth, was Queene of Castille, as next of the blood, and lawfull, she married with

D. FERDINAND, Prince of Arragon, King of Sicile: they began to raigine in the yere 1474, and had Lawfull children } D. Isabel, Queene of Portugall, mother to D. Michel, who had beene heire to all the realmes of Spaine, if he had liued.

D. John, who died yong.
D. Ioane Queene heire.
D. Maria Queene of Portugall.
D. Katherine.

XXI. King of Castile. 42 of Leon.

D. IOANE, daughter to the Queene D. Isabel, and D. Ferdinand her husband: she was married to the Archduke

D. PHILIP of Austria: they succeeded to the Realmes of Castille and Leon, in the yere 1504, and raigned together two yeres, they had Lawfull children } D. Leonora Queene of Portugall and of France.

D. Charles King and Emperour.
D. Isabel Queene of Denmarke.
D. Ferdinand Emperour.
D. Marie.
D. Katherine.

XXII. King of Castile. 43 of Leon.

D. CHARLES by the decease of his father D. Philip, succeeded to the right of the Crowne of Castille, vnder the gouernment of the King D. Ferdinand his grandfather, after

Castille and Leon.

after whose death hee tooke vpon him the gouernment of the realme, by reason of the incapacie of the Queene D. Ioane his mother, in the yere 1516: hee raigned 43 yeres in Castille, Arragon and Nauarre.

D. ISABELL daughter to King Emanuel of Portugall his wife.

Lawfull children } D. Philip king.
D. Marie Emperesse.
D. Ioane married to the Prince of Portugall.
D. Ferdinand who died yong.

By Concubines he had

Bastards } D. Marguerite duchesse of Florence, and Parma.
D. John d Austria.

XXIII. King of Castile. 44 of Leon.

D. PHILIP, 2 sonne to the Emperour Charles 5, in the yere 1558: hee raigned fortie yeres.

D. MARIE of Portugall his first wife, mother to

D. Charles.
D. MARIE Queene of England, died without children.
D. ISABELL of France, his 3 wife, mother to

D. Anna of Austria his 4 wife, by whom he had Lawfull children } D. Charles.

D. Laurens, some say Ferdinand.
D. Diego, or James.
D. Philip.
D. Na daughter.

XXIII. King of Castile. 45 of Leon.

D. PHILIP 3 now raigining, sonneto Philip 2, in the yere 1598.
D. MARGUERITE of Austria daughter to the Archduke Ferdinand of Gratz, his wife.

Line of Nauarre.

First King in Sobrabre and Nauarre.

D. GARCIA Ximenes in the yere 716: hee raigned 42 yeres.
INIGO his wife, mother to Garcia Inigo.

II.

D. GARCIA INIGO, second of that name, in the yere 758: hee raigned 44 yeres: the name of his wife is vnknowne.

D. FORTUN GARCES his sonne.

III.

D. FORTUN GARCES, sonneto D. Garcia Inigo, in the yere 802: hee raigned 13 yeres.

D. THEYDA of Arragon daughter to D. Galinde.
D. Sancho Garces.

III.

D. SANCHE GARCES, first of that name, sonneto D. FORTUN, in the yere 815: hee raigned 17 yeres.

The name of his wife is not found.

D. Ximen Inigo, it may be their sonne.

Hhhhhh j

D. XIMEN

V.

D. XIMEN INIGO, in the year 832: he reigned 8 yeres.
D. NUGNA his wife.

D. Inigo Arista.

VI.

D. INIGO ARISTA, in the year 840: he reigned 27 yeres some hold that hee was not sonne to D. Ximen, but suffred from the Lords of Bigorre, and elected.
D. THEYDA, daughter to Zeno Earle of Biscaie.

D. Garcia Inigo.

VII.

D. GARCIA INIGO, third of that name, sonne to D. Inigo Arista, in the year 867: he reigned 18 yeres.

D. VERRACA, heire of Arragon, his wife.

Children {
D. Fortun.
D. Sancho Abarca.
D. Sancho Queene of Leon.

VIII.

D. FORTUN, in the yere 885: hee reigned 6 yeres in Nauarre and Arragon, which was a small thing then, and vnder the foueraigntie of Nauarre. This king made himselfe a Monke, and left the realme to his brother.

IX.

D. SANCHO ABARCA, 2 of that name, in the year 901: reigned 19 yeres.
D. TODA, or THEYDA his wife.

Children {
D. Garcia Sanchez.
D. Prraca Xerimes, Queene of Leon.
D. Marie Countesse of Barcelona
D. Theresa Queene of Leon.
D. Sancho Countesse of Castille.
D. Blanche married to the Lord of Biscaie.

Some hold this King had 3 sonnes more,

{
D. Ramir.
D. Gonfal.
D. Ferdinand.

X.

D. GARCIA SANCHES, 4. of that name, sonne to D. Sancho Abarca, in the year 920: he reigned 49 yeres.
THERESIA his wife.

Children {
D. Sancho Garcia.
D. Ramir.
D. Prraca.
D. Ermeisilde.
D. Ximena.

XI.

D. SANCHO GARCIA, third of that name, sonne to D. Garcia Sanchez, in the year 969: he reigned 24 yeres.
D. VERRACA his wife.

Children {
D. Garcia.
D. Ramir father to D. Sancho.
D. Gonfal.
D. Garcia.

XII.

D. GARCIA the shaking sonne to D. Sancho Garcia, 5. of that name, in the yere 993: he reigned 7 yeres or therabouts.

D. XIMENA

D. XIMENA his wife.

D. Sancho their sonne.

XIII.

D. SANCHE, 4 of that name, sonne to D. Garcia the trembling, in the year 1000: hee reigned 34 yeres.

D. NYENA daughter to D. Sancho Earle of Castille, which by some is called D. Nena, heire of Castille.

D. Garcia King of Nauarre.

Children {
D. Ferdinand king of Castille.
D. Gonfal king of Sobrabre and Ribagoda.

Of D. Caya the Ladie of Ayurca Concubine

D. Ramir King of Arragon.

XIII.

D. GARCIA, 6 of that name, sonne to D. Sancho 4, in the yere 1034: he reigned 20 yeres.

D. EYVETTES French woman, of the house of Carisone, and of Beciers, his wife.

D. Sancho Garcia King.

D. Ramir.

D. Ferdinand.

D. Raymond.

Children {
D. Ermeisilde.

D. Zimena.

D. Mayor.

D. Prraca, or Oyma.

XV.

D. SANCHO GARCIA, 5 of that name, sonne to D. Garcia, in the yere 1054: hee reigned 22 yeres.

D. PLAISANCE his wife.

D. Ramir Sanchez of D. Elaira daughter to Cid Roy Dias had.

D. Garcia the elder.

D. Garcia the second.

These children did not succeed.

XVI.

D. SANCHO RAMIRS, who was 2 king of Arragon leazed vpon the realme of Nauarre, and is nombred for the 6 of that name, in the yere 1096 he reigned 18 yeres.

D. FRONCA, daughter to the Earle of Yrgel his wife, mother of some children named in the Line of Arragon, to

Children {
D. Pedro, who was king of Nauarre and Arragon.
D. Alfonso, who was king of Arragon.
D. Ramir a Monke.

D. PEDRO, 1 of that name, sonne to D. Sancho Ramirs, in the yere 1098 he reigned 10 yeres.

D. BERTHA or INES of Tuscaine his wife.

D. Pedro died an infant.

D. Isbell died also before the father blind.

XVIII.

D. ALFONSO, brother to D. Pedro 1 of that name, vniued all the Christian realms

Hhhhhh ij of of Spaine together by his marriage with D. Vrraca heire of Castille and Leon, he came to the Crowne of Nauarre, in the yere 1104, and reigned 30 yeres.

D. VRRACA, daughter to Alfonso 6 of Leon and Castille, his wife, by whom he had not any children.

XIX

D. GARCIA RAMIREZ, 7 of that name, sonne to D. Ramir Sanchez, 8 grand-child to D. Sancho Garcia, 5 of that name, he was chosen by the Estates, in the yere 1134, and reigned 16 yeres.

D. MARCELLINA OR MARGUERITE, as some say, daughter to Rotron Earle of Perche, his wife.

Children {
D. Blanche.
D. Sancho king.
D. Alfonso Ramirez.
D. Marguerite Queene of Naples.

D. VRRACA, base daughter to D. Alfonso, 8 king of Leon and Castille, his second wife, mother to

D. Sancho Vicountesse of Bearn, and then wife to D. Pedro de Molina, of which second marriage came Americ Vicont of Naboma, for D. Pedro his father was sonne to Ermiscinda Vicountesse of Naboma.

XX

D. SANCHE, 7 of that name, called the wife, sonne to D. Garcia Ramirez, in the yere 1150: he reigned 46 yeres.

D. BEACIA OR BEATRIX, or as some say D. Sancho, daughter to D. Alfonso Raymond, king of Castille and Leon, his wife, by whom he had

Children {
D. Sancho King of Nauarre
D. Ferdinand.
D. Ramir Bishop of Pampelone.
D. Berenguela Queene of England.
D. Theresa, or Constance.
D. Blanche Countesse of Champagne and Brie.

XXI

D. SANCHE, 8 of that name, called the strong, sonne to Sancho 7, in the yere 1194: he reigned 40 yeres.

D. CLEMENCE, daughter to Raymond, 4 Earle of Tolousa, his wife

D. Ferdinand, who died before the father.

Of a Concubine whose name is unknowne, this king had

William a bastard.

By the death of the king, the Crowne of Nauarre pass into the House of Champagne, D. Blanche his sister, wife to Count Thibaud, remaining sole of the race, having issue

XXII

D. THIBAUD, 1 of that name, sonne to D. Blanche of Nauarre, succeeded his vncler D. Sancho 8, in the yere 1234, and reigned 19 yeres.

His first wife was of Metz.

The 2, was daughter to Guichard Earle of Beausieu, and had

D. Blanche Duchesse of Britaine.

The third wife, was daughter to Archambaud, Earle of Foix, named Marguerite, mother to

Children {
D. Thibaud.
D. Henry.
D. Lewis.
D. Pedro.

D. THIBAUD,

XXIII

D. THIBAUD, second of that name, sonne to the first, in the yere 1253: he reigned 18 yeres.

D. ISABELL of France, daughter to S. Lewis, by whom he had not any children.

D. Marguise Lope de Rada a Concubine, brought him

D. Marguise a bastard, who was wife to Pedro Fernandez of Isar, base sonne to D. James the first, King of Arragon.

XXIII

D. HENRY, brother to Thibaud the second, in the yere 1271: he reigned three yeres, the first of that name.

D. IOANE, daughter to Robert Earle of Artois.

Children {
D. Thibaud, died an infant.

D. Ioane Queene.

By a Concubine of the house of Laparra, he had

D. Henry, bastard, Marshall of Nauarre.

XXV

D. IOANE, sole daughter to D. Henry the first, married to Philip the faire, king of France, and reigned in Nauarre, in the yere 1274, the space of 31 yeres: of which mariage issued

Children {
D. Lewis Hutin.
D. Philip the long.
D. Charles the faire.
D. Ioane.
D. Isabell Queene of England.

XXVI

D. LEUVIS HUTIN, King of France and Nauarre, first of that name, in the yere 1303: he reigned 10 yeres in Nauarre.

D. MARGUERITE daughter to Robert of Burgundie.

D. Ioane of Nauarre.

His second wife was Clemence, daughter to the King of Hungarie.

D. John an after-birth, who lived but eight dayes.

XXVII

D. PHILIP the long, king of France and Nauarre, second of that name, in the yere 1313: he reigned five yeres.

D. IOANE daughter to Othelin Earle of Burgundie.

Children {
D. Ioane Duchesse of Burgundie.
D. Marguerite Countesse of Nemours.
D. Marie, wife to the Dauphin Humbert.
D. Blanche, a religious woman.

XXVIII

D. CHARLES the first, first of that name, king of Nauarre and France, in the yere 1328: he reigned about eight yeres.

D. BLANCHE, daughter to Othelin Earle of Burgundie, his first wife.

D. MARIE of Luxembourg his second wife, mother to

D. Blanche Duchesse of Orleans.

A sonne, which died in his infancy.

D. IOANE, daughter to Lewis Earle of Euzeux, by whom (some say) D. Blanche was borne.

XXIX

D. IOANE, daughter to King Lewis Hutin, heire of Nauarre, in the yere 1328: (he reigned with her husband 21 yeres.

D. PHILIP

D. PHILIP Earle of Eux, husband to D. Joane, the third of that name, among the kings of Nauarre: of which marriage descended

- Children
- D. Charles king.
  - D. Philip Earle of Longueville.
  - D. Lewis Earle of Beaumont. This D. Lewis married the heire of the house of Beaumont le Roger in Normandie, and were the stemme of the Barons of Lerin.
  - D. Joane Countesse of Rohan.
  - D. Marie Queene of Arragon.
  - D. Blanche Countesse of France.
  - D. Agnes Countesse of Foix.

XXX

D. CHARLES second of that name, sonne to D. Philip the third, in the yeare 1349: he reigned in Nauarre 37 yeares, and was furnished the bad.

D. IOANE of France, daughter to king John, his wife: of which marriage descended these following.

- Lawfull children
- D. Charles King.
  - D. Philip died young.
  - D. Pedro Earle of Mortaigne, from whom descended D. Pedro of Portugal, Constable of Nauarre, the stemme of the Marquess of Falfes.
  - D. Blanche.
  - D. Joane, Duchesse of Britaine, and Queene of England.
  - D. Marie Countesse of Denia: it is doubtfull whether she were daughter to this Queene.
  - D. Leon or Lionell a bastard, the beginning of the Marquess of Cortes, Marshals of Nauarre.

XXXI.

D. CHARLES third of that name, sonne to Charles the second, in the yeare 1386: he reigned 39 yeares.

D. LEONORA of Castille his wife.

- Children
- D. Joane Countesse of Foix.
  - D. Marie.
  - D. Blanche Queene of Sicile and Nauarre.
  - D. Beatrix Countesse of Marche.
  - D. Isabell.
  - D. Charles.
  - D. Lewis.

By a Concubine whose name is unknowne.

- Bastards
- D. Godfrey Earle of Cortes.
  - D. Joane married to D. Inigo d'Ortiz of Bistuniga.

XXXII.

D. BLANCHE, daughter to D. Charles the third, had to her second husband D. John of Arragon, and began to reigne in the yeare 1415, and lasted 17 yeares: then after her decease D. JOHN, who was king of Arragon and Sicile, continued his reigne vnto the yeare 1479, who had by D. Blanche

- Children
- D. Charles.
  - D. Blanche Queene of Castille.
  - D. Leonora, Countesse of Foix, and afterwards Queene of Nauarre.

This King John had a second wife, and other issue which is set downe in the Line of Arragon.

XXXIII.

D. LEONORA, Countesse of Foix, wife to D. Gaston the fourth, came to the Crowne of Nauarre, suruiuing her brother and sister, in the yeare 1479, and died the same yeare.

D. GASTON,

D. GASTON Earle of Foix, called Prince of Viana, husband to D. Leonora, by whom he had

- Children
- D. Gaston, of whom and of Mar- Francis and guerite of France descended Katherine.
  - D. John, Vicount of Narbona.
  - D. Pedro, Cardinall.
  - D. James.
  - D. Marie, Marquess of Montserrat.
  - D. Joane, Countesse of Armaignac.
  - D. Marguerite, Duchesse of Britaine.
  - D. Katherine, Countesse of Candalle.
  - D. Leonora died a maid.

XXXIII.

D. FRANCIS, sonne to Gaston, surnamed Phebus, and grandchild to D. Leonora, his father being dead before her decease, he succeeded her in the realme of Nauarre, in the yeare 1479, and reigned four yeares: he died without any children.

XXXV.

D. KATHERINE, sister to Francis Phebus, reigned after her brother in the yeare 1483: she married with

D. JOHN of Albret: of which marriage issued

- Children
- D. John.
  - D. Andrew.
  - D. Henry king of Nauarre.
  - D. Charles, or rather Francis, who died at Naples in Monsieur de Lautrecs voyage.
  - D. Katherine.
  - D. Anne.
  - D. Quiterie.
  - D. Magdelaine.
  - D. Isabell.

And five other children which died young.

During the time and raigne of these Kings, D. John of Albret and D. Katherine, D. Ferdinand and D. Isabell his wife, kings of Castille and Arragon, seized on the realme of Nauarre beyond the Pyrenees, and joynd it to Castille.

XXXVI.

HENRY, the second, of Albret, successor to the rights of Nauarre, second of that name, in the yeare 1517.

MARGUERITE of France, sister to king Francis the first, his wife.

Joane, whom Bertrand Helie calls Charlotte.

XXXVII.

IOANE, daughter to Henry the second, succeeded in her fathers rights, married to ANTHONIA, Duke of Vendosme, of the noble house of Bourbon.

- Henry.
- Katherine.

XXXVIII.

HENRY the third of that name in Nauarre, and the fourth in France, in the yeare 1579, and reigned 38 yeares.

MARGUERITE of Valois, from whom he was diuorced, having no children.

MARIE de Medicis, daughter to the duke of Florence, his second wife, by whom he had Lewis, with diuers other children.

XXXIX.

LEWIS now reigning, the second of that name in Nauarre, and the thirteenth in France: he succeeded to his fathers rights in the yeare 1610.

Line

Line of Arragon.

I.

There is mention made about the year 775, of Aznar the sonne of Aznar and grand-king to Ende, Duke of Aquitaine, who had two sonnes.

Galinde and Ximenes Garcet.

II.

D. Galinde obtained some lands of the Souveraigntie of Navarre, and had his dwelling and seat at Iaca: This was the beginning of Arragon.

D. Theuda, who was Queene of Navarre.
D. Ximen Aznaret.
D. Endregot.

III.

D. Ximen Aznaret, sonne to D. Galinde, the third Earle of Arragon.

IIII.

D. Ximen Garcet, brother to D. Galinde, fourth Earle of Arragon, in the year 803.

D. Garcia Aznaret his sonne.

V.

D. Garcia Aznaret, sonne to D. Ximen Garcet, fift Earle of Arragon.

D. Fortun Ximenes his sonne.

VI.

D. Fortun Ximenes, sixt Earle of Arragon.

D. Vrraca, as some say daughter to this D. Fortun, and others to Endregot above named, vniwed the Earldome of Arragon to the Crowne of Navarre, bringing it in dowrie to the King D. Garcia Inigo, second of that name.

VII.

D. Garcia Inigo king of Navarre and seventh Earle of Arragon, in the year 867.

D. Vrraca above named, his wife.

D. Fortun their eldest sonne: the rest are named in the Line of Navarre.

VIII.

D. Fortun king of Navarre, second of that name, and eight Earle of Arragon, in the year 885.

IX.

D. Sancho Abarec king of Navarre, and ninth Earle of Arragon, brother to D. Fortun, in the year 901.

X.

D. Garc Sanchez, sonne to D. Sancho Abarec, king of Navarre, and tenth Earle of Arragon, in the year 920.

XI.

D. Sancho Garcet, sonne to D. Garc Sanchez, eleventh Earle of Arragon reigning in Navarre, in the year 969.

XII.

D. Garcia the Shaking, sonne to D. Sancho Garcet, king of Navarre, and twelfth Earle of Arragon, in the year 993.

XIII.

D. Sancho the Great, sonne to D. Garcia the Shaking, thirteenth Earle of Arragon, in the year 1000. This king of Navarre erected the Countie of Arragon to a Realme, and gave it to his baird sonne D. Ramir, as appears by the discourse by the Historie.

First

First King of Arragon.

D. RAMIR, first of that name, sonne to D. Sancho the great, king of Navarre, was the first king of Arragon, in the year 1034: and reigned 42 years.

D. ERMISSENDE, daughter to the Earle of Bigorre, by some named Giberge, his wife.

Children {
D. Sancho Ramirez,
D. Garcia Bishop of Iaca.
D. Sancho Countesse of Tolousa.
D. Theres Countesse of Prouence.

He had by a concubine

D. Sancho Lord of Ayuar, Atares, and Xauierre.

II.

D. SANCHO RAMIRRS, king of Arragon, in the year 1076: he reigned 18 years, and vsurped the realme of Navarre.

D. FELICA daughter, to the earle of Virgel, his wife.

Children {
D. Pedro king.
D. Alphonso a king.
D. Ramir a Monke, and then a king.

By a concubine, whose name is not extant,

D. Garcia, Bishop of Iacca.

III.

D. PEDRO, first of that name, sonne to D. Sancho Ramirez, in the year 1094: he reigned 14 yeres.

D. BERTHE, or IONES, his wife, an Italian.

Children {
D. Pedro 2.
D. Isabell } They died both before the father.

IIII.

D. ALPHONSO first of that name, brother to D. Pedro, in the year 1108, and reigned 26 yeres: he married D. Vrraca the heire of Castille, and died without children: after him Navarre was seperated from Arragon.

V.

D. RAMIR a Monke, sonne to D. Sancho Ramirez, and brother to the last kings, was king of Arragon, in the year 1134, by election of the Estates: his raigne was vncertaine: for hauing for the most part led a Monkish life, he gaue ouer the gouernment of the realme vnto his sonne in law, D. Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelona.

D. AGNES sister, or daughter, as some hold, to William Earle of Poitiers, his wife, mother to

D. Petronilla, heire of Arragon.

D. Petronilla, daughter to D. Ramir, did not raigne, as some hold, but her sonne D. Raymond, whom she had by the Earle of Barcelona.

D. Raymond Berenger, who gouerned the realme in qualitie of a Regent, and was called Prince of Arragon, who had by his wife Petronilla, among other children which are named in the line of Cattelogne, this sonne

D. Raymond, who changed his name, and was called Alphonso.

VI.

D. ALPHONSO, second of that name, called before Raymond, sonne to the Earle D. Raymond Berenger, and of the Princess D. Petronilla, in the year 1162: he reigned 34 yeres.

D. SANCHA, daughter to D. Alphonso Raymond, king of Castille and Leon, and of D. Rica, the was mother to

D. Pedro,

Arragon.

D. Pedro king of Arragon.

Children

- D. Alfonso Earle of Prouence, who had to wife D. Maria de Folcaquier, whence descended D. Raymond Berenger who was married to Batrix daughter to Thomas Earle of Morienne, who had
- D. Ferdinand a Monke.
- D. Constance Queene of Hungarie and then Emperesse.
- D. Leonora Countesse of Toloufa.
- D. Sancho Countesse also of Toloufa.
- D. Doulee a Nunne.

Marguerite queene of France.
Leonora Queene of England.
Sancho Queene of England & Emperesse.
Batrix Queene of Naples.
Isabel, who had the countie of Prouence, as the Arragonois say.

VII.

D. Pedro 2. of that name, sonne to D. Alfonso the 2., in the yeare 1196: he reigned about 18 yeares.

His first wife was of the house of Folcaquier, by whom he had

D. Raymond Berenger.

D. Marie daughter to the Earle of Mompellier, who had bene marryed to the Earle of Cominges: by this second wife he had

D. James king.

By a Concubine not named

D. Constance marryed to William Raymond of Moncado, Seneschall of Cartelogne.

VIII.

D. James first of that name, sonne to the king D. Pedro the first, in the yeare 1213: hee reigned 43 yeares.

D. Leonora of Castille, daughter to king D. Alfonso the 9., by whom he had

D. Alfonso, who dyed before the father.

D. Violant daughter to the king of Hungarie his second wife, mother to

D. Pedro king of Arragon.

Children

- D. James king of Maiorca, who married Elsclermond of Foix, who brought him
- D. Sancho Archbishop of Toledo.
- D. Isabel Queene of France.
- D. Ferdinand.
- D. Violant Queene of Castille.
- D. Constance wife to D. Manuel.
- D. Sancho.
- D. Maria.

D. James a Monke.
D. Sancho king of Maiorca.
D. Ferdinand.
D. Philip.
D. Sancho.

Of D. Ferdinand 3. sonne to D. James of Maiorca, and of Isabel heire of Morca, issued

D. James king of Maiorca.

D. Frederic.

And of his 2. wife of Cypres

D. Ferdinand.

D. James sonne to D. Ferdinand had by Constance of Arragon

Isabel Marquesse of Montserrat.

James heire of Maiorca.

King James had also by D. Theresa Gil de Bredoure, whom hee had married secretly,

D.

Arragon.

D. Pedro, Lord of Ayerbes.

D. James, Lord of Arica.

D. Berenguela, a concubine.

D. Pedro Fernandez, Lord of Ixtar.

Of the daughter of D. Sancho d. Antilla, a concubine,

D. Ferdinand Sanchez.

IX.

D. Pedro, third of that name, son to D. James 1., in the yere 1276: he reigned 9 yeres.
D. Constance, daughter to Manfroy, ballard to the Emperour Frederic 2. his wife, mother to

Children

- D. Alfonso, King of Arragon.
- D. James, King of Sicile, and then of Arragon.
- D. Frederic, King of Sicile.
- D. Pedro.
- D. Isabel, Queene of Portugall.
- D. Constance or Violant, queen of Naples.

D. Maria Nicolsa, a concubine, brought him

D. James Perez.

D. Anne Zapate, a concubine, mother to

D. Ferdinand.

By another concubine not named,

D. Sancho.

X.

D. ALPHONSO, third of that name, sonne to D. Pedro, in the yeare 1285: he reigned six yeares, and died without children.

XI.

D. JAMES, second of that name, brother to D. Alfonso, in the yeare 1291: he reigned 36 yeares.

BLANCHE, daughter to Charles King of Naples, called the Lame, his wife, mother to

Children

- D. James, who became a Monke.
- D. Alfonso.
- D. Pedro, Earle of Ampurias.
- D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Prages.
- D. John, Archbishop of Toledo.
- D. Constance, wife to D. John Manuel.
- D. Maria, wife to D. Pedro of Castille.
- D. Blanche, a Nunne.
- D. Violant, Princess of Tarentum.
- D. Isabel, wife to the Emperour Frederic the third.

This King had first of all married D. Isabel, daughter to D. Sancho King of Castille but the Pope dissolved this marriage.

D. MARIA of Cypres was his third wife.

D. ECLISENDE, sister to Othon of Moncado, his fourth wife.

By a concubine, not named,

D. James of Arragon, Earle of Luna.

XII.

D. ALPHONSO fourth, sonne to D. James 2. in the yere 1328, and reigned 8 yeres.

D. THERESA ENTENZA, Countesse, heire of Virge, his wife.

Children

- D. Pedro, King.
- D. James, Earle of Vagel.
- D. Constance, Queene of Majorca.
- Some write hee had five other children which died.
- D. LEONORA of Castille, his second wife, mother to
- D. Ferdinand, Marquesse of Tortosa.
- D. John.

Iiiii

D. Pedro,

Arragon.

XIII
D. PEDRO, 4 of that name, son to D. Alphonso, in the yere 1336: he reigned 51 yeres.
D. MARIA, second daughter to Philip 3, King of Nauarre, his wife.

Children D. Constance, Queene of Sicile.
D. Ioane, Countesse of Ampurias.
D. Maria.

A sonne which dyed young.

D. LEONORA, of ELVIRA of Portugall, his second wife.
D. CONSTANCE, of LEONORA of Sicile, sister to King Lewis, his 3 wife, mother to Children D. John, King.

D. Alphonso.
D. Martin, who was King.
D. Leonora, Queene of Castille.

D. SIBILLE FORTIA, widow to Artol de Foix, his 4 wife, by whom he had
D. Isabel, Countesse of Virgel.

XIIII
D. JOHN, 1 of that name, son to D. Pedro 4, in the yere 1387, and reigned 8 yeres.
D. MATTHEW, daughter to the Earle of Armaignac.

Children D. James, who dyed.
D. Ioane, wife to Mathew of Castillon, Earle of Foix.

D. VIOLANT, second wife to D. John, mother to Children D. Violant, wife to Lewis, 1, Duke of Calabria.

D. John, Duke of Calabria.
D. Nicholas, Marquess of Pont.
D. Marguerite, Queene of England.
D. Violant, Duchesse of Lorraine.
D. One sonne, who dyed young.
D. Charles, Earle of Mayne.

XV
D. MARTIN, brother to D. John deceased, for want of heires male by him, succeeded by election of the Estates, and by will, to the realme of Arragon, to the prejudice of D. Ioane, Countesse of Foix, and against her matrimoniall conventions, and the promises made by her father and grandfather to Mathew of Castillon, her husband.

D. MARIA de Luna was his first wife, before he came to the Crowne, by whom he had
D. Martin, who was King of Sicile, and dyed before his father, without any children.

D. MARGUERITE de Prades, his 2 wife, by whom he left no issue.

XVI
D. FERDINAND first of that name, brother to Henrie 3, King of Castille: hee obtained the realme of Arragon by election of the Estates, all other pretendants being rejected in the yere 1412, and reigned about foure yeres.

D. LEONORA d'Albuquerque, a Princess of the blood of Castille, his wife, mother to Children D. Alphonso, King of Arragon.

D. John, King of Nauarre and Arragon.
D. Henrie, Master of S. James in Castille.
D. Pedro, Master of Alcantara.
D. Marie, Queene of Castille.
D. Leonora, Queene of Portugall.

XVII
D. ALPHONSO, 5 of that name, son to D. Ferdinand, in the yere 1416: he reigned 42 yeres.

D. MARIE of Castille, his wife, but without children.

By

Arragon.

Cattelogne.

By concubines not named, he had

D. Ferdinand king of Naples.
D. Marie Marquess of Ferrara.
D. Leonora Princess of Rossano.

XVIII.

D. JOHN second of that name, brother to king Alphonso 5th, for want of lawfull heires, succeeded to the Realme of Arragon, in the yere 1458: and reigned one and twentie yeres and fixe moneths.

D. BLANCH of Nauarre his first wife, in whose right he was king of Nauarre, and had by her three children Children D. Charles, who died before his father, and had these base children,

D. Philip Master of Montefia.
D. John Bishop of Huesca.
D. Anne duchesse of Medina Celi.
D. Blanche Queene of Castille.
D. Leonora Queene of Nauarre.

D. Ioane daughter to D. Frederic Henricus Admirall of Castille, his second wife, mother to Children D. Ferdinand king of Arragon, Castille, Nauarre, &c.

D. Ioane Queene of Naples.

By concubines whose names are vnknowne,

Bastards D. Alphonso Earle of Vilhermosa.
D. John Archbishop of Saragossie.
D. Leonora Countesse of Lerin.
D. Ferdinand.
D. Maria.

XIX.

D. FERDINAND second of that name, sonne to king John, in the yere 1479: he reigned 37 yeres in sonne.

D. ISABEL Queene of Castille his wife, by whom the realmes of Arragon and Castille were vnitid.

D. Ioane mother to the Emperour Charles the first.

The other children of D. Ferdinand and D. Isabel are mentioned in the Line of Castille.

D. GERMAINE second wife to king Ferdinand.

D. John, who died an infant.

The Vicountesse of Eboli a concubine, mother to

D. Alphonso of Arragon Arch-bishop of Saragossie.

Of another concubine

D. Ioane of Arragon wife to D. Bernardin de Polesco, Constable.

Of D. Tots of Bilbao, a concubine

D. Marie of Arragon a Nun.

By a Portugall of the family of Pereira.

D. Marie of Arragon a Nun.

Line of Cattelogne.

BERNARD, Earle, Duke and Marques of Spaine vnder Charles the great, confirmed by Lewis the gentle, gouerned Cattelogne about the yere 795.

D. GEOFREY d'Arria Earle of Barcelona, vnder the French, in the yere 899.

D. ALMIRA his wife, a French woman, mother to

D. Geoffrey the hairie.

D. SALOMON Earle of Cerdagne, an vsurper, in the yere 898.

iiiiij

Ex

First proprietas Earle.

D. GEOFFREY the haire obtained Cattellogne in proprietas, vnder the Soueraignty of France, in the yere 884, of Charles the Grosse.

D. N. a Fleming, his wife.

Children { D. Rodolphus, Abbot of Ripol, and Bishop of Virgel.

D. Geoffrey.

D. Myr.

D. Seniofrid, Earle of Virgel, who was father to

One daughter.

{ D. Borel, Earle &c.

{ D. Armingol, Bishop of Virgel.

II.

D. Myr, sonne to D. Geoffrey, in the yere 914: he held the Countie 15 yeres: his sonnes were Children	D. Seniofrid , earle.	Bernard, called William the fat, Breake-yrone, father to	earle of Belsalu, father to	Bernard Guillel, also Earle of Belsalu.

	D. Oliban , called Cheurette , earle of Cerdagne & Belsalu, father to	D. Geoffrey , earle of Cerdagne, who had five sonnes.	D. Raymond Geoffrey , earle of Cerdagne, father to	D. William Raymond , earle of Cerdagne, father to
	D. Myr , Earle and Bishop of Gironne.	D. Oliban , Bishop of Vic, of Ossone.	D. Geoffrey Guinard , Arch-bishop of Narbonne.	D. Henry .
			D. Berenger Geoffrey , Bishop of Gironne.	D. William Geoffrey , Bishop of Virgel.

D. Geoffrey, Earle of Bergade.

III.

D. Seniofrid, sonne to D. Myr in the yere 919: he ruled vnder the gouernment of his vnkle the Earle of Virgel, and alone, about 38 yeres.

D. MARIA, Infanta of Nauarre, daughter to the King D. Sancho Abarca, his wife, by whom he had not any children.

IIII.

D. Borell, sonne to D. Seniofrid, Earle of Virgel, succeeded his cousin D. Seniofrid in the Countie of Barcelona, by right of intrusion: yet some pretend an insufficiencie in D. Oliban, brother to the deceased, in the yere 967.

D. LEONOR, his first wife, mother to

D. Raymond Borel.

D. ARMERYDE, or as some write, Engelrade his second wife.

Children { D. Ermengauld, Earle of Virgel.

D. Borella, a Nunne.

V.

D. RAYMOND Borell, sonne to the Earle D. Borel, in the yere 993, and held the Earle-dome 24 yeres.

D. SANCHA his wife, mother to

D. Berenger Borel.

VI.

D. Berenger Borel, sonne to D. Raymond, in the yere 1017: he ruled 18 yeres. The name of his wife is vncertaine.

Children { D. Raymond Berenger.

D. William Berenger.

D. Sancho Berenger, a Prince.

D. RAY-

VII.

D. RAYMOND BERENGER, sonne to D. Berenger Borel, in the yere 1035: he ruled 41 yeres.

D. RADALMVS his first wife.

D. Pedro Raymond.

D. Berenger Raymond.

D. ALMODIA, a French Ladie, descended from those Lords which ruled then in Languedoc, by whom the house of Barcelona got the rights it hath had to Carcassone, and other lands in that country: by her D. Raymond had { D. Raymond Berenger, Earle.

{ D. Lucia, Countesse of Palsars by her marriage with the Earle of Arual.

VIII.

D. RAYMOND BERENGER the Young, and third of that name, sonne to D. Raymond Berenger 2, in the yere 1076: he held the Earledome of Barcelona six yeres.

D. ALMODIA, daughter to Robert Guichard, Duke of Ponglia, his wife, mother to

D. Raymond Arnould.

IX.

D. RAYMOND ARNOULD, sonne to D. Raymond Berenger, and 4 of that name, in the yere 1082: he ruled 48 yeres.

D. DOVICE, Countesse of Prouence, daughter to Count Gilbert, or Gibert, his wife, mother to { D. Berenguela, Queene of Castille.

{ D. Raymond Berenger, Prince of Arragon.

{ D. Berenger Raymond, Earle of Prouence.

{ One daughter, married to Amery, Vicont of Narbonne.

{ Another daughter, married to Count Roger, some call him Bernard de Foix.

X.

D. RAYMOND BERENGER, sif of that name, sonne to D. Raymond Arnould, in the yere 1131: he ruled 31 yeres.

D. PETRONELLA, daughter to the king D. Ramir the Monke: by which marriage the realme of Arragon and the Earledome of Cattellogne, or Barcelona, were vnyted, they had

{ D. Raymond, who was afterwards called Alphonso, king of Arragon.

{ D. Pedro.

Children { D. Sancho.

{ D. Adoncia, Queene of Portugall.

{ One daughter, married to the Earle of Virgel.

D. RAYMOND, afterwards Alphonso, sonne to D. Raymond Berenger the first king of Arragon, and Earle of Barcelona, in the yere 1162: his posteritie is in the line of Arragon.

Line of Portugall.

HENRIS of Bescanson, or of Lorrain, was first Earle of Portugal about the yere 1090, by his marriage with D. THERESA, daughter to D. Alphonso the first king of Leon and Castille, to whom that country was given in dowrie: Their children were { D. Alphonso Henriques, King.

{ D. Theresa Henriques.

{ Another daughter, married to D. Ferdinand Menides.

First King of Portugall.

D. ALPHONSO HENRIQUES succeeding his father in the Earldome of Portugal in the yere 1112, tooke vpon him the title of King about the yere 1139, and held that country 72 yeres.

IIIIII III

D. MAL-

D. MALFADA MANRIQUE de Lara, his wife.

Children D. Sancho, King of Portugall.

D. Vrraca, Queene of Leon.

D. Theresa, Countesse of Flanders.

D. Malfada.

Bastard D. Pedro Alphonso.

II.

D. SANCHE, first of that name, sonne to D. Alphonso, in the yeare 1184: he reigned 28 yeares.

D. ALBONCIA, or D. Vrraca, daughter to D. Raymond Berenger, Earle of Barcelone, mother to

D. Alphonso, King.

D. Ferdinand, Earle of Flanders.

D. Pedro, Earle of Vigel in Arragon.

D. Henrique.

Children D. Theresa, wife to D. Alphonso of Leon.

D. Malfada, Queene of Castille.

D. Sancho, a Nunne.

D. Blanche.

D. Berenguela.

By D. Maria Aires, a concubine, he had Bastards D. Vrraca.

By D. Maria Peres of Ribera another concubine,

D. Theresa Sanches.

D. Gil Sanches of Portugall.

Bastards D. Constance Sanches.

D. Roy Sanches of Portugall.

III.

D. ALPHONSO, second of that name, son to the King D. Sancho, in the yeare 1212: he reigned 11 yeares.

D. Sancho.

D. Alphonso.

D. Ferdinand.

D. Leonora, Queene of Denmarke.

By a concubine, a Moore,

D. Alphonso Martinis.

III.

D. SANCHE, called Capello, second of that name, sonne to D. Alphonso the second, in the yeare 1223: he reigned in troubles vnto the yeare 1257; for then by reason of his incapacie, D. Alphonso, his brother, was called to the gouernement of Portugall.

D. MENCIA LOPES, his wife, by whom he had no children.

V.

D. ALPHONSO, third of that name, brother to D. Sancho, of a Regent and Gouernor he made himselfe king of Portugall, about the yeare 1257, and reigned two and twentie yeares.

MARAVLT, or MATILDE, Countesse of Boullen, his lawfull wife, mother to

D. Ferdinand, or Peter.

D. Robert.

This king D. Alphonso, to be supported in his desires to raigne by the fauour of Castille, his lawfull wife Matilde Countesse of Boullen, and married, in her life time, with the daughter of D. Alphonso, called the Wife, king of Castille.

D. BEATRIX

D. BEATRIX, a bastard, his wife, by whom he had

D. Denis, king.

D. Alphonso.

D. Blanche, a nun.

D. Constance.

By a concubine, or by diuers, he had

D. Leonora.

D. Ferdinand Alphonso of Portugall.

VI.

D. DENIS, sonne to D. Alphonso the third, in the yeare 1279: hee reigned 46 yeares.

D. ISABEL of Arragon, daughter to the king D. Pedro, his wife, mother to

D. Constance, Queene of Castille.

Children D. Alphonso, king of Portugall.

D. Pedro, Earle of Portalegre.

D. Alphonso Sanches, a bastard.

Some write, that the lawfull children of D. Denis and D. Isabel, were,

Isabel.

Constance.

Alphonso.

By concubines,

D. Alphonso, author of the familie of Albuquerque.

D. Peter, who gaue himselfe vnto learning, and made a booke of the great houses of Spaine.

Bastards D. John.

D. Ferdinand.

A daughter married to D. John de la Cerde.

Another daughter, a Nunne.

VII.

D. ALPHONSO the fourth, sonne to D. Denis, in the yeare 1325: hee reigned thirtie two yeares.

D. BEATRIX of Castille, his wife, mother to

D. Pedro, King.

D. Maria.

D. Alphonso.

D. Denis.

D. John.

D. Leonora, or Isaura, Queene of Arragon.

VIII.

D. PEDRO, I of that name, son to D. Alphonso 4, in the yeare 1357: he reigned 10 yeares.

D. BLANCHE, daughter to D. Pedro king of Castille, whom he put away, and then married

D. CONSTANCE, daughter to D. John Manuel, mother to

D. Lewis, who died an infant.

D. Ferdinand, King.

D. Marie, wife to D. Ferdinand of Arragon.

D. Beatrix died young.

By AGNES de Castro, a clandestine marriage,

D. Alphonso.

D. John.

D. Denis.

D. Beatrix, Countesse of Albuquerque.

D. Theresa Gallega, a concubine.

D. John, who was King.

liiii iiii

D. FERDINAND

IX.

D. FERDINAND, sonne to D. Pedro, in the yere 1367: he raigned seuentene yeres.
D. LEONORA TELLES de Meneſes, his wife.

D. Beatrice, queene of Castille.

By a concubine he had Isabella Countesse of Gijon.

X.

D. JOHN first of that name, base sonne to the king D. Pedro: he got the realme by his sword, and also by election, in the yere 1385, from D. John king of Castille and D. Beatrice his wife. He was before master of Auiz. He raigned 49 yeres.

D. PHILIP of Lancaster, an English woman, his wife, mother to

D. Blanche.

D. Alphonso.

D. Edward king.

D. Pedro duke of Coimbra, who married D. Isabel of Arragon, and had

D. Henrique duke of Viseo.

D. Isabel duchesse of Bourgondie.

D. John Master of Saint James, father to D. Isabel, who was queene of Castille.

D. Ferdinand Master of Auiz.

Besides these lawfull children, the king D. John had by D. Agnes a concubine, D. Beatrice Countesse of Arundel.

D. Alphonso Earle of Oren and Barcellos, and duke of Bragance.

XI.

D. EDWARD sonne to D. John the first, in the yere 1433: he raigned five yeres.

D. LEONORA of Arragon, daughter to D. Ferdinand the first, his wife, mother to Children D. Alphonso king.

D. Ferdinand Duke of Viseo, who married D. Beatrice, daughter to his vncl D. John Master of S. James, and had

D. Philip a daughter.

D. Leonora, wife to the Emperour Frederic the third.

D. Katherine.

D. Joane queene of Castille.

D. Leonora queene.

D. Dominike.

D. Emanuel king.

D. Isabel, Duchesse of Bragance.

XII.

D. ALPHONSO first of that name, sonne to D. Edward in the yere 1438, and raigned 43 yeres.

D. ISABEL, daughter to his vncl D. Pedro Duke of Coimbra, his wife, mother to

D. John, who died young.

D. Joane.

D. John king, whom some call Ferdinand, and make him father to John which raigned, and adde a third sonne,

D. Henrique.

XIII.

D. JOHN, second of that name, son to D. Alphonso the first, in the yere 1481: he raigned foureteene yeres.

D. LEONORA, daughter to D. Ferdinand Duke of Viseo, mother to

D. Alphonso, who died before his father.

By D. Anna de Atendosa, a concubine,

D. George, Master of S. James and Auiz.

D. EMANUEL

XIII.

D. EMANUEL Sonne to D. Ferdinand duke of Viseo, by right, and also by the nomination of king John, was king of Portugall, in the yere 1495, and raigned 26 yeres: he married first:

D. ISABELL, eldest Daughter to D. Ferdinand and D. Isabel Kings of Castille and Arragon, mother to

D. Michel who lived little.

D. MARIA, Sister to the said D. Isabel his second wife, by whom hee had

D. John king.

D. Isabel Queene of Castille, and Emperesse.

D. Beatrice Duchesse of Sauoy.

D. Lewis, father to D. Anthony the Bastard chosen king after Cardinal Henry his vncl.

D. Henry Cardinall.

D. Alphonso Cardinall.

D. Catherine.

D. Ferdinand.

D. Edward husband to Isabel, daughter to John or Jaime, duke of Bragance, & had { Marie duchesse of Parma.
 Catherine duchesse of Bragance, wife to John second sonne to Theodosius.
 Edward an after birth died in the yere 1576.

D. Anthony, he died soone after he was borne.

D. LEONORA, sister to the Emperour Charles the first, mother to { D. Charles, he died an Infant.

{ D. Marie, who being 56 yeres old, died at Lisbon in the yere 1578.

XV.

D. JOHN, 3 of that name, Sonne to D. Emanuel king of Portugall in the yere 1521: he raigned thirty and sixe yeres.

D. CATHERINE, sister to the Emperour Charles, his wife, mother to

D. Alphonso.

D. Marie Princeesse of Castille.

D. Catherine.

D. Beatrice.

D. Emanuel.

D. Philip.

D. John Prince, father to D. Sebastian, & husband to D. Joane, daughter to the Emperour Charles.

D. Anthony.

XXI.

D. SEBASTIAN Sonne to the Prince D. John, in the yere 1557, hee raigned one and twentie yeres, and died in Africke, leauing no heires.

XVII.

D. HENRY, Cardinall, Archbishop of Eбора, sonne to the King D. Emanuel, in the yere 1578, he raigned about a yere and a halfe.

XVIII.

D. PHILIP 2, king of Castille vnited the Realme of Portugall to Castille by force, after the Cardinals death, in the yere one thousand five hundred and eighty, and held it eightene yeres.

XIX.

D. PHILIP the third doth now hold this Realme.

Archbishops

Archbishops of Toledo.

Eugenius , first Archbhop.	Campeius .	Iustus .
Pelagius .	Cintuacius .	Eugenius 2.
Patruuius .	Patron .	Eugenius 3.
Turibio .	Paramacius .	Illefonus .
Quince .	Peter 1.	Quiricus .
Vincent .	Celsus .	Julian 2.
Paulacius OR Pauist .	Montanus .	Seferbert OR Sicarius .
Natalis .	Julian 1.	S. Felix .
Andens .	Bacchand .	Gunderic OR Guttiere .
Astur .	Peter 2.	Sinderic .
Illicus .	Enfernius .	Opas .
Maorian .	Excipius .	Yrbain .
Caitin .	Adelphius .	Peter , ? In the time of
Melanicius .	Aurafius .	Cixilas , the Moores.
	Heladim

After the Conquest of the Citie of Toledo from the Moores.

Bernard Abbot of Sahagun.	Blasco .
Raymond .	Gomez Manrique .
John 1.	Pedro Tenorio 4.
Celebrun .	Pedro de Luna 5
Gonfal 1.	Sancho de Roias .
Martw .	John de Contreras 4.
Roderigo Ximenes .	John de Cerezuela 5.
John 2.	Guttiere Gomes de Toledo .
Guttiere 2.	Alfonso Carillo de Acugna .
Pascal .	Pedro Gonfal de Mendoza , a Cardinal
Sancho 1.	Francis Ximenes a Cardinal.
Sancho 2 , Infant of Arragon.	William of Croy .
Gonfal 2 , Cardinal.	Alfonso Fonseca of Azeneda.
Guttiere 3.	John Tancra , Cardinal.
Gonfal 3.	John Martinez Silico , Cardinal.
John 3 , Infant of Arragon.	Frier Barthelmew Carranza de Miranda.
Ximene de Luna .
Gil Carillo d' Albornos , Cardinal.
Blaise .

76. Archbishops.

Moores.

Gouernors vnder the Miraluminis or kings of Affrike.

Musa in the year	714	Heman .
Tarif .		Ausuman .
Abdulaziz tooke the royal diademe at Seuille.		Alhatan .
Aiub , who restored the ancient Bilbilis, and called it Calataub.		Manes .
Alabir .		Mahumet .
Adam .		Abderrahamen .
Abderrahamen .		Abdimeic .
Tabca .		Abubacar .
Adaisa , Alscaxzin .		Redoon .
		Toaba .
		Josepb .

Soue-

Soueraigne kings at Cordoua ouer the other Princes Moores, in Spaine, and did no more acknowledge the Miraluminis of Affrike.

Abderrahamen 1.	year 757	Zuleima .	889
Hizen his sonne.	787	Mahumet 3.	993
Hilithan , sonne to Hizen .	794	Hali .	1001
Abderrahamen 2.	819	Caein .	1003
Mahumet .	839	Hata .	1007
Almundir .	874	Abderrahamen .	1007
Abdalla .	876	Mahumet 4.	1007
Abderrahamen Almanfor 3.	889	Hizen 3.	1009
Hali Hasan 2.	938	Joar .	1011
Aizen 2.	956	Mahumet 5.	1014

After these there were great alterations and changes among the Moores in Spaine, sometimes free, sometimes vnder the kings of Maroc and Fez: in the end the realme of Granado was erected, the which continued about two hundred and fiftie years vnder the kings which follow.

GRANADO.

Mahumet Aben Alhamar .	1236	Joseph his Sonne.	1392
Mahumet Mir Almu his sonne.	1272	Mahumet Aben Balua .	1396
Mahumet Aben Alhamar Aben Azar .	1302	Joseph .	1407
Mahumet Azar Aben Leuin .	1309	Mahumet Aben Azar .	1423
Ismael .	2319	Mahumet the little.	1427
Mahumet Sonne to Ismael .	1322	Joseph Aben Almas .	1432
Joseph Aben Amet .	1334	Mahumet Aben Ozmen .	1445
Mahumet Lagus .	1354	Ismael .	1453
Mahumet the Vermeil reigned two yeres, but		Muley Alboacen .	1462
Mahumet whom he had expelled returned		Mahumet Boabdalin the little.	1482
Mahumet Guadix .	1379	Muley Boabdalin .	1485

This king being expelled from Granado by Mahumet aboue named retained Malaga, Basa, Almerie, Guadix, and some other places, which were taken from them by the kings D. Ferdinand and D. Isabell, some by force, some by composition, Boabdalin, remaining sole king of Granado, whereof he was dispossest by the same kings.

The Titles and families of all the Dukes, Marquesses, and Earles of Spaine.

THe duke of Lerma and of Cea, Marquesse of Denia and Villamisar, Earle of Ampudia, of the Councel of state, cup-bearer, to king Philip 3. and master of his horse, commander Maior of Castille, captain general of the horse of Spain and of the holy church of Toledo, Adelantado, or Lord President of Calabria, the head of the house of Rotas and Sandoval: he holds his estate in Castille the old, and his house in Vailledol, and in Denia.

2 The duke of Frias, Marques of Berlanga, earle of Haro, Lord of the house of the seven Infants of Lara, Constable of Castille, Justice Major and high Chamberlain, he is the chiefe of the Velasco: his house is in Burgos, & his estate in Castille the old, in the mountains of Biscaia, and the hills of Soria; hee is of the Councel of State and President of the Councell of Italie, he had a daughter which was married to the duke of Braganca.

3 The duke of Medina of Riolecco, Marques of Modica, earle of Melgar, Vicont of Esterlin, Admiral of Castille, head of the Enriques: he holds his house in Vailledol, and his estate in the Prouince of Campos, Catalonia and Sicilia.

4 The

They are called Grandes to whom the king gives leave to stand covered before him. All dukes be Grandes.

- 4 The duke of Alua and Guefca, marques of Coria, Earle of Saluaterria, Vicor of Salduca, & lord of Valde Comeia, the chief of the familie of the Toledos: he holds his house in Salamanca, and his estate in Castille the old, towards Portugal, and the realm of Granada, he is Constable of Navarre, and a knight of the order of the Golden fleece.
- 5 The duke of Infantado, Marques of Cenete, and Santillana, earle of Saldanes, Lord of the royaltie of Manfanares, and head of the Mendoza: he hath his house in the cite of Guadalajara, and his estate in the kingdome of Toledo, and in the mountaines of Castille the old, and in the Prouince of Alaua, he is of the Councell of State.
- 6 The duke of Medina Celi, Marques of Cogolludo, Earle of Port Santa Maria, chief of the familie of Los Cerdas: his house is in Medina Celi, and his estate in the Realm of Toledo, & Seuille, he is of the bloud Royall of Castille.
- 7 The duke of Medina Sidonia, Marques of S. Lucar of Barameda, Earle of Niebra, head of the familie of Guzmans: he holds his house in Seuille, and S. Lucar, and his estate in the country of Seuille.
- 8 The duke of Escalona, Marques of Moya, earle of Esteuan, hee hath his house in the cite of Toledo, and his estate in the realm of Murcia, and in la Mancha, he is chief of the Pachecos, he was married vnto the sister of the duke of Braganca.
- 9 The duke of Osuna, Marques of Pegnafiel, earle of Vrena, head of the familie of Girones: he hath his house in Pegnafiel, and his estate in the realm of Seuille and in Castille.
- 10 The duke of Bejar, Marques of Gibralfon, earle of Benalcacar, head of the Zunigas, and of the familie of Soto Maior: he holds his house in Seuille, and his estate in the realm of Seuille and in Castille the old he is of the bloud royall.
- 11 The duke of Albuquerque, Marques of Biedma & Cuellar, earle of Ledefina, head of the familie of the Cuenas: he hath his house in Cuellar, his estate in Estremadura, and in Castille the old.
- 12 The duke of Alcala de los Gasules, Marques of Tarifa, earle of Hornos and Villamartin, chief President of Andalusia, he is of the familie of the Enriques and Riberas: hee hath his house in the cite of Seuille, and his estate in Andalusia, hee hath married with a daughter of the Marques of Castell Rodrigo, Verrey of Portugall.
- 13 The duke of Seta and Terranova, Earle of Cabra and Baena, head of the Cordouas & of Aguilar: he holds his house in Cordoua, and his estate in the kingdome of Naples, & in the realm of Cordoua: he is of the Councell of state, and chief steward to the Queene.
- 14 The duke of Najara, earle of Treuigno & Valencia, of D. Iohn, hee is head of the familie of the Manriques de Lara: he hath his house at Najara, and his estate in the Prouince of Rioje, and in the realm of Leon.
- 15 The Duke of Maqueda, Marques of Elche, head of the Cardenas: hee hath his house in Toledo, and his estate in the realm of Seuille.
- 16 The duke of Feria, Marques of Safra, head of the familie of the Figueras: he hath his estate in Estremadura, and his house in Safra.
- 17 The duke of Arcos, Marques of Lara, earle of Marchena, head of the house of Panaces: hee hath his estate in Andalusia, and house in Seuille.
- 18 The duke of Gandia, marques of Laiba, head of the familie of the Borjas: hee hath his estate and house in the Realm of Valencia.
- 19 The duke of Sogorue and Cordoua, marques of Comares, lord of Lucena, of the bloud royall of Arragon, and of la Cerde: hee hath his house in the cite of Valencia, and the Duchie of Sogorue in the realm of Valencia, and that of Cordoua, in Cartelonia, and his greatest estate in the realm of Cordoua.
- 20 The duke of Soma, earle of Panamos, admiral of Naples, his of the familie of the Cardenas: he hath his house at Belpuche, and his estate in the Realm of Naples.
- 21 The duke of Villahermosa, earle of Ribagorça, head of the house of Arragon: he hath his house at Saragoffe, and his estate in the realm of Arragon.
- 22 The duke of Veraguas, Admirall of the Indies, of the house of Toledo: hee keeps his house in the city of Saragoffe, and his estate in the realm of Arragon.
- 23 The duke of Pastrana, prince of Eboli, of the familie of Silvas in Portugall: he hath his house and his estate in Pastrana.
- 24 The

24 The duke of Franca villa, Prince of Melito, of the house of the Mendozas: hee hath his house in Franca villa, and his estate in the realm of Naples.

Marquesses that be Grandes.

- 1 The Marques of Astorga, Earle of Trastamara, Lord of the house of Villa Lobos, head of the familie of the Oforros: he hath his house in the cite of Astorga, and his estate in the realm of Leon, and in the prouince of Campos.
- 2 The Marques of Aguilar, Earle of Castagneda, of the house of the Manriques of Lara: he holds his house in Carriou and in Aguilar del Campo, and his estate in the mountains of Leon, and in the prouince of Campos.
- 3 The Marques of Montedon, Earle of Tendilla, one of the house of the Mendozas: he holds his house in Montedon, and his estate in Alcaria.
- 4 The Marques of Tavares, master of Montefia, of the house of Borjas: he may giue the habit of Montefia in Arragon and Valencia, and hath his estate and house in the said realmes.
- 5 The Marques of Pliego, Lord of the house of Aguilar, of the familie of Figueras: he hath his house in Cordoua, and his estate in the said realm, and in base Andalusia.
- 6 The Marques of Los Velez, Adelantado or President of Murcia, of the familie of the Paredos: he hath his estate and house in the realm of Murcia.
- 7 The Marques of Villa Franca, of the house of the Toledos: he keeps his house in Villa Franca, and his estate in the realm of Leon and Naples.
- 8 The Marques of Santa Cruz, of the familie of the Bafanes: he hath his house in Vifo, and his estate in the realm of Toledo.
- 9 The Marques of Frichilla, and of Malagon, he is brother to the duke of Braganca: he hath his estate in Castille, and is of the bloud royall of Portugall, and liues in the city of Eborra, in the same realm.

Marquesses which be not Grandes.

- 1 The Marques of Ayamonte, of the familie of Swigas: he hath his estate & house in Seuille.
- 2 The Marques of Benefa, of the house of Aneltonada.
- 3 The Marques of Viana, of the familie of the Pimentelles: he hath his house in Vailledolit, and his estate in Galicia.
- 4 The Marques of Cameraca, of Sauiore, and Earle of Riscla, he was Adelantado of Calorla: he is of the house of Cobos and Mendoza.
- 5 The Marques of Cortes, he is of the Toledos: he hath his house in Cortes, and his estate in the realm of Navarre.
- 6 The Marques of Monte-mior, of the house of Silvas.
- 7 The Marques of Guardia, Earle of Santa Euphemia, he is the chief of the familie of the Mexias: he hath his house in Salamanca, and his estate in Andalusia, and in the realm of Iden.
- 8 The Marques of Montes Claros, of the house of the Mendozas: he hath his house in Guadalajara, and his estate in Alcaria.
- 9 The Marques of Las Nauas, he is chief of the house of Anilas: he hath his house in the city of Auila, and his estate in the mountaines of Auila.
- 10 The Marques of Pola, he is of the familie of Roxas: he hath his house in Pola, and his estate in Castille the old.
- 11 The Marques of Stepa, of the house of the Centuriones at Genoua: he hath his estate and house in the realm of Seuille.
- 12 The Marques of Tabara, he hath his estate in Castille the old, & his house in Vailledolit.
- 13 The Marques of Villanoua del rio, of the familie of the Enriques: he holds his estate in Extremadura, and his house in Seuille.
- 14 The Marques of Villanoua of Barca rota, he is chief of the familie of Puerto carveros: he holds his house in Seuille, and his estate in Extremadura.
- 15 The Marques of Ladrada, of the familie of Los Cuenas: he holds his estate in the realm of Toledo.
- 16 The Marques of Canete, of the familie of Mendoza: he hath his house in the city of Cuencia, and his estate in the said prouince.
- 17 The Marques of Palcs, head of the Peraltes: he hath his house in Navarre, and his estate in the said kingdome.

- 18 The Marques of Fiomesta, of the familie of the Benavides and Enriques: he hath his house in Fiomesta, and his estate in the province of Campos.
- 19 The Marques of Valle, sonne to Fernando Cortes, who conquered Noua Hispania: hee hath his house in Seuille and in Mexico, and his estate in Noua Hispania.
- 20 The Marques of Aunon, he is of the Hercera: he hath his house in Madrid, and his estate in Alcaria.
- 21 The Marques of Ardale, Earle of Teba, of the house of Guzman: he keeps his house in Malaga, and his estate in the realme of Seuille.
- 22 The Marques of Beretta, of the familie of the Cardenas: he hath his house in Herena, and his estate in Estremadura.
- 23 The Marques of Villa Manrique, of the house of Saniga: he hath his estate & house in the realme of Seuille.
- 24 The Marques of Motta, of the house of Villos: hee holds his estate and house in Castille.
- 25 The Marques of Alcanices, of the familie of the Henriques: he hath his estate and house in Castille.
- 26 The Marques of Auila Fuente, of the house of the Saniga: he holds his estate and house in Castille.
- 27 The Marques of Molina.
- 28 The Marques of Fuentes.
- 29 The Marques of Villada, Maior domo, maior or chiefe Steward, to the king: he is one of the Grandes.
- 30 The Marques of Laguna, chiefe steward to the Queene: he is a Grande.
- 31 The Marques of Sarrauo.
- 32 The Marques of Caracena, of the familie of the Carrillos and Toledos.
- 33 The Marques of Cuellar.
- 34 The Marques of Saint Germain, of the house of Mendoza: his Marquisate is in Sauoy, and his house and estate in Castille: He is a gentleman of the kings chamber, and Lieutenant generall of his gards and of all the horse in Spaine.

Earles which be Grandes.

- 1 The Earle of Miranda, Marques of Baneza: he is head of the Anellaneda, and is of the familie of Saniga and Basanes: he holds his house in Penaganda villa suya, & his estate in Castille the old, and the mountaines thereof: he is of the Councell of State, and President of the chiefe of Castille.
- 2 The Earle of Benauent, the head of the Pimentels: he holds his house in Vailledolit, and his estate in the province of Campos: he is the greatest Earle in Spaine.
- 3 The Earle of Alua de Lita, of the familie of the Henriques: he hath his house in Zamora, and his estate in Castille the old, and Estremadura: he is of the Councell of State, and chiefe huntman to the king, and of his chamber.
- 4 The Earle of Lemos and Andrada, of Castro and Villalua, Marques of Sarria, and Lord of Villos, he is head of the house of Castros, and gentleman of the kings chamber, he is president of the councell of the Indies: he hath his house in Lemos and Sarria, and his estate in the realm of Galicia.
- 5 The Earle of Oropeza, he is of the house of Toledo and Pacheco: he hath his house at Talavera, and his estate in the realm of Toledo, he had one daughter and heire, who was married to a brother of the Duke of Braganes.
- 6 The Earle of Santa Gadea, he is head of the familie of the Padillas, he is a gentleman of the kings chamber, and Adelantado maior of Castille: he hath his house and estate in Castille.

Earles which he not Grandes.

The Earle of Salinas and Ribadeo, of the house of Anellaneda & Mendoza: he hath his house in the city of Burgos and his estate in Biscaye, & the mountaines, who (for that his predecessors did helpe much in the winning of Toledo) haue this priuiledge, to dine on twelfe day with the King, and the apparell, which the King wears that day, is his, with his best horse, and a Cup of gold. This house fell by mariage to Roy Gomez de Silva, Duke of Pastrana, who was second brother

- to him that died in Flanders, and Viceroy to him that holds the state at this day, he is president of the Councell of Portugall.
- 2 The Earle of Aguilar, head of the Arrelanos, and Lord of Los Cameros: he hath his house in the towne of Nilda, which is his, and his estate is in Rioja, and the Mountaines of Soria.
  - 3 The Earle of Aranda, Lord of Almuernin.
  - 4 The Earle of Alcaudette, of the house of the Cordons: he keeps his house in Alcaudette, and his estate in the realme of Cordova, he is also of Aluadia, of the house of Milan.
  - 5 The Earle of Alcamira, of the house of Roxas, and Moscofo: he hath his house in Alcamira and his estate in Galicia.
  - 6 The Earle of Citona, of the house of Moncada and Heredia.
  - 7 The Earle of Buendia, Lord of Duenas, of the house of Acugna: he hath his house in Acugna, and his estate in the Territorie of Campos.
  - 8 The Earle of Ayllon, of the house of Leon and Cordova.
  - 9 The Earle of Belchite, of the house of Tiar: he holds his estate in Valencia and Arragon.
  - 10 The Earle of Castellar, he is the chiefe of the Sayavedras: he hath his house in Seuille, and his estate in the same realme.
  - 11 The Earle of Castro Xeris, of the house of Mendoza, and Manriques: he hath his house in Castro Xeris, and his estate in the realme of Leon.
  - 12 The Earle of Chinchon, head of the house of the Bobadillas: he hath his house in Madrid, and his estate in the realme of Toledo.
  - 13 The Earle of Cifuentes, he is the head of the Silvas: hee hath his house in Toledo, and his estate in Alcaria.
  - 14 The Earle of Corunna, of the house of Mendoza: his house is in Guadaluja, & his estate in Alcaria.
  - 15 The Earle of Fuenfaldia, he is the head of the Ayales, his house is in Toledo, and his estate in the same realme.
  - 16 The Earle of Gelues, he is chiefe of the house of the Portugals, he hath his house in Seuille, and his estate in the same realme.
  - 17 The Earle of Gomera, which is in the Iland of the great Canarie, hee is of the house of the Ayales.
  - 18 The Earle of Gajan.
  - 19 The Earle of Oliuarez, he is of the house of Guzman: his house is at Seuille, and his estate in Andalusia.
  - 20 The Earle of Ierna, of the familie of the Carrillos.
  - 21 The Earle of Costania in Valencia.
  - 22 The Earle of Cortijo.
  - 23 The Earle of Fuentes of the house of Heredia: hee hath his estate in Arragon, and his house at Fuentes.
  - 24 The Earle of Luna, he is head of the Quignones and Villasanes, he hath his house and estate in the realme of Leon.
  - 25 Earle of Medellin, of the house of Puerto Carrero: hee hath his house in Medellin, and his estate in Estremadura.
  - 26 Earle of Montecagudo, he is of the house of Mendoza: he holds his estate in Raca of Arragon, and his house in Almasa.
  - 27 Earle of Monterey, of the house of Azuado: he hath his house in Salamanca, and his estate in Galicia.
  - 28 Earle of Ofomo, he is of the Manriques, his house is in Vailledolit, and his estate in Castille the old.
  - 29 Earle of Onante, head of the Guenares: he hath his house in Onante, and his estate in the province of Guipuscoa.
  - 30 Earle of Oliua, of the house of Gentillas.
  - 31 Earle of Morata, of the house of Luna.
  - 32 Earle of Orga, he is of the house of Ayala and Mendoza: and some say hee is the head of the Mendosas.
  - 33 Earle of Puebla, of the house of the Cardenas: he hath his house in Llerena, and his estate in Estremadura.

34 Earle of Palua, of the house of Puerto Carrero, he holds his house in Eccia, and his estate in the Realme of Cordoua.

35 Earle of Pliego, of the house of Cerillo and Mendoza: hee hath his house in Guadalajara, and his estate in the mountaines of Cuenca.

36 Earle of Puno in Rostro, he is head of the Sarras: he hath his house in Madrid, and his estate in the Realme of Toledo.

37 Earle of Paredes, of the house of Manriques: his house is in Paredes, and his estate in the prouince of Campos.

38 Earle of Ribadavia, of the house of Auellaneda: he hath his house in Vailledolit, and his estate in Galicia.

39 Earle of Ciruela, of the house of Velasco.

40 Earle of Saffago and Pina, of the house of Arragon: hee hath his house in Saragoffe, and his estate in the realme of Arragon.

41 Earle of Saint Esteuan, the head of the Benanides: his house is in the citie of Vuida, and his estate in the realme of Arragon.

42 Earle of Nauarre, of the family of the Toledos, & by his wife, by whom he had the estates, of the bloud of Nauarre, & of the Beaumonts: he hath his house and estate in the realm of Nauarre.

43 Earle of Bargas, he is head of the house of Capotas, his house is in Madrid.

44 Earle of Puebla of Montaluan, of the familie of the Telles, Girones and Pachecos: hee holds his estate in Estremadura.

45 Earle of Baileu, hee is of the Ponfos of Leon: his house is in Baileu, and his estate in the realme of Iacn.

46 Earle of Nieua, of the house of Valefos: he hath his house in Nieua, and his estate in Rioja.

47 Earle of Saluatierra, of the house of Ayala: he holds his estate in Castille the old.

48 Earle of Cosentraina, of the house of Correlias: his estate & house is in the realm of Valencia.

49 Earle of Galuas, of the house of Los Cordas.

50 Earle of Delda, of the familie of the Colomas: his estate & house are in the realm of Valécia.

51 Earle of Ficallo, of the house of Gandia and Borias: his countie is in Portugall, but his estate and house in the Realme of Valencia.

52 Earle of Cuba, he is of the Henriques of Almanca: he hath his countie in Portugall, and his estate and house in the realme of Castille.

53 Earle of Villamediana, he is of the familie of Taxis.

54 Earle of Barraja. 58 Earle of Villador. 62 Earle of Villalonso.

55 Earle of Mayalde. 59 Earle of Castarubios. 63 Earle of Rifco.

56 Earle of Mirabel. 60 Earle of Los Arcos. 64 Earle of Malpica.

57 Earle of Galue. 61 Earle of Salafar. 65 Earle of Torrejon.

Vicounts, Admirals and Adelantados.

Vicount of Peralta. Admirall of Arragon.

Vicount del Buli. Admirall of Valencia.

Vicount of Altamira. Adelantado Maior of Castille.

Vicount of Chelba. Adelantado Maior of Andalusia.

Admirall of Castille. Adelantado of Galicia.

Masterhips of Orders of Knights.

The great Masterhip of Saint Iames.

The Masterhip of Alcantara.

The masterhip of the Calatrava.

These three are annexed to the Crowne, and the king is perpetuall Gouvernor and Administrator of them.

These be the Dukes, Marquesses, Earles, Admirals, and Adelantados, which are in the realmes of Castille, Leon, Arragon, Nauarre, Galicia, Valencia, and Cattelonia, and the other estates of Spaine, except Portugall. Some haue precisely set downe the reuenues of euery one of these Noblemen in their relations, as if they were immuable; but, being subiect daily to increase and decrease according to the disposition and frugality of the persons that enioy them, I haue wittingly omitted it; but thus much I dare boldly say, that the nobility of Spaine are exceeding rich in their yerely reuenues, and if I be not much deceiued, they are the richest subiects in reuenues of any country of Christendo me.

F I N I S.

50 A Table of the most memorable things contained in this

Historie of Spayne: wherein the Reader is to be aduertised

of an error escaped in the bodie of the Booke, in numbering of the pages, from 971, from whence to 972. he shall find them doubled: Which obserued, will let him right on that he seeks for by this Table.

A Bderramen stemue of the Kings of Maroc, 165	Approbation of the Order of Saint Ierome by the Pope, 586
Abderramen vsurpes the Soueraignie of Spaine, 175	Admonition of the king of Castile to his sister the Queene of Nauarre, 623
Aben Nabomet , a Moorish king vnder the protection of the King of Castile, 369	Admirall of Castile surpriseth Simanca , 819
Accord betwixt the Romanes and the Carthaginians, 36	Admiralke in Castile, and the iurisdiction, 993
Accord betwixt the k. of Castile & his mother, 277	Era of Cesar abolished in Arragon, 542
Accord betwixt the kings of Castile and Arragon, for the diuorce of Queene Elenor , 339	Affection of a mother, 227
Accord betwixt the Kings of Nauar & Arrag. 366	Agility of the Numidian horsemen, 143
A concord betwixt the King of Castile and Granada, 394	Afflicke a towne in the Realme of Tunes taken by the king, 706
Accord betwixt Alphonso king of Castile, and his rebellious subiects, 400	Ayre in Sardynia corrupted by nature, 22
Accord betwixt the Estates of Nauarre, and Pearo of Arragon, 403	Admirall of Boniuet enters Guipulcoa with an armie, 966
Accord betwixt the kings of Maroc & Castil, 427	Alaric chiefe of the Gothes, 130
Accord betwixt Castile and Portugall by marriage, 443	Alanes and Vandalis defeated by the Goths, 151
Accord betwixt Granada and Castile, 454	Alcaron of the Barbarians, 163
Accord betwixt Castile and Nauar, 582	Alphonso king of Ouedo and Leon leaues the Crowne to become a Monke, 199. hee is repented that he became a Monke, 200. hee is beleaged and taken by his owne brother, ibid.
Accord betwixt the kings of Castile & Arrag. 588	Alphonso king of Leon, a louer of Iustice, 226
Act of the Master of Auiz to make the Castilians odious, 603	Alphonso k. of Leon disposseth by his brother, 241
Accord betwixt the king of Castile and the Duke of Lancaster, 614	D. Almedia poysoned by her sonne-in-law, 241
Accord betwixt the Noblemen of Castile, 616	D. Alphonso king of Nauarre seeks to assure himselfe of Castile, 270
Accord made with the Earle of Gition, 648	Almudebar taken from the Moores, 272
Accord made by the king of Castile with D. Henry of Arragon, 690	D. Alphonso king of Nauarre defeated by the Moores and Isaine , 282
Accident happened to the Prince of Portugall, and his death, 941	Alphonso Raymond king of Castile crowned Emperor of Spaine, 285
Accord betwixt the k. of Castile and Nauar, 740	Alphonso king of Castile beeing young, giuen in ward to the Inhabitants of Auila, 310. hee marries Elenor of England, 314
Accord betwixt D. Iohn king of Arragon, and his sonne D. Charles , 761	Alphonso King of Portugall, taken prisoner by the king of Leon, 322
Accusations propounded by the Confederats, 781	Alphonso king of Castile inuades Leon and Nauarre, 331
Accord betwixt king Iohn of Arragon and Leonor his daughter, 812	D. Aluar de Lara spoiles the Queene Regent of her authoritie and estate, 351
Accord for the government of Spaine, 924	D. Aluaro of Sandy taken prisoner by the Turkes, 1092.
A&T of constancie of D. Alphonso Perez de Guzman , 438	Aluar de Lara taken prisoner, 354
A&T of Alphonso of Aguilar against the children of the Earle of Cabra, 819	Alphonso of Portugall leaues his lawfull wife, 389
A&T of choler done by the D. of Infantaigo, 1001	D. Alphonso king of Castile disinherits the children of D. Fernand his eldest sonne, 413
Adrian doth a generous act, 121	Alain Leontine a damnable traytor, his end, 428
Adelantamiento of Casoria giuen to the Church of Toledo, 365	D. Alphonso de la Cerda saluted k. of Castile, 440
Adulfe of D. Nugno de Lara , 397	Alphonso de la Cerda and D. Iohn of Castile contend for the Realme of Castile, 440
Adultery punished, 550	Allycance renewed betwixt Castile & Arragon, 458
Admonition of the son to the father, 1134	Alcaudete taken by the king of Castile, 458
Aduertisements of a Philosopher a Moore, to the king of Castile, 572	Alphonso de la Cerda quits his interest to Cast, 434
Admonition of the Admirall of Castile to Cardinal Ximenes , 949	Alaua vinit to the crowne of Castile, 488
	Aluacen king of Maroc disposseth by his son, 519
	Alcauala, a kind of Impoft, 527
	K k k k k
	D. Al

The Table.

Don Alphonso Fernand Comes vnworthily put to death,	534	Arabians tributaries to the Romanes,	164
D. Alphonso , the king of Castille vnle deliuered out of prison,	633	Arabian tong common in Affricke,	166
Aluaro de Luna and his beginning,	670	Arabians & Moors all one in this History,	168
Alphonso king of Arragon leads an army into Corsica,	686	Armes of Barcelona and Arragon,	191
Alphonso de Luna made Constable of Castile,	687	Arabian Philitions in great request,	205
Alphonso k. of Arragon fauors a new Schism,	688	Arts flourish among the Arabians in Spaine,	236
Aluaro de Luna Constable of Castile insolent, contumacious, and trecherous,	714	Arragon and Nauarre vnited,	243
Aluaro de Luna Constable of Castile executed,	744	Arragon and Cattelonia vnited by marriage,	288
Alphonso king of Arragon, inuested in the Realme of Nauar,	724	Arragon exempted to the Soueraignty of Castile,	317
Alphonso of Faiardo punisher for his rebellion,	759	Aduice giuen by the Emperour Charles vnto his sonne,	1126
Alphonso the king of Castile brother acknowledged heire to the Crowne,	782	Aduice to D. Iohn touching the war of Granado,	1147
the Confederates,	794	Army of Turkes in Cypres,	1159
Aluaz Gomez disloyall to the K. of Castile,	783	Aduice of k. Philip to King Sebastian ,	1199
Alphonso of Hoieda first discoverer of the mayne land at the Indies,	889	Army against the Moors in Spaine,	339
Alphonso of Arragon and his posteritie	831	Armes of Nauarre,	342
Alliance betwixt France and Castile,	855	Arabians in Spaine reiect the Miraliums of Affricke,	353
Alhama taken by the Castilians,	884	Archb. in quarrell for the Primacie,	376
Alhambra of Granado yielded to the King of Castile,	940	Articles sworne by the King of Nauarre,	477
Alliances betwixt the house of Austria and Castile,	954	Arragonois defeated by the Nauarrois,	457
Amicor slaine by the Spaniards,	235	Articles of the Order of the band,	489
Ambition makes Aluandarez and Indubito disloyall,	68	Armies are vnprofitable that haue too great multitudes,	510
Ambassador ill aduised and importunate,	101	Archb. of Toledo forced to leaue Spaine,	535
Ambition the mother of heresies,	160	Armie of Don Pedro king of Castile,	574
Ambition of Almeida furious and vnrestrained,	225	Act of D. Leonora Telles de Mendez ,	597
Ambassadors sent from Nauar to Castile,	478	Archbishop of Toledo turbulent,	630
Ambassadors speech to the king of Arragon,	591	Articles concluded at the assembly at Tholousa in Guispucoas,	634
Ambassadors from France to the k. of Castile,	631	Archbishop of Toledo regards not the publike good,	633
Ambassadors from the King of Granado to the k. of Castile,	645	Arragonois reiect D. Ioane and chofe Don Martin to be king,	650
Ambassadors discouer the counsels and actions of Princes,	658	Articles of marriage broken by the Estates of Arragon,	660
Amadeus of Sauoy called Pope Felix ,	733	Arbitrators to chuse the king of Nauarre,	675
Ancients vsd Religion to keepe the people in awe,	51	Artillerie when first vsed in Spaine,	669
Antiquity of Toledo,	251	Articles concluded for the pacification of the troubles in Castile,	782
Ambition a vice in great men,	1132	Archb. of Toledo betrayes the king his Master,	784
Answer of D. Henry of Nauar to the Conspirators of Castile,	397	Arragonois defeated by the French,	808
Andreu of Clairmont beheaded at Palermo,	660	Articles of marriage betwixt Fernand of Arragon, and Isabella of Castile,	818
Ambassadors from the king of Castile to the Souldans of Egypt,	968	Arzilla and Tanger in Affricke taken by the king of Portugall,	829
Ambassador of king Fernand stayd in Bearre,	905	Archb. of Toledo disloyall and seditious,	871
Answer made by Pope Paul to the Duke of Albas complaint,	1075	Armes of French in Spaine,	873
Apparitions beleueed by the Spaniards,	149	Arzilla beleseged by the Moors, and the towne taken,	887
Apparition of S. Iudore ,	251	ken,	895
Armes of the ancient Spaniards,	16	Army of Spaine annoy the Venetians,	895
Arts in Spaine damnable in old time,	30	Articles of yeelding of Pampelona to the Duke of Alba,	904
Army of Spaniards against the Romanes,	144	Army of French enters into Nauarre,	909
Argemond a traitor punished,	150	Armes giuen to the Prouince of Guispucoas,	910
Arabians first attempt vpon Spaine,	150	Arrogant answer of D. Pedro Giron ,	926
Arabian western Moors defended fro Ismael ,	161	Articles betwixt the Emperour and k. of Tunes,	991

The Table.

Army sent against Pegnon de Veles,	1113	Barbarians diuide the conquest of Spaine,	130
Arrians persecute the faithfull	125	Barbarians easie to corrupt,	101
Archbishop of Toledo drawne in question by the Inquist. on,	1125	Barbarians impatient of seruitude kill them-selues,	103
Army sent with the D. of Alua into Flanders,	1129	Zamba made King of the Gothes against his will,	150
Abdalla King of Marroc, Fez and Taradant,	1195	149, he is payloyed by Erning .	205
Allegations made by King Philip touching his title to Portugall,	1209	Bargaine made in sport enter tayned by force,	219
Aduice of the diuines of Alcala of Henares	ibid	Barcelona taken and ruined by the Moores,	281
Army of D. Anthony put to rout	1214	Baiona taken by the King of Nauarre,	281
Articles granted by King Philip to the realme of Portugall,	1219	Barcelona yeelded to King Ihon of Arragon,	813
Army of French and Spanish at the Iland of Saint Michel,	1221	Barbarossa beleseged the Castell of Nice,	1006
Asdrubal takes aduantage of his enemies negligence 41, he prepares to goe into Italy. 43. his passage broken, 44. he circumvents Nero , 50. he makes noe conscience to decaue his enemy, 51. he thinkes to repaire his losses by a battell, 98. he is defeated by Scipio , 59. he passeth into Italy. 60. he is defeated there,	61	Barbarians sets vp the banners of Castile,	777
Asians barbarously murder their wiues and children,	68	Battens at Famagoffa,	1161
Assembly of the Estates euery yeare in Spaine,	1216	Battell betwixt the Romanes and naturall Spaniards, 78. an other battell betwixt them, 88. betwixt Pompey and Scriverius , 111. betwixt Caesar and Pompey , 116. of Vaglad and death of Alaric , 137. of longuera lost by the Christians, 194. of Simancas, and great victory of the Christians, 201. of Calcaualor, 215. Battell betwixt the Moores, 222. of Obrique wonne by Alphonso Henriques first King of Portugall, 292. of Valpeire, 303. of Muradall, 341. Battell at sea before Callery, 480. of Salado, 512 betwixt the Genucois and Venetians, 543. at Aliborata, 608. betwixt the Christians and Moores, 665. of Figueroa, 703. of Olmedo, 730. of Olmedo, 738. of Albuhera, 874. of Rauenna, 992. betwixt the Castilians and Portugalls, 858. of Villa Larraga, 962. betwixt the Christians and Barbarosia in Affricke, 990. of Lepanto, 1169. of Alcazer in Affricke, 1202. at the Tercera the bewixt the French and Spanish,	1222	Bata Guadix and Almeyri yeild to Castile,	935
Arch-duke Albert made gouernor of Portugall,	1216	Batens of King Ramir occasion of new tumults,	211
Army of Spaine going to the Terceres,	1227	Batens of Henry called the vnble King of Castile	760
Angra at the Terceres taken by the Marques of Santa Cruz,	1236	Bazain at the Indies taken by the Portugals,	997
Asanphe the Goth slaine by his owne men,	131	Batteries made by the Turke at Malta,	1116
Authority of D. James King of Maiorca vaine,	525	Beginning of nations fabulous for the most part, 1	7
Attempt rashly made by the Constable of Castiles followers,	722	Beginning of the Saguntines,	7
Atabalpa defeated and taken,	980	Beteca called Valdausia of the Vandales,	133
Aurang taken by the Romanes,	61	Begger counterseiting punished from heuen, 142	142
Authors of a Sedition punished for the whole multitude,	70	Bernard first Earle of Barcelona subiect to the French,	179
Authors of rebellion alwaies smart for the rest,	78	Bernard of Carpio neglects his rebellion,	188
Authority of the Iustice Maior of Arragon,	618	D. Bernard a religious King and a louer of Iustice	239
D. Anthony proceeding after King Henries death 1208, he is declared defender of the realme of Portugall, 1211. he is receiued into Lisbon, 1215. he rayseth a new army, ibid, he writes to King Philip , 1217. his estate after the defeat of the French at Sea,	1225	Beginning of the towne of Saint Deminike,	265
Amdassadors from Iapon into Spaine,	1230	Berrugels of Leon, Gouvernesse of Castile	347
Amdassadors sent into Spaine from the Duke of Sauoy,	1221	Behauior of D. Sancho the grosse, King of Nauarre in his age,	367
B		Beginning of Granado,	372
Badaios taken from the Moores by the King of Leon,	322	Beginning of the house of Guzman and Dukes of Medina Sydonia,	437
Baefa and Almeyri taken from the Moores,	295	Berrand of Guefclin betraies King Henry ,	575
Baefa Castle beleseged by the Moores,	361	Beginning of the house of Medina City,	606
Badurio K. of Cambia slaine by the Portugalls,	997	Beginning of a sect called the White coats,	663
Baleares Iland, called Gimnassies,	9	Beginning of the King of Castiles hatred against the Constable,	731

Kkkkkk 2

Berrand

The Table.

Bernard de la Cueva the Queene of Castiles Min- ister, created Earle of Ledesma , 767. he is made	1144
Duke of Albuquerque	120
Beginning of the house of Foix,	811
Beginning of the Jesuites,	962
Beouya a castle of importance, abandoned by the French,	967
Beginning of Pixarro and James of Alma	984
190.
Bernardin de Mendoza drowned with some Gal- lies,	1094
Beginning and progresse of the Inquisition in Spain,	1119
Biscaine young first vied in Spain,	3
Birth of Mahomet ,	142
Bishops in Spain learned and religious,	199
Bishops at Toledo in the Moores time,	173
Bishops at Compostella profane,	213
Bishops sea restored to Saragosa,	272
Bishop of Silames exempt from all subiection but to the Pope,	265
Bishop of Pampelona a fauourer of seditions,	405
Biscay sold to the king of Castile,	483
Bishop of Burgos chosen by himselfe,	568
Bishop belongs to the house of Alanson,	585
Biscay of Lisbonne slaine by the mutines,	603
Birth of the Infant Don Henry of Castile ,	689
Bishop of Pampelona slaine by the Countesse of Nauarre,	838
Bishop excluded in the Countrey of Biscay,	863
Bishop being a murderer, is himselfe murdered, 872.
Birth of the Infanta Catherina of Castile,	314
Bishops banished from Biscay,	919
Birth of Charles of Austria , who was king of Spain and Emperor.	962
Birth of John Prince of Portugal,	971
Birth of Charles Prince of Spain,	1013
Birth of D. Sebastien of Portugal,	1039
Bishops newly erected in the Netherlands, 1093
Birth of the Infanta D. Isabella , who was Queene of Castile and Arragon,	740
Biscaines defeated for war of discipline,	695
Birth of Fernand of Arragon husband to Isabella , 744.	745
Birth of D. Alphonso of Castile,
Boldnes of Martius proves successful by the e- nemies negligence,	49
Bonsfay delivers Affricke to Genferic and the Van- dals,	133
Booke found in Spain,	378
Beauie of Henry the new king of Castil-	567
Booke of the holy Scriptures translated into the Portugall language,	681
Bountie of the Duke of Milan,	710
Body of Queene Isabella layed in a Friars weede, 874.
Bountie of Gonsalo Fernandez the great Captaine, 883.
Boote taken at the Indies,	916
Bona in Affricke taken by Andrew Doris ,	993
Bounty of the Emperor Charles to Prince Do- ria ,	1105
Boote taken from the Moores,
Bridge of Alicantra built by Traian ,	1144
Brothers kings in one kingdom and agree well,	120
183.
Brothers of Nauarre at discord,	243
Breethren executed vnjustly,	458
Braganza a terror to the Moores,	922
Breach betwixt Pope Paul the fourth, and the king of Spaine,	1074
Burthen layd vpon the Spaniards by Luennus , 96
Burgos made a Bishopricke,	265
Buildings of Fernand king of Portugal,	600
Buildings of Charles the third king of Nauar, 668
Burgos in the Confederates power, 780. it yelds to king Henry ,	805
Burson king of Fez defeated and slaine,	1193
C
Arthaginiens called into Spaine by the Gad- tains ,	12
Cadiz, and the ancient names,	20
Carthaginiens desire rather to be great then ill, 32. they continue the conquest of Spaine, 35.
they are defeated at Caia by Scipio , 40. they are twice defeated, 45. being growne proud of a victorie they are defeated by the Romanes, 48.
they dissemble their losse, 57. they refuse to vi- npeople Spaine of Iouidiers to prevent reuolts,
60. they are quite defeated by the Romanes, and chased out of Spaine,	65
Carthage the new taken by the Romanes,	54
Care and diligence of a good Generall,	57
Castile yielded to the Romanes,	44
Castile and Ilerurgis, rebellious towne, 65. taken both by the Romanes,	66
Cato defeats the Spaniards. 32. his seueritie in the Spaniards relaps, 33. he demantes the towne, which he seeks to corrupt the Celibitians, 84.
he dispoeth of the reuenues of Spaine,	85
Caire built by Muhamut ,	163
Cape S. Vincent why so called,	175
Catalonia wholy to fall, 178. vnder the Souer- eignty of France, 189. giuen in propriety to Geoffrey the heire,	191
Care of a Prince most commendable,	200
Castile exempt from all subiection vpon a foolist bargaine, 208. vnitd to Nauarre,	229
Castilla, a Princeesse of the Moores baptized,	216
Calatrava taken from the Moores,	280
Castile and Leon diuided,	286
Calatrava giuen to the Monkes of Cisteraux,	304
Cathedral church at Toledo built by Don Rodri- go the Arch-bishop,	362
Castile and Leon united,	364
Catalonia freed from the foursaignty of France, 169
Castellans in armes against Navar & Arragon, 386
Castellans & Arragonis in Greece & Thrace, 455
Castilians defeated by the Arragonois,	502
Castilians burne the coast of Genoua,	532
Carmona yielded to D. Henry of Castile,	580
Castile acknowledged the Pope,	595
Castilians defeated by them of Ebroa, 604. defea- ted againe at Troncosa, 607. defeated by the Moores,	702
Castile

The Table.

Catiffre preferred before Arragon,	751	tesicar,	674
Catalans fpeak freely to their King, 753 they live in vaine for their Prince, ibid. they complain	753	Change of Bifhops in Spaine,	723
the king of Catiffle,	774	Choler of the king of Catiffle,	723
Caloorta taken by Gafcon of Foix from the Spani- ards,	787	Chriftians being victors are vanquifhed,	736
Catiffle of Burgos yielded to Q. Izabella ,	855	Charles Prince of Viana calls himfelfe King of Na- uarrre, 754. he is imprifoned by his father,	793
Catiffle of Zamora yielded to K. Fernand ,	860	he is deliuered out of prifon, and poyfoned by his ftep-mother,	764
Caftro Nungro yields to K. Fernand ,	876	Charitie of K. Fernand and Queene Izabella ,	881
Cannaries made fubieft to the K. of Catiffle ,	899	Chriftians defeated by the Moores,	91
Catiffans fpoile the realme of Nauarrre,	819	Chancerie tranfported from cite Real to Granado,	877
Caia a fmall ftreame diuiding Catiffle from Portu- gal,	938	Charge of Bifhops in Catiffle,	883
Cadiz vinted to the crown of Catiffle,	947	Chancellor of Arragon fcutted to haue fought to difhonor Queene Germane ,	920
Capitulation betwixt King Fernand and Mulomes the Little,	940	Charles Gouernor to Charles Prince of Spain, 930	930
Caufes of the D. of Alua's difcontent,	950	Charles king of Spaine cholen Emperour of Ger- many, called the fifth, 960. his departure out of Catiffle forced, ib. his entry into Pampelona,	972
Caufes of hatred betwixt the Spaniards and Flem- mings,	1126	his coronation at Bolonia , 979. his going with an army to Tunis, 987. his coming into Sicily,	993
Caufe of the rebellion of the Moores of Granado, 1138.	1138	he goes with an army into Prouence, 994. his voyage to Africa, 1001. his confidence and pictie, 1007. he follicit K. Fernand his fon, 1034 he refigns the gouernment to his fon Phil. 1041 he reigne the Emperore to his brother, 1076. hee pafeth into Spaine to a folitarie life, 1077. his death.	1081
Carc. mo fpeech to D. Antonio ,	1216	Chriftian flaues feaze vpon the caftle of Tunes, 990	990
Celts paffe into Spaine,	10	Chriftians land with an army at Geibe,	1086
Celiberians take armes for the Romanes,	40	D. Charles Prince of Spaine grieuoufly ficke, 1094. he is vnphealing to his father, 1126. he was va- nable for women,	1133
Ceremonies of the Barbarians when they are lu- tors,	95	Charles Archduke of Auftria fent into Spain, 1137	1137
Celiberians defeated by Publius Flaccus ,	109	Circuit of all Spaine,	1147
Cefar difarmes Africanus and Petrus ,	119	Ciuiti warre in Arabia,	165
Ceffion of the rights of Rouffillon to the houfe of Aniou,	509	Cid Ruis Diuz returns into Catiffle,	350
Ceremonie at the K. of Nauarrs coronation,	635	Ciuiti warres corrupt the beft tride,	351
Ceremony in taking poffeffion of Nauarrre,	693	Ciuiti warre in Catiffle,	350
Ceremony of the Order of the golden heere,	696	Claufe in D. Alphons's will prodigious,	716
Ceremonies vied at the taking of any towns from the Moores,	904	Clement of Launoy Vicerey in Naples,	809
Cefar Borgia Cardinall, Bifhop of Pampelona, 993 he is made Duke of Valentinois,	993	Clergy of Toledo deliuer the city to R. Henry , 839	839
Ceremonies at the fwearring of the Archduke Phil- lip and D. Ioane Kings of Catiffle,	967	Clergie of Spaine freed from paying the tenth pe- ny for their benefices,	926
Chriftian religion among the Gothes,	126	Clergie of Spaine helpe the king with money, 1111	1111
Chriftians perfecuted in Africke,	139	Conclufures that the Celtes were mingled with the Iberians,	4
Chriftians follow the Moores in their armes for fpoule,	168	Courfe of the riuer of Ebro,	5
Charlemagne made heire of Ouiedo, and afterward reiefted,	181	Courfe of the riuers of Tagus and Guadiana, 15	15
Change of the Eftate of Catiffle,	195	Contempt of militarie difcipline followes a wifdo- rie,	42
Chriftians defeated by the Moores, and the heire of Catiffle flaine,	266	Councell of Carthage neglect Spaine, thinking to get Italy,	42
Change of Religion among the Arabians in Spain 301.	301	ibid.	42
Chriftians perfecuted by the Moores in Spaine, ibi Chiefe conuents of the Knights of S. James, 318	318	Courage of Lucius Martius keeps the Romanes from defpaire,	48
Chriftians in pay with the Moores againft the king of Catiffle,	361	Confidence of P. Cornelius Scipio fonne to Publius Scipio flaine in Spaine,	51
Children of King Thibaud the fecond,	391	Con. bates vpon furious ambition,	57
Charles of Aniou made k. of Naples & Sicily, 413	413	Concord the ground of filberby,	67
Charles Prince of Salerne defeated, and taken by the Arragonies,	421	Contrieba taken by the Romanes,	90
Charles of Valois refufeth to quit his righte to Ca- telonia,	432	Colonie of Libertrines,	94
Chriftians defeated by the Moores,	516	Confrufie of Spaniards at Numancia,	95
Charles king of Nauar a leper,	606	Corduba built by Marcillus ,	96
Chriftians defeated by the Moores, heere to Mon-	606

Kkkkkk 3 Com-

The Table.

Combat betwixt Amilanus & a Spaniard,	96	Council of Constance,	677
Couetousnes drew Lucullus into Spaine,	97	Combats not to be allowed among Christians,	979
L. Comedus versus a persecuter of the church,	121	Conquest of the Canaries,	680
Council of Illiberis ,	125	Controversie betwixt England and Castile for	707
Councils of Sardinia and Syrmium,	131	precedence,	707
Constantine a tyrant,	136	Conditions of peace betwixt Castile, Nauarre and	712
Council at Toledo,	137	Aragon,	712
Council at Tarazona, Saragossa, and other places,	137	Constable of Castile sent from the court for fixe	721
Conspiracy of the son and mother-in-law against	141	yeares,	729
the father,	143	Council to arme a multitude dangerous,	731
Council of Toledo,	144	Confederates besieged in Olmedo,	731
Council of Seville,	144	Condemnation of the confederates,	731
Continuance of the Goths kingdom in Spaine,	154	Constable restored to fauour, and made Master of	731
Council of the Mahometists at Damas,	164	J. James , 731 hee is charged, and in danger to	745
Conquests of Alphonso the first, and 3. King of O-	173	be slaine. 741, his possessions, 745.	581
uiedo,	173	Complaints of the Arragonois oppressed,	581
Confusion and ciuill warre among the Moors,	223	Complot betwixt king John and Gaston of Poix,	770
Councils called in Nauarre,	228	ruine the right of Nauarre,	770
Combat of one Knight against another,	246	Conspiracy against the Queene of Castile and Ber-	779
Conquests of the King of Arragon vpon the	249	trand de la Cuenca,	786
Moors,	249	Continuance of the warre in Cattalonia,	786
Controversies for ecclesiasticall matters decided	255	Confederates in Castile contemne the Popes au-	799
by armes,	255	thoritie, 779. they appeale from him to a gene-	800
Coardize of the sonnes in law of Cid Ruis Diaz ,	263	ral council,	800
Couetousnes of the Geneuois infamous,	266	Contention for the Bishopricke of Siguenza,	801
Conversion of Masse a Jew,	268	Courtesie well rewarded,	804
Confirmation of a peace betwixt Nauarre and Ca-	293	Confession of Isane Queene of Arragon at her	810
stille,	293	death,	811
ibid. ,	293	Contempt of iustice in Castile,	811
Cordova yielded to the king of Castile,	311	Constable of Castile murdered by the people, 812	812
Confirmation of the Order of Calatrava,	318	Contention betwixt king Fernand and Queene I-	847
Consent for the Knights of S. James built,	318	zabelle ,	847
Colledges, commanders, and Hospitals belon-	319	Consultation touching the re-union of the royall	880
ging to the Knights of S. James,	319	reuenue,	880
Council of S. Iohn de Laran vnder Innocent the	348	Confederates to the Duke of Viseo executed,	910
third,	348	Contention betwixt the Arch bishop of Toledo,	915
Conuents of the Order of S. Dominicke, built by	355	and the Queene of Castile,	915
the King of Castile,	355	Columbus his first comming to the Kings of Ca-	945
Contentions in Arragon,	380	stille 918. his first voyage to the Indies, 945. hee	945
Confines of Murcia and Valencia,	370	is made Admirall of the Indies. 948. his third	948
Cordova surprized by the Christians,	390	voyage to the Indies, 956. he with his brother	948
Contumacie of D. Alphonso king of Portugal,	390	are sent prisoners into Spaine, 960. his fourth	880
Council at Lyons vnder Pope Gregory the tenth,	399	voyage to the Indies, 970. his death,	880
Complaints and requests of King Alphonso to the	409	Councils are dangerous for the Church of Rome,	883
Pope, but in vaine,	412	Couetousnesse of a Spaniard controuled by an In-	906
Comde poisoned by Masfroy ,	412	dian,	912
Conference of Deputies for the Kings of France &	429	Conspiracy against king Fernand ,	924
Castile,	429	Contention for the Master-ship of S. James,	924
Conditions of peace betwixt the King of Arragon	432	Contention for the towne of Arevalo,	948
and Charles of Naples a prisoner,	432	Court of Parliament violated,	948
Compromise betwixt the Christian Princes of	447	Complaints against Cardinall Ximenes ,	949
Spaine,	447	Controversie for the Earledome of Ribado,	952
Coronation of Philip of Euxen king of Nauarre,	478	Coronation of the king of Castile, the first of that	960
Conditions betwixt the king of Castile, and the	569	name,	960
Prince of Wales,	569	Conference of Deputies touching the Realme of	968
Conditions of peace propounded by the King of	638	Nauarre,	968
Portugall to Castile,	638	Combat betwixt two Arragonois,	974
Conditions propounded by the duke of Beneuent,	646	Council giuen to the Emperour by the Bishop of	977
Council of a Jew against Iewes,	652	Ofisa,	977
		Colledge of Iesuites built at Eborn,	977

The Table.

Conference for the limits of Nauigation betwixt	978	Defeat of Celtiberians,	91
Castile and Portugal,	978	Despaire of the Numantins,	108
Conditions imposed vpon the Elector of Saxony,	1016	Death of many learned Spaniards,	119
Constancy of the Elector of Saxony,	1018	Defeat of the Emperor Valens army, and his mis-	130
Contreras a rebel at Peru,	1034	table end,	130
Commendation of the Emperor Charles ,	1081	Defeat of Alarie ,	131
Council of Trent,	1094	Defeat of Astila ,	133
Controversie betwixt the French and Spaniards	1095	Desire of reuenge in a woman damnable,	134
for precedence,	1095	Defeat of Sueus and death of Richaire ,	135
Commissioners appointed to order the Moors,	1127	Death of Ricarde and his vertues,	144
Considerations of the Council of Spaine,	1133	Decree of the ninth Concile of Toledo,	148
Councillors about D. John of Austria,	1147	Decree made against the Iewes,	152
Conuoy defeated by the Moors of Granado,	1152	Death of Mahomet ,	162
Christians defeated by the Moors,	ibid.	Defeat of Moores,	174
Commander of Castile dissuaded D. John from	1164	Deeds of charity done by D. Ramis King of Leon,	203
fighting with the Turke, 1164. hee is sent to	1164	Death of the seuen brethren of Lara very lamen-	214
succeede the Duke of Alba in the government	1178	table,	214 of the Low countries,	1178	Defeat of the Castilians and death of their Earle,	218
Cruelty of a Grandfather,	10	Declining of the Moores Monarchy in Spaine, by	220
Cruelty and treachery of Lucullus ,	96	their diuisions,	220
Cruelty, auarice and infidelity of Valens against	129	Death of D. Sancho King of Nauarre,	230
the Gothes,	129	Detection of D. Garcia of Nauarre in Castile,	237
Cruelty of Fab. Maximus against the Spaniards,	101	Death of D. Garcia Sanchez King of Nauarre,	237
Cruelty of Agila against the Christians,	140	Deeds of almes done by the King of Castile,	239
Cruelty of Vitric to young Luiba ,	144	Debate for the Primacy of Spaine,	252
Cruelty of King D. Alphonso ,	414	Death of Cid Ruis Diaz ,	263
Cruelty of Sancho King of Castile,	435	Death of D. Alphonso the sixth,	268
Cruelty of D. John of Castile,	438	Death prodigious of D. Fernand of Castile,	288
Cruelty breeds feare, but not loue in subiects,	504	Detextery of D. Alphonso king of Castile,	288
Cruelties committed vpon the Iewes,	632	Debate among Bishops to enlarge their Dioceses,	290
Cruelty and couetousnesse to the Indians made re-	945	Death of the Emperor D. Alphonso ,	305
ligion odious to the vnbeteleuing,	945	Death of D. Sancho the desired,	304
Cruelty of the sonne to his father and brethren,	1020	Death of D. Raymond Berenger Earle of Barcelo-	310
Cruelty of the Marquis of Mendeiar,	1144	na,	310
Cruelty of the Xeriffe Mahomet ,	1190	Defeat of Christians nere to Alarcos,	329
Cruelty of the Marquis of Santa Cruz to the	1224	Deeds of D. Sancho the Strong,	330
French,	1224	Deceit of Mary Queene of Arragon commenda-	333
Custom to anoynt kings taken from the Hebrew,	188	ble,	333
Custom to make women drinke first in Spaine,	218	Defendants of the house of Champagne,	334
Custom ancient and religious to purge them-	246	Death of D. Fernand of Nauarre,	337
selues by oth,	246	Death of D. Fernand sonne to the king of Castile,	339
Cuenca taken from the Moores,	417	Death of D. Sancho King of Portugal,	344
Curse of the father vpon the sonne,	487	Death of D. Alphonso the noble, king of Castile,	347
Custom of Alaua,	1030	Death of D. Henry king of Castile,	354
Cusco results from Gonsaluo Pizarro ,	1227	Death of D. Aluar and D. Fernand de Lara,	355
Conquest of the Island of the Tercera's,	1227	Death of D. Fernand king of Castile,	381

D

Amas the seat of the Caliphes,	164	Death of Mary Queene of Castile,	466
Desire of reuenge brutish,	3	Death of D. Denis king of Portugal,	469
Description of Spaine,	13	Defeat of Nauarrois by Guispuos ,	477
Description of Sardinia,	22	Death
Description of the Celtiberians,	28
Defeat of the Carthageans,	44
Defeat of Spaniards,	79

The Table.

Death of D. Fernand heir of Castile.	495	Death of D. John de Pacheco Master of Saint James.	840
Defeat of Arragonois and Nauarrais by the Castilians.	499	Decrees of the Estates in Castile executed.	884
Defeat of the garrison of Logrogne by the Earle of Foix.	500	Discovery of Manicongo.	906
Death of Ximenes de Luna Archbi. of Toledo.	506	D. spaire sometimes bringeth helpe.	933
Defeat of the Castilian army and death of the Admiral.	509	Death of Iohn king of Portugal.	951
Death of Philip king of Nauarre.	517	Death of Pope Alexander the sixth.	873
Decree against the king of Maiorca.	521	Death of Isabel Queene of Castile.	874
Defeat of the king of Arragons troupees by his rebels.	523	Death of Philip king of Castile.	877
Debate betwixt Toledo and Burgos for preedence.	527	Demands vacuily made by king Fernand to him of Nauarre.	902
Death of D. Alphonsus king of Castile.	528	Darien a neck of land at the Indies.	906
Detention of the Prince of Nauarre in France.	591	Death of Gonsalo Fernandes of Cordous.	920
Death of D. Fernand king of Portugal.	603	Defeat of Turkes at sea by the Spanish gallies.	930
Delivery of the Prince of Nauarre in favor of the king of Castile.	605	Death of king Iohn and Queene Catherine of Nauarre.	933
Death of young Gaston of Foix.	606	Demands of the townes of Spaine.	945
Death of D. Pedro king of Arragon.	619	Demolitions in Nauarre.	956
Demands of Portugal to Castile.	639	Death of Fernand Magellanes .	977
Demands of the Bilcains to the King of Castile.	640	Death of D. Mammel king of Portugal.	1000
Death of Pope Clement at Avignon.	649	Death of the Empreſse Isabella .	1000
Death of Iohn king of Arragon.	650	Death of Mary of Portugall wife to king Philip .	1003
Death of the Archbishop of Toledo.	663	Deſigne of the Emperor against Germany.	1014
Demands made by D. Henry of Castile to the E. of Arles.	666	Defeat and taking of the Elector of Saxony.	1016
Death of the two ſonnes of Nauarre.	667	Death of Valco Nugnes Gouverneur at Peru.	1018
Death of Pere Lopez of Ayala a valiant Knight.	670	Dexterity of Pedro Gualca Gouverneur at Peru.	1018
Death of D. Moris king of Sicile.	673	Death of Queene Joane the Emperours mother.	1030
Death of D. Fernand king of Arragon.	678	Death of D. Iohn the third king of Portugal.	1052
Death of Charles king of Nauarre.	689	Description of Malta.	1114
Death of D. Iohn king of Portugal.	704	Degrading of a Priest by the Inquisition.	1123
Defeat of the Master of Alcantara by the Moores.	709	Deſignes of the Prince of Spaines discovered.	1130
Death of Iane Queene of Naples and her testament.	717	Death of the Prince of Spaine.	1131
Death of Edward king of Portugal.	722	Death of Elizabeth Queene of Spaine.	1132
Death of D. Blanch Queene of Nauarre.	722	Death of the Marquis of Poza.	1136
Death of two Queenes sisters being poisoned.	723	Death of Christians.	1162
Demands made by the confederates to the king of Castile.	730	Death of Marc Antonio Bragadin.	1162
Death of D. Henry Infant of Arragon.	741	Death of D. Sebastien not beleueed of many.	1203
Deuile of the Prince of Nauarre.	746	Decree of the Governours against D. Antonie .	1212
Defeat and death of the Infans D. Pedro duke of Coimbra.	747	Death of Queene Anne of Castile.	1214
Discovery of the Canaries.	753	Death of Philip Strussy.	1223
Discovery of the coast of Affrike by Portugals.	753	Distinction of Spaine within the Country.	15
Deſire of rule affections of a noble mind.	753	Diuiſion of Spaine according to the antients.	23
Deſignes to trouble Castile.	761	Diuiſion of Spaine according to the warre.	23
Deſire of command and vntamed fury.	763	Diſcretion of Colonels to pacifie a muteny.	69
Death of D. Pedro Giron Master of Calaurau.	795	Diſſembling of Pompey before Numantia.	120
Deſire of riches takes away all Ciuill respect.	803	Diuiſion of the Government of Spaine.	129
Deſcent of Portugal.	803	Diſtinction of the Eaſt and Weſt Gothes.	129
Death of the Infant D. Alphonsus of Castile.	803	Diſſention betwixt the Emperors Lieutenants was the loſſe of Spaine and Affrike.	133
Deſire of charity done by the Eaſle of Hano.	821	Diuerty of religion kills all charity.	138
		Diuiſion among the Gothes.	140
		Diſcourſe of Mahomet not very credible.	145
		Diſloyalty of P. n. l. a capitaine to Bambas .	149
		D. Diego Perello ſtem of the Princes of Castile.	195

Diuiſion

The Table.

Diuiſion among Chriſtians gives an entry to infidels.	213	Dragut beleeged by Doria at Gerbe and eſcapes.	1038, hee comes to Malta and is ſlaine there.
Diſpoſition of a woman inclined to reuenge.	214	Duke of Brittan ſlaine at the Popes coronation.	1115
Dishonolt deſire of a Counteſſe of Caſtile.	218	Dukes, Marquiſes and Earles not hereditary in Spaine.	1143
Dignity of chi: ſe Iuſtice of Arragon.	272	Duke of Beneuet ſeekes to purge himſelfe to the king of Caſtile.	1284
Diſpoſition of D. Alphonsus king of Caſtile.	272	Duke of Braganças praſtices diſcovered by his ſecretary, 906, he is beheaded at Ebor.	907
Diuiſion among the Nobility of Nauarre and Arragon.	284	Duke of Viſco ſlaie by the king of Portugals owne hand.	1614
Diſpoſition of D. Raymond Berengerys will.	310	Duke of Valentinois ſent priſoner into Spaine.	873
Diſpoſition of the ſpoile after the battaile of Muradel.	342	he eſcapes out of priſon, 883, hee is ſlaine at the ſerge of Viana.	886
Diſpoſition of king Thibaud .	373	Dutic of a well aduised capitaine.	891
Diuiſion in Arragon.	445	Duke of Alba enters into Pampelona, 905 he ſubmits himſelfe to the Cardinal Ximenes .	953
Diſturb of great troubles.	457	Duke of Gandia becomes a ſclau.	964
Diſloyalty of the king of Caſtile.	497	Duke of Alba ſent victory into Italy, 1041, hee complains of the Popes adions, 107, he goes to ſiſtule Rome, 1079, he is ſent into Flanders, 1120, he ſends to treat with the Queene of Eng: land, 1170, he enters into Portugal.	1211
Diſpoſition of the will of D. Frederic king of Sicile.	503	Duke of Guile ſent with an army into Italy, 1076
Diſpoſition of D. Pedro king of Portugal.	549	Duke of Medina Cell ſent to gouerne, the Low countries, 1170, he reſuſeth the government.	1171
Diuiſion in Caſtile before it was conquered.	561	Duke of Albas exploits in Portugal, 1212, his death.	1226
Diſpoſition of Charles king of Nauarre.	592	D. Diego Prince of Spaine borne.	1174
Diſpoſition of D. Iohn king of Caſtile.	597	Diſcuſe betwixt D. Anthony and Carcamo .	1216
Diſpoſition of the noblemen of Portugal.	602	Description of the Terceira.	1218
Diſpoſition and qualities of Aluarez de Luna Conſtable of Caſtile.	745	Death of Diego Prince of Spaine.	1226
Diuiſes deſide the Conſtable of Caſtile.	745	Deputies ſent from the Eſtates of the vniued Pri: unces into England.	1232
Diego Hurtado de Mendoza retired to his right of Guadalaſara.	765
Diſorders in the government of Caſtile.	826
Diuiſion betwixt the father and the ſonne.	897
Difference betwixt Fernand king of Arragon and Philip and Joane kings of Caſtile.	880
Diſpoſition of Iohn king of Nauarre.	884
Distribution of the ſpoile at Oran.	894
Difference betwixt a vaſſal and a ſubiect.	905
Drinke given to king Fernand by the Queene his wife.	913
Diuiſion among Councellors in a ſtate dangerous.	919
Discipline of them of Peru at the warre.	982
Diu attempted in vaine by the Portugals.	996
Diſpoſition of the Alarabes of Affrike.	1001
Diu breeged by the king of Cambaca.	1018
Diſpoſition of D. Charles Prince of Spaine.	1132
Diſobedience and inſolencies in Chriſtian ſouldiers.	1146
Diſpoſition of king Sebaſtian .	1160
Difficulties in pulſing the victory of Lepanto.	1171
Dominiſm , the ſecond perſecutor of the Church.	120
Donation falſely fathered vpon Conſtantin .	142
Docility of the Gothike nation.	129
Donations, titles and preuiledges of Monafteries.	210
Donations to Churches.	230
Dominiſm of Uima Author of the Iacopins Order.	345
Donation made by Alphonsus de la Cerde to the king of Nauarre.	478
Diſcord betwixt the Governours and Eſtates of Portugal.	1208
Drought prodigious.	13

E

Earles and Lieutenants gouerning Spaine.	117
Earle of Cattelonia murdered.	189
Earles and Gouvernors of Caſtile murdered.	195
Earle of Caſtile detained priſoner in Leon.	207
Earle of Barcelona ſlaine by the Moores.	219
Earle of Artois ſent into Nauarre to puniſh the rebels of Pampelona.	405
Earle of Oren the Queene of Portugals miſhon ſlaine.	603
Earle of Gyon ſeiſeth vpon Ouede.	648
Earldome of Rouſſillon cauſe of warre betwixt France and Arragon.	839
Earle of ſyſenſe deſected by the Portugals.	853
Earle of Rouſſillon returned to Fernand .	949
Earldomes erected in Portugal by king Alphonſus .	981
Earthquake in Spaine.	874
Earle of Egmont ſent into Spaine.	1119
Eberhard an Archbiſhopricke.	1002
Edict to raze towneſtanding in the mountains.	1231
Edict to raze the chriſtian churches.	123
Edict made by Abu Hatan against the chriſtians moſt cruel.	211
	Edict

The Table.

Edict against Commanders of places that should resist the king.	497	Queen of Spaine his sister.	1123
Edict against the Jewes.	946	Entervew of the Pope, Emp. & French king.	1000
Edict against the Genevois trafficking into Spaine.	938	Enemies to the Prince of Spaine.	1130
Edict against the Moores.	1127	Englishmens goods arrested in Spaine.	1137
Effects of immoderate chollier.	886	Enterprise vpon Tunes.	1173
Esile yielded to the Arragonois.	467	Enty of king Philip into Lisbon.	1220
Elephants held to be common enemies.	95	Equity of Hercules the Egyptian.	5
Election of the Pope given to the Cardinals at Rome.	239	Equity of the king and Queene of Castile.	913
Election of Pedro de Luna to be Pope.	649	Error of Ofus.	125
Election of worthy men to mannage great affaires.	658	Estates without armes are lame.	154
Election of Pope Pius the fifth.	725	Estates of Arragon make warre, peace and leagues.	363
Emulation for honor.	117	Estates of Masjon for the warre of Valencia.	368
Emerits now Metida built by the Barbarians.	117	Estates of Castile miserable.	449
Emerald of inestimable price.	295	Estates of Arragon, where the right of representation was put in pacifice.	480
Emperour Maximilian and king Fernand reconciled.	895	Estates of Sardynia.	514
End of reading of histories.	123	Estates in Arragon, 618. they require reformation on of the kings house.	610
End of Decian the persecutor.	124	Estates at Burgos for a peace.	613
End of Tyrants miserable.	124	Estates at Toro and their remonstrances.	689
End of Count Talien, his wife and children very miserable.	155	Estates of Nauarre at Tafalla.	883
End of the Vandales reigne in Affricke.	138	Estates of Arragon swaere to Prince John.	889
Enty of the Moores into Gaule.	172	Estates of leane Queene of Castile mother to the Emperor Charles.	935
Envy and ieaalousie passions in great men.	195	Estates of Lisbon vnder D. Antonio.	1113
Entervew of the kings of Castile Arragon and Nauarre.	387	Estates of Portugal held at Tamar.	1219
Envy and treachery among the Moores.	224	Estates of Bellemarch Gouvernor of Nauarre.	404
Entervew of the kings of Castile, Arragon and Portugal.	446	Excellence of light in a confusion of State.	69
Entervew of the kings of Navar and Castile.	540	Excellence of Fulvius Nobilior.	89
Enterprises of king Charles of Nauarre detestable.	605	Excellence of Quintus Fab. Maximus.	100
Entervew of the Emperor Sigismund and the king of Arragon.	678	Execution of Spanish prisoners.	104
Entervew of Lewis the 11. and the king of Castile.	773	Excellence of Brutus the Consul.	107
Enterprise of the Master of Saint James.	835	Execution vpon rebels.	112
Entervew of the king of Castile and the Princesse Isabel his sister.	837	Excellence of Spain by Julius Cesar.	136
Entervew of the kings of Castile and Portugal at Guadalupa.	778	Excellence of Henry or Enric king of Gothes.	141
Entervew of D. John king of Arragon and D. Fernand his brother.	869	Excellence of Leunigilde the Gothe.	167
Entervew of Queene Isabel and the Duchesse of Viseo touching a peace.	874	Excellence of the Arabians in Spaine.	207
End of the Albigians Monarchy in Spaine.	941	Example of Coniugal loue most rare.	219
Enterprises vpon the Africans Moores.	956	Excellence of D. Alonso the 8. against the Moores.	233
Entervew of the kings of France and Arragon.	882	Excellence of Cid Ruis Dias in Andalusia.	247
Enterprise of Oran by Cardinal Ximenes.	891	Excellence of Cid Ruis Dias, and his banishment out of Castile.	262
Enterprise of K. Fernand against the French K.	939	Expedition to the holy warre in Siria.	271
Enterprises of King Charles and his mother necessary.	917	Expedition against the Mahometists.	277
Entervew betwixt Elenor the Emperors sister, and D. Maria of Portugal her daughter.	971	Exercise of Bishops in that age.	277
Entervew betwixt the French king and the		Excellence of D. Alphons the 8. against the Moores.	278

The Table.

Exploits of the Castilians in Nauarre.	594	Fertility of Sardinia.	22
Exploits of the new King of Portugall.	608	Fertility and riches of Spaine.	25
Exactions vpon the Clergy.	639	D. Fernand Gonfalez first Earle of Castile; 100. he is surprized in Nauarre & detayned prisoner.	205
Excuses of the Queene of Nauarre.	634	D. Fernand King of Castile assigns portions to his children.	233
Exactions cause of tumults in Guipuscoa.	670	Fernand King of Leon puts away his wife.	325
Exploits of war betwixt the Castilians and Moores.	670	Fest of Triumphant Crucis in Spaine after the victory of Muradal.	343
Exploits of the King of Arragon in Castile.	695	Fernand called the holy proclaimed King of Castile.	353
Exploits of the Moores in Andalusia.	735	Fernand Dias de los Cameros a concussor.	359
Exploits of warre betwixt Nauarre & Castile.	717	Fernand of Castile takes possession of Leon.	364
Expedition into Affricke against Tanger.	777	D. Fernand brother to the King of Castile refuses the realm of Castile; 669. he pretends a title to the Crowne of Arragon; 675. hee is chosen and crowned at Saragossa.	677
Execution at Seulle.	659	D. Fernand of Portugal a prisoner in Barbary 713.	713
Exploits of the Earle of Lerin in Nauarre.	879	D. Fernand K. of Arragon promises the Moores liberty of conscience 905. he (vaquous Amador of Albrer against the French King, 949. he is hure at Barcelona 947. he proves vncharitable; 950. he is desirous to get the realm of Nauarre; 962. he retyes into Arragon; 881. he enters Naples. 882. his last will; 882. his last will; reformed by the aduice of his counsell; 921. his death; 922.	922
Executions of the inquisition in Spaine.	883	Fernand Cortes voyage to the Indies; 875. hee is deprived of his government of Mexico; 1006.	1006
Exploits of Gonfalo Hernandez of Cordoua furnished the great Capitaine.	954	Fernand Infant of Spaine borne.	979
Excuses of the Catholike King for not maintaining a peace with France.	873	Fez wonne by the Xeriff Mahomes; 1189. hee abandons it to the Turkes.	1192
Exploits of Pedro Nauarre at Arzilla.	887	Fire from whence the Pyrenes took their name.	15
Extremities of the Spaniard at the Indies.	891	Excess committed by the Duke of Infantazgo.	947
Exploits of Gaston of Foix.	901	Excess of the Spanish army in Beane.	973
Exploits of Vasco Nugno of Bilbao at the Indies.	906	Excess of Bouguillo Prouost of the Court.	981
Exploits of King Manuel in Affricke.	923	Excess of a disordered soldier.	1143
Exactions of Pope Leo hindred by Cardinal Ximenes.	946	Exploits of the Marquis of Velaz.	ibid.
Excess committed by the Duke of Infantazgo.	947	Factions in the senate of Carthage.	36
Excess of the Spanish army in Beane.	973	Fable of Scipios birth.	55
Excess of Bouguillo Prouost of the Court.	981	Facility and courtosie of Gracchus to the Barbarians.	91
Excess of a disordered soldier.	1143	Fable of Goliath.	220
Exploits of the Marquis of Velaz.	ibid.	Family of Toledo in Castile.	252
Factions in the senate of Carthage.	36	Family of Haro Lords of Biscay.	291
Fable of Scipios birth.	55	Family of Aualos.	315
Facility and courtosie of Gracchus to the Barbarians.	91	Factions in Castile.	351
Fable of Goliath.	220	Factions in Germany for the Empire.	389
Family of Toledo in Castile.	252	Family of Henriquez in Nauarre, Lords of Albitar.	401
Family of Haro Lords of Biscay.	291	Family of Beaumont in Nauarre.	478
Family of Aualos.	315	Family of Pacheco in Castile.	550
Factions in Castile.	351	Parfanes Christian Africans.	625
Factions in Germany for the Empire.	389	Family of Aualos come out of Nauarre.	664
Family of Henriquez in Nauarre, Lords of Albitar.	401	Factions in Castile after the Kings death.	668
Family of Beaumont in Nauarre.	478	Family of Estuniga and Suniga come out of Nauarre.	680
Family of Pacheco in Castile.	550	Factions in Guipuscoa and Biscay.	737
Parfanes Christian Africans.	625	Factions of Beaumont and Gramont.	751
Family of Aualos come out of Nauarre.	664	Factions in Biscay.	822
Factions in Castile after the Kings death.	668	Famine in Perpignan.	847
Family of Estuniga and Suniga come out of Nauarre.	680	Family of Peralta.	883
Factions in Guipuscoa and Biscay.	737	Faction of Beaumont in the Court of Nauarre.	904
Factions of Beaumont and Gramont.	751	Faction against Cardinal Ximenes.	926
Factions in Biscay.	822	Famagosta besieged by the Turkes; 1159. yielded vnto them.	1162
Famine in Perpignan.	847	Payal and the other Ilands yielded to King Philip.	1228
Family of Peralta.	883
Faction of Beaumont in the Court of Nauarre.	904
Faction against Cardinal Ximenes.	926
Famagosta besieged by the Turkes; 1159. yielded vnto them.	1162
Payal and the other Ilands yielded to King Philip.	1228
		Forces of the Emperor Charles at his going to Tunes.	987
		Forces of Barbetouffa in Tunes.	988
			Fort

The Table.

Fort built at Diu by the Portugals 997. beſeiged by the Turkes.	998	Garcia Almoravid head of a faction.	405
Fort built by the Spaniards in the Iſland of Gerbe.	1088	Gaston Earle of Foix ſucours the Nauarrois.	500
1088. beſeiged and taken by the Turkes.	1093	Gardes ſet about the Popes pallace.	664
Fort built at Tunes taken by the Turkes.	1174	Garcia Mendez of Badajos ſlaine at Burgos by the mutinous multitude.	802
Forces ſent into Ireland by the Pope and king of Spaine.	1219	D. Garcia de Toledo in diſgrace.	1124
Friends ſtare off are ſlow to ſuccor.	38	Galeate taken from the Moores.	1151
Friend ſick at need.	109	D. Geoffrey gouernor or Earle of Barcelona.	186
French invade Gaule.	130	Genealogy of Ouiedo and Leon.	195
French defeated in Spaine.	139	Genealogy of Caſtile.	200
Froila murders his brother.	174	Genealogy of Leon.	216
French drawne into Spaine by the Moores diuiſions.	176	Generoſity and bounty of king Almenon to D. Alphonſo the ſixth king of Caſtile.	246
French defeated at Ronceuaul.	181	Genealogy of Caſtile and Leon.	ibid.
Fraud of the king of Nauarre ill executed.	287	Genealogy of Portugal.	327
French king ſuours the king of Nauarre.	300	Geneſes of the Gibiline faction againſt the Aragonois in Sardynia.	502
Frederic of Arragon ſeizeth vpon Sicile.	436	Gironne beſeiged by the French and taken.	428
French defeated by the Cattelans in Greece.	615	Girdle enchanted.	535
French ſucceſs fruſtleſſe for Caſtile.	647	Gironne a principality for the eldeſt ſonne of Arragon.	542
Frederic Duke of Beaumont a priſoner.	698	Gijon yielded to the king of Caſtile, and the Earle baniſhed.	654
Frederic Duke of Arione dies in priſon.	708	Gibraltar taken by the Caſtillians.	771
Frederic of Arragon Earle of Luna a priſoner in Caſtile.	856	Gibraltar ſo called of Taſſiffe a Moore.	154
French ſpoile Guipulcoa.	887	Gibraltar diuided into factions.	1178
Frederic Henriquez confined into Sicile.	898	Gold and ſilver forbidde among the ancient Marquins.	21
Francis Phibus entrench into Nauarre, and is poſſeſſed.	973	God doth onely raiſe and ruine Eſtates.	50
Francis Ximenes of Ciferos Archbiſhop of Toledo, 956. hee is made a Cardinal, 884. his condeſcende, 956. hee is made a Cardinal, 884. hee is ſcience, foreſight and magnanimity, 892. hee is made Gouernor of Caſtile, 924. his prouidence for the peace of Spaine, ibid. his wiſdome to maintaine his Authority, 927. hee is an enemy to the Geneſes, 940. hee is ambitious and impatient of injuries, ibid. hee maintains his authority reſolutely, 944. hee is poiſoned, 952. his ſpeech to the Infant D. Fernand , ibid. his death and diſpoſition.	958	Gouernment of Spaine vnder the Emperours.	117
Franges yeelds Fontaraby baſely to the Spaniards, and is degraded.	973	Gouernor ſlaine by a peafant for his cratching.	118
Francis the French king taken at Pauia.	1027	Ghoſpel preached in Spaine in Tiberius time, ibid.	126
Francis Pizarro murdered at Peru.	1174	Goths invade the Romaine Empire.	127
Francis Drake firſt voyage to the Indies.	106	come out of Asia into Europe.	127
Fury of Barbarians brutiſh.	706	Goths, Getes and Gepides all one.	129
Funerals of Iohn king of Portugal.	903	Goths, made Arrians by the Romans.	135
Fulminations of Pope Iulio againſt Lewis 12.	906	Goths deſeated in Africa by the Romans.	139
French defeated at ſea by the Spaniards.	1223	Goths kingdome in Spaine ruined.	154
Forſe built at the Tercezes.	1226	Goths deſeated in rebellion, though the Prince God not pleaſed with rebellion.	203

G

Gardians call the Carding, into Spaine.	27
Gardians of Valencia.	32
Gaditians call the Carding, into Spaine.	45
Gaditians offer to yeeld vnto the Romaines.	68
Galla a victor defeated by his rafineſſe, 98. hee is ſent to ſuppreſſe the rebels in Spaine.	119
Gallia made a kingdome.	191
Garcia Earle of Caſtile murdered.	229
Garcia king of Galicia diſpoſſeſt, 241. hee is made a prey to his enemy by reaſon of his tiranies, 242

The Table.

Gregory Biſhop of Offia Protector of Vines.	265	Henry Prince of Caſtile wonne by the Conſtables faction.	726
Grecians defeated by the Cattelans.	455	Henry the fourth king of Caſtile giues his enemies meanes to make war againſt him, 783. being deſtitute of all humane helpe, hee hath recourſe vnto God, 784. hee is degraded in effigie, and his brother declared King of Caſtile, 781. his patience, ibid. hee oppreſſeth his truſtie ſeruants, and dares not deale with his rebels, 796. hee is forſaken by his ſubiects, 800. his indifcretion, 803. his falſe oath, 825. hee takes no cares for the ſucceſſion of the Realme.	841
Greene croſſe the badge of the Knights of Calatrua.	676	Hernandades of Caſtile.	828
Granado yeelded to the Kings of Caſtile.	940	Hernando Aluarez beheaded.	881
Gredelines of the Flemmings gouerning K. Charles 945.		S. Hermes at Malta taken by the Turke.	1116
Greatest of the King of Spaines dominions, 1095		D. Henry king of Portugal. 1204. his proceeding touching the ſucceſſion, 1205. his death and diſpoſition.	1207
Gun-powder an ancient inuention.	8	Hypocriſie of the Infant D. Sancho .	417
Gusdalquib, the Spring and courſe.	16	Hypocriſie of the Inquiſitors in Spaine.	1123
Guipulcoa a member of the realme of Nauarre.	201.	Horſes in Spaine.	27
Guſts to Elenor of England Queene of Caſtile in fauour of her marriage.	315	Hope and Deſpaire breed like effects at the ſeege of Sagunt.	37
Guipulcoa yeelded to the king of Caſtile.	335	Honor and liberty animate valiant men.	66
Guipulcoas enemies to the Nauarrois.	500	Hopitality of king Almenon a Moore.	241
Gifts of Henry the 4. king of Caſtile.	753	Hoſe of Biſcay.	313
Gouernors draw king Philip into Portugal.	1210	Hoſes of Religion built by Alphonſo king of Portugal, being excommunicate.	391
they ſeek to diſſolve the Eſtates.	ibid.	Hopitaliers enriched with the ſpoils of the Templers.	453

H

Hanno voyaged along the coaſt of Affricke.	34	Houses of ſtrength turrets for theues, ruines in Guipulcoa.	740
Haunſal ſent into Spaine. ibid. hee is made Gouernor of Spaine, 36. hee marcheth towards Italy.	39	House of Braganza in Portugal.	776
Hanno defeated by Scipio , ibid. hee is ſent againe into Spaine.	61	House of Mendoza gouerns the Realme of Caſtile.	797
Hambroz the Moore betrays the Toledains.	180	Hoſpital of S. James built for Pilgrimes.	917
Harred betwixt ſue Chriſtian kings raigning in Spaine.	335	Hope of gaine makes vice remaine vnpoſſible.	915
Habit of the knights of Alcantara.	356	Hunger in the Emperors army at Alger.	1068
Haro Lord of Biſcay much honored by the king of Caſtile.	429	Humanity of Matellus to poore innocents.	1060
Harred betwixt D. Iohn Nagues de Lays , and Don Alphonſo of Albuquerque.	532	Huns chaſe the Gothes out of their conqueſts.	129
Harred among Courtiers cannot be reconciled, but with the ruine of the one partie.	701	Humanity of the Gothes to the vanquiſht Sueues.	135
Harred of the Portugueſes and Caſtillians.	1210	Humanity of King Hazen to a Chriſtian his priſoner.	214
Heſperus of whom Italy and Spaine are named.	5	Hueſca taken and the Moores defeated.	264
Hercules defeats the Curetes.	9	Humanity and modeſty of a Moorish king.	417
Heauines in Gr. Scipio's army without apparent cauſe.	47	Hugh Iudge of Arborea murdered by his ſubiects.	618
Hermingſdale a Chriſtian ſlaine by his fathers commandement, being an Arrian.	141	Humanity of Chriſtians to baniſhed Iewes.	947
Henry of Lorraine the ſtemme of the houſe of Portugal.	247	Husbandrie of Cardinal Ximenes .	937
the firſt Earle of Portugal.	258.
D. Henry takes vpon him the tide of king of Caſtile, 566. hee is defeated in battell, 570. hee is releued againe by the French, 572. hee is ſeſſed king of Caſtile, 578. hee is poiſoned.	590
D. Henry the 3. proclaimed king of Caſtile.	628
Hermite an Impoſtor.	644
D. Henry lubdues his rebels.	ibid.
D. Henry Maſter of the Order of Chriſt firſt diſcouered at ſea.	681
D. Henry Infant of Arragon deſtroyed of his lands in Caſtile.	684
D. Henry de Guzman drowned neere to Gibraltar.	711.

The Table.

D. James king of Maiorca disposeth by his Nephew.	428	Indiscretion of D. Gutierrez Fernandez.	308
D. James king of Maiorca slain.	525	Interest of the French king to the crowne of Castile.	352
Lew Collesor of the kings revenues slain in Guipulcoa.	774	Inhabitants of Pampelona refuse to doe homage to the king of Castile.	387
Iewes and plate taken from Chuchers by the king of Castile.	852	Injustice of D. Pedro king of Arragon to his brother.	419
Iewes and converted Moores oppressed upon slanderous reports.	992	Insolencies of the French in Sicile.	442
Iewes constrained to be baptized.	958	Invasion of Castile by the king of Granada.	442
Ignorance makes people subiect.	30	Integrity of D. John Ramirez of Arellan.	573
Ignorance surprized by the Prince of Arragon.	788	Integrity of Leonora Queene of Castile.	601
D. John Nuygues de Lara defeated and taken prisoner.	444	Intercession for D. Henry Infant of Arragon.	684
D. John of Castile brings the Moores into Spaine against the king his brother.	438	Infants of Arragon loose all their land in Castile.	704
D. John Alphonsus of Albuquerque poisoned.	537	Insolencies of the Constable of Castile made knowne vnto the king.	716
D. John of Abendagno murdered by the Lord of Biscay.	539	Insolency of the commons punished.	725
D. John de la Cerde slain by the king of Castiles commandement.	548	Ingratitude of Pope Calixtus.	755
D. John of Arragon in the king of Castiles presence.	547	Insolency of the confederats in Castile against the Pope Legat.	800
D. John Master of Auiz aspires to the gouernment of Portugal.	603	Insolency of the Master of Saint James.	829
607, he calls the English into Spaine.	612	Inquisition in Spaine against Iewes and Moores, and the fruits thereof.	870
D. John de Pacheco gouerns Prince Henry of Castile.	777	Integrity of king Ferdinand and Queene Isabel.	899
John king of Arragon pawneth Roussillon to Lewis the French king.	769	Inquisition in Arragon.	927
he is proclaimed an ene-emy to the country.	830	Inquiry done to the kings Receiueurs.	932
his demerity.	830	Injury done to the kings Reueiueurs.	946
he gives the precedence to his son the king of Castile.	864	Indians gentle and tractable.	946
his death.	873	Inuestiue made by the Constable Velaesca against Cardinal Ximenes.	926
John king of Nauar goes into Castile.	962	Intreaty of the Infant D. Fernando to Cardinal Ximenes.	954
he is forced to retire into France.	903	Insolency against the kings Officers.	961 forced to retire into France.	1006	Inigo of Loyola and his family.	962
Saint John de Loue burnt by the Spaniards.	1076	Inquisition of Spaine attempted at Mylan.	1111
D. John de Luna flies into France.	1116	Inquisition of Spaine attempted at Mylan.	1111
John de la Valette great Master of Malta.	1116	Inquisition reiected by the Arragonois.	1120
Ilands about Spaine.	1116	Inquisitors what they be.	1130
Illurgis beset by the Carthaginians.	44	Imprisonment of the Prince of Spaine.	1130
ken by Scipio.	917	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Illora yielded to king Ferdinand.	126	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Impiety of Valens.	366	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Impiety of Thibaud Earle of Champagne to his reign.	389	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Impiety of Menroy Frederies bastard.	389	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Imprisonment and murder of D. John Nuygues de Prada.	536	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Imprisonment of the Master of Auiz.	599	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Imprisonment of D. Pedro Manrique.	712	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Imprisonment of Charles Prince of Viana.	763	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Impunity the nurse of all disorders.	1001	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Imposition cause of troubles.	1003	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Imperial army landed at Alger.	1113	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Ilands of Philippina discovered.	1216	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Imputations laid upon the Duke of Alba.	41	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Indiscretion and rashness of Bosphorus.	46	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Infidelity of the Celiberrians.	86	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Integrity of Penalarum.	279	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Intercourse of L. Babins vnto the Duke of Alba.	279	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130
Inuention of Saint James Sepulcher.	279	Inquisitors sharpe persecutors of Prince Charles.	1130

The Table.

Isabella sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Nauarres lands in Castile forfeited and giuen away.	696
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Arragon defeated and taken prisoner at sea by the Genouois.	709
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Castile and Nauarre visit the Constable.	724
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Castile puts the Constable to death, more through base feare then for the loue of Justice.	745
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Nauarre and the Lords pacified and reconciled to the new king of Castile.	759
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Castile contemned of his subjects.	753
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Castile makes warre against Nauarre.	766
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Castile reioyced with the adulterat birth of his supposed daughter.	781
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Portugal abandons Zamorra, 854, his base courage, 864, he despaires.	805
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Manicongo becomes a Christian.	950
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Kings of France and Arragon diuide the realme of Naples, and dispossesse Frederic.	966
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Nauar and his wife in factions.	885
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Tremessen decaied by the Spaniards.	1009
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Tunes taken by his sonne.	1010
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Tunes expelled by Plucely.	1160
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Fez defeated by the Xeriffes.	1185
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Fez and Maroc warre.	1187
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Fez defeated and taken, 1188, he is set at liberty.	1187
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Kings of Maroc electiue.	1195
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Language of the Spaniards at this day.	30
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Lauren taken by Sertorius in the view of Pompey.	110
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Laves of king Sisehumb.	146
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Law made by the Gothes not to marry the kings widow.	151
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Law of defying a towne.	246
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Lawrence Suarez betraies king Aben Hur, who had entertained him in his exile.	371
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Lands called Beeries in Biscay &c.	533
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Lands of the crowne giuen in recompence of seruice.	622
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Lands confiscated being giuen away hinder the peace.	715
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Lamentation of Isabella of Castile.	942
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Landgrae of Hessen feared by the Emperour.	1116
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Lebriffa and the beginning.	8
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Leon taken by the Christians.	171
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	League of Christian Princes and Moores in Spaine against the French.	181
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Leon the Christians chiefe city taken by the Arabians.	213
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	League betwixt the king of Castile and Prince of Arragon against Nauar.	289
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	Leira taken by the Moores.	298
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	League against Nauar.	320
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	League against Castile, made by Arragon, Leon and Portugal.	327
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	League betwixt the king of Arragon and the widow Queene of Nauarre.	385
Isabella, sister to king Henry, reiects the title of Queene of Castile.	805	King of Castile beset by his own subjects.	683

The Table.

Lewis the French king quits his right to Castile.	760	Loues and vanities of Henry called the Vnable, king of Castile.	801
395		Loofe life of Joane Queene of Castile.	846
League and marriage betwixt Nauar and Arragon.	491	Lords holding the party of Fernand and Isabella and their opposits.	872
Leonora de Guzman mistress to the king of Castile, ill intreated by the widow, 531. she is murdered by the Queenes commandement.	533	Loue of a brother to his brother.	916
League full of infidelity.	573	Lora befeeged by the Castilians.	940
Leonora Queene of Nauar light and vnkind.	622	Lord of Chaux sent for a third Gouernor into Spaine.	943
League against Aluor de Lara the Constable.	690	Logiogee befeeged by the French and releued by the Castilians.	1129
League treated to the preiudice of the king of Castile.	643	Loife receiued by the pirats of Arger.	6
Leonora of Arragon restrained by the king of Castile.	697	Luffus of whom comes Lusitania.	86
League made by the king of Nauar broken.	730	Lusitanians defeated by Catonus .	97
Learning cherished by D. Alphons king of Arragon.	776	Lucullus retires from Palenxa with shame.	109
Leonora Pimentel, Countesse of Plaisance of a noble courage.	820	Lusitanians reuolt and defeat the Romans.	315
Lewis of Beaumont affects the realme of Nauarre, 861. he is made Marquis of Huéca.	954	Lust of D. Alphons king of Castile.	11
League made against the Venetians.	879	M Adria sometimes called Mantua .	21
Learning and armes vnited, make a man compleat.	1182	Maioirquins expert in slings.	29
Legionary souldiers inuented by Card. Ximenes .	928	Manners of the Spaniards in general.	29
League against the Emperor Charles .	979	Magnanimity of the Numantians.	46
Letters from king Charles to discharge Cardinal Ximenes .	977	Majiffa a cruel Aduersary to the Romans.	48
League betwixt the Pope and Emperor.	996	L. Martius chosen general of the Roman army.	52
Lewis Prince of Saouy dies in Spaine.	1035	L. Martius chosen general of the Roman army.	52
League made by the Princes of Germany and the French king against the Emperor.	1160	Majiffa ioynd with modesty in P. Scipio .	58
League concluded betwixt the Pope, king of Spaine and the Venetians.	28	L. Martius honoured by Scipio .	63
Liberty deere to the Spaniards.	187	Mandanius and Indibilis reuolt to the Romans.	65
Liberty of Christians among the Moores in Spaine.	287	Mandanius and Indibilis reuolt to the Romans.	65
Limits betwixt Nauar and Arragon.	297	Maffina Nephew to Majiffa prisoner to the Romans.	65
Lisbone taken from the Moores.	524	Mago and Majiffa charge the Romans.	65
Limitation of the Authority of Iustice Maior of Arragon.	604	Majiffa practised by Sillanus .	65
Lisbone spoiled and burnt by the king of Portugal.	612	Mago brother to Hannibal hopes to recour Spaine.	75
Liberty of the new king of Portugal.	621	72. hee spoiles the Gaditans, 74. hee makes a vaine attempt vpon new Carthage.	80
Lisbone made an Archbishoprike.	940	Manner of the Empurians lying.	104
Liberty of religion granted to the Moores.	950	Magnanimity & clemency of Brutus to rebels.	104
Limits of the Spaniards and Portugals nauigation made by the Pope.	881	Mancinus called to Rome to answer the ignominious accord made with the Numantians.	105
Library gathered by Diego Colombus .	1007	is deliuered bound to the Numantians.	123
Lima called the city of kings.	1206	Martins at Saragossa.	161
Lisbone refusethe king of Spaines letters.	1214	Manners of the Arabians.	161
it yields to king Philip .	205	Mahumer his birth, and country, ibid. his doctrine published in Heracles time, ibid. his death and childre, 162. he was ignorant of all learning.	163
Loue of subiects to their Prince.	271	Magnus a Christian seruing the Moores forreth Pelagius sister.	169
Loyalty and integrity of D. Pedro & Anfures .	274	Marriage secretly made seuerely punished.	179
Lope de Hitero made Bishop of Cordoua.	371	Martins vnder the Moores.	211
Loyalty rewarded makes a good seruant despite rate.	509	Marriage for loue, vnfortunate.	211
Loues of D. Pedro king of Castile.	533	Marriage betwixt a Christian and an Infidel reproued of God.	220
Loue of the Earle of Letin to the Prince Charles .	558	Marriage of D. Alphons king of Castile with a Moore.	257
	754	Marriage of the daughter of Cid Ruiz Diaz .	262
		Mariorca taken by the Cattelans.	266
		Marriage of the Countesse of Portugal detestable.	271
		Magnanimity of king D. Alphons .	274
		Marique de Lara slaine before Huete.	312
		Marriage betwixt Lewis of France and D. Blanch of Castile.	336
		Marriage of D. Henry king of Castile forced.	351
		Marriage of the king D. Sancho Capello .	358
		Marriage

The Table.

Marriage of the Infant of Castile with D. Violant of Arragon.	378	Masterfhip of Saint James in the king of Castiles hands as Administrator.	949
Marriage of D. Frederic of Castile with Blanche daughter of France.	395	Marriage of the king of Arragon with Germaine of Foix.	880
Manfroy vanquished and slaine by the French.	413	Mafines receiued pay among the Spaniards at the Indies.	916
Marriage of Charles 1. king of Nauarre.	475	Magellanes and Faliero Portugals seruice in Castile.	923
Mary of Naples Queene of Maiorca, vnchast.	502	Magnanimity of Cardinal Ximenes .	947
Matorea conquered by the king of Arragon.	520	Marquis of Aguilar Gouernor to D. Fernand .	955
Maffaker of Iewes in Nauarre.	566	Maia a strong fort taken by the Castilians.	966
Mahumer king of Granafo murdered by his subiects.	495	Maioirquins vanquished and punished.	968
Marriage of D. Pedro king of Arragon with the Infanta of Portugal.	523	Maximes of the point of honor at this day.	972
Marriage treated of betwixt D. Pedro king of Castile and Blanch of Bourbon.	533	Marriage of the Emperor Charles .	975
Malandrins passe into Spaine.	566	Marriage of the Duke of Saouy with D. Beatrice of Portugal.	977
Marriage vnlawful of the king of Portugal.	583	Marriage of John king of Portugal with the Emperors sister.	978
Marriage of D. Martin of Arragon, with Mary heire of Sicile.	621	Marriage of Philip Prince of Spaine with the Infanta of Portugal.	1008
Marriage betwixt the heire of Albuquerque and the king of Castiles brother.	628	Marriage of Joane heire of Nauar to Antonio duke of Vendome.	1025
Majority of D. Henry king of Castile.	614	Marshall of Termes defeated by the Spaniards.	1081
Marriage of D. Martin king of Sicile and Donna Blanch of Nauarre.	667	Marriage of the king of Spaine with Elizabeth of France.	1082
Marriage of D. Martin king of Arragon with D. Joane of Prades.	673	Markes of the antiquity of Spaine.	1095
Marriage betwixt D. Alphons of Arragon and D. Maria of Castile.	677	Malta befeeged by the Turkes.	1114
Madera discovered.	681	Manner of the Inquisitors proceeding in Spaine.	1025
Marriage forced betwixt D. Henry of Arragon and D. Catherine of Castile.	683	Maffacre of Moores that were in prison.	1146
Marfeilles surprized by the king of Arragon.	687	Marc Antonio Calanna perswads D. John to fight with the Turkes.	1165
Mahumer defeated and Granado taken by Ioseph Aben Almo .	702	Mahomet the sonne of Abdalla expelled by Maluc his vnclie.	1197
Magnanimity of Alphons king of Arragon.	710	Marriage concluded betwixt Catherine Infanta of Spaine and the Duke of Saouy.	1229
Marriage of the Prince of Castile with the Infanta of Nauar.	717	Majiffa cause of the first Punike warre.	35
Marriage of the king of Nauarre with D. Joane Henriques .	727	Memorable defeat of Moores.	178
Manner of reforming Nuns in Castile.	754	Memory of D. Sancho Abarca .	202
Marquis of Villena becomes a pensioner to the French king.	773	Metropolitaine of Languedoc vnder the Primar of Toledo.	255
Magnanimity of the Infanta D. Isabella .	795	Men of learning admitted into the council of Castile.	379
Magnanimity and Iustice of D. Alphons of Castile.	802	Menaute second king of the Canaries fels the Island to them of Seule.	680
Marriage concluded betwixt Charles Duke of Guicenne and D. Joane of Castile.	824	Merzalguibir a Port in Affrike taken by the Castilians.	877
Marriage of John Prince of Portugal with D. Leonora of Viseo.	819	Mexico at the Indies taken by the Christians.	965
Marshall of Nauarre treacherously slaine.	832	Metz befeeged by the Emperor.	1035
Maffacre of the new Christians.	834	Medina del Campo surprized by the confederats.	720
Marquis of Santillana fur prizeth Carion.	839	Mendozas speech to the French king, and his answer.	1230
Marquis of Villena taken prisoner by his competitor, 841. he begins to adhere to king Fernand and I.abella , 854. hee is reconciled vnto them.	877	Mines in Spaine.	1255
Mahometaine hermita a murderer.	925	Military exercises done by Scipio .	57
Malaga yielded to the king of Castile.	926	Miseries of a place befeeged.	108
Marriage of Calatraua incorporated to the crowne of Castile.	934	Mistaking the ruine of Pompey army.	116
Marquis of Villena valiant and charitable.	937	Middlefle and Christian bounty of king Sizembuth .	146
Marriage betwixt the Infant D. Alphons of Portugal and Isabel of Castile.	938	Mignon of the Queene of Portugals draws Castile and Portugal into armes.	600
		Miseries of ciuill warre.	639

The Table.

Mildness in a Prince without Justice and severity,	918
is hurtful both to himselfe and his Estate,	751 Misfortune in the king of Portugals voyage, into Affrike,	778
Ministers of Justice punished exemplarily,	993
Minors spoiled by Barbarossa ,	993
Marriage of the Duke of Savoy and the Infanta	1231
D. Catherina in Spaine,	15
Mountain of Idubeda,	16
Mountaines called Ianibals Ladders,	115
Moors both in Casir and Pempeis armies,	146
Moors defeated by D. Garcia K. of Ouedo,	778
Moors of Barcelona tributaries to the French,	191
Moors of Oradego king of Leon,	194
Moors drawne into Galicia by a Bishops faction,	212
Moors drawne into Spaine by D. Alphonso king	257
of Castile,	278
Moors defeated by D. Alphonso ,	278
Modesty of greater force then aimes,	331
Moors spoile Toledo and Castile, 331. they in-	332
uade Portugal,	361
Moors of Seulle defeated,	431
Moors expelled out of Minorca,	431
Mother perswades her sonne to reuenge his fathers	434
death,	508
Moors raised from the seerge of Siles and defea-	508
ted,	520
Monster borne in Cattelonia, slaine by the parents	520 and they punished,	579
Moors take Algizire,	706
Modesty of D. Pedro Infant of Portugal,	742
Moors of Granada drawne by the king of Nauar	742 into Castile, 735. defeated nere vnto Arcos, 742
Moors make furious sallies vpon the Christians,	897
Moors they are defeated and their king taken by	900
the Castilians,	950
Melucca 's found in the Castilians nauigation,	961
Moors Mudecians enforced to change their religi-	964
on,	931
Moors persecuted in Spaine,	1009
Moors strong and fit for the warre,	1127
Moors curious and superstitious,	1127
Moors ill intreated in Spaine,	1145
Moors vnnaturall, 1145. they are thrust out of Granado, 1149. they are defeated by D. Iohn of Austria, 1152. after an accord made their re-	1153 tract,	1153
Mutines resolute to submit them to Serpis mercy,	70
Mutines in armies not alwaies of greatest effect,	340
Murder of Garcia Lasso de la Oega ,	484
Murder of the Constable of France by the king	541
of Nauar,	549
Murder of D. Agnès de Castro,	549
Murder of D. Philip de Castro,	675
Murder of the Archbishop of Saragossa,	884
Murder committed by the Earle of Lerin,	918
Mutiny vnder a few of religion,	936
Malay Boabdelsin submits himselfe to the kings of Castile,
Mutines at the Indies through enuy,	918
Murmuring of the Spaniards against Card. Xime-	928
nes ,	937
Multitude of Officers in the treasury hurtfull to the
State,	937
Muley Hesen king of Tunes dispossessed by Barba-
rossa and restored by the Emperor,	1025
Muley Baulon demands succors in Spaine,	1140
Murders done by the Moors of Granada,	1200
Muley Maluer speech of D. Selafian ,	1232
Mutiny at Naples,

N

Nature and manners of the Spaniards,	27
Nauarand Arragon vnited,	189
Nauarrois defeated, and their king Don Garcia	206
taken prisoner by the Earle of Castile,	286 Nauarre vassal to Castile, 286. invaded by the king of Castile and Arragon, 316. he sends	336
Ambassadors to Castile,	336
Nauarre vnder the protection of the French,	404
Nauigations and conquests of Spaniards in the Ocean,	870
Nauigations of the Portugals,	931
Nauarre vnited to the crowne of Castile,	919
Nauy sent into Flanders for king Charles ,	952
C. Nero sent Pretor into Spaine,	50
Negligence of captaines punished sometimes at	103
Rome,	103
Nephew betraies his vncl through ambition,	704
Nice the first General council,	124
Nicholas Ouando Gouvernor at the Indies,	976
Nomination of Bishops belonged to the kings of	151
Spaine,	151
Noblemen of France at the seerge of Saragossa,	271
Nobility of Castile defend their libertties,	321
Number of the dead at the battaile of Muradal,	341
Nomination of the Bishop of Maiorca,	363
Noblemen murdered by the commandement of	532
D. Pedro king of Castile,	609
Noblemen of Castile slaine at Aliabartota,	609
Noblemen at the king of Nauarres coronation,	627
Nobility of Castile defiled by their alliances with	947
conuerced Iewes,	1084
Number of the Christian army going to Tripoly,	1095
Nobility of the kings of Spaine,	1169
Number of the dead at the battaile of Lepanto,	1169
Numanzia attempted in vaine by Q. Pompeius	103
Numanzins reduced to extremity,	108
Nugos de Lara vanquished by the Moors and	409
slaine,	1168
Number of the French army at the Terceeres,	1221

O

The Table.

O Bstinacy of the Barbarians,	104
Oppa Archbishop of Seulle, an Apostate,	179
Ouedo built,	174
Ouedo called the townes of Bishops and made an Archbishopricke,	190
Ouedo supprest in the kings titles,	199
D. Oradego king of Leon puts a way his wife,	204
Offences die not unpunished,	218
Order of the knights of Saint Sauior,	273
Orders for the nobility of Nauarre,	287
Order of Saint Iames instituted,	317
Order of Calatraua,	319
Order of the knights of Alcantara,	347
Order of preaching Friars,	355
Order of knights called de la Merced,	357
Order Seraphical of Saint Francis,	ibid.
Order of the knights of Christus instituted in Por-
tugal,	453
Obseruation in Philip the Faire and his posterity,	459
Order of Montesa in Arragon,	465
Oth reciprocal betwixt the king and his subjects,	471
Order of knights of the band,	489 Obedience of the Noblemen of Castile to their
king,	499
Order betwixt Toledo and Burgos for precedence,	527
Orders for Iewes apparel,	580
Order of Saint Ierome in Spaine,	586 Ordonances made by D. Iohn king of Castile in his last testament,	639
Orders for the gouernment of the realme of Castile,	ibid.
Order for the gouernment of Castile,	637
Orders for the giuing of spirituall liuings,	641
Officers called in question,	659
Order of the golden fleece instituted,	696
Outrage committed by a Moore in Seulle vnpu-
nished,	776
Opinion of the Biscains concerning Bishops,	863
Orders for the quiet of the realme of Nauar,	894
Order touching the gouernment of Castile,	851
Oran in Affrike taken miraculously,	893
Order of the Nuns called the Conception,	900
Orders for the Indies,	930
Outrage committed by the Earle of Vregna,	948
Oran besieged by the Turkes and valiantly defended,	1077
Occasion of a victory lost by the Christians,	1086
Order of the Christians army at Gerbe,	1087
Oran besieged againe and well defended,	1112
Obiections against the Prince of Spaine,	1130
Order of the Christians and Turkes armies at Le-panto,	1168

P

P Affion in Amilcar the ruine of his country,	35
--	----

Parle betwixt Mafinissa and Scipio ,	74
Palatinians among the Spaniards,	106
Pampelone begun,	112
Paliardise the ruine of the Gothes kingdom,	157
Palence restored to the king of Nauarre,	230
Particid among the Princes of Cattelonia,	254
Papacy disputed by aimes,	276
Parliament at Toledo for the Moors warre,	339
Pam; elona in sedition, 346. diuided into two factions,	405
Particids committed by Conrade ,	412
Pablo a Iew conuerced, a learned Doctor and of a good life,	618
Pampelona made one body,	689
Pardon granted to the confederats,	731
Parliament at Toledo,	880
Pastors being negligent cause persecutions,	946
Pampelona besieged in vaine by king Iohn , 910.
it is abandoned by the Castilians, 962. it is taken by the Lords of Asperaut,	965
Passage of king Francis a prisoner into Spaine,	974
Pardon for the Moors proclaimed,	1145
Perpenna and his confederats murder Serriorius ,
111. he is punished for his treason,	112
Pelagius the first king of the Asturias, 168. he flies into the mountaines, 169. he flies himselfe king of Ouedo,	171
Pelagius a religious man cruelly murdereth,	194
Peace betwixt Nauarre and Castile,	289
Peace betwixt Nauarre and Arragon,	303
Pero Nugnes a faithful vassal to his king,	309
D. Pedro king of Arragon slaine in France,	345
D. Pedro of Arragon drawes his brother,	401
D. Pedro Sanches of Montaga, regent of Nauarre,
402. he is murdereth,	405
Peace betwixt France and Arragon,	436
Perpignan taken by the French,	437
Peace betwixt Nauarre and Castile,	501
D. Pedro king of Castile, called the cruel, 531. hee leaves his new wife 3. daies after his marriage, 534. he marries a second wife the first being li-uied, 536. murders committed by him, 538. he puts his brother to death, 546. his diuillish cruelty 548. he spoiles the Venerians at sea, 551. hee murders two other of his brethern, 552. hee murders Queene Blanch his wife, 554. his cruelty, couetousnesse and treachery, 557. his flight out of Castile, 567. he discontents the English, 571. he is slaine by his base brother D. Hen , 575
Peace broken by the Castilian with Arragon,	556
Peace betwixt Castile and Arragon,	585
Peace betwixt Castile and Nauarre,	594
D. Pedro of Portugal a great trauelier,	691
D. Pedro of Arragon slaine at Naples,	714
Pedro Sarmien 's deliueys Toledo to Prince H. 739
Peace concluded betwixt Castile & Arragon,	768
D. Pedro of Portugal chosen king of Arragon, 775
he is crowned at Barcelona, 786. he is defeated with the Castilians, ibid . he is poisoned,	789
Pedro de Ouelasco made Constable of Castile,	834
Pero Gonzalez of Mendoza Cardinal of Spaine,	835

LIIIIII 4

Perpignan

The Table.

Perpignan yielded to the French.	847	Portugal whence it was so called.	18
Peace betwixt France and Castile.	870	Pouerty assures the peoples liberty.	23
Peace betwixt Portugal and Castile.	875	Policy of the Romaine and Carthag. captaines.	43
Pedro of Nauarre made Earle of Albero, 874. hee is		Pompey deceives the Numantins, 103. he is sent in-chiefe conductor of the warre at Oran.	892	to Spaine against S. rictoria , 111. his wisdom to Peace betwixt France and Spaine.	879	end the ciuill war, 112. he is made perpetual go-
Pegnon de Velez fortified by the Castilians.	888	uernor in Spaine, ibid. he gets the farther Spaine
Pedro Arias d' Auila viceroy of the firme land at		to be at his deuotion.	115
the Indies.	917	Policy of Flaccus Commissary of the victuals.	105
Pearles in abundance at the Indies.	918	Popilius Lenax vnfortunat in the warre of Numan-
D. Pedro Giron raiseth new troubles.	955	ti.	104
Peru discovered.	981	Pompey sonne slaine by Cæsar .	116
Peace betwixt the Pope and king of Spaine.	1080	Power of Balancing that of kings.	146
Peace betwixt France and Spaine.	1081	Pope Benedict an heretike.	151
Persecutions in Spaine for religion.	1083	Pope Benedict of Mularra Gonfalez .	218
Pegnon de Velez how situated.	1112	Posterity of the crown of Leon.	258
Pedro of Velez defeated and slaine by the Moores.		Portugal held in fee of the crowne of Leon.	258
1144		Pope ratifies the election of the Emperour Rebol-
Pegnon of Fregiliana, taken by the great Com-		phus .	46
mander.	1148	Pope and D. Alphons king of Castile met at Beau-
Peace betwixt the Turke and the Venetians.	1172	caire.	407
People of the Terceeres brutish.	1218	Pompe at the creation of the Earl of Barcellos.	551
Pedro de Balides defeated by them of the Terceeres.		Policy cruell and detestable of Queene Leonora
ibid.		Telles .	558
Phenitiens spoile Spaine.	8	Pope Clement sends a Legat into Castile.	631
Philip Archduke of Austria and Isaane his wife dri-		Portugals slaine at Alubarota.	609
uen into England by a storme.	880	Portugals of the realme of Granada.	644
Philip Prince of Spaine, sworn future king of Spaine,		Power of the realme of Rome.	672
1007. he goes into Flanders, 1025. his marriage		3. Popes at one time in the Church of Rome.	672
with Mary Queene of England, 1039. hee is		Pope and Counsel condemne one an other.	679 made king of Naples, 1040. he is desirous of a		Possessions of D. Iohn Infant of Arragon.	682 peace with the Pope, 1078. hee returns into		Portugals forced to accept of dishonorable condi-
Spain, 1083. he sends succors into France, 1094		tions.	713
his marriage with his Niece, 1156. he sends his		Policy of the Bishop of Segobia.	724
resolutions to assist the Venetians, 1157. his resolu-		Pope sends a Legate into Castile to treat a peace.
gallies to assist the Turke, 1173. he dis-		799 owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Portugals enter into Castile with an army.	850
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		they are defeated.	857 owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Power of the Inquisitors in Spaine.	885
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Portugal army defeated at Albuhera.	874 owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Pope giues the West Indies to the kings of Ca-
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		stille.	948 owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Prouolt of the Court troubled in his charge and owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		the fact punished.	888
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Pope in despair.	903 owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Policy of Cardinal Ximenes to keepe the nobleowns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		men in awe.	947
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Pope Paul the 4. willing to treat of a peace.	1074
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Pompe at an execution done by the Inquisitors.
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		1123
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Porto Carrero an indiscreet Gouvernor of Gouleta.
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		1174
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Portugal wholly reduced vnder king Philip .	1215
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Pope Gregory allows of the conquest of Portugal.
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		1217
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Proincines out of Spaine vnder the iurisdiction owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		thereof.	14
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Preparation for yron.	29 owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Prisoners taken in new Carthage.	54
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Prachse of the Gaditains discovered & suppressed.	93
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Pretors refuse their charge in Spaine.	113
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Preparations in Spaine to resist Cæsar .	126
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Præfilius the heretike beheaded at Treues.	148
owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Primacy of the Pope.	174 owns to warre against the Turke, 1173. hee dis-		Præfils forbidden to marry.	Prince

The Table.

Princes too superstitious.	177	Proceeding of the Inquisition to torture.	1122
Prachse of D. Garcia king of Nauarre against his		Prachses of the Court of Spaine.	1135 brother D. Fernand .	235	Prachses of a Goldsmith to end the warre with Princes of Spaine betray their fellow Christians.		the Moores.	1155
249.		Pruiiledges of the Inhabitants of Fez.	1191
Pruiiledges granted to Toledo.	256	Pretendants to the Crowne of Portugal.	1205
Prelates of the French nation advanced to Chur-		Punishment of fmuines.	71
ches in Spaine.	261	Publike charge affected for private profite.	93
Prouence giuen to the Earle of Barcelona.	267	Punishment of a cowardly Capitaine.	104
Prachses of the Countesse of Portugal against her		Punishment of a trecherous Gouvernor.	136
sonne.	292	Punishment of Rebels.	149
Primacie of Toledo confirmed.	305	Punishment of a trash man.	267
Prouence returns to the Crowne of Arragon.		Poursuite for the abolishing of the Templers.	453
317.		D. Philip the King of Spaine sworne by the
Proceffe for the Primacie of Spaine.	348	Estates of Portugal.	1226
Prachses of the Castilians and Arragonois against		Qualities of the mountain Spaniards.	28
Nauarre.	418	Queene of Nauar accused of adulterie.	227
Priests allowed to keepe Concubins.	450	her innocence iustified.	ibid.
Pretension of Souerainity ouer Nauar made by the		Quarrels betwixt the Kings of Castile and Nauar.
King of Castile.	452	235.
Princes absence cause of libertie and disorder.	467	Qualities of D. Yraca Queene of Castile.	271
Pruna taken by the Christians.	483	Queene D. Yraca vnchast, put away by her hus-
Preparation of the Moores against Spaine.	550	band.	274
Predictions of a Monke to the King of Castile.		Queene of Portugal expelled for her Insolencies.
552.		377.
Princes in continuall iualousie.	564	Queene Violant of Castile vnchast.	414
Prince of Wales writes to Don Henry of Castile.		Quarrels in Court, where D. Lope Dias of Haro is
570.		slaine.	433
Pretensions of Iohn Duke of Lancaster, to Castile.		Qualities of D. Pedro king of Arragon.	513
585. his preparation against the King of Ca-		Quarrels touching the succesor to Castile.	532
stille.	587	Queene mother of Castile vnchast, and slaine by
Professes of the Court of Rome stayd in Spain.	592	her fathers commandement.	538
Prodigie at Ebor.	603	Queene of Nauarre refuseth to returne to her hus-
Pretension of Lewis duke of Aniou.	619	band, 631. she is intangled in the troubles of Pretensions of the King of Arragon to the realme		Castile, 633. she is sent to her husband against of Sicily.	653	her will.	649
Proceedings of the Earle of Clion.	653	Qualities and disposition of D. Henry the fourth
Princes pretending to the Realme of Arragon.	675	king of Castile.	749
Pruiiledges of the Earles of Ribadeo.	718	King of Castile gotte with child by D. Bertrand
Prince Henry of Castile made run away.	714	de la Cueva .	766
Prachses of Don Aluaro de Luna Constable of		Quarrels betwixt the Earles of Beneuent and Le-
Castile.	ibid.	mos.	822
Presege of the Constables end.	743	Quarrels betwixt the Earles of Haro and Treuig-
Prachse against the Master of S. James.	803	no.	827
Proceeding against the Arch-bishop of Toledo.		Quarrels betwixt the houfes of Mendoza and Pi-
825.		mentel.	839
Prachses of Leonora Countesse of Foix.	832	Qualities of the Princes Fernand & Isabella .	845
Prachses of the Marquis of Villena in Portugal.		Quarrell betwixt D. Frederick Henriques , and D.
848.		Ramir Nunez de Guzman .	886
Princesse careful of iustice.	919	Qualities of King Muley Alboacen .	894
Princes seruants follow for profit and not for affe-		Qualities of Christopher Columbus .	918
ction.	881	Qualities of Mannet king of Portugal.	957
Pretensions of Christian Princes against the Vene-		Quarrell betwixt Pedro Giron , and the Duke of tians.	889	Medina Sidi.	925
Proceeding of the Inquisition vnjust.	940	Qualities of Colonell Filalua .	933
Proceedings of Cardiuall Ximenes allowed by the		S. Quintins taken by the Spaniards.	1080
King.	949	Queene Elizabeth conducted into Spaine.	1085
Prachses of the Flemmish Courtiers to keepe the		Question of precedence vndecided at Rome, 1010
King from seeing the Cardinal.	956	Quarrell betwixt the Duke of Alba and English.
Proceeding of Pizarro at Peru.	1007	1137.
Preiudice done to the French king at the Council		Queene of England refuseth to heare the duke of of Trent.	1097	Alba's Ambassador.	ibid.
Princes of Austria go into Spaine.	1112		Radage

The Table.

R

R Adages slaine, and his army of Gothes ruined,	130.
Rabats Christians in Affricke,	166
Don Ramir put out his brothers and his mothers eyes,	200
Race of Cid Ruis Dias ,	238
Raymond Berenger Earle of Prouence, father to Queenes ,	248
Rashnes of the Earle of Lerin,	883
Religion, a cloake for Tyrants,	7
Religion is naturally reuerenced, whatsoeuer it be,	12
Religion of the ancient Spaniards infamous,	28
Religion receiued with great affection by the Spaniards,	30
Refolution of the two Scipios ,	41
Reward of vertue must not be sought by vitious means,	55
Remembrance of great crimes makes men desperate,	66
Refolution of the Asapians Barbarous,	67
Retreat of two Romaines from Palentia,	105
Refolution of Rhetogines the Numantine,	107
Refignation of Bishoppes reprobued,	136
Reward of a lustfull tyrant,	140
Repentance of Leuigild ,	141
Religion the least care of Conquerors,	168
Reuenge vpon the Toledans for their rebellion,	180.
Rebell punished,	183
Rebellion of the Gouernour of Biscay,	189
Rebellion in the realme of Leon,	205
Rebellion of the sonne against the father,	218
Rewards and punishments maintaine Estates,	223
Religious deedes of Don Sancho the great,	228
Reuenge vnworthie of a royall mind,	233
Rebellions at Toledo draw the king of Castile to besiege it,	250
Reparation of crimes by combate,	263
Reconciliation of the Kings of Castile and Leon,	347.
Realme of Nauarre affected by the Kings of Castile and Arragon,	402
Rebellion in Castile,	359
Reuenge of the death of Conradin of Suabe,	421
Reformation of the king of Arragons house belongs to the Estates,	431
Reuolt in Sardinia,	482
Reuolt in Castile,	485
Rebels of Arragon fauoured by the King of Castile,	523
Reformation of the Iurisdiction of the Iustice Maior of Arragon,	524
Reuolt in Sardinia,	525
Reuenues of Churches taken without the Popes permission,	564
Records of Castile burnt,	594
Rebellion of the Earle of Giron,	602
Refolution for the Queene of Nauarre to returne to her husband,	643
Red crosse, the marke of the Order of Calatrava,	659.
Religious houses built by D. Nungo Aluarez Pereira , Constable of Portugal,	699
Recompences giuen by the King of Castile to the Lords that followed him,	792
Reene of Aniou chosen King of Arragon,	808
Reformations in Andalusia,	367
Rebellion pacified in Castile,	916
Refusall of iustice cause of great troubles in Spain,	939.
Reconciliation of the Cardinal Ximenes , with the Duke of Infantazgo,	947
Reformation of the Infant Don Fernando loule by the Cardinal Ximenes ,	953
Rebels defeated in Castile,	962
Returne of the Emperor Charles into Spaine,	967
Rebellion in Maiorca,	968
Religion a cloake for tyrants,	985
Retreat of Barbarossa from Tunis,	991
Rebellion of the Gantois,	1001
Rebellion of Goulette ,	1002
Returne of Prince Philip into Spaine,	1035
Refolution of Aluaro de Sando in the sort of Gerbe,	1092
Reasons of the Spaniards for their precedence,	1095.
Reasons of the French for their precedence,	1098
Retreat of the Turkes army from Malta,	1118
Refolution in Spaine touching the gouernement of the Low-countries,	1162
Refolution of the Christian armie at Messina,	1163
Ricamed becomes a nurse of the Church,	143
Riches of the Church of Toledo,	252
Rights at the temple at Ierusalem,	267
Rioie and Bureua taken by the Castilians from Nauarre,	321
Richard of England chosen Emperor,	389
Rigour of Don Pedro king of Castile,	556
Rigour of the Spanish Inquisition moderated,	885
Riuer of Plata found by Iohn Dias de Solis ,	907
Rights of the Seigneuie of Venice to Cipres,	1158.
Romaines seeke to get footing in Spaine,	35
Refolution of a seruant louing his master,	36
Romaines resolute to warre against the Carthaginians,	38.
they are defeated by the Carthaginians,	45.
they procure them enemies in Affricke,	45.
they besiege Auringe,	62.
they ioyne with the Carthaginians in battell,	64
Romane Captaines chased out of their campe by their mutined souldiers,	69
Romane Gouernours great exactors,	70
Romaines defeated by the Spaniards,	87.
they are charged by the Celtiberians in a streight,	90.
they are defeated by the Lusitanians,	97
Rome taken by the Gothes,	121
Romaines assailed by the Sueses in Spaine,	133
the Gothes in Gaule,	146
Royalty of the Gothes electiue,	153
Roderic a vitious king of the Gothes,	163
Rhodes taken by Muhamias , Romaines

The Table.

Romaines chased out of Spaine,	166
Roderigo Dias de Bimar a valiant Knight,	238
Rout and death of Don Sancho of Arragon Arch-bishop of Toledo, by the Moores,	409
Robert Sonne to Charles King of Naples put to rout by the Sicilians,	440
Rocke of two Louers,	674
Ruy d'Andar Constable of Castile charged with treason,	685
Roderigo Borgia a Cardinal,	833
Rout of the French army at Noyan,	965
Rome taken and sackt,	975
Roderigo Portondo slaine by Pirats,	979
Rome in danger to be sackt,	1079
	$
S Agunt beleeged, taken by assault,	38
Saguntines reformed to their goods,	45.
they send Ambassadors to Rome,	79
Saxons and french invade Spaine,	122
Saracins why so called,	162.
they invade Langue-doc,	171
Sancho Aberea King of Nauarre slaine by the Castilians,	202
Sancho Emperor of Spaine,	226
Sancho King of Castile slaine,	242
Sancho Ramirez king of Arragon slaine at the siege of Huelfa,	259
Saragossa beleeged and taken by D. Alphons seized on by the King of Castile,	271
Salustia terra taken by the Moores,	339
Sancho King of Nauarre aydes the King of Castile,	340
Sancho King of Portugal why called Capello , he abandons his realme and retires into Castile	358.
he is dispossest of his realme,	390
Sancho of Castile resolues to dispossest his Nephews of the realme,	410.
hee makes a league with the Moores to dispossest his father,	415.
he takes vpon him the Regency and refuseth the title of a King,	416
Saragossa made an Arch-bishoppike,	461
Sardinia invaded by the Arragonois,	467.
it rebells againe,	479
Satisfaction made by the Emperor to the Duke of Infantazgo,	1001
Salt water made fresh by a lymbecke,	1091
Sancho d'Avila sent against D. Anthony ,	1215
Sarmiento fortifies the straights of Magellan,	1225
Scipio sent into Spaine,	39
Scipio and P. Scipio slaine and two Romaine armies defeated,	47
P. Corn. Scipio vertuous but an hypocrite, he begins his charge with a greate enterprize,	52.
hee intreates the Spanish hostiges kindly,	54.
hee giues thanks to the Gods for his victories and commends his souldiers,	55.
hee pacifies a great mutinie, ibid. hee seeke to win the Spaniards by his bounty,	56.
hee encourageth his army to fight,	58.
hee hateth the title of a King,	59
Situation of new Carthage,	33
Scipio relies not vpon mercenaries as his father had done,	62.
hee deceiues Asdruball by his policy,	64.
hee beategeth Ilirius , hee recovereth to vanquish or die,	66.
hee falls very sicke,	68.
hee makes an inuolunt against the mutinous souldiers,	70.
hee prepares to go against Mandanius ,	72.
hee pardons the rebellious Spaniards and returnes to Rome,	75
Scipio Amilianus sent into Spaine reformes the army,	106.
hee repaires Lucullus faules,	107
Schisme among the Knights of Calatrava,	126
Schisme in the Church,	395
Scio taken by the Turke,	1128
Sutes of Iustice erected in Spaine by Constantine the greate,	24
Seuerity in the auncient Romaines commendable,	50
Sedition a mischeife which doth import Estates,	71
Seuerity against souldiers hauing left their garr,	100
Sertorius warre in Spaine, 109, hee is called by the Lusitanians,	110.
hee defeats Manlius and kills Domitius ibid. his life is set to sale, which makes him cruell,	117
Seuile yields the primacy to Toledo,	148
Sects in Mahomets religion,	164
Sedition in Galicia,	208
Seuile a royall seat of the Moores,	213
Sedition, reuolts and usurpations amongst the Arabian Princes,	244
Seditions and trecheries among the Moores in Spaine,	253
Sect newly sprung vp among the Arabians of Affricke,	294
Seuile beleeged and yielded to King Fernand , hee selga a kind of tribute,	380
Sentence giuen by the King of Castile against Don Diego Lopes de Haro ,	445
Sedition in Granada against King Mahmet ,	418
Sentence giuen by the Pope against the Templers,	460
Seals taken from the Arch of Toledo,	453
Seuerity of the King of Castile, makes his Knights flee vnto the Moores,	470
Sedition against the Lewes in Castile,	496
Sentence against the Earle of Foix,	630
Sea of Toledo voyde four years,	661
Sedition at Toledo,	662
Seditions in Cattelonia,	738
Seditions rayled by two Archbishops vnto and Nepheue,	768
Regobia deliuered to the confederate Lords,	775
Seuile ill intreated by the factions of Guzman and Ponce ,	800
Seditions reuiued in Nauar,	867
Sedition in Granada,	879
Siege of Granada,	920
Servant faithfull to King Fernand ,	939
Sentence against the Earle of Lerin,	885
Sedition at Lisbon for religion,	688
Sedition

The Table.

Sedition in Cardinall Ximenes campe caused by a rascall,	893	Spain nourisheth the hatred betwixt the Romans and Carthaginians,	35
Seditious among the Spaniards at the West Indies,		Spaniards inconstant,	39
1897.		Spain fit to supply armes	44
Sentence giuen by the Pope against Iohn of Albret king of Nauarre,	902	Spaniards being mercenary abandon the Romans,
Sedition at Valladolid against Cardinall Ximenes ,	929	46, they are defeated by Scipio and yeeld to his mercie,	73
Sedition against the towne of Villafraze,	949	Spaniards in old time glorious, ambitious, enuious, and trecherous,	77
Secrets of Cardinall Ximenes discovered,	953	Spaniards take armes against the Pretor. 80. they were alwaies apt to rebell. 81. they complaine of the courtousnesse of their Gouvernors,	93
Seuerity of Cardinall Ximenes ,	955	Spain made one gouernement,	94
Sea of Iesuites confirmed at Rome,	963	Spaniards opinion of S. Lames his bodie,	119
Sedition at Peru for the gouernement,	1026	Spain vnder Constantine diuided into fise Prouinces,	124
Sentence inconsiderate and vnjust,	1027	Spies in the king of Nauars Councill,	367
D. Sebastian king of Portugall goes into Affricke,	1176	Speech of the King of Castile to his Councill,	511
Service rashly performed,	1195	Spoyle of a Jew condemned,	553
Settuall taken by the Castilians,	1212	Speech of the Bishop of Calaoorra to the king,	781
Ships sent out of Castile to the Moluccos,	991	Speech of the Arch-bishop of Toledo, too audacious,	849
Shipwracke of the Emperors fleet at Alger,	1004	Spaniards first voyage to Guiney,	865
Sicily why called Sicania,	ibid.	Spaniards defeated at sea by the Portugals,	874
Sciculus gaue the name to Sicily,		Speech of Katherine Queene of Nauar to her husband,	904
Singularitie of the riuer of Guadiana,	16	Spaniards defeated and slaine by the Indians,	918
Simplicity of the Romanes,	38	Speech of the Duke of Infantago,	927
Silence required in a great Captaine,	53	Spaniards slaine in the riuer of Plata,	922
Sillanus defeats the Carthaginians,	61	Speech of King Francis touching his promise to the Emperor,	975
Simplicity of the Spaniards,	91	Spaniards preferue their liues generously against the Affricans,	1005
Silens Bishop of Compostella, a turbulent man,	210	Speech of the Prince of Spaine to the Duke of Alba,	1134
Sicily and Naples held by the Normans,		Speech of Queene Izabella dying, to the King,	1136
Sicilian Euenfong,	411	Spaniards of account slaine at Galeze,	1151
Seigneuries and rights of the house of Lara,	430	Speech of Bragadino at Famagosta,	1161
Seigneurie of Gonsalo , the great Captaine,	882	Strangers tyrannize ouer Spaine,	4
Signe of Cardinall Ximenes ,	957	Statues sent by the Pope into Arragon,	662
Sienna loseth her libertie,	1041	Stones very light fall from heauen,	713
Shippe-wracke of the great Commanders fleet,	1148	Statute of Cordoua for the Nobility,	941
Ships of Spaine cast away,	1181	Store-houses for munition in Spaine,	936
Skirmish betwixt the Christians and Moores at Gerbe,	1087	Studies of Inigo of Loyola author of the Iesuites,	963
Slaughter of Spaniards,	83	Spanish souldiers detest the crueltie of the Marquis of Santa Cruz,	1224
Slaughter of Monkes made by the Moores,	212	Succession of women in Arragon,	183
Snakes in an armie in the dead of Winter,	788	Succession of the Realmes of Castile and Leon by women,	233
Soueraignes should be Iudges, and not parties in their subiects quarrels,	481	Submission of Don Pedro king of Arragon to the Pope,	333
Souldiers should be alwaies in action,	81	Superstitious acknowledgement of a great victory,	512
3. Sunnes seene together in Spaine,	174	Submission of the king of Maiorca,	521
Sobrarbe and Ribagorça vnitd to the Crowne of Arragon,	234	Success of the warre of Naples,	723
Sonne dispossesteth the father,	1009	Superstitions of the Spaniards,	820
South sea discovered by Vasco Nugnes of Balbao,	914	Suspition of loue betwixt the Princesse of Nauarre and the Bishop of Pampelona,	838
Sonne of Aly Bassa set at libertie by Don Iohn ,	1173	Suisses come to the warres of Granado,	901
Spaine vnknowne before the Carthaginians,	2	Submission of the Lantgrauet to the Emperor,	1017
Spaniard at the first grosse and without religion,	3		Succ-
Spain why fo called,	5
Spaine like to an Oxe hide,	15
Springs of the riuers of Ebro and Duero,	15
Spaine reduced to one gouernement, 24. it is compared by nature,	25
Spaniards life simple and rude,	28
Spanish toung a corrupt Latin,	29

The Table.

Succors sent from Goa to Diu,	1022	Titles of Leonora of Nauar,	838
Succors sent to Malta,	1118	Titles of king Fernand and Queene Izabella ,	874
Superfluity of the Portugals going to the warre,	1200.	Testament of Xeriffe Ababomer ,	1195
Succors sent to the Terceeres,	1226	Townes in Sardinia,	22
Sebastian , the first king of Portugall, 1197. bred vp by the Iesuites, ibid. he is vnfurnished of all things for the warre of Affricke, 1199. his army going thither. 1200. his error and resolution, 1201. his death, 1202. his bodie sent to the Portugals,	1203	Torismund king of Gothes slaine by his brothers procurement,	134
		Toledo chiefe towne of the Gothes kingdome in Spaine,	137
		Townes of Spaine demanded, and the people distressed by Vitica ,	152
		Toledo reduced vnder the Moores of Cordoua, 188. yeelded to D. Alphonso king of Castil,	251
		it was called the Imperiall city,	255
		Tortola taken by the Arragonois,	296
		Townes built by Don Fernand king of Leon,	313
		Townes and castles taken from the Moores,	375
		Townes taken by the Moores,	494
		Townes in Castile which giue voyces in the Estates,	527
		Townes in Castile yeeld to the King of Nauarre,	574
		Towne of Saint Vincent obtaines new priuiledges,	696
		Tortola yeelded to King Iohn of Arragon,	789
		Toledo reuolted, and reduced againe to the Kings obedience,	804
		Townes of the Infantaigo giuen to the Marques of Santillana,	824
		Toro deliuered to the king of Portugall, 850. besieged by King Fernand of Arragon, 851. surprised by the Castilians,	866
		Tordesillas taken by the Confederats, 961. recovered againe,	962
		Truth the subiect of an Historie,	3
		Treasure of Spaine casually discovered,	13
		Truce betwixt the Sicilians and Carthaginians,	34
		Trecherie of Hanno against the Senate of Carthage,	35
		Trecherie of a Spaniard,	41
		Trecherie of the Spaniards to the Carthaginians their allies,	64
		Truth breeds hatred in the wicked,	96
		Trecherie and crueltie of Ser. Galbi ,	98
		Treatie made with Viriatus broken by Cepio ,	101
		Traian a Spaniard, the third persecutor of the Church,	120
		Trecherie of Stillicio and defeat of the Imperiall armie,	131
		Traitors frustrate of their hope,	155
		Tribute payed by the Atabians to the Romanes,	165
		Tribute payed by a Christian Prince to Infidels most detestable,	177
		Titles of D. Sancho king of Castile,	426
		Tiscara a strong place taken from the Moores,	463
		Tyrant offended, is neuer truly reconciled,	504
		Title of Prince first giuen in Castile to the kings eldest sonne,	615
		Title of Earle of Eureux ceaseth in the house of Nauarre,	668
		Tyrants care not to be hated, so as they be feared,	692
		Title of Princesse first vsurped by the eldest sonne of Portugall,	706

The Table.

Troubles in Castile by reason of the Kings no- uages,	308	Tumult made in Spaine by the Moors of Granada	1127.
Trecherie of D. Maurique de Lara against his Prince and Country,	309	Turkes come to succour the Moors in Spaine,	1149.
Treasons iustly punished,	362	Turkes goe to beseege Fez,	1191
Troubles in Arragon,	400	V
Truce betwixt the Christians and Moors ,	410	V Allia the Gothe, a friend to the Romanes,
Truce betwixt the French and Arragonois,	433	makes warre in Spaine against the Barbari- ans,	132
Troubles raised by D. Henry of Castile,	441	Vanity of humane greatnes.	155
Tribute imposed by the Pope vpon the Realme of Sicily,	455	Valencia taken by Cid Ruiz Diaz ,	262
Troubles and quarrels where there is much idle Nobilitie,	481	Valour of Cid Ruiz Diaz ,	241
Trecherie of Don Alphonso king of Castil against his owne blood,	483	Valour of Don Alphonso , the noble king of Castile.	342.
Truce very beneficiall to the Moors ,	496	Vanity of the Emperour Fredericke ,	375
Treatie of marriage betwixt D. Pedro of Arragon, and D. Maria of Nauar,	503	Valencia taken by the Arragonois,	369
Troubles by the report of a woman,	508	Valenciens mutinous and seditious,	523
Trecherie of the king of Arragon against the Earle of Trantamara,	556	Valencia subdued by the K. of Arragon,	524
Treason of Don Roderigo of Vris punished,	589	Vagabond troupes spoile Cattelonia,	620
Trecherie of Queene Leonor Teller,	599	Vallidolot submits vnto the king,	794
Treatie of marriage to the preiudice of Castile,	627	Vallidolot the King of Portugall,	857
Troubles in Zamora,	667	Viana surprized by the marshall of Nauarre,	879
Troubles in Arragon,	674	Vasco de Gama layles to Calicut,	938
Truce with the king of Granada,	698	Vasco Nugnes of Balbao beheaded at Darien,	919
Truce betwixt Castile, and the kings of Arragon and Nauar,	703	Valeste a new towne built in the Island of Malta,	1119.
Troubles in Castile by false reports,	757	Vertue giues to euery one his due reward,	57
Treason discovered but not punished,	780	Vertue alwaies enuied,	110
Treatie of marriage betwixt Isabella of Castile, and Fernand of Arragon,	809	Vertue not alwaies hereditarie,	172
Trecherie of the Earle of Lerin against the Marshall of Nauar,	883	Vertue reuerenced euen by enemies,	207
Treatie of peace betwixt France and Spaine,	972	Vertue of Don Ramir the bastard of Nauar,	227
Trecherie of mercenarie Moors ,	894	Vertues of King D. Alphonso the eight,	278
Troubles rayed by the Archb. of Toledo,	825	Vertues of D. Charles Prince of Nauar,	741
Triopoly in Barbary taken by Pedro Nauarro ,	897	Velez Malaga besieged by King Fernand ,	921
Truce betwixt France and Spaine,	912	Velez Malaga besieged by the Spaniards,	916
Trauels endured with great patience by the Spani- ards,	916	Venicians defeated by the Spaniards,	1167
Treatie of Cambray,	979	Venierio the Venetian General incensed against the Spanish souldiers,	1167
Tremessen rebels against the Emperour,	1008	Victorie of great consequence for the Romanes,	43.
Triopoly besieged by the Christians,	1082	Vice and corruption abounds, where strangers bide,	77
Troubles in the Low-countries,	1135	Victorie gotten by the Pretor Heluins ,	81
Tiechery a diuellish reuenge,	1153	Victorie of Scipio against the Lusitanians,	85
Treatie of peace with the Moors of Granada,	1162	Victorie of Ful. Flaccus against the Celibetians,	89.
Trecherie of Musapha at Famagosta,	1162	Virtutus Capitaine of the Lusitanians defeats Vi- rellus . 98. he is defeated by Q. Fab. Max. 99. he is fauoured by the Senate of Rome. 101. he is treacherously murdered and lamented by his souldiers,	143
Treason brought by Sir Francis Drake out of the south sea,	1181	Victorie admirable and almost incredible,	143
Tudela taken by the Earle of Perche,	435	Vitiza a vicious king, his eyes put out by Rodericke	515.
Tumult at Badajos,	464	Victorie of the Christians against the Moors ,	170
Tumults in Castile for the gouernement,	584	Vices of Princes causes of sedition,	211
Tumults at Lisbon for their Kings marriage,	947	Victoria in Alaua built, 323. taken by the King of Castile.	336
Turkes make profit of the Iewes banishment,	934	Victories of the christians at sea against the Moors ,	515.
Tumult at Malaga suppressed,	991	Victorie of the Castilians at sea,	659
Tunes taken by the Emperour,	1077	Victory of Valencia laine by the trecherie of his owne brother.	672
Turkes repulsed at Din,	1090	Viana
Turkes and Moors flee from Oran,	1116
Turkes beseege the fort at Gerbe, Turkes armie at Malta,

The Table.

Viana besieged by the D. of Valentinois,	883	War made by Castile and Arragon against Gra- nado,	434
Victory of Rauenna vnprofitable for the French,	903.	War betwixt Nauar and Castile,	499
Victory of D. Berenguels against the Turke,	939	War made in Castile by the rebels,	504
Victory of the Portugals at sea,	1024	War made by Portugall against Castile,	505
Vices common to young Noblemen,	1122	War made by D. Henry king of Castile against the King of Portugall,	579
Victorie of the Christians,	1169	War in Sardynia,	581
Vniou of Leon and Castile,	231	War betwixt Castile and Nauar,	592
Vniuersity of Salamanca,	375	War against the Earle of Cilion,	648
Vniou in Arragon against the King for their liber- ties,	422	War made by the King of Castile against Arragon and Nauarre,	694
Vniuersity of Palence,	533	Warrant to apprehend the Constable,	745
Vnde bawde to his neece,	626	War of Vcles against the Marquis of Villena,	864
Vnction of the king of Nauarre,	636	War betwixt the French and Spaniards,	954
Vnion of all the townes of Guipuscoa,	686	War renewed by the persecuted Moors ,	964
Vnchastnes of Ioane the 2. Queene of Naples,	686	War against the Constable of Lerin,	886
Vnion of the Princes and Commonalties in Ca- stille for the administration of iustice,	789	War betwixt France and Spaine,	899
Vniou of Castile and Arragon,	876	War betwixt the French and the Emperour,	1005
Vniou of Castile and Nauarre by conquest,	905	Wisdomde of the Romanes in matters of state,	85
Vniuersity of Coimbra erected,	977	Wisdom necessary in a Prince to chooe men of valour,	661
Vniuersity of Tudela erected in Nauar,	1111	Wonders of the mountaine of Stella,	15
Voyage of D. Joane of Castile into Flanders,	955	Women in Spaine warriors and valiant,	104
Voyages made to the Indies,	906	Workes of piety of D. Alphonso ,	188
Voyage of Lopez Suarez de Meneses to the East In- dies,	971	Women Moors massacred,	1151
Voyage of Fernand Magellanes to the Moluques,	976.	War renewed with the Moors of Granada,	1154
Voyage of Sebastian del Cano.,	978	War denounced by the Turke against the Veneti- ans,	1157
Voyage of the Castilians to the Moluques vnfor- tunate,	1180.	X
Voyage of Sir Francis Drake into the south sea,	1180.	X Erifis Kings of Morocco, and their beginning,	1182.
Visrupsations of the king of Castil vpon Nauar,	238	Xeriffe Mahomet Ben Hames makes himselfe Lord of Turedant,	1183
Visrupsations of D. Alphonso king of Castile,	248	Xeriffs his sonnes seize vpon Morocco by treason ibid.
Visrupsations vpon the Clergie in Castile,	622	Xeriffs brethren, in quarrell betwixt themselves, 1185.
VV		Xeriffe Mahomet defeats his elder brother, 1186 they are reconciled.
VVarre to deliuer the oppressed, iust,	4	Xeriffe Hames breaks the peace made with his brother,	ibid.
VVarre made in Sicily by the Carthagini- ans,	34	Xeriffe Mahomet speech to his brother, 1187. his speech to the King of Fez, 1188. he is forced to flee out of Fez, 1191. he recouers Fez againe, 1193. he is murdered, 1194. his testament, ibi .
VVarre in Spaine betwixt the Vandales and Suetes,	133.	Xeriffe Mahomet sonne to Abdalla , being expelled, flies to King Philip for succour, 1198. hee craues ayde from Portugall.	ibid.
VVarre for religion betwixt the French and the Vice-Gothes,	136	Z
VVarre betwixt two breethren Moors ,	177	Z Amora taken and ruined, 218. made a Bi- shoppricke.	278
VVarre betwixt Nauarre and Castile for an iniurie done to the Ambassadors of Castile,	202	Zair a Moorish King baptized,	368
VVarre betwixt the Moors ,	212	Zamora in the power of the King of Portugall,	850
VVarre betwixt Nauar and Castile,	227	Zahara surprized by the Christians.	904
VVarre betwixt 3. breethren, sonnes to Don Fernand King of Castile,	241	Zeale incensed in Charles Prince of Spaine,	1133.
VVarre betwixt the mother and the sonne in Portu- gall,	276
VVarre betwixt Nauar and Arragon,	286
VVarre betwixt the king of Leon and his mother-in- law,	337
VVarin Valencia against the Moors ,	368

F f N f S.

Excuse these grosse misprisions, and for the re? I put my selfe to your fauorable construction.
I fol. 225. lin. 48. for daughter, reade wife. f. 859. l. 21. for, suffered the Portugals to take it, read, suffered it to be taken from the Portugals. In the marg. fol. 273. for delible, r. detestable. fol. 1144. r. by the Moors, f. 889. l. 12. for your husband, read, her sonne.